PREFACE.

"WHAT has this babbler to say?" is substantially the question of every one to whom a new book is offered. For ourselves, it will be difficult to furnish an answer in a sentence equally terse and explicit; yet our book has a definite scope and distinct speciality, which we will proceed to unfold. We call it a "Dictionary of Phrase and Fable," a title wide enough, no doubt, to satisfy a very lofty ambition, yet not sufficiently wide to describe the miscellaneous contents of this "alms-basket of words." As the Gargantuan course of studies included everything known to man and something more, so this sweep-net of a book encloses anything that comes within its reach. It draws in curious or novel etymologies, pseudonyms and popular titles, local traditions and literary blunders, biographical and historical trifles too insignificant to find a place in books of higher pretension, but not too worthless to be worth knowing. Sometimes a criticism is adventured, sometimes an exposition. Vulgar errors, of course, form an item; for the prescience of the ant in laying up a store for winter, the wisdom of the bee in the peculiar shape of its honey-comb, the disinterestedness of the jackal, the poisonous nature of the upas tree, and the striding of the Rhodian Colossos, if not of the nature of fable, are certainly "more strange than true."

In regard to etymology, it forms a staple of the book, which professes to give "the derivation, source, or origin of words that have a tale to tell." Thus, abandon is to "desert your colours;" church means "a circle," and not "God's house," as is usually given; prevaricate is "to go zig-zag," or "plough a crooked furrow;" scrupulous is to get a "stone in one's shoe;" sir is cousin german to the Greek "anax," a king; head, to the Greek "kephalé;" wig, to the Latin "pilucca;" tear and the French larme are mere varieties of the Greek "dakru." A large number of such word-studies have been admitted as walnuts for after dinner. Many others will serve to show how strangely even wise men will sometimes err when they wander in Dreamland: witness the etymology given by Dr. Ash of the word curmudgeon; Crabbe's etymology of the word doze, noticed under the article SLEEP in this Dictionary; Isidor's derivation of the word stipulate; Blackstone's deduction of parson from "persona;" Pliny's druid from "drus," an oak; Scaliger's etymology of satire; Bescherelle's bigot; Ducange's Saracen; Bailey's Dunstable; the derivation given in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle of the Isle of Wight; that of barbarous from "barba," a beard; of Shoreditch from "Jane Shore;" of Stony Arabia; and Ptolemy's blunder about Arabia Felix (see YEMEN). These are "pleasant fables" in word-lore, and have a full right to take their place in this museum of literary odds and ends.

Fugitive matter of this sort makes up no small portion of our bulky volume; but, after all, the main substance of the book is "Phrase and Fable" proper. We have all met with a number of familiar phrases, some of them "as old as the hills," the meaning of which, though perfectly plain, it is difficult to connect with the words themselves. Why, for example, is common sense so called? and how can we be said to have seven senses? Why is kindness of heart called good-nature? and one "gâté" said to be killed with kindness? What was the cat of the famous Wittington that made him a merchant prince? Why is it said there is luck in odd numbers? Why does Hamlet call the ghost old True-penny? Why is a parasite called a Toad-eater? or a hare Wat? What is the origin of such household phrases as standing Sam, mare's-nest, shell out, kick the bucket, dishing the spurs, little urchin, layers-over for meddlers, can de vic, jagot votes, salted accounts, walls have ears, the polite refusal expressed by the words I'll think about it, and why is a mismanaged concern called a kettle of fish? We talk of getting our hand or foot in, of the crisis of a disease, of a pretext (which, of course, is a sort of dress), with a thousand similar words and phrases; but where they come from, how they became naturalised, and what they refer to, is, for the most part, a mystery. One object of this "Dictionary of Phrase and Fable" is to make them tell their respective tales.

Again, there are a host of words which have an attached meaning, apart "from" their original bearing, such as Adullamites; shibboleth; tariff; delirium, which has something to do with ploughing; canvassing a town, which has something to do with hemp; suffrages and suffragans, which are somehow connected with the pasterns of a horse; bankrupt, a man whose bench is broken; grotesque, which must belong to the word grotto; a tradesman's bill, which must be connected with a billet of wood; and all such strange misnomers as widow-bird, Judas-tree, wolf's-bane, Jerusalem artichoke, and fox-glove. Who gave them their present twist? who effaced their old image, and stamped on them their present superscription? In what crucible have they been melted, that their nature has been so completely changed? To give a brief and trustworthy answer is another of the objects of our book.

Once more. There are allusions in every newspaper and periodical, which would puzzle many a wrangler more than the "Principia" of Newton. Crabbe, for example, says, I do not use the word fight in the sense of Mendoza, the Jew; but no extant book that I know of throws any light upon this Hebrew. Napoleon said of the young Queen of Prussia, She was Armida, in her distraction, setting fire to her own palace. Sir Walter Scott says, I submitted, like Dorax, with a swelling heart. The song says, Sham Abram you may, but must not sham Abraham Newland. Longfellow says, Thought, like Acastes' arrow, kindles as it flies. The Times says, Let Gryll be Gryll, and keep his hoggish mind. Some hundreds of such allusions are explained in the present book.

Then we have references to Scandinavian and other mythology, bogie-land and fairy-land, ghouls and gnomes, and a legion of character-words, such as Bumbledom and Podsnappery, Lilliputian and Utopian, Jeremy Diddler and Jerry Sneak, Tony Lumpkin, Tom Tiddler, Bob Acres, and Squeers, the Malaprops and Partingtons of society, whom we meet with in our daily walks, but know neither their family nor address. The "Dictionary of Phrase and Fable" is their Directory, not so perfect as that of the Post Office, yet sufficiently so, we hope, to give the local habitation of the most characteristic. In a word, from a mass of material in manuscript, fully thrice the size of the present volume, we have selected some 20,000 examples of what we have thought to be the best suited for popular purposes. Much has been culled, of necessity, from the thousand and one sources of such lore, in English, German, or French, and more is entirely new. We cannot even hope that all our explanations will pass the ordeal of critics unscathed. It is the bread and cheese of some to "pick holes in a' our coats;" and the lighting on weak places carries with it something of the ferret's or huntsman's "passion." What is fair game will, of course, be run hard; and some of our statements must of necessity be mere matters of opinion, in more than one instance modified even while these pages have been passing through the press; but we doubt not that most of them are correct, and are bold to believe that we have in many cases succeeded, where others have wholly or partially failed. The labour has been the willing labour of an enthusiast, who has been for twenty years a "snapper-up of unconsidered trifles." If other eyes less fond see defects in any of these little ones, and will communicate with the author, through his publishers, he will promise to be more grateful than the Archbishop of Toledo to his secretary Gil Blas.

. As a rule, the names of Greek and Latin fable have been excluded from this Dictionary; where an exception has been made it is either because the word has been so incorporated into our literature as to render its omission a serious defect, or because some characteristic has been added which finds no place in a "Classical Dictionary."

BREWER'S DICTIONARY

OF

PHRASES AND FABLE.

A. This letter is the outline of an ox's head, the two legs being the two horns. It is called in Hebrew aleph (an ox).

A among the Egyptians is the hieroglyphic which represents the ibis. Among the Greeks it was the symbol of a bad augury in the sacrifices.

A in logic is the symbol of a universal affirmative. A asserts, E denies. Thus, syllogisms in barbara contain three universal affirmative propositions.

A 1 means first-rate—the very best. In Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, the character of the ship's hull is designated by letters, and that of the anchors, cables, and stores by figures. A 1 means hull first-rate, and also anchors, cables, and stores; A 2, hull first-rate, but furniture second-rate.

She is a prime girl, she is; she is A 1.—Sam Slick.

A.B. (See ABLE.)

A B C Book. A primer, a book in which articles are set in alphabetical order, as the "A B C Railway Guide."

A. E. I. O. U. The device adopted by Frederick, emperor of Germany.

Austriæ	Est Imperare	Orbi	Universo.
Alles	Erdreich	Ist	Oesterreich
			Untherthan.
Austria's	Empire	Is	Overall
Austria's	Empire	Is	Obviously Upset.

Frederick III., in the fifteenth century, translated the motto thus:—

Austria Erit In Orbe Ultima (Austria will one day be lowest in the scale of empires).

A.U.C. Anno urbe condita (Latin), "from the foundation of the city"—i.e., Rome.

Aaron. An Aaron's serpent. Something so powerful as to swallow up minor powers. Thus, Prussia was the Aaron's serpent that swallowed up the small German States; England was the Aaron's serpent that swallowed up the States of India. A gigantic monopoly is the Aaron's serpent that swallows up small private traders. (Exod. vii. 10–12).

Ab o'vo. From the very beginning. Stas'imos, in the epic poem called the "Little Iliad," does not rush in medias res, but begins with the eggs of Leda, from one of which Helen was born. If Leda had not laid this egg, Helen would never have been born. If Helen had not been born, Paris could not have eloped with her. If Paris had not eloped with Helen, there would have been no Trojan War, &c.

Ab ovo usque ad mala. From the first dish to the last. A Roman cœna (chief meal) consisted of three parts. The first course was the appetiser, and consisted chiefly of eggs, with stimulants; the second was the "dinner proper," and the third the dessert, at which mala (i.e., all sorts of apples, pears, quinces, pomegranates, and so on) formed the most conspicuous part.

Aback'. I was taken aback—I was greatly astonished—taken by surprise—startled. It is a sea term. A ship is "taken aback" when the sails are suddenly carried back by the wind.

Ab'acus. Each wire contains ten balls. The Abacus is an instrument for calculation. The word is derived from the Hebrew abak (dust), because the Orientals used tables covered with dust for ciphering and diagrams. The multiplication table invented by Pythagoras is called Abacus Pythagoricus.

Abaddon. The angel of the bottomless pit. (Rev. ix. 11.) The Hebrew abad means "to be lost."

Abam'bou. The evil spirit of the Camma tribes in Africa. A fire is kept always burning in his house. He is supposed to have the power of causing sickness and death.

Abandan'nad. A boy who picks pockets of bandannas (pocket-handkerchiefs). The word is a contraction of Abandanna-lad.

Abandon means properly to go away from your general's ensign; to fly from your colours. (Latin—a, "away from;" bandum, "the general's banner.")

Ab'aris. The dart of Abaris. Abaris, the Scythian, was a priest of Apollo; and the god gave him a golden arrow on which to ride through the air. This dart rendered him invisible; it also cured diseases, and gave oracles. Abaris gave it to Pythagoras.

The dart of Abaris carried the philosopher wheresoever he desired it.—Wilmott.

Abased. In heraldry the wings of eagles are called abased, when the tops are turned downward towards the point of the shield, or when they are shut.

Abas'ter. One of the horses of Pluto. (See ABATOS.)

Abate means properly to knock down. (French, abatire, whence a battue, i.e., wholesale destruction of game; Saxon, a batan.)

Abate, in horsemanship, is to perform well the downward motion. A horse is said to abate when, working upon curvets, he puts or beats down both his hind legs to the ground at once, and keeps exact time.

Abatement, in heraldry, is a mark of dishonour annexed to coat armour, whereby the honour of it is abated.

Ab'aros One of the horses of Pluto. (See AETON.)

Abb'aside (3 syl.). A family of Arab caliphs, who reigned from 749-1257. The name is derived from Abbas ben Abd-al-Motaleb, paternal uncle of the prophet Mahomet. The most celebrated of these caliphs was Haroun-al-Raschid, born 765, reigned 786-808.

Abbey Lands. At the dissolution of the monasteries, the abbey lands were mainly divided among five noble families, if the following rhyme may be relied on:

Hopton, Horner, Smyth, Knocknaile, and Thynne
When abbots went out, they all came in.

Abbot of Misrule, or Lord of Misrule. A person who used to superintend the diversions of Christmas. As those diversions were unruly and noisy, the title is well applied. In Scotland the master of revels was called the "Master of Unreason."

Abbotsford. A name given by Sir Walter Scott to Cartley Hole, on the south bank of the Tweed, after it became his residence. Sir Walter devised the name from a fancy he loved to indulge in, that the abbots of Melrose Abbey, in ancient times, passed over the fords of the Tweed.

Abb-wool. Wool made of abbs—that is, the yarn of a weaver's warp. (Saxon.)

Abdall'ah, the father of Mahomet, was so beautiful, that when he married Ami'na, 200 virgins broke their hearts from disappointed love.—"Life of Mahomet," by Washington Irving.

Abdall'ah. Brother and predecessor of Giaffir, pacha of Aby'dos. He was murdered by Giaffir (2 syl.).—Byron, "Bride of Abydos."

Ab'dals. Persian fanatics, who think it a merit to kill any one of a different religion, and if slain in the attempt, are accounted martyrs.

Ab'derite (3 syl.). A scoffer. Democritus, the laughing or rather scoffing philosopher, was a native of Ab'dera, in Thrace.

Abde'ritan. A native of Ab'dera—a fool. The stupidity of the Abderitans was proverbial. They were ultimately compelled to abandon their native land and migrate to Macedonia, in consequence of the swarms of rats and frogs.

Ab'diel. The faithful angel who withstood Satan when he urged the angels to revolt.

(He) adheres with the faith of Abdiel to the ancient form of adoration.—Sir Walter Scott.

Abeceda'rian. One who teaches or is learning his A B C.

Abecedarian hymns. Hymns which began with the letter A, and each verse or clause following took up the letters of the alphabet in regular succession. (See ACROSTIC POETRY.)

Abel Keene. A village school-master, afterwards a merchant's clerk. He was led astray, lost his place, and hanged himself. — Crabbe's "Borough" Letter, xxi.

Abel Shufflebottom. A name assumed by Robert Southey in some of his amatory productions. (1774-1843.)

A'belites (3 syl.), Abel'ians, or Abe-lo'nians. A christian sect of the fourth century, chiefly found in Hippo (N. Africa). They married, but lived in continence, as they affirm Abel did. The sect was maintained by adopting the children of others. No children of Abel being mentioned in Scripture, the Abelites assume that he had none.

Abes'sa. The impersonation of Abbeys and Convents, represented by Spenser as a damsel. When Una asked if she had seen the Red Cross Knight, Abessa, frightened at the lion, ran to the cottage of blind Superstition, and shut the door. Una arrived, and the lion burst the door open. The meaning is, that at the Reformation, when Truth came, the abbeys and convents got alarmed, and would not let Truth enter, but England (the lion) broke down the door. — Faëry Queen, b. i.

Abes'ta. The Commentary of the Zend.

Abey or Alawy. The Nile, so called by the Abyssinians. The word means "the giant."

Abey'ance really means something gaped after (French, bayer, to gape). The allusion is to men standing with their mouths open, in expectation of some sight about to appear.

Abhor' (Latin, ab, "intensive," and horreo, "to set up the bristles," as a cat from antipathy to a dog). To abhor is to have a natural antipathy, and to show it by "bristling" in anger.

Abia'la. Wife of Makambi ; African deities. She holds a pistol in her hand, and is greatly feared. Her aid is implored in sickness.

Abidhar'ma. The book of metaphysics in the Tripit'ka (q.v.).

Ab'igail. A lady's maid, or lady-maid. Abigail, who introduced herself to David, calls herself over and over again his handmaid (1 Sam. xxv. 3); hence the word became a synonym for a lady-maid, as Goliath for a giant, Samson a strong man, and Job a model of patience. Beaumont and Fletcher, in "The Scornful Lady," call the "waiting gentlewoman" Abigail, a name employed by Swift, Fielding, and others, in their novels. Probably "Abigail Hill," the birthplace of Mrs. Masham, waiting-woman to queen Anne, popularised the name.

Abim'elech is no proper name, but a regal title of the Philistines, meaning Father-king.

Able. An able-bodied seaman is one not only sound in wind and limb, but skilled in seamanship, and willing to serve. Such a man is termed an A.B.

Aboard. He fell aboard of me — met me, abused me. A ship is said to fall aboard another when, both being in motion, one runs against the other and obstructs its progress.

To go aboard is to embark, to go on the board or deck.

Aboard main tack is to draw one of the lower corners of the main-sail down to the chess-tree. Figuratively, it means "to keep to the point."

Aboll'a. An ancient military garment worn by the Greeks and Romans, opposed to the toga or robe of peace. The abolla being worn by the lower orders, was affected by the philosophers in the vanity of humility.

Abom'inate (ab o'mina, ill-omened). As ill-omened things are disliked, so, by a simple figure of speech, what we dislike we consider ill-omened.

Abomina'tion. The abomination of desolation. The Roman standard is so called. (Matt. xxiv. 15.) As it was set up in the holy temple, it was an abomination; and, as it brought destruction, it was the "abomination of desolation."

Abon Hassan. A rich merchant, transferred during sleep to the bed and palace of the caliph Haroun-al-Raschid. Next morning he was treated as the caliph, and every effort was made to make him forget his identity. The same trick was played on Christopher Sly, in the Induction of Shakespeare's comedy of "Taming the Shrew;" and, according to Burton ("Anatomy of Melancholy," ii. 2, 4), by Philippe the Good, duke of Burgundy, on his marriage with Eleono'ra.—Arabian Nights, "The Sleeper Awakened."

Were I caliph for a day, as honest Abon Hassan, I would scourge me these jugglers out of the Commonwealth.—Sir Walter Scott.

Abor'tion. A work badly finished, especially a literary production. An abortion is a human fœtus born before the sixth month of pregnancy.

Abortive flowers are those which have stamens but no pistils.

Abou ebn Sina, born at Shiraz. The great Persian physician, whose canons of medicine were those adopted by Hippoc'ratis and Aristotle. Died 1037.

Abou-Bekr, called Father of the Virgin, Mahomet's favourite wife. He was the first caliph, and was founder of the sect called the Sunnis. (571-634.)

Abou-Jahi'a. The angel of death. (Mahom. Myth.)

Above. In a previous part of the book, as See above, p. *. An expression derived from the ancient method of making books in the form of scrolls, when the writer began at the top and continued to the bottom, which was the end.

Above board. In a straightforward manner. Dr. Johnson says the expression is derived from gamblers, who place their hands above the table when they change cards, that their adversaries may see they play fairly.

Above your hook—i.e., beyond your comprehension; beyond your mark. The allusion is to hat-pegs placed in rows; the higher rows are above the reach of small statures.

Abracada'bra. A charm. Abracadabra was the supreme deity of the Assyrians. Sere'nus Samon'icus recommended the use of the word as a powerful antidote against ague, flux, and toothache. The word was to be written on parchment, and suspended round the neck by a linen thread, in the form given below:—

A B R A C A D A B R A
A B R A C A D A B R
A B R A C A D A B
A B R A C A D A

Abrac'alam. A Syrian deity. A cabalistic word, serving as a charm among the Jews.

Abrac'ax, also written Abrax'as or Abas'ax, in Persian mythology denotes the Supreme Being. In Greek notation it stands for 365. In Persian mythology Abracax presides over 365 impersonated virtues, one of which is supposed to prevail on each day of the year. In the second century the word was employed by the Basilid'ians for the deity; it was also the principle of the Gnostic hierarchy, and that from which sprang their numerous Æons.

A'braham. The Ghebers say that Abraham was thrown into the fire by Nimrod's order, but the flame turned into a bed of roses, on which the child Abraham went to sleep.—Tavernier.

Sweet and welcome as the bed
For their own infant prophet spread,
When pitying Heaven to roses turned
The death-flames that beneath him burned.
T. Moore, "Fire Worshipers."

To Sham Abraham. To pretend illness or distress, in order to get off work. (See ABRAHAM-MAN.)

I have heard people say Sham Abraham you may,
But must not sham Abraham Newland.
Upton.

Abraham Newland was cashier of the Bank of England, and signed the notes.

Abraham's Bosom. The repose of the happy in death. (Luke xvi. 22.) The figure is taken from the ancient custom of allowing a dear friend to recline at dinner on your bosom. Thus the beloved John reclined on the bosom of Jesus.

There is no leaping from Delilah's lap into Abraham's bosom—i.e., those who live and die in notorious sin, must not expect to go to heaven at death.—Boston, "Crook in the Lot."

Abraham Newland, An. A bank-note; so called because, in the early part of the present century, none were genuine but those signed by this name.

Abraham'ic Covenant. The covenant made by God with Abraham, that Messiah should spring from his seed. This promise was given to Abraham, because he left his country and father's house to live in a strange land, as God told him.

Abrahamites (A-braham-ites). Certain Bohemian deists, so called because they professed to believe what Abraham believed before he was circumcised. The sect was forbidden by the emperor Joseph II. in 1783.

Abram-Man, or Abraham Cove. A Tom of Bedlam; a naked vagabond; a begging impostor.

The Abraham Ward, in Bedlam, had for its inmates begging lunatics, who used to array themselves "with party-coloured ribbons, tape in their hats, a fox-tail hanging down, a long stick with streamers," and beg alms; but "for all their seeming madness, they had wit enough to steal as they went along."

—Cunting Academy.

See "King Lear," ii. 3.

In Beaumont and Fletcher we have several synonyms:—

And these, what name or title e'er they bear,
Juckmen or Pal'rico, Cranks or Clapper-dudgeon,
Fraier or Abram-man, I speak to nil.

Beggar's Bush, ii. 1.

Abrax. One of the horses of Auro'ra.

Abrax'as Stones. Stones with the word Abraxas engraved on them, and used as a talisman. The word symbolises the mystic number 365, and the Supreme deity of the Basilid'ians. (See ABRACAX.)

Abreast. Side by side, the breasts being all in a line.

The ships were all abreast—i.e., their heads were all equally advanced, as soldiers marching abreast.

Abridge has no connection with the word bridge; but "bridge" in this word is a corruption of the Greek brachus, or Latin brevis (short), through the French abrèger (to shorten).

Abroach. Afloat. To set mischief abroach is to set it on foot. The figure is from a tub of liquor, which is broached that the liquor may be drawn from it.

Abroad. You are all abroad. Wide of the mark; not at home with the subject. Abroad—in all directions.

An elm displays her dusky arms abroad.

Dryden.

Abroc'omas. The lover of Anthi'a, in Xenophon's romance called "Ephesi'aca." (See ANTHI'A.)

Ab'rogate. When the Roman senate wanted a law to be passed, they asked the people to give their votes in its favour. The Latin for this is rogare legem (to solicit or propose a law). If they wanted a law repealed, they asked the people to vote against it; this was ab-rogare legem (to solicit against the law).

Ab'salom. James, duke of Monmouth, the handsome but rebellious son of Charles II. in Dryden's "Absalom and Achitophel." (1649-1685.)

Abscond' means properly to be in hiding; but we generally use the word in the sense of stealing off secretly from an employer. (Latin, abscondo.)

Ab'sent. The. "Out of mind as soon as out of sight." Generally misquoted "Out of sight, out of mind."—Lord Brooke.

Ab'solute. A Captain Absolute, a bold, despotic man, determined to have his own way. The character is in Sheridan's play called "The Rivals."

Sir Anthony Absolute is a warm-hearted, testy, overbearing country squire, in the same play.

Absquat'ulate. To run away or abscond. An American word, compounded of ab squat (to go away from your squatting). A squatting is a tenement taken in some unclaimed part, without purchase or permission. The persons who take up their squatting are termed squatters.

Abste'mious, according to Fabius and Aulus Gellius, is compounded of abs and tem'e'tum. "Teme'tum" was a strong, intoxicating drink, allied to the Greek methē (strong drink).

Abstract Numbers are numbers considered abstractedly—1, 2, 3; but if we say 1 year, 2 feet, 3 men, &c., the numbers are no longer abstract, but concrete.

Taken in the abstract. Things are said to be taken in the abstract when they are considered absolutely, that is, without reference to other matters or persons. Thus, in the abstract, one man is as good as another, but not so socially and politically.

Abstrac'tion. An empty Abstraction, a mere ideality, of no practical use. Every noun is an abstraction, but the narrower genuses may be raised to higher ones, till the common thread is so fine that hardly anything is left. These high abstractions, from which everything but one common cord is taken, are called empty abstractions:

For example, man is a genus, but may be raised to the genus animal, thence to organised being, thence to created being, thence to matter in the abstract, and so on, till everything but one is emptied out.

Absurd means deaf and dumb. (Latin, ab, "intensive," and surdus, "deaf and dumb.")

Reductio ad absurdum. "Reducing to absurdity" whatever contradicts your statement; or proving a proposition to be right, by showing that every supposable deviation from it would involve an absurdity.

Abu'dah. A merchant of Bagdad, haunted every night by an old hag; he finds at last that the way to rid himself of this torment is to "fear God, and keep his commandments."—Tales of the Genii.

Like Abudah, he is always looking out for the Fury, and knows that the night will come with the inevitable hag with it.—Thackeray.

Ab'yla. A mountain in Gibralt'ar. This, with Calpè in Spain, sixteen miles distant, form the two pillars of Hercules.

Abyssin'ians. A sect of Christians in Abyssinia, who admit only one nature in Jesus Christ, and reject the Council of Chal'cedon.

Aca'cians. Followers of Aca'cius, bishop of Cesare'a, and Aca'cius, patriarch of Constantinople.

Academ'ics. The followers of Plato were so called, because they attended his lectures in the Acad'emy, a garden planted by Acade'mos.

Acad'emy. Divided into—Old, the philosophic teaching of Plato and his immediate followers; Middle, a modification of the Platonic system, taught by Arcesila'os; New, the half-sceptical school of Car'neadès.

Plato taught that matter is eternal and infinite, but without form or order; and that there is an intelligent cause, the author of everything. He maintained that we could grasp truth only so far as we had elevated our mind by thought to its divine essence.

Arcesila'os was the great antagonist of the Stoics, and wholly denied man's capacity for grasping truth.

Car'neadès maintained that neither our senses nor our understanding could supply us with a sure criterion of truth.

The talent of the Academy, so Plato called Aristotle. (B.C. 384-322.)

Academy Figures. Drawings in black and white chalk on tinted paper, from living models, used by artists. So called from the Royal Academy of Artists.

Aca'dia—i.e., Nova Scotia, so called by the French from the river Shuben-acadie. The name was changed in 1713. In 1750 the old French inhabitants were driven into exile by order of George II.

Thus dwelt together in love those simple Acadian farmers.—Longfellow, "Evangeline."

Acaire, St. Patron saint of madmen, by a play on the Greek word acerias'tos, meaning a "frantic bedlamite."

Acan'thus. The leafy ornament of Corinthian and composite columns. It is said that Callim'achos lost his daughter, and set a basket of flowers on her grave, with a tile to keep the wind from blowing it away. The next time he went to visit the grave an acanthus had sprung up around the basket, which so struck the fancy of the architect that he introduced the design in his buildings.

Accep'tance. A bill or note accepted. This is done by the drawee writing on it "accepted," and signing his name. The person who accepts it is called the "acceptor."

Ac'cessory. Accessory before the fact is one who prompts another to commit an offence, but is himself absent when the offence is perpetrated.

Accessory after the fact is one who screens a felon, aids him in eluding justice, or helps him in any way to profit by his crime. Thus, the receiver of stolen goods, knowing or even suspecting them to be stolen, is an accessory ex post facto.

Ac'cident. A logical accident is some property or quality which a thing possesses, but which does not essentially belong to it, as the tint of our skin, the height of our body, the redness of a brick, or the whiteness of paper. If any of these were changed, the substance would remain intact.

Accidental Colours. Those which depend on the state of our eye, and not those which the object really possesses. Thus, after looking at the bright sun, all objects appear dark; that dark colour is the accidental colour of the bright sun. When, again, we come from a dark room, all objects at first have a yellow tinge. This is especially the case if we wear blue glasses, for a minute or two after we have taken them off.

The accidental colour of red is bluish green, of orange dark blue, of violet yellow, of black white; and the converse.

Acciden'tals in music are those sharps and flats, &c., which do not properly belong to the key in which the music is set, but which the composer arbitrarily introduces.

Ac'cius Na'vius was the augur who cut the whetstone with a razor in the presence of Tarquin the Elder.

In short, 'twas his fate unemployed, or in place,
To eat mutton cold, or cut blocks with a razor.
Ed. Burke.

Accolade (3 syl.). The embrace given by the grand master when he receives a neophyte or new convert. (Latin, ad collum, round the neck.)

Accommoda'tion. A loan of money, which accommodates us, or fits a want.

Accommodation Note or Bill. An acceptance given on a Bill of Exchange for which value has not been received by the acceptor from the drawer, and which, not representing a commercial transaction, is so far fictitious.

Accommodation Ladder. The light ladder hung over the side of a ship at the gangway.

Accord' means "heart to heart." (Lat., ad corda.) If two persons like and dislike the same things, they are at "ac-cord," or heart to heart with each other.

Accost' means to "come to the side" of a person for the purpose of speaking to him. (Latin, ad costam, to the side.)

Account'. To open an account, to enter a customer's name on your ledger for the first time.

To keep open account is when merchants agree to honour each other's bills of exchange.

We will give a good account of them—i.e., we will give them a thorough good drabbing. An account is an entry made in a book of some transaction; and when an antagonist is "paid out in full" with blood and iron, the transaction may be posted as a good account.

If they come, see if we do not give a good account of them.—The Times.

Ac'curate means well and carefully done. (Latin, ad-curo.)

Accu'sative, The. Calvin was so called by his college companions.

Ace (1 syl.). The unit of cards or dice. The Romans called it unus (one); the Greeks, who borrowed the game of dice from the Romans, called unus onos, but onos in Greek means "an ass." The Teutons learnt the game from the Greeks, and translated the word into ass, Italian asso, French and Spanish as, English ace. (See BATE.)

Within an ace. Within a shave. An ace is the lowest numeral, and he who wins within an ace, wins within a single mark.

Acel'dama. A battle-field, a place where much blood has been shed. To the south of Jerusalem there was a field so called; it was purchased by the priests with the blood-money thrown down by Judas, and appropriated as a cemetery for strangers.

Aceph'alites (4 syl.) properly means men without a head. (1.) A faction among the Euty'hians in the fifth century after the submission of Mongus their chief, by which they were "deprived of their head." (2.) Certain bishops exempt from the jurisdiction and discipline of their patriarch. (3.) A sect of levellers in the reign of Henry I., who acknowledged no leader. (4.) The fabulous Blemmyës of Africa, who are described as having no head, their eyes and mouth being placed elsewhere. (Greek, a-keph'alê, without a head.)

Aces'tes (3 syl.). The Arrow of Acestes. In a trial of skill Acestës, the Sicilian, discharged his arrow with such force that it took fire.

Like Acestes' shaft of old,
The swift thought kindles as it flies.
Longfellow.

Achæ'an League. A confederacy of the twelve towns of Achæa. It was broken up by Alexander the Great, but was again re-organised B.C. 280, and dissolved by the Romans in 147 B.C.

Acha'tes (3 syl.). A fidus Achates. A faithful companion, a bosom friend. The term fidus Achates repeatedly occurs in Virgil's "Æneid."

He has chosen this fellow for his fidus Achates.
Sir Walter Scott.

Ac'heron. The "River of Sorrow" (Greek, achos rheo); one of the five rivers of the infernal regions.

Sad Acheron of sorrow, black and deep,
Milton, "Paradise Lost," ii.

Acheron'tian books. The most celebrated books of augury in the world. They are the books which the Etruscans received from Tagès, grandson of Jupiter.

Acheru'sia. A cavern on the borders of Pontus, said to lead down to the infernal regions. It was through this cavern that Hercules dragged Cer'berus to earth.

Achilles (3 syl.). King of the Myrmidons (in Thessaly), the hero of Homer's epic poem called the "Iliad." He is represented as brave and relentless. The poem begins with a quarrel between him and Agamemnon, the commander-in-chief of the allied Greeks, in consequence of which Achilles refuses to go to battle. The Trojans prevail, and he sends forth his friend Patroc'los to oppose them. Patroc'los falls; and Achilles, in anger, rushes into the battle, and kills Hector, the commander of the Trojans. He himself falls in battle a few days afterwards, before Troy is taken.

Achilles of Rome: Sicin'ius Denta'tus. (B.C. 405.)

Of England: the Duke of Wellington. (1769-1852.)

Of Germany: Albert, Elector of Brandenburg. (1414-1486.)

Achilles' Tendon. A strong sinew running along the heel to the calf of the leg. The tale says that Thetis took her son Achilles by the heel, and dipped him in the river Styx to make him invulnerable. The water washed every part, except the heel covered with his mother's hand. It was on this vulnerable point the hero was slain; and the sinew of the heel is called, in consequence, tendo Achillis.

The Heel of Achilles, the vulnerable or weak point in a man's character. (See above.)

Ireland is sometimes called the Achilles' heel of England.

Achit'ophel, in Dryden's satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," is designed for the earl of Shaftesbury. Achitophel was David's traitorous counsellor, who deserted to Absalom, but his advice being disregarded he hanged himself (2 Sam. xv.).

Of these (the rebels) the false Achitophel was first;
A name to all succeeding ages curst;
For close designs and crooked counsels fit;
Sagacious, bold, and turbulent of wit;
Restless, unfix'd in principles and place;
In power unpleas'd, impatient in disgrace.—Pt. i.

A'chor. God of flies, worshipped by the Cyre'neans, that they might not be annoyed with these tiny tormentors. (See BEELZEBUB.)

Achte-quad'jams (4 syl.). The eight elephants, in Indian mythology, which sustain the world. (See AIRA-PADAM.)

A'cis The son of Faunus, in love with Galat'ea. Polyphe'mos, his rival, killed him with his club.

Ac'më. The crisis of a disease. Old medical writers used to divide the progress of a disease into four periods: the ar'-chë, or beginning; the anab'asis, or increase; the ac'më, or term of its utmost violence; and the pa-rac'-më, or decline.

Ac'olyte (3 syl.). A subordinate officer in the Catholic Church, whose duty is to light the lamps, prepare the sacred elements, attend the officiating priests, &c. (Greek, a follower.)

Aco'metæ. An order of monks in the fifth century who watched day and night. (Greek, watchers.)

Acra'sia (Feebleness). An enchantress who lived in the "Bower of Bliss," situate in "Wandering Island." She transformed her lovers into monstrous shapes, and kept them captives. Sir Gnyon having crept up softly, threw a net over her, and bound her in chains of adamant; then broke down her bower and burnt it to ashes.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," b. ii.

Acra'tes (3 syl.) means ill-will; called by Spenser the father of Cymoch'lës and Pyroch'lës.—Faëry Queen.

A'cre-fight. A duel in the open field. The combats of the Scotch and English Borderers were so called. The word "acre" is the Latin ager (a field).

Acre-shot, a land tax. "Acre" is ager (land), and "shot" is scot or sceat (a tax).

A'cres. A Bob Acres—i.e., a coward. From Sheridan's comedy called "The Rivals." His "courage always oozed out at his fingers' ends."

Acroamat'ics. Esoter'ical lectures; the lectures of Aristotle, which none but his chosen disciples were allowed to attend. Those given to the public generally were called ex'oter'ic. (Acroamatic is a Greek word, meaning heard.)

Acroa'tic. Same as esoter'ic. (See ACROAMATICS.)

Ac'robat means one who goes on his extremities, or uses only the tips of his fingers and toes in moving about. (It is from the two Greek words akrōn baino, to go on the extremities of one's limbs.)

Acros'tic means "first-letter verse." (Greek, akra-stichos.) The term was first applied to the verses of the Erythrean sibyl, written on leaves. These prophecies were excessively obscure, but were so contrived that when the leaves were sorted and laid in order, their initial letters always made a word.—Dionys., iv. 62.

Acrostic poetry among the Hebrews consisted of twenty-two lines or stanzas beginning with the letters of the alphabet in succession, as Psalm cxix., &c.

Act of Faith (auto da fé), in Roman Catholic countries, is a day set apart by the Inquisition for the punishment of heretics, and the absolution of those who renounce their heretical doctrines. The sentence of the Inquisition is also so called; and so is the ceremony of burning, or otherwise torturing the condemned.

Actæ'on. A hunter, a cuckold. In Grecian mythology Actæon was a huntsman, who surprised Diana bathing, was changed by her into a stag, and torn to pieces by his own hounds.

Go thou, like Sir Actæon, with Ringwood at thy heel.

Shakespeare, "Merry Wives," &c., ii. 1.
Divulge Page himself for a secure and wilful Actæon. Ditto, iii. 2.

Act'ian Years. Years in which the Actian games were celebrated. Augustus instituted games at Actium to celebrate his naval victory over Antony. They were held every five years.

Ac'tive. Active verbs, verbs which act on the noun governed.

Active capital. Property in actual employment in a given concern.

Active commerce. Exports and imports carried to and fro in our own ships. Passive commerce is when they are carried in foreign vessels. The commerce of England is active, of China passive.

Activity. The sphere of activity, the whole field through which the influence of an object or person extends.

Acutia'tor. A person in the Middle Ages who attended armies and knights to sharpen their instruments of war. (Latin, acuo, to sharpen.)

Ad. Argumentum ad hominem. A personal or home-thrust argument.

Ad inquirendum. A judicial writ commanding an inquiry to be made into some complaint.

Ad lib'itum. Without restraint.

Ad val'o'rem. According to the price charged. Some custom-duties vary according to the different values of the goods imported. Thus at one time teas paid duty ad valorem, the high-priced tea paying more duty than that of a lower price.

Adam. The old Adam; Beat the offending Adam out of thee; The first Adam. Adam, as the federal head of unredeemed man, stands for "original sin" or "man without regenerating grace."

The second Adam; the new Adam, &c.; I will give you the new Adam. Jesus Christ, as the covenant head, is so called; also the "new birth unto righteousness."

A faithful Adam. A faithful old servant. The character is taken from Shakespeare's comedy of "As You Like It," where a retainer of that name, who had served the family sixty-three years, offers to accompany Oliver in his flight, and to share with him his thrifty savings of 500 crowns.

Adam Bell. A northern outlaw, whose name has become a synonym for a good archer. (See CLYM OF THE CLOUGH.)

Adam Cupid—i.e., Archer Cupid, so called from Adam Bell, the celebrated archer. (See "Percy's Reliques," vol. i., p. 7.)

Adam's Ale. Water as a beverage; from the supposition that Adam had nothing but water to drink. In Scotland water for a beverage is called Adam's Wine.

Adam's Apple. The protuberance in the fore-part of a man's throat; so called from the superstition that a piece of the forbidden fruit which Adam ate stuck in his throat, and occasioned the swelling.

Adam's Needle. The yucca, so called because it is sharp-pointed like a needle. If Adam ever sewed, the yucca would have served him for a needle.

Adam's Peak, in Ceylon, is where the Arabs say Adam bewailed his expulsion from Paradise, and stood on one foot till God forgave him. It was the Portuguese who first called it "Pico de Adam." (See KAABA.)

Adam's Profession. Gardening, agriculture. Adam was appointed by God to dress the garden of Eden, and to keep it (Gen. ii. 15); and after the fall he was sent out of the garden "to till the ground." (Gen. iii. 23.)

There is no ancient gentlemen, but gardeners, ditchers, and grave-makers; they hold up Adam's profession.—The Clown in "Hamlet," v. 1.

Adams. Parson Adams, the ideal of a benevolent, simple-minded, eccentric country clergyman; ignorant of the world, bold as a lion for the truth, and modest as a girl. The character is in Fielding's novel of "Joseph Andrews."

Adamas'tor. The spirit of the stormy Cape (Good Hope), described by Camoëns in the "Lusiad" as a hideous phantom. According to Barreto, he was one of the giants who invaded heaven.

Ad'amic. Adamic Covenant, the covenant made with God to Adam, that "the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head." (Gen. iii. 15.)

Adamic Earth. Common red clay, so called from the popular but erroneous notion that adam means "red earth." Adam really means "likeness" (Hebrew, damah), and refers to the words "Let us make man after our likeness;" and "in the likeness of God made he him; male and female created he them, and called their name Adam." (Gen. v. 1, 2.)

Ad'amites (3 syl.). A sect of fanatics who spread themselves over Bohemia and Moravia in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. One Picard was the founder in 1400, and styled himself "Adam, son of God." He professed to recall his followers to the state of primitive innocence. No clothes were worn, wives were in common, and there was no such thing as good and evil, but all actions were indifferent.

Ad'aran', according to the Parsee superstition, is a sacred fire less holy than that called Behram (q.v.).

Ad'dison of the North—i.e., Henry Mackenzie, the "Man of Feeling." (1745-1831.)

Addix'it, or Addix'e'runt (Latin). All right. The word uttered by the augurs when the "birds" were favourable.

Ad'dle. Addle-headed, or Addle-pated—i.e., empty-headed. (Saxon, aidlian, to be empty.)

Addled egg, a rotten one; or, rather one that has lost the principle of vitality. (Welsh, hadyl, corrupt.)

Ad'elite, or Almog'anen. A Spanish fortune-teller, who predicts the fortune of a person by the flight and note of birds.

Ad'emar, or Adema'ro (in "Jerusalem Delivered"). Archbishop of Pogg'gio, an ecclesiastical warrior, who with William archbishop of Orange, besought pope Urban on his knees that he might be sent on the crusade. He took 400 armed men from Poggio, but they sneaked off during a drought, and left the crusade. (Book xiii.) Ademmar was not alive at the time, he had been slain at the attack on Antioch, by Clorinda (Book xi.); but in the final attack on Jerusalem, his spirit came with three squadrons of angels to aid the besiegers. (Book xviii.)

Adephag'ia (5 syl.). Goddess of gluttony, who had a temple in Sicily.

Adept' properly means one who has found it out (from the Latin adeptus). The alchemists applied the term verè adeptus to those persons who professed to have "found out" the elixir of life and philosopher's stone.

Ades'sena'rians. A sect who hold the real presence of Christ's body in the eucharist, but do not maintain that the bread and wine lose any of their original properties. (The word is from the Latin adesse, to be present.)

Ades'te Fide'lës. Composed by John Reading, who wrote "Dulcè Domum." It is called the "Portuguese Hymn," from being heard at the Portuguese Chapel by the duke of Leeds, who supposed it to be a part of the usual Portuguese service.

Adfil'iate, Adfilia'tion. The ancient Goths adopted the children of a former marriage, and put them on the same footing as those of the new family. (Latin, ad-filius, equal to a real son.)

Adha, al (the slit-eared). The swiftest of Mahomet's camels.

Ad'har-al-Gabr. The first purgatory of the Mahometans.

Adiaph'orists. Followers of Melanchthon; moderate Lutherans, who hold that some of the dogmas of Luther are matters of indifference. (Greek, adiaph'oros, indifferent.)

Adieu, good-b'ye. A dieu, an elliptical form for I commend you to God. Good-b'ye is God be with ye.

Adis'sechen. The serpent with a thousand heads which sustains the universe. (Ind. myth.)

Adjective. Adjective colours are those which require a mordant before they can be used as dyes.

Adjourn'. A corruption of Ajourn—i.e., à-journée (from to-day's work), to put off from to-day to another time.

Ad'mirable, The. James Crichton (kry-ton). (1551-1573.)

Admirable Doctor. Roger Bacon. (1214-1292.)

Admiral, corruption of Amir-al. Milton, speaking of Satan, says:—

His spear (to equal which the tallest pine
Hewn on Norwegian hills, to be the mast
Of some tall amiral, were but a wand)
He walked with.—Paradise Lost, i. 292.

The word was introduced by the Turks or Genoese in the twelfth century, and is the Arabic Amir with the article al (the lord or commander); as, Amir-al-ma (commander of the water), Amir-al-Omra (commander of the forces), Amir-al-Mumenim (commander of the faithful).

English admirals are of three classes, according to the colour of their flag—

Admiral of the Red, holds the centre in an engagement. (ADMIRAL.)

Admiral of the White, holds the van. (VICE-ADMIRAL.)

Admiral of the Blue, holds the rear. (REAR-ADMIRAL.)

Admirals are called Flag Officers.

Admiral of the Red. A cant, punning term applied to a wine-bibber, whose face and nose are very red.

Admittance. Licence. Shakespeare says, "Sir John, you are a gentleman of excellent breeding, of great admittance"—i.e., to whom great freedom is allowed. ("Merry Wives," ii. 2.) The allusion is to an obsolete custom called admission, by which a prince avowed another prince to be under his protection. Maximilian, emperor of Mexico, is the "admittant" of the emperor Napoleon III.

Admonitionists. Certain Puritans who in 1571 sent an admonition to the Parliament condemning everything in the Church of England which was not in accordance with the doctrines and practices of Geneva.

Ado'nai. Son of the star-beam, and god of light among the Rosicrucians.

Adona'is (4 syl.). The song about Ado'nis; Shelley's elegy on Keats is so called.

Ado'nis. A beautiful boy. The allusion is to Ado'nis, who was beloved by Venus, and was killed by a boar while hunting.

The flower called Adonis is blood-red, and, according to fable sprang from the blood of the gored hunter.

A garden of Adonis (Greek). A worthless toy; a very perishable good. The allusion is to the fennel and lettuce jars of the ancient Greeks, called "Adonis gardens," because these herbs were planted in them for the annual festival of the young huntsman, and thrown away the next morning.

Ado'nists. Those Jews who maintain that the proper vowels of the word Jehovah are unknown, and that the word is never to be pronounced. Every time they meet with the word Jehovah they call it Ado'nai instead. (Hebrew, adon, lord.)

Adop'tion. Adoption by arms. An ancient custom of giving arms to a person of merit, which laid him under the obligation of being your champion and defender.

Adoption by baptism. Being godfather or godmother to a child. The child by baptism is your god-child.

Adoption by hair. Cutting off your hair, and giving it to a person in proof that you receive him as your adopted father. Thus Bo'son, king of Arles, cut off his hair and gave it to pope John VIII., who adopted him.

Adoption Controversy. Elipand archbishop of Toledo, and Felix bishop of Urgel, maintained that Jesus Christ in his human nature was the Son of God by adoption only (Rom. viii. 29), though in his pre-existing state he was the "begotten Son of God" in the ordinary catholic acceptance. Duns Scotus, Durandus, Calixtus, and others supported this view.

Adop'tionist. One who maintains that Christ is the Son of God by adoption only. The disciples of Elipand archbishop of Toledo, and Felix bishop of Urgel (in Spain), are so called.

Adore (2 syl.) means to "carry to one's mouth," "to kiss" (ad-os, ad-ora're). The Romans performed adoration by placing their right hand on their mouth and bowing. The Greeks paid adoration to kings by putting the royal robe to their lips. The Jews kissed in homage: thus God said to Elija, he had 7,000 in Israel who had not bowed unto Baal, "every mouth which hath not kissed him." (1 Kings xix. 18; see also Hos. xiii. 2.) "Kiss the Son, lest he be angry" (Ps. ii. 12), means worship, reverence the Son. Even in England we do homage by kissing the hand of the sovereign.

Adram'melech. God of the people of Sepharva'im, to whom infants were burnt in sacrifice.

Adroit' properly means "to the right." (French, à droite.) The French call a person who is not adroit gauche (left-handed), meaning awkward, boorish.

Adsidel'ta. The table at which the flamens sat during sacrifice.

Ad'ulator. Dace'rius derives this word from the Latin, ad ollam itor, i.e., one who clings to you from cupboard love. This derivation has wit but no worth. Non'ius suggests the Greek, adus lizo, Doric for adus-leicho (to like fondly), i.e., like a dog. Another plausible suggestion is ad'leo (to treat like a god, to worship).

Adullamites (4 syl.). The adherents of Lowe and Horsman, seceders from the Reform party. John Bright said of these members that they retired to the cave of Adullam, and tried to gather round them all the discontented. The allusion is to David in his flight from Saul, who "escaped to the cave Adullam; and every one that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented, gathered themselves unto him." (1 Sam. xxii. 1, 2.)

Advent. Four weeks to commemorate the first and second coming of Christ; the first to redeem, and the second to judge the world. The season begins on St. Andrew's Day, or the Sunday nearest to it. (Latin, ad-ventus, the coming to.)

Ad'versary, The. Satan. (1 Pet. v. 8.)

Advocate means properly "one summoned to the patron or pleader," to assist him as his "junior counsel." (Liv. ii. 55.)

The Devil's Advocate. One who brings forward malicious accusations. When any name is proposed for canonisation in the Roman Catholic Church, two advocates are appointed, one to oppose the motion, and one to defend it. The former, called Advoca'tus Diab'oli (the Devil's Advocate), advances all he can rummage up against the person in question; the latter, called Advoca'tus Dei (God's Advocate), says all he can in support of the proposal.

Advocates' Library, in Edinburgh, founded 1660, containing about 150,000 volumes. It is one of the five libraries to which copyright books are sent. (See COPYRIGHT.)

Advow'son means the right of patronage to a church or ecclesiastical benefice.

A presentative advowson is when the patron presents to the bishop a person to whom he is willing to give the piece of preferment.

A collative advowson is when the bishop himself is patron, and collates his client without any intermediate person.

A donative advowson is where the Crown gives a living to a clergyman without presentation, institution, or induction. This is done when a church or chapel has been founded by the Crown, and is not subject to the ordinary.

Adwoson in gross is an adwoson separated from the manor, and belonging wholly to the owner. While attached to the manor it is an adwoson appendant. "Gross" (French) means absolute, entire; thus gross weight is the entire weight without deductions. A villain in gross was a villain the entire property of his master, and not attached to the land. A common in gross is one which is entirely your own, and which belongs to the manor.

Sale of Adwosons. When lords of manors built churches upon their own demesnes, and endowed them, they became private property, which the lord might give away or even sell, under certain limitations. These livings are called Adwosons appendant, being appended to the manor. After a time they became regular "commercial property," and we see daily the sale of some of them in the public journals.

Æ'diles (2 syl.). Those who have charge of the streets. The Roman officers were so called from adēs (streets).

Ægine'tan Sculptures. Sculptures excavated by a company of Germans, Danes, and English (1811), in the little island of Ægi'na. They were purchased by Ludwig, Crown Prince of Bava'ria, and are now the most remarkable ornaments of the Glyptothek, at Munich.

Æ'ger. God of the ocean, whose wife is Rana. They had nine daughters, who wore white robes and veils. (Mahom. myth.)

Æ'gis. I throw my ægis over you, i.e., my protection. The shield of Jupiter made by Vulcan was so called, and symbolised "Divine protection." The shield of Minerva was called an ægis also. The shield of Jupiter was covered with the skin of the goat Amaithæa, and the Greek for goat is agos. That made by Vulcan was of brass.

A.E.I. (A—i), a common motto on jewellery, means "for ever and for aye." (Greek.)

Æne'as. The hero of Virgil's epic. He carried his father Anchi'sēs on his shoulders from the flames of Troy. After roaming about for many years, he came to Italy, where he founded a colony which the Romans claim as their origin.

Æne'id. The epic poem of Virgil, so called from Æne'as aīdo (to sing Æne'as).

Æ'olus, in Roman mythology, was "god of the winds."

Æolian harp. The wind-harp. A box on which strings are stretched. Being placed where a draught gets to the strings, they utter musical sounds.

Æmo'nian Arts (Ovid). Magic; so called from Æmo'nia, an ancient name of Thessaly, noted for magic.

The Æmo'nian. Jason; so called, because his father was king of Thessaly. (See above.)

Æra. An epoch. Sepulve'da derives it from A. E.R. A., anno erat Augusti (it was in the year of Augustus), because the Spanish method of computation was from the year when their country fell under the dominion of Augustus. Vossius favours the same derivation.

The chief æras are—

The Constantinopolitan, which began ...	A.M.	5509
The Alexandrine ...	B.C.	5492
The Jewish (A.M.) ...		3760
The æra of Nabonassar ...		747
Of the Olympiads ...		776
Year of Rome (A.U.C.) ...		753
The Julian æra (Ju. ær.) ...		45
The Christian æra ...	A.D.	0
The æra of Sulwanah (Saca) ...		78
Diocletian ...		284
The Hegira (A.H.) ...		622
The æra of Yezdegird (Æ. Pers.) ...		632

Ærated. Ærated Water. Water impregnated with carbonic acid gas, called fixed air.

Ærated Bread. Bread made light by means of carbonic acid gas instead of leaven.

Æ'rrians. Followers of Æ'rrius, who maintained that there is no difference between bishops and priests.

Æs'chylos. The Eschylus of France. Prosper Joyot de Crebillon. (1674-1762.)

Æ'sop's Fables were compiled by Bab'rios, a Greek, who lived in the Alexandrian age.

Æsop of Arabia. Nasser. (In the fifth century.)

Æsop of England. John Gay. (1688-1732.)

Æsop of France. Jean de la Fontaine. (1621-1695.)

Æsop of Germany. Gotthold Ephraim Lessing. (1729-1781.)

Æsop of India. Bidpay or Pilpay. (About three centuries before the Christian era.)

A'eton (3 syl.). One of the horses of Pluto. (See ABATOS.)

Affable means "one easy to bespoken to." (Latin, ad furi, to speak to.)

Affect'. To love, to desire. (Latin, affecto.)

Some affect the light, and some the shade.
Blair's "Grave."

Affront' properly means to stand front to front. In savage nations opposing armies draw up front to front before they begin hostilities, and by grimaces, sounds, words, and all conceivable means, try to provoke and terrify their vis-à-vis. When this "affronting" is over, the adversaries rush against each other, and the fight begins in earnest.

Africa. Teneo te, Africa (I take possession of thee, O Africa). When Cæsar landed at Adrumetum, in Africa, he tripped and fell—a bad omen; but, with wonderful presence of mind, he pretended that he had done so intentionally, and kissing the soil, exclaimed, "Thus do I take possession of thee, O Africa."

After-cast. A throw of dice after the game is ended; anything done too late.

Ever he playeth an after-cast of all that he shall say or do.—Gower.

After-clap. Beware of after-claps. An after-clap is a catastrophe or threat after an affair is supposed to be over. It is very common in thunderstorms to hear a "clap" after the rain subsides, and the clouds break.

What plaguy mischief and mishaps
Do dog him still with after-claps.

Hudibras, pt. 1. 3.

Aft-meal. An extra meal; a meal taken after and in addition to the ordinary meals.

At aft-meals who shall pay for the wine?
Thynne's "Debate."

Agag, in Dryden's satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," is meant for Sir Edmondsbury Godfrey, the magistrate before whom Titus Oates made his declaration, but was afterwards found barbarously murdered in a ditch near Primrose Hill. Agag was hewed to pieces by Samuel. (1 Sam. xv.)

And Corah Titus Oates, might for Agag's murder call,
In terms as coarse as Samuel used to Saul.

Agamem'non. King of Argos, in Greece, and commander-in-chief of the allied Greeks who went to the siege of Troy. The fleet being delayed by adverse winds at Aulis, Agamemnon sacrificed his daughter Iphigenia to Diana, and the winds became at once favourable. On his return home he was murdered by his wife.—Homer's "Iliad."

Till Agamemnon's daughter's blood
Appensed the gods that them withstood.
Earl of Surrey.

I'ixērē fortēs antē Agamem'nona (there were brave men before the days of Agamemnon), i.e., we are not to suppose that our own age monopolises all that is good.

Ag'apē (3 syl.). A love-feast. The early Christians held a love-feast before or after communion, when contributions were made for the poor. These feasts became a scandal, and were condemned at the Council of Carthage, 397. (Greek, agapē, love.)

Agapem'onē (5 syl.). An association of men and women living promiscuously on a common fund. There was one at Bridgewater, in Somersetshire. (Greek, agapē, love.)

Agapet'æ. Women under vows of virginity, who undertook to attend the monks. (The word is Greek, and means beloved.)

Ag'ate (2 syl.). So called, says Pliny (xxxvii. 10), from Acha'tēs or Gaga'tēs, a river in Sicily, near which it is found in abundance; but Bochart deduces it from the Hebrew okad or nakad (spotted).

Agate is supposed to render a person invisible, and to turn the sword of foes against themselves.

Ag'atha. Daughter of Cuno, the ranger, in love with Max, to whom she is to be married, provided he carries off the prize in the annual trial-shot. She is in danger of being shot by Max unwittingly, but is rescued by a hermit, and becomes the bride of the young huntsman.—Weber's Opera of "Der Freischütz."

Agdistēs (self-indulgence). The god who kept the porch of the "Bower of Bliss." He united in his own person the two sexes, and sprang from the stone Agdus, parts of which were taken by Deucalion and Pyrrha to cast over their shoulders, after the flood, for re-peopling the world. — Spenser, "Faëry Queen," book ii.

Age of Animals. An old Celtic rhyme, put into modern English, says—

Thrice the age of a dog is that of a horse;
Thrice the age of a horse is that of a man;
Thrice the age of a man is that of a deer;
Thrice the age of a deer is that of an eagle.

Ages. Hesiod names five :—

The Golden or patriarchal, under the care of Saturn.
The Silver or voluptuous,	Jupiter.
The Brazen or warlike,	Neptune.
The Heroic or renaissant	Mars.
The Iron or present	Pluto.

Fichtë names five ages also : the antediluvian, post-diluvian, christian, satanic, and millennial.

According to Lucre'tius, there are three ages, distinguished by the materials employed in implements (v. 1282), viz. :

(1) The age of stone, when celts or implements of stone were employed.

(2) The age of bronze, when implements were made of copper or brass.

(3) The age of iron, when implements were made of iron, as at present.

Ag'elas'ta. The stone on which Ce'rës rested when worn down by fatigue in searching for her daughter. (Greek, joyless.)

Agent. Is man a free agent? This is a question of theology, which has long been mooted. The point is this: If God foreordains all our actions, they must take place as he foreordains them, and man acts as a watch or clock; but if, on the other hand, man is responsible for his actions, he must be free to act as his inclination leads him. Those who hold the former view are called necessitarians; those who hold the latter, libertarians.

Agglu'tinate Languages. The Turanian family of languages are so called because the pronouns are glued on the verbs, and the case-prepositions on the nouns, and may be unglued so as to leave the roots distinct.

Aghast'. Frightened as by a ghost. The Saxon of ghost is gast.

Ag'is. King of Sparta, who tried to deliver Greece from the Macedonian yoke, and was slain in the attempt.

To save a rotten state, Agis, who saw
E'en Sparta's self to servile avarice sink.
Thomson, "Winter,"

Agist'. To take the cattle of another to graze at a certain sum. The feeding of these beasts is called agistment. The words are from the Norman agiser (to be levant and couchant), because, says Coke, beasts are levant and couchant whilst they are on the land.

Ag'la. A cabalistic name of God, formed from the initial letters of Attâh, Gibbor, Leholâm, Adonâi (Thou art strong for ever, O Lord!). (See NOTARICA.)

Ag'nes. The heroine of "David Copperfield," by Charles Dickens.

She is an Agnes (elle fait l'Agnes)—i.e., she is a sort of female "Verdant Green," who is so unsophisticated that she does not even know what love means. It is a character in Molière's "L'Ecole des Femmes."

Ag'noites (2 syl.). (1.) Certain heretics in the fourth century who said "God did not know everything." (2.) Another sect, in the sixth century, who maintained that Christ "did not know the time of the day of judgment." (Greek, a-gnomi, not to know.)

Agnus-castus. One of the Vitex plants, called agnos (chaste) by the Greeks, because the Athenian ladies, at the feast of Ce'rës, used to strew their couches with vitex leaves, as a palladium of chastity. The monks, mistaking agnos (chaste) for agnus (a lamb), but knowing the use made of the plant, added castus to explain its character, making it chaste-lamb. (For other similar blunders, see I. H. S.)

Agnus Dei. A cake of wax or dough stamped with the figure of a lamb supporting the banner of the Cross, and supposed, at one time, to preserve those who carried it about with them from accidents and temptation. Our Lord is called Agnus Dei (the Lamb of God). There is also a prayer so called, because it begins with the words, Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccâta mundi (O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world).

Agog'. He is all agog, in nervous anxiety; on the qui vive, like a horse in clover. (French, à gogo, or vivre à gogo, to live in clover; Italian, agogure, to desire eagerly.)

Agonis'tes (4 syl.). Samson Agonistes

means Samson wrestling with adversity—Samson combating with trouble. (Greek, agonizomai, to combat, to struggle.)

Agonis'tics. The disciples of Don'tusts.

Ag'ony properly means contention in the athletic games; and to agonise is the act of contending. (Greek, agōn, a game of contest.) Our notion of "great pain" arises from the great corporal suffering these athletes had to endure.

Agra'rian Law, from the Latin ager (land), is a law for making land the common property of a nation, and not the particular property of individuals. In a modified form, it means a re-distribution of land, giving to each citizen a portion.

Ague-cheek. Sir Andrew Ague-cheek, a straight-haired country squire, stupid even to silliness, self-conceited, living to eat, and wholly unacquainted with the world of fashion. The character is in Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night."

Abasue'rus, a title equivalent to Cœur de Lion, common to several Persian kings. Ezra styles Camby'sēs so (iv. 6), but probably the Ahasuerus of Scripture is Gushtasp darawesh (Dari'us). (See JEW.)

Ahith'ophel, or Achit'ophel. A treacherous friend and adviser. Ahithophel was David's counsellor, but joined Absalom in revolt, and advised him "like the oracle of God." (2 Sam. xvi. 20—23.) (See ACHITOPHEL.)

Ah'med (Prince). Noted for the tent given him by the fairy Pari-ban'ou, which would cover a whole army, but might be carried in one's pocket; and for the apple of Samarcand', which would cure all diseases.—Arabian Nights, "Prince Ahmed," &c.

This tent coincides in a marvellous manner with the Norse ship called Skidbladur (q.v.).

Aholiba'mah. A granddaughter of Cain, loved by the seraph Samia'sa. She is a proud, ambitious, queen-like beauty, a female type of Cain. When the flood comes, her angel-lover carries her under his wings to some other planet.—Byron, "Heaven and Earth."

Ah'riman, or Ahrima'nēs. The principle or angel of darkness and evil in the Magian system. (See ORMUSD.)

I recognise the evil spirit, sir, and do honour to Ahriman es in . . . this young man.—Thackeray.

Aide toi et le Ciel t'aidera (God will help those who help themselves). The party-motto of a political society of France, established in 1824. The object of the society was, by agitation and the press, to induce the middle classes to resist the Government. Guizot was at one time its president, and Le Globe and Le National its organs. This society, which doubtless aided in bringing about the Revolution of 1830, was dissolved in 1832.

Ai'grette (2 syl.). A lady's head-dress, consisting of feathers or flowers. The French call the down of thistles and dandelions, as well as the tuft of birds, aigrette.

Aim. To give aim, to stand aloof. A term in archery, meaning to stand within a convenient distance from the butts, to give the archers information how near their arrows fall to the mark aimed at.

But, gentle people, give me aim awhile,
For nature puts me to a heavy task;
Stand all aloof.

Shakespeare, "Titus Andronicus," v. 3.

To cry aim. To applaud, encourage. In archery it was customary to appoint certain persons to cry aim, for the sake of encouraging those who were about to shoot.

All my neighbours shall cry aim.
Merry Wives of Windsor, iii. 2.

Aim-crier. An abettor, one who encourages. In archery, the person employed to "cry aim" (q.v.).

Air, an Element. Anaxag'oras held air to be the primary form of matter.

Airap'adam. The white elephant, one of the eight which, according to Indian mythology, sustain the earth.

Ajax, the Greater. King of Sal'amis, a man of giant stature, daring, and self-confident. Generally called Tel'amon Ajax, because he was the son of Tel'amon. When the armour of Hector was awarded to Ulysses instead of to himself, he turned mad from vexation and stabbed himself.—Homer's "Iliad."

Ajax, the Less. Son of Oileus, king of Locris, in Greece. The night Troy was taken, he offered violence to Cassandra, the prophetic daughter of Priam; in consequence of which his ship was driven on a rock, and he perished at sea.—Homer's "Iliad."

Akbar. A title in Hindustan, meaning "Very Great," as Akbar Khan.

Ak'uan. The giant which Rustan slew. (Persian myth.)

Ak'uman. The most malevolent of all the Persian gods.

Alabaster. A stone of great purity and whiteness, used for ornaments. So called from "Alabastron," in Upper Egypt, where it abounds.

Alad'din, in the "Arabian Nights' Tales," obtains a magic lamp, and has a splendid palace built by the genius of the lamp. He marries the daughter of the sultan of China, loses his lamp, and his palace is transported to Africa.

Vanished into air like the palace of Aladdin.
Sir Walter Scott.

Aladdin's Lamp. The source of wealth and good fortune. After Aladdin came to his wealth and was married, he suffered his lamp to hang up and get rusty.

It was impossible that a family, holding a document which gave them access to the most powerful noblemen in Scotland, should have suffered it to remain unemployed, like Aladdin's rusty lamp.—Senior.

Aladdin's Window. To finish Aladdin's window—i.e., to attempt to complete something begun by a great genius, but left imperfect. The Times applied the illustration to earl Russell's attempt to patch up the vacancy made in the ministry by the death of lord Palmerston. The genius of the lamp built a palace with twenty-four windows, all but one being set in frames of precious stones; the last was left for the sultan to finish; but after exhausting his treasures, the sultan was obliged to abandon the task as hopeless.

Al'adine (3 syl.). The sagacious but cruel old king of Jerusalem in Tasso's epic. This is a fictitious character, inasmuch as the Holy Land was at the time under the dominion of the caliph of Egypt. Aladine is slain by Raymond.—"Jerusalem Delivered," book xx.

Al'ako. Son of Baro-De'vel, the great god of the gipsies. The gipsies say that he will ultimately restore them to Assas in Assyria, their native country. The image of Alako has a pen in his left hand and a sword in his right.

Alar'con. King of Barca, who joined the armament of Egypt against the Crusaders. His men were only half armed.—Jerusalem Delivered.

Alarm. An outcry made to give notice of danger. (Danish and Swedish, larm, outcry; French, alarme, as cloche d'alarme, an alarm bell.)

Alar'um Bell. In feudal times a larum bell was rung in the castle in times of danger to summon the retainers to arms—à l'armes (to the arming); hence the bell was called the "d'larmer bell," corrupted into alarum bell. Another etymology is larrum, Norman French for "robber." In cases of burglary the old Normans cried out au larrum, similar to the modern au voleur (thieves! thieves!). The bell that gave notice of the same molestation was called the "au larum" bell.

Alas'nam. Alasnam's lady. In the "Arabian Nights' Tales" Alasnam has eight statues of solid gold, but had to go in quest of a ninth more precious still, to fill the vacant pedestal. The prize was found in the lady who became his wife, at once the most beautiful and the most perfect of her race.

There is wanting one pure and perfect model, and that one, wherever it is to be found, is like Alasnam's lady, worth them all.

Sir Walter Scott.

Alas'tor. The evil genius of a house. Cicero says: "He meditated killing himself that he might become the Alastor of Augustus, whom he hated." Shelley has a poem entitled "Alastor;" or, The Spirit of Solitude. The word is Greek, and means "not to forget" (a'la'thein).

Alb The white tunic (Latin, albus, white) originally bound round the waist with a zone. The dress is emblematical of purity and continence.

Alba'ro Stone or Peperi'no, used by the Romans in building; a volcanic tufa quarried at Albi'no.

Al'bany. Scotland. (See ALBIN.)

Alba'ti. Certain Christian hermits of the fourteenth century, so called because they dressed in white. (Latin.)

Albatross. The largest of web-footed birds, called by sailors the Cape Sheep, from its frequenting the Cape of Good Hope. It gorges itself, and then sits motionless upon the waves. It is said to sleep in the air, because its flight is a gliding without any apparent motion of its long wings. Sailors say it is fatal to shoot an albatross. Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner" is founded on this superstition.

Albertaz'zo (in "Orlando Furioso") married Alda, daughter of Otho, duke of Saxony. His sons were Hugh or Ugo, and Fulke or Fulco. From this family springs the Royal Family of England.

Albia'zar (in "Jerusalem Delivered"). One of the leaders of the Arab host which joined the Egyptian armament against the Crusaders. "A chief in rapine, not in knighthood bred." (Book xvii.)

Albigen'ses (4 syl.). A common name for heretics prior to the Reformation; so called from the Albigeois, inhabitants of Tarn, the capital of which was Albi. It was here the persecution of the Reformers began, under the direction of Pope Innocent III., in 1209. The Walden'ses rose after them, but are not infrequently confounded with them.

Albin means "highlands," i.e., Scotland. (Gaelic, ailp; Celtic, alp; our Alps.) Albin is either Ailp-ben (son of the hills, i.e., hill-country), or Ailp-inn (hilly island).

Woe to his kindred, and woe to his cause,
When Albin her claymore indignantly draws.
Campbell, "Lochiel's Warning."

Albi'no. A term originally applied by the Portuguese to those negroes who were mottled with white spots; but now applied to those who are born with red eyes and white hair. (Latin, albus, white.)

Al'bion. England, so named from the ancient inhabitants, called Albi'o'nēs. The usual etymology of albus (white), said to have been given by Julius Cæsar in allusion to the "white cliffs," is quite untenable, as Aristotle mentions the islands of Albion and Iernē four hundred years before the invasion of Cæsar. (See ALBIN.)

Albion. Son of the king of this island when Oberon held his court in what we call Kensington Gardens. He was stolen by the elfin Milkah, and brought up in fairyland. When nineteen years of age, he fell in love with Kenna, daughter of king O'beron, but was driven from the empire by the indignant monarch. Albion invaded the territory, but was slain in the battle. When Kenna knew this, she poured the juice of moly over the dead body, and it changed into a snow-drop.—T. Tickell.

Albrac'ca's Damsel (in "Orlando Furioso") is Angelica. Albracca is the capital of Cathay (q.v.).

Album. A blank book for scraps. The Romans applied the word to certain tables overlaid with gypsum, on which were inscribed the annals of the chief priests, the edicts of the pretors, and rules relating to civil matters. In the Middle Ages, "album" was the general name of a register or list; so called from being kept either on a white board with black letters, or on a black board with white letters. For the same reason the boards in churches for notices, and the boards in universities containing the names of the college men, are called albums.

Alca'de or Alca'di. A judge is so called in Spain. The word is the Arabic al cadi (the judge).

Alca'ic Verse or Alcaics. A Greek and Latin metre, so called from Alcæos, a lyric poet, who invented it.

Alcanta'ra. The Order of Alcantara, instituted in 1156, by Hadria II., king of Leon, at Alcantara, a town of Estramadura. The sovereign of Spain is, ex officio, sovereign of the Order.

Alcastus (in "Jerusalem Delivered"). The Cap'anens of the Crusaders, leader of 6,000 foot soldiers from Helvetia.

Al'ce (2 syl.). One of the dogs of Actæon.

Alces'te (2 syl.). The hero of Molière's "Misanthrope." Not unlike Shakespeare's character of Timon.

Alchemy is the Arabic al kīmīa (the secret art); so called not only because it was carried on in secret, but because its main objects were the two great secrets of science—the transmutation of baser metals into gold, and the elixir of life.

Alci'na. The personification of carnal pleasure in "Orlando Furioso;" the Circē of the Greeks, and Labē of the Arabians. She enjoyed her lovers for a time, and then changed them into trees, stones, fountains, or beasts, as her fancy dictated.

Al'ciphron. The hero of T. Moore's "Epicure'an."

Alco've (2 syl.). A recess in a room for a bed; a garden bower. The word is Arabic, and means al-kauf (the tent).

Aldabella or Aldabelle (in "Orlando Furioso.") Sister of Olivie'ro and Brandinarte, daughter of Monodantès, and wife of Orlando.

Aldabella. A marchioness of Florence, who gave entertainment to the magnates of the city. She was very handsome, heartless, and arrogant. When Fazio became rich with Bartoldo's money, Aldabella inveigled him from his wife, and his wife, out of jealousy, accused her husband of being privy to Bartoldo's death. Fazio being condemned for murder and robbery, his wife Bianca accused Aldabella of inveigling him, and the marchioness was condemned by the duke of Florence to spend the rest of her life in a nunnery.—Dean Milman, "Fazio."

Ald'ebaran. The sun in Arabian mythology. In astronomy, the star called the Bull's eye in the constellation Taurus.

Alderman. A cant term for a half-crown. An alderman, as a magistrate, may be termed half a king (or crown). Of course, the word means one of the "elders."

A turkey is called an alderman, both from its presence in aldermanic feasts, and also because of its red and purple colours, which make it a sort of poultry alderman.

An alderman in chains, by a similiar effort of wit, is a turkey hung with sausages.

Aldiboron'tephos'cophor'io. A character in Henry Carey's farce called "Chro'nonho'tontbol'ogos."

Al'diger (in "Orlando Furioso"). Bu'o'vo's son, of the house of Clarmont, who lived in Ag'rismont Castle. He was brother of Malagi'gi and Vivian; all Christians.

Aldine (2 syl.). Leader of the second squadron of Arabs who joined the Egypttian armament against the Crusaders.—Tasso, "Jerusalem Delivered." (See SYPHAX.)

Aldine editions. Editions of the Greek and Latin classics, published and printed under the superintendence of Aldo Manuz'io and his son Paolo (1490-1597); most of them in duodecimo, and all noted for their accuracy. The father invented the type called italics, once called Aldine, and first used in printing "Virgil," 1501.

Al'dingar, Sir. Steward of queen Eleanor, wife of Henry II. He impeached her fidelity, and submitted to a combat to substantiate his charge, but an angel, in the shape of a child, established the queen's innocence.—Percy's "Reliques."

Ale is the Scandinavian öl, a liquor made of the molte-beer, a large, red, three-lobed berry that grows wild in most parts of Scandinavia. Malt is the word molte, applied to the barley substitute of the Norwegian berry. Beer is ale with hops in it, called Baiersk (Bavarian). Even in England ale was made at one time of wheat, barley, and honey, without hops.

In some parts of the island ale means the stronger brew, and in others beer. The rule is this: wherever the Scandinavian element prevails, ale or öl is the strong drink; but where the German element predominates, it is beer or baiersk.

Ale-draper, a tapster. *Ale-draper*y, the selling of ale, &c.

No other occupation have I but to be an ale-draper.—H. Chettle, "Kind-harts' Dreame," 1592.

Ale-silver. A yearly tribute paid to the corporation of London, as a licence for selling ale.

Ale-stake. The pole set up before ale-houses by way of "sign." A bush was very often fixed to its top.

A garland had he set upon his head
As great as it werin for an ale-stake.

Chaucer.

Ale-wife. The landlady of an ale-house or ale-stand.

Alec'to. One of the Furies, whose head was covered with snakes.

Then like Alecto, terrible to view,
Or like Medusa, the Circassian grew.

Hoolet's "Jerusalem Delivered," b. vi.

Ale'ka. Wife of Pan'geo, idols of the Oroun'gou tribes in Africa, the special protectors of kings and governments.

Ale'ria (in "Orlando Furioso"). One of the Amazons, and the best beloved of the ten wives of Guido the Savage.

Alert. To be on the watch. (Greek, orthos 'erect'; Latin, ortus; Italian, erto, sleep; French, erte, a watch-tower. Hence the Italian starè all' erta, the Spanish estar alerta, and the French être à l'erta, to be on the watch.)

Alessio. The lover of Liza, in Bellini's opera of "La Sonnambula." (Scribe's libretto.)

Ale'thes (3 syl.). An ambassador from Egypt to king Al'adine. He is represented as a man of low birth raised to the highest rank, subtle, false, deceitful, and wily.—Tasso, "Jerusalem Delivered."

Alexander. You are thinking of Parmen'io, and I of Alexander—i.e., you are thinking what you ought to receive, and I what I ought to give; you are thinking of those castigated, rewarded, or gifted, but I of my own position, and what punishment, reward, or gift is consistent with my rank. The allusion is to the tale about Parmen'io and Alexander, when the king said, "I consider not what Parmenio should receive, but what Alexander should give."

Only two Alexanders. Alexander said, "There are but two Alexanders—the invincible son of Philip, and the inimitable painting of the hero by Apellès."

Alexander of the North. Charles XII. of Sweden, so called from his military achievements. He was conquered at Pultowa, in Russia (1709), by czar Peter the Great (1682-1718).

Repressing here
The frantic Alexander of the North.
Thomson, "Winter."

Alexander the Corrector. Alexander Cruden, author of the "Concordance to the Bible," who petitioned Parliament to constitute him "Corrector of the People," and went about constantly with a sponge to wipe out the licentious, coarse, and profane chalk scrawls which met his eye. (1701-1770.)

Alexandra (in "Orlando Furioso"). Daughter of Oronthe'a, queen of the Amazons, and one of the ten wives of Elba'nio. From her the land of the Amazons was named Alexandra.

Alexan'drian. Anything from the East was so called by the old chroniclers and romancers, because Alexandria was the d-pôt from which Eastern stores reached Europe.

Reclined on Alexandrian carpets [see Persian].
Rose, "Orlando Furioso," x. 37.

Alexandrian Codex. A manuscript of the Scriptures in Greek, which belonged to the library of the patriarchs of Alexandria, in Africa, A.D. 1098. In 1628 it was sent as a present to Charles I., and is now in the British Museum.

Alexandrian Library. Founded by Ptolemy So'ter in Alexandria, in Egypt. The tale is that it was burnt and partly consumed in 391; but when the city fell into the hands of the calif Omar, in 642, the Arabs found books sufficient to "heat the baths of the city for six months."

Alexandrian School. An academy of literature by Ptolemy, son of La'gos, and especially famous for its grammarians and mathematicians. Of its grammarians the most noted are Aristarchos, Harpocration, and Aristoph'anès; and of its mathematicians, Ptolemy and Euclid, the former an astronomer, and the latter the geometer whose "Elements" are still very generally used.

Alexandrine Age. From A.D. 323 to 640, when Alexandria, in Egypt, was the centre of science and literature.

Alexandrine Philosophy. The system of the Gnostics, or Platonised form of Christianity.

Alexan'drines (4 syl.). Verses of twelve or thirteen syllables, divided into two parts between the sixth and seventh syllable; so called because they were first employed in a metrical romance of Alexander the Great, commenced by Lambertli-Cors, and continued by Alexandre de Bernay of Normandy. The final line of the Spenserian stanza is an Alexandrine.

A needless Alexandrine ends the song
Which, like a wounded snake | drags its slow length along.—Pope.

Alex'is, St. Patron saint of hermits. The story goes that he lived on his father's estate as a hermit till death, but was never recognised.

Alfa'der (father of all). The most ancient and chief of the Scandinavians gods.

Alfa'na. The name of Gradasso's horse.—Orlando Furioso.

Alfar'. The good and bad genii of the Scandinavians.

Alf'heim (home of the genii). A celestial city inhabited by the elves and fairies. (Scand. myth.)

Alfonso. While Tasso was at Ferrara he fell in love with Leonora d'Este, daughter of Alfonso, duke of Ferrara. Whereupon the duke shut him up in a madhouse for seven years, from which he was released by Clement VIII., who invited him to Rome.

The miserable despot could not quell
The insulted mind he sought to quench, and blend
With the surrounding maniacs.
Byron, "Childe Harold," iv. 35.

Alfonso XI., of Castile, whose "favourite" was Leonora de Guzman. Being threatened with excommunication unless he put her away (as Leonora was in love with Ferdinando, a brave officer), the king creates Ferdinando marquess of Montreal, and gives him the hand of his "favourite." As soon as Ferdinando discovers who Leonora is, he restores his honours to the king, repudiates his bride, and retires to a monastery.—Donizetti's Opera "La Favorita."

Alfred's Scholars. Werfrith bishop of Worcester, Ethelstan and Werwulf two Mercian priests, Plegmund (a Mercian) afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, Asser a Welshman, Grimbold a great French scholar, &c., invited over to England by king Alfred.

Al'garsife (3 syl.). Son of Cambuscan, and brother of Cam'balo, who "won Theod'ora to wife." It is in the "Squire's Tale," by Chaucer, but was never finished. (See CANACE.)

Call up him that left half told
The story of Cambusean hold,
Of Camball, and of Al'garsife,
And who had Canace to wife.
Milton, "Il Penseroso."

Al'gebra is the Arabic al gebr (wal mokâhola), "the supplementing and equalising (process);" so called because the problems are solved by equations, and the equations are made by supplementary terms.

Alham'bra. The palace of the ancient Moors in Grana'da. The word is the Arabic al-hamra, or at full length kal'-at al hamra (the red castle).

Al'i. Cousin and son-in-law of Mahomet, the beauty of whose eyes is with the Persians proverbial, inasmuch that the highest term they employ to express beauty is Aya Hali (eyes of Ali).—Chardin.

Al'icant. A Spanish wine made at Alicant, in the province of Valencia.

Alice. The foster-sister of Robert le Diable, and bride of Rambaldo the Norman troubadour. She comes to Palermo to place in the duke's hand her mother's will, which he is enjoined not to read till he is a virtuous man. When Bertram, his fiend-father, tempts his son to evil, Alice proves his good genius; and when, at last, Bertram claims his soul as the price of his ill deeds, Alice reads the "will," and wins him from the evil one.—Meyerbeer's Opera "Roberto il Diavolo."

Alichi'no. A devil, in "The Inferno" of Dante.

Al'icon. The seventh heaven. (Mahometan mythology.)

Al'ilat. The name by which the Arabs adore Nature, which they represent by a crescent moon. All inferior gods are called by them el ilahat (the goddesses).

Aliphar'non, the giant. Don Quixote attacked a flock of sheep, which he declared to be the army of the giant Aliphar'non. Similarly Ajax, in a fit of madness, fell on a flock of sheep, which he mistook for Grecian princes.

Alipran'do (in "Jerusalem Delivered"). One of the Christian knights. Having discovered the armour of Rinaldo cast on one side, he took it to Godfrey, who very naturally inferred that Rinaldo had been slain.

Al'iris. Sultan of Lower Buchar'ia. Under the disguised name of Fer'amorz, he accompanies Lalla Rookh, his bride, from Delhi, and wins her heart by his ways, and the tales he tells on the journey. The lady falls in love with the poet, and is delighted to find, on the morning of the wedding, that Fer'amorz is, in fact, the sultan, her intended husband.—T. Moore, "Lalla Rookh."

Al Ka'der (the Divine decree). A particular night in the month Ramadhan, when the Arabs say that angels descend to earth, and Gabriel reveals to man the decrees of God.—Al Kcran.

Al Moshta'ri. The Arabian name of the planet Jupiter.

Al-Si'rat (Arab., the path). The bridge over hell, no wider than the edge of a sword, across which every one who enters heaven must pass. (Mahom. Theol.)

All Alive and Kicking. The allusion is to a child in the womb after "quickening."

All in the Wrong. A drama, by Murphy, borrowed from Destouches, the French dramatist.

All my Eye (and) Betty Martin. All nonsense. Joe Miller says that a Jack Tar went into a foreign church, where he heard some one uttering these words—Ah! mihi, bea'te Marti'nē (Ah! [grant] me, Blessed Martin). On giving an account of his adventure, Jack said he could not make much out of it, but it seemed to him very like "All my eye and Betty Martin."

All Saints or All Hallows. In 610 the Pope of Rome ordered that the heathen pantheon should be converted into a Christian church, and dedicated to the honour of all martyrs. The festival of All Saints was first held on May 1, but in the year 834 it was changed to November 1. "Hallows" is from the Saxon haligan (to make or keep holy).

All Souls' Day. The 2nd of November, so called because the Roman Catholics on that day seek by prayer and almsgiving to alleviate the sufferings of souls in purgatory. It was first instituted in the monastery of Clugny, in 998.

According to tradition, a pilgrim, returning from the Holy Land, was compelled by a storm to land on a rocky island, where he found a hermit, who told him that among the cliffs of the island was an opening into the infernal regions through which huge flames ascended, and where the groans of the tormented were distinctly audible. The pilgrim told Odilo, abbot of Clugny, of this; and the abbot appointed the day following, which was November 2, to be set apart for the benefit of souls in purgatory.

All this for a Song. The exclamation of Burleigh, when queen Elizabeth ordered him to give £100 to Spenser for a royal gratuity.

All-overish. A familiar expression, meaning all over ill at ease. "I feel all-overish," not exactly ill, but by no means well. The precursor of a fever, influenza, ague, &c. The word is a corruption of all awr-ish, i.e., all elfish, as if the elves or hobgoblins had bewitched me.

All-to. Altogether. As "all-to be-crossed;" "all-to be-batted." "A certain woman cast a piece of a millstone upon Abimelech's head, and all-to brake his skull." (Judges ix. 53.) (See The Parker Society's reprints.)

Mercurio's icy hand had al-to frozen mine.—Romeus and Juliet, 1502.

Alls. The five Alls. A public-house sign. It has five human figures, with a motto to each:—

- | | | |
|----------------------------------|-------|-------------------------|
| (1) A king, in his regalia... | motto | I govern all. |
| (2) A bishop, in his pontificals | " | I pray for all. |
| (3) A lawyer, in his gown | " | I plead for all. |
| (4) A soldier, in regimentals | " | I fight for all. |
| (5) A labourer, with his tools | " | I pay for all. |

One of these signs still exists in the town of Marlborough.

Alls. Tap-droppings. The refuse of all sorts of spirits drained from the glasses, or spilt in drawing. The mixture is sold in gin-houses at a cheap rate.

Alla or Allah (that is, al-ilah). "The adorable." The Arabic name of the Supreme Being.

Alla Akbar'. Alla is most mighty. The cry of the Arabs.—Ockley.

Allath. One of the three daughters of the supreme god of the ancient Arabians. The other two were Menach and Aluzzo.

Allen-a-Dale. A brave young man who was assisted by Robin Hood to carry off his bride, when on the point of being married against her will to a rich old knight.

Allick and Sandie. Contractions of Alexander; the one being Alex' and the other 'xander.

Alligator. When the Spaniards first saw this reptile in the New World, they called it el lagarto (the lizard). Sir Walter Raleigh called them lagartos, and Ben Jonson alligartas.

Allo'dials. Lands which are held by an absolute right, without even the burden of homage or fidelity. The word is Teutonic—all-od (all property).

Allop'athy is in opposition to Homœop'athy. The latter word is from the Greek homœos pathos, similar disease; and the former is allos pathos, a different disease. In one case, "like is to cure like;" and in the latter, the disease is cured by its "antidote."

Allworth. In "A New Way to Pay Old Debts," by Massinger.

Allworthy, in Fielding's "Tom Jones," is designed for the author's friend Ralph Allen.

Let humble Allen, with an awkward shame,
Do good by stealth, and blush to find it fame.
Pope.

Al'ma (the human soul), queen of "Body Castle," beset by enemies for seven years (the Seven Ages of Man). The besiegers are a rabble rout of evil desires, foul imaginations, and silly conceits. Alma conducted Arthur and Sir Guyon over her castle. "The divine part of a man," says Spenser, "is circular, a circle being the emblem of eternity; but the mortal part triangular, as it consists of three things—blood, flesh, and bones."

Alma Ma'ter. A collegian so calls the university of which he is a member. The words are Latin for "fostering mother."

Expulsion from his Alma Mater.—The Collegian and the Porter.

Almack's. Aristocratic exclusiveness. A ball given by the highest nobility. Almack's means properly a suite of assembly rooms in King Street, St. James's (London), built in 1765 by a Scotchman named Macall, who inverted his name to obviate all prejudice and hide his origin. Balls, presided over by a committee of ladies of the highest rank, used to be given at these rooms; and to be admitted to them was as great a distinction as to be introduced at Court. The rooms are now called Willis's, from the present proprietor; but they no longer retain their original character.

Al'manac is the Arabic al manac (the diary). Verstegen says it is the Saxon al-mon-aght (all moon heed), and that it refers to the tallies of the full and new moons kept by our Saxon ancestors.

One of these tallies may still be seen at St. John's College, Cambridge.

The Man i' the Almanac stuck with pins (Nat. Lee), is a man marked with points referring to signs of the zodiac, and intended to indicate the favourable and unfavourable times of letting blood.

I shan't consult your almanac (French), I shall not come to you to know what weather to expect. The reference is to the prognostications of weather in almanacs.

Alman'zor. A character in Dryden's "Conquest of Grenada," a tragedy.

Almighty Dollar. Washington Irving first made use of this expression, in his sketch of a "Creole Village" (1837).

Almond Tree. Grey hairs. The Preacher thus describes old age:—

In the day when the keepers of the house (the hands) shall tremble, and the strong men (the legs) bow themselves, and the grinders (the teeth) cease because they are few, and those that look out of the windows (the eyes) be darkened . . . and the almond-tree shall flourish (grey hairs on a bald pate), and the grasshopper be a burden, and desire shall fail . . . when the silver cord (the spinal marrow) shall be loosed, the golden bowl (intellect) broken, and the pitcher broken at the cistern (the pulse of the heart stopped).—Eccles. xii. 3-6.

Almonry. The place where the almoner resides. The almoner is the person whose duty it is to distribute alms, which, in ancient times, consisted of one-tenth of the entire income of a monastery. (See AMBRY.)

Alms. Gifts to the poor. (Old English almesse, Danish almisse, Norman almoignis, French aumones, Latin elemosyna, from the Greek eleō, I pity.)

Alms-drink. Another's leavings; for alms consist of broken bread and the residue of drink. It is also applied to the liquor which a drinker finds too much, and therefore hands to another.

Alms-house. A house in which almsmen and women live free.

Alms-man. One who lives on alms.

Along-shore Men. The lower sort of men employed about our quays and docks.

Alonzo of A'guilar'. When Fernando, king of Aragon, was laying siege to Grenada, after chasing Za'gal from the gates, he asked who would undertake to plant his banner on the heights. Alonzo, "the lowmost of the dons," undertook the task, but was cut down by the Moors. His body was exposed in the wood of Oxijera, and the Moorish damsels, struck with its beauty, buried it near the brook of Alpuxarra.

Aloof. Stand aloof, away. A sea term. The loof is the after-part of a ship's bow, and the guns mounted therein are styled "loof-pieces."

A l'outrance. In spite of obstacles and objections. (French, à l'outrance, to the extreme.)

A champion has started up to maintain à l'outrance her innocence of the great offence.—Standard.

Alp. The Adrian renegade, a Venetian by extraction, who forswore the Christian faith to become a commander in the Turkish army. He led the host to the siege of Corinth, while that country was under the dominion of the Doge. He loved Francesca, daughter of Minotti, governor of Corinth, but she died of a broken heart because he deserted his country and was an apostate. The renegade was shot in the siege.—Byron, "Siege of Corinth."

Alph. A mythical "sacred river in Xanadu," which ran "through caverns massecure to man."—Coleridge, "Kubla Khan."

Al'pha. "I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last." (Rev. i. 8.) "Alpha" is the first, and "O-meg'a" the last letter of the Greek alphabet.

Alphe'os and Arethu'sa. The Greek fable says that Alphe'os, the river-god, fell in love with the nymph Arethu'sa, who fled from him in affright. The burly god pursued, but was changed into a river, and the nymph into a fountain.

We have seen a moustachioed Alpheos, at Ramsgate, pursue an affrighted Arethusa.—London Review.

Alphe'us (in "Orlando Furioso"). A magician and prophet in the army of Charlemagne, slain in sleep by Clorinda'no.

Alpnaon'sin. An instrument for extracting balls; so called from Alphonso Ferri, a surgeon of Naples, who invented it.

Alphon'sine Tables. Astronomical tables constructed in 1252, by Isaac Hazan, a Jewish rabbi, who named them in honour of his patron, Alphonsus X., king of Aragon.

Alphonso, to whom Tasso dedicates his "Jerusalem Delivered," was Alphonso d'Este, duke of Ferra'ra.

Alpue (Al-pu). Continuing the bet on a particular card that has already won.

What pity 'tis those conquering eyes
Which all the world subdue,
Should, while the lover gazing dies,
Be only on alpue.—Etherege, "Basset."

Alqui'fe (al-ke'-fab). A famous enchanter, introduced into the romances of ancient times, especially those relating to Am'adis.

Alsa'tia. The Whitefriars' sanctuary for debtors and law-breakers. Cunningham thinks the name is borrowed from Alsace, in France, which, being a frontier of the Rhine, was everlastingly the seat of war and the refuge of the disaffected. Sir Walter Scott, in his "Fortunes of Nigel," has described the life and state of this rookery. (See PETAND.)

Als'vidur. One of the horses of the sun. (Scand. myth.)

Altamo'rus (in "Jerusalem Delivered"). King of Samarcand', who joined the Egyptian armament against the Crusaders. "He was supreme in courage as in might." (Book xvii.) He surrendered himself to Godfrey. (Book xx.)

Altan Kol or Gold River (Thibet). So called from the gold which abounds in its sands.

Altar. Led to the altar, i.e., married. Said of a lady. The altar is the communion-table railed off from the body of the church, where marriages are solemnised. The bride is led up the aisle to the rail.

Alter eg'o. My double or counterpart. In "The Corsican Brothers," the same actor performs the two brothers, the one being the alter ego of the other. (Lat., "a second I.")

Altesido'ra (in the "Curious Impertinent"); an episode in "Don Quixote."

Altis. The plot of ground on which the Greeks held their public games.

Alto rilievo (rel-e-a'-ro). Italian for "high relief." A term used in sculpture for figures in wood, stone, marble, &c., so cut as to project at least one-half from the tablet.

Alzes (2 syl.). The Scandinavian god of fraternal love.

Alzir'do (in "Orlando Furioso). King of Trem'izen, in Africa. He was overthrown by Orlando on his way to join the allied army of Ag'ramant.

Am'adis of Gaul. The hero of a romance in prose of the same title, originally written in Portuguese in four books. These four were translated into Spanish by Montalvo, who added a fifth. Subsequent romancers added the exploits and adventures of other knights, so as to swell the romance to fourteen books. The French version is much larger still, one containing twenty-four books, and another running through seven volumes. The original author was Vasco de Lobeira, of Oporto, who died 1403.

The hero, called the "Lion-knight," from the device on his shield, and "Bel-tene'bros" (darkly beautiful), from his personal appearance, was a love-child of Per'ion, king of Gaul, and Elize'na, princess of Brittany. He is represented as a poet and musician, a linguist and a gallant, a knight-errant and a king, the very model of chivalry.

Other names by which Am'adis was called were the Lovely Obscure, the Knight of the Burning Sword, the Knight of the Dwarf, &c.

Am'adis of Greece. A supplemental part of the romance called "Am'adis of Gaul," added by Felicia'no de Silva.

Amai'mon (3 syl.). One of the chief devils whose dominion is on the north side of the infernal gulf. He might be bound or restrained from doing hurt from the third hour till noon, and from the ninth hour till evening.

Amaimon sounds well; Lucifer well.
"Merry Wives of Windsor," ii. 2.

Amain'. Forcibly, at once. (Saxon, a-mægn.) Let go amain, at once; lower amain; strike amain, i.e., let fall at once, with a run.

Amal'fian Code. A compilation of maritime laws, compiled in the eleventh century by the Amalfians.

Amaliv'aca. An American spirit, who had seven daughters. He broke their legs to prevent their running away, and left them to people the forests.

Amalthæa's Horn. The cornucopia or horn of plenty. The infant Zeus was fed with goats' milk by Amalthæa, one of the daughters of Melisseus, king of Crete. Zeus, in gratitude, broke off one of the goat's horns, and gave it Amalthæa, promising that the possessor should always have in abundance everything desired. (See EGIS.)

Aman'da, the impersonation of love in Thomson's "Spring," is Miss Young, afterwards married to Admiral Campbell.

Aman'ga. The Indian love-god.

Am'arant. A cruel giant slain by Guy of Warwick.—"Guy and Amarant," Percy's Reliques.

Am'arant. Clement of Alexandria says—Amarantus flos, symbolum est immortalitatis. The word is from the Greek amaran'tos (everlasting); so called because its flowers never fade like other flowers, but retain to the last their deep blood-red colour.

Immortal amarant—a flower which once
In Paradise, fast by the tree of life,
Began to bloom; but soon, for man's offence,
To heaven removed, where first it grew, there grows
And flowers aloft, shading the fount of life. . . .
With these, that never fade, the spirits elect
Bind their resplendent locks.

Milton, "Paradise Lost," iii.

Amaryll'is. A pastoral sweetheart. The name is borrowed from the pastorals of Theoc'ritos and Virgil.

To sport with Amaryllis in the shade.—Milton.

Amaryn'thos. One of the dogs of Actæon.

Ama'ti. A first-rate violin; properly, one made by Ama'ti of Cremona. (See CREMONA.)

Am'azon. A horsewoman, a fighting or masculine woman. The word means without breast, or rather, "deprived of a pap." According to Grecian story, there was a nation of women in Africa of a very warlike character. There were no men in the nation; and if a boy was born, it was either killed or sent to his father, who lived in some neighbouring state. The girls had their right breasts singed off, that they might the better draw the bow.

Probably the fable is founded on a misconception of the Circassian word muza (the moon), the Amazons of Thermodoon, in Asia Minor, being worshippers of the moon.

A similar error was the origin of the name "Amazons of the North." Adam of Bremen mistook Quanerland (ice-land) for Quinerland; and as Quiner means "woman," he peopled his "Womanland" with a race of amazons.

Am'azon. In South America, originally called Mar'anōn. The Spaniards first called it Orellana; but after the women joined their husbands in attacking the invaders, the Spaniards called the people Am'azons and the country Amazo'nia.

Am'ber is said by some to be a concretion of birds' tears. — Chambers.

Around thee shall glisten the loveliest amber
That ever the sorrowing sea-bird hath wept.
T. Moore, "Pire Worshippers."

Amber, a repository. So called because insects and small leaves are preserved in amber.

You may be disposed to preserve it in your amber.
"Notes and Queries." — W. Dove.

Ambera'had. Amber-city, one of the towns of Jinnistan, or Fairy Land.

Am'bes-as or Ames-ace. Two aces, the lowest throw in dice; figuratively, bad luck.

I had rather be in this choice than throw ames-ace for my life. — "All's Well," &c., ii. 3.

Ambi-dexter properly means both hands right hands; a double dealer; a juror who takes money from both parties for his verdict.

Ambition, strictly speaking, means "the going from house to house" (Latin, ambitio, going about canvassing). In Rome it was customary, some time before an election came on, for the candidates to go round to the different dwellings to solicit votes, and those who did so were ambitious of office.

Ambro'sia. The food of the gods (Greek, a brotos, not mortal); so called because it made them not mortal, i.e., it made them immortal. Anything delicious to the taste or fragrant in perfume is so called from the notion that whatever is used by the celestials must be excellent.

Ambro'sian Chant. The choral music introduced from the eastern to the western church by St. Ambrose, archbishop of Mil'an, in the fourth century.

It was used till Gregory the Great changed it for the Gregorian.

Ambro'sian Library. A library in Mil'an, so called in compliment of St. Ambrose.

Am'bry. A corruption of almonry, the niche or recess cut in the wall, or (in large cathedrals and monasteries) that part of the cloisters where alms were deposited and out-door relief was distributed. Ambries are now used for holding the sacramental plate, consecrated oils, and so on. (See ALMONRY.)

Ambusca'de (3 syl.) is the Italian imbosca'ta (concealed in a wood).

Amedieu (3 syl.). "Friends of God;" a religious body in the Church of Rome, founded in 1400. They wore no breeches, but a grey cloak girded with a cord, and were shod with wooden shoes.

Amé'lia. A model of conjugal affection, in Fielding's novel so called. It is said that the character is intended for his own wife.

Amende honorable, in France, was a degrading punishment inflicted on traitors, parricides, and sacrilegious persons, who were brought into court with a rope round their neck, and made to beg pardon of God, the king, and the court. Now, the public acknowledgment of the offence is all that is required.

Amen'thes (3 syl.). The Egyptian Ha'dēs. The word means hiding-place.

American Flag. The American Congress resolved (June 14, 1777), that the flag of the United States should have thirteen stripes, alternately red and white, to represent the thirteen States of the Union, together with thirteen white stars, on a blue ground. General Washington's escutcheon contained three bars and three stars, and, like the American stars, those of the General had only five points instead of six. A new star is now added for each new State, but the stripes remain the same.

American Peculiarities:—

Natives of New England ...	say Guess .
" N. York and Middle States ...	" Exped.
" Southern States ...	" Reckon .
" Western States ...	" Calculate .

Ameth'ea. One of the horses of Pluto. (See ABASTER.)

Am'ethyst. A species of rock crystal; so called from the ancient notion of its being an antidote to the effects of wine. (Greek, a methusko, to de-intoxicate.)

Ami'cus cu'riæ (Latin, a friend to the court). One in the court who informs the judge of some error he has detected.

Ami'cus Plato, sed magis ami'ca Ver'itas (Plato I love, but I love Truth more). A noble dictum attributed to Aristotle, but certainly a very free translation of a line in the "Nicomach'ean Ethics."

Am'iel (3 syl.). A form of the name Eliam (friend of God). In Dryden's satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," it is designed for Mr. Seymour, speaker of the House of Commons. (2 Sam. xxiii. 34.)

Who can Amiel's praise refuse?
Of ancient race by birth, but nobler yet
In his own worth, and without title great.
The Sanhedrim long time as chief he ruled,
Their reason guided, and their passion cooled.
Dryden, "Absalom and Achitophel."

Am'iens (3 syl.). The Peace of Amiens, March 27, 1802, a treaty signed by Joseph Bonaparte, the marquis of Cornwallis, Azara, and Schimmelpenninck, to settle the disputed points between France, England, Spain, and Holland. It was dissolved in 1803.

Ami'na. An orphan adopted by a miller, and beloved by Elvi'no, a rich farmer. The night before her espousals she is found in the bed of count Rodolpho, and is renounced by her betrothed husband. The count explains to the young farmer and his friends that Ami'na is innocent, and has wandered in her sleep. While he is still talking, the orphan is seen getting out of the window of the mill, and walking in her sleep along the edge of the roof under which the mill-wheel is rapidly revolving. She crosses a crazy bridge, and comes among the spectators. In a few minutes she awakes, flies to Elvi'no, and is claimed by him as his beloved and innocent bride.—Belli'ni's best opera, "La Sonnambula."

Amin'adab. A Quaker. The Scripture name has a double m, but in old comedies, where the character represents a Quaker, the name has generally only one. Obadiah is used, also, to signify a Quaker, and Rachel a Quakeress.

Ami'ne (2 syl.). A hard-hearted woman who led her three sisters about

"as a eash of greyhounds."—Arabian Nights.

Am'iral or Ammiral. A Miltonic form of the word "admiral." (German, amiral; Italian, ammiraglio.) (See ADMIRAL.)

Am'let, Richard. The gamester in Vanbrugh's drama called "The Confederacy."

Am'mon. A Libyan deity similar to the Roman Jupiter; so called from the Greek ammos (sand), because his temple was in the desert.

Son of Jupiter Ammon. Alexander the Great. His father, Philip, claimed to be a descendant of Hercules, and therefore of Jupiter; and the son was saluted by the priests of the Libyan temple as son of Ammon. Hence was he called the son or descendant both of Jupiter and of Ammon.

Am'monites (3 syl.). Fossil molluscs; so called because they resemble the horn upon the ancient statues of Jupiter Ammon. (See above.)

A'mon's Son (in "Orlando Furioso") is Rinaldo. He was the eldest son of Amon or Aymon, marquis d'Este, and nephew of Charlemagne.

Am'oret, brought up by Venus in the courts of love. She is the type of female loveliness—young, handsome, gay, witty, and good; soft as a rose, sweet as a violet, chaste as a lily, gentle as a dove, loving everybody and by all beloved. She is no Diana to make "gods and men fear her stern frown;" no Minerva to "freeze her foes into congealed stone with rigid looks of chaste austerity;" but a living, breathing virgin, with a warm heart, and beaming eye, and passions strong, and all that man can wish and woman want. She becomes the loving, tender wife of Sir Scu'damore. Tim'ias finds her in the arms of Corflambo (sensual passion); combats the monster unsuccessfully, but wounds the lady.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," book iii.

Amorous, The. Philippe I. of France; so called because he divorced his wife Berthe to e-pouse Bertrade, who was already married to Foulques, comte d'Anjou. (1061-1108.)

Amour propre. One's self-love, vanity, or opinion of what is due to self. To make an appeal to one's amour propre, is to put a person on his metal. To wound one's amour propre, is to gall his good opinion of himself—to wound his vanity.

Ampa'ro de Pobres. A book exposing the begging impostors of Madrid, written by Herrera, physician to Felipe II.

Amphictyon'ic Council. A council of confederate Greeks from twelve of their tribes, each of which had two deputies. The council met twice a year—in the spring at Delphi, and in the autumn at Thermop'yle. According to fable, it was so called from Amphic'tyon, son of Deuca'lion, its supposed founder. (Greek, amphictionēs, dwellers round about.)

Amphi'on is said to have built Thebes by the music of his lute, which was so melodious that the stones danced into walls and houses of their own accord.

Amphitri'te (either 3 or 4 syl.). The sea. In classic mythology, the wife of Neptune (Greek, amphi-trēō, to bore all round); so called from the notion that the sea encompasses the earth like a ditch.

His weary chariot sought the bowers
Of Amphitritē and her tending nymphs.
Thomson, "Summer."

Amphit'ryon. Le véritable Amphitryon est l'Amphitryon où l'on dîne (Molière). That is, the person who provides the feast (whether master of the house or not) is the real host. The tale is that Jupiter assumed the likeness of Amphit'ryon, and gave a banquet; but Amphitryon himself came home, and claimed the honour of being the master of the house. As far as the servants and guests were concerned, the dispute was soon decided—"he who gave the feast was to them the host."

Amphrys'ian Prophetess (Amphrysia Vates). The Cumean sibyl; so called from Amphrys'os, a river of Thessaly, on the banks of which Apollo fed the herds of Adme'tos; consequently Amphrys'ian means Apollo'ian.

Amram's Son. Moses. (Exod. vi. 20.)

As when the potent rod
Of Amram's son, in Egypt's evil day,
Waved round the coast.—"Paradise Lost," i.

Amri, in the satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," by Dryden and Tate, is designed for Sir Heneage Finch, earl of Winchelsea and lord chancellor.

Our list of nobles next let Amri grace,
Whose merits claimed the Abethidin's (Lord Chancellor's) high place—

To whom the double blessing does belong,
With Moses' inspiration, Aaron's tongue.

Pt. ii.

Amri'ta. The elixir of immortality, made by churning the milk-sea (Hindu mythology). Sir Wm. Jones speaks of an apple so called, because it bestows immortality on those who partake of it. The word means immortal.

Amsanc'tus. A lake in Italy, in the territory of Hirpi'nium, said to lead down to the infernal regions. The word means sacred water.

Amuck'. To run amuck. To talk or write on a subject of which you are wholly ignorant; to run foul of. The Malays, under the influence of opium, become so excited, that they sometimes rush forth with daggers, yelling "Amuck! amuck!" (Kill! kill!), and fall foul of any one they chance to meet.

Satire's my weapon, but I'm too discreet
To run amuck and tilt at all I meet.—Pope.

Am'ulet. Something worn round the neck as a charm. (Arabic, hamulet, that which is suspended.)

The early Christians used to wear amulets called Icthus (fish); the word is composed of the initial letters of Ie'sos Christos T'Heon Uios Sotēr (Jesus Christ, Son of God, our Saviour). (See NOTARICA.)

Amun'deville. Lady Adeline Amundeville, a lady who "had a twilight tinge of blue," could make epigrams, give delightful soirées, and was fond of making matches.—Byron, "Don Juan," xv., xvi.

Amyclæ'an Silence. More silent than Amyclæ. The inhabitants of Amyclæ were so often alarmed by false rumours of the approach of the Spartans, that they made a decree no one should ever again mention the subject. When the Spartans actually came against the town, no one durst mention it, and the town was taken.

The Amyclæan Brothers. Castor and Pollux, who were born at Amyclæ.

A'mys and Amyl'ion. The Pyl'adēs and Ores'tēs of feudal story.—Ellis's "Specimens."

Anabaptists. A nickname of the Baptist Dissenters; so called because, in the first instances, they had been baptised in infancy, and were again baptised on a confession of faith in adult age. The word means the twice-baptised.

Anachar'sis. Anacharsis among the Scythians. A wise man amongst fools; "Good out of Nazareth;" "A Sir Sidney Smith on Salisbury Plain." The opposite proverb is "Saul amongst the Prophets," i.e., a fool amongst wise men. Anacharsis was a Scythian by birth, and the Scythians were proverbial for their uncultivated state and great ignorance.

Anacharsis Clootz. Baron Jean Baptiste Clootz, a Prussian by birth, but brought up in Paris, where he adopted the Revolutionary principles, and called himself The Orator of the Human Race. (1755-1794.)

Anacleth'ra. The stone on which Ceres rested after searching in vain for her daughter. It was kept as a sacred deposit in the Prytane'um of Athens.

Anacreon. A Greek poet, who wrote chiefly in praise of love and wine. (B.C. 563-478.)

Anacreon of the Twelfth Century. Walter Mapes, also called "The Jovial Topper." (1150-1196.) His best-known piece is the famous drinking-song, "Meum est propositum in taberna mo'ri," translated by Leigh Hunt.

Anacreon Moore. Thomas Moore, who not only translated Anacreon into English, but also wrote original poems in the same style. (1779-1852.)

Anacreon of the Guillotine. Bertrand Barère de Vieuxac, president of the National Convention; so called from the flowery language and convivial jests made by him towards his miserable victims. (1755-1841).

Anacreon of the Temple. Guillaume Amfrye, abbé de Chauvieu; the "Tom Moore" of France. (1639-1720.)

The French Anacreon. Pontus de Thiard, one of the Pleiad poets. (1521-1605.)

The Persian Anacreon. Mohammed Hafiz. (Fourteenth century.)

The Sicilian Anacreon. Giovanni Meli. (1740-1815.)

Anacreon of Painters. Francesco Alba'no, a famous painter of lovely females. (1578-1660.)

Anacreon'tic. In imitation of Anac'reon (q.v.).

Anach'ronism. An event placed at a wrong date; as if one were to talk of Magna Charta as existing in the reign of William the Conqueror. (Greek, anachronos, out of time.)

Anag'nostēs (Greek). A domestic servant employed by the wealthy Romans to read to them at meals. Charlemagne had his reader; and the monks were read to at meals. (Greek, anaginosko, to read.)

Anah, a tender-hearted, pious, meek, and loving creature, granddaughter of Cain, and sister of Aholiba'mah. Japeth loved her, but she had set her heart on the seraph Aza'ziel, who carried her off to some other planet when the flood came.—Byron, "Heaven and Earth."

Ana'na. The pine-apple (the Brazilian ananas). In Ethiopian hieroglyphics, says A Tuder, it is the symbol of "knowledge."

Witness thou, best Anana! thou the pride
Of vegetable life.—Thomson, "Summer."

Anath'ema. A denunciation or curse. The word is Greek, and means to place, or set up, in allusion to the mythological custom of hanging in the temple of a patron god something devoted to him. Thus Gordius hung up his yoke and beam; the shipwrecked hung up their wet clothes; workmen retired from business hung up their tools, &c. Hence to set apart; and in the Roman Catholic Church, to set apart from the Church as under a curse.

Anat'omy. He was like an anatomy—i.e., a mere skeleton, very thin, like one whose flesh had been anatomised or cut off. Shakespeare uses atomy as a synonym. Thus the hostess quickly says to the Beadle: "Thou atomy, thou!" and Doll Tearsheet caps the phrase with, "Come, you thin thing; come, you rascal."—2 Hen. IV., v. 4.

Anaxar'etē, of Sal'amis, was changed into stone for despising the love of Iphis, who hung himself.—Ovid.

Anaxar'tē. A knight whose adventures and exploits form a supplemental part of the Spanish romance called "Am'adis of Gaul." This part was added by Feliciano de Silva.

Ancæ'os. Helmsman of the ship Argo, after the death of Typhus. He was told by a seer that he would never live to taste the wine of his vineyards. When a bottle made from his own grapes was set before him, he sent for the seer to laugh at his prognostications; but the seer made answer, "There's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip." At this instant a messenger came in, and told Ancæos that a wild boar was laying his vineyard waste, whereupon he set down his cup, went out against the boar, and was killed in the encounter.

Ancal'itēs. Inhabitants of parts of Berkshire and Wiltshire, referred to by Cæsar in his "Commentaries."

An'chor. That was my sheet anchor—i.e., my best hope, my last refuge. The sheet anchor is the largest anchor of a ship, which, in stress of weather, is the sailor's chief dependence. The word sheet is a corruption of the word shote (thrown out), meaning the anchor "thrown out" in foul weather. The Greeks and Romans said, "my sacred anchor," referring to the sheet anchor, which was always dedicated to some god.

The anchor is apeck—that is, the cable of the anchor is so tight that the ship is drawn completely over it. (See BOWER SHEET.)

Ancient. A corruption of ensign.

My whole charge consists of ancients, corporals, lieutenants, gentlemen of companies. . . . —Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV." iv. 2.

Ancient Mariner. Having shot an albatross, he and his companions were subjected to fearful penalties. On repentance he was forgiven, and on reaching land told his story to a hermit. At times, however, distress of mind drove him from land to land, and wherever he abode he told his tale of woe, to warn from cruelty and persuade men to love God's creatures.—Coleridge.

Ancient Regime. An antiquated system of government. This phrase, in the French Revolution, meant the monarchical form of government, or the system of government, with all its evils, which existed prior to that great change.

Anci'le (3 syl.). The Palladium of Rome. It was the sacred buckler which Numa said fell from heaven. To prevent its being stolen, he caused eleven others to be made precisely like it, and confided them to twelve priests called Salii, who bore them in procession through the city every year at the beginning of March.

And. The sign '&' called Anders, Ampers, or Amprus, and. A corruption of X Y Z, and "& as and"—i.e., '&' for the word "and." And-as "And."

Another derivation is this: it is said that the ancient hornbooks used to place after the alphabet "&c. (et cetera), and & (per se) and;" the last being called 'And-per-see And,' contracted into 'An'pers And.'

The martyr Bradford, says Lord Russell, was "A per se A" with them, "to their comfort," &c.—i.e., stood alone in their defence.

And'rea Ferra'ra. A sword. So called from a famous sword-maker of the name.

Andrew, St. The symbol of this apostle is a X, in allusion to the cross, made in an X shape, to which he was bound in Patræ. (A.D. 70.) (See ST. RULE.)

A Merry Andrew. A buffoon or clown. (See MERRY.)

St. Andrew's Cross is represented in the form of an X (white on a blue field). The cross, however, on which the apostle suffered was of the ordinary shape, if we may believe the relic in the convent of St. Victor, near Marseilles. The error rose from the way in which that cross is exhibited, resting on the end of the cross-beam and point of the foot.

According to J. Leslie ("History of Scotland"), this sort of cross appeared in the heavens to Achains, king of the Scots, and Hungus, king of the Picts, the night before their engagement with Athelstane. As they were the victors, they went barefoot to the kirk of St. Andrew, and vowed to adopt his cross as their national emblem. (See CONSTANTINE'S CROSS.)

Andrews. A Joseph Andrews. A man too good to be tempted to what is wrong, whether in love or money. Though decidedly "soft," Joseph is brave and ingenuous. Fielding's novel so called.

Android (properly pronounced An'dro-id, but more generally An'droid). An automaton figure of a human being.

(Greek, andros-eidos, a man's likeness.) One of the most famous of these machines is that by M. Vaucanson, called the flute-player. The chess-player by Kempil is also celebrated. (See AUTOMATON.)

Androni'ca (in "Orlando Furioso"). One of Logistilla's handmaids, famous for her beauty. She was sent with Sophros'ynë to conduct Astolpho from India to Arabia.

Angel. Half a sovereign in gold; so called because, at one time, it bore the figure of the archangel Michael slaying the dragon.

Angel. To write like an angel (French). The angel referred to was Angel Verge'cios, a Greek of the fifteenth century, noted for his caligraphy.

Angel (a public-house sign), in compliment to Richard II., who placed an angel above his shield, holding it up in his hands.

Angels, say the Arabs, were created from pure, bright gems; the genii, of fire; and man, of clay.

Angels, according to Dionysius the Areop'agite, were divided into nine orders:—

- (1) Seraphim, and (2) Cherubim, in the first circle.
- (3) Thrones, and (4) Dominions, in the second circle.
- (5) Virtues, (6) Powers, (7) Principalities, (8) Archangels, and (9) Angels, the third circle.

In heaven above,

The effulgent bands in triple circles move.

"Jerusalem Delivered," xi. 13.

Angels. The seven holy angels are—Michael, Gabriel, Raphael, Orph'iel, Zacha'riel, Samuel, and An'ael. The first three the Scripture, including the Apocrypha, affords.

Angel-beast. A favourite round game of cards, which enabled gentlemen to let the ladies win small stakes. Five cards are dealt to each player, and three heaps formed—one for the king, one for play, and the third for Tri'olet. The name of the game was la bête (beast). Angel was the stake. Thus we say, Shilling-whist.

This gentleman offers to play at Angel-beast, though he scarce knows the cards.—"Mulberry Garden."

Angel'ic Doctor. Thomas Aquinas was so called, because he discussed the knotty point of "how many angels can dance on the point of a needle," or, more strictly speaking, "Utrum An'gelus possit moveri de extre'mo ad extre'mum non tran- seundo per me'dium?" (If an angel passes from one point to another, does he pass over the intervening space?) The Doctor says No.

Angelic Hymn. The hymn beginning with "Glory be to God on high," &c.; so called because the former part of it was sung by the angel host that appeared to the shepherds of Bethlehem.

Angel'ica. Daughter of Gal'aphron, king of Cathay, the capital of which was Albra'ca. Orlando greatly loved her, but she married Medo'ro, a young Moor, and returned to India, where Medo'ro succeeded to the crown in right of his wife.—Orlando Furioso.

Angel'ical Stone. The speculum of Dr. Dee. He asserted that it was given him by the angels Raphael and Gabriel. It passed into the possession of the earl of Peterborough, thence to lady Betty Germaine, by whom it was given to the duke of Argyle, whose son presented it to Horace Walpole. It was sold in 1842, at the dispersion of the curiosities of Strawberry Hill.

Angel'ici. Certain heretics of the second century, who advocated the worship of angels.

An'gelites (3 syl.). A branch of the Sabellian heretics; so called from Angel'ius, in Alexandria, where they used to meet.

An'gelo. (See MICHAEL.)

An'gelus, The. A prayer to the Virgin, instituted by Urban II. It begins with the words An'gelus Dom'ini nuntiavit Mari'e (the angel of the Lord announced to Mary); then follows the salutation of Gabriel—Avë Maria, &c. (Hail, Mary, &c.). The prayer contains three verses, and each verse ends with the salutation, Avë Mari'a.

The prayer is recited three times a day, at the sound of a bell called the Angelus.

Sweetly over the village the bell of the Angelus sounded.—Longfellow, "Evangeline."

Anger. Athenodo'rus, the Stoic, told Augustus the best way to restrain unruly anger, was to repeat the alphabet before giving way to it. (See DANDER.)

The sacred line he did but once repeat,
And laid the storm, and cooled the raging heat.
Tickell, "The Horn Book."

Angiolina (4 syl.). The young wife of Mari'no Falie'ro, the doge. She was the daughter of Loreda'no.—Byron, "Mario Faliero."

Anglant's Lord—i. e., Orlando, who was lord of Anglant and knight of Brava.

An'gle. A dead angle. A term in fortification applied to the plot of earth before an angle in a wall which can neither be seen nor defended from the parapet.

To angle with a silver hook—i. e., to buy fish at market.

An'gling. The father of angling. Izaak Walton. (1593-1683.)

Angry, The. Christian II. of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden was so called, on account of his ungovernable temper. (1513-1559.)

Anguar'aguen (4 syl.). The planet Mars. (Indian myth.)

An'gular. Cross-grained; of a patchy temper; one full of angles, whose temper is not smooth.

Angurva'del. Frithiof's sword, inscribed with Runic letters, which blazed in time of war, but gleamed with a dim light in time of peace.

An'ima Mundi (the soul of the world), with the oldest of the ancient philosophers, meant "the source of life;" with Plato, it meant "the animating principle of matter," inferior to pure spirit; with the Stoics, it meant "the whole vital force of the universe."

Animals. Animals sacred to special deities. To Apollo, the wolf, the griffon, and the crow; to Bacchus, the dragon and the tiger; to Diana, the stag; to Esculapius, the serpent; to Heracles, the deer; to Isis, the heifer; to Jupiter, the eagle; to Juno, the peacock and the lamb; to the Lar's, the dog; to Mars, the horse and the vulture; to Mercury, the cock; to Minerva, the owl; to Neptune, the bull; to Tethys, the halegon; to Venus, the dove, the swan, and the sparrow; to Vulcan, the lion. &c.

Animals symbolical. The ant, frugality and precision; ape, uncleanliness; ass, stupidity; Bantam cock, pluckiness, priggingness; bat (blind as a bat); bear, ill-temper, uncouthness; bee, industry; beetle (blind as a beetle); bull, straight- forwardness; bull-dog, pertinacity; but-terfly, sportiveness, living in pleasure; cat, styness, deceit; calf, timidity; cicada, gift of poetry; cock, vigilance, overbearing insolence; crow, longevity; crocodile, hypocrisy; cuckoo, cuckoldom; dog, fidelity, dirty habits; dove, innocence, harmlessness; duck (French, canard); eagle, majesty, inspiration; elephant, sagacity, ponderosity; fly, feebleness, insignificance; fox, cunning, artifice; frog and toad, inspiration; goat, lasciviousness; goose, conceit, folly; gull, quillibility; grasshopper, old age; hare, timidity; hawk, penetration; hen, maternal care; horse, speed, grace; jackdaw, vain assumption, empty conceit; jay, senseless chatter; kitten, playfulness; lamb, innocence, sacrifice; lark, cheerfulness; lion, noble courage; lynx, suspicious vigilance; magpie, garrulity; mole, obtuseness; monkey, tricks; mule, obstinacy; nightingale, forlornness; ostrich, stupidity; ox, patience, strength; owl, wisdom; parrot, mocking verbosity; peacock, pride; pigeon, covardice (pigeon-livered); pig, obstinacy, dirtiness; puppy, empty-headed conceit; rabbit, timidity; raven, ill luck; robin red-breast, confiding trust; serpent, wisdom; sheep, siliness, timidity; sparrow, litigiousness; spider, wiliness; stag, cuckoldom; swallow, a sunshine friend; swan, grace; swine, filthiness, greed; tiger, ferocity; tortoise, chastity; turkey-cock, official insolence; turtle-dove, conjugal fidelity; vulture, ravine; wolf, cruelty.

The cry of animals. Apes gibber; asses bray; bees hum; beetles drone; bears growl; bitterns boom; blackbirds whistle; black-caps—we speak of the "chick-chick" of the black-cap; bulls bellow; canaries sing or quaver; cats meow, purr, swear, and caterwaul; calves bleat and blear; chaffinches chirp or pink; chickens pip; cicadae sing; cocks crow; cows moo or low; crows caw; cuckoos ery cuckoo; dogs bark, bay, howl, and yelp; doves coo; ducks quack; eagles scream; falcons chant; flies buzz; foxes bark and yelp; frogs croak; geese cackle and hiss; goldfinch—we speak of the "merry twinkle" of the female; grasshoppers chirp; grouse—we speak of the "drumming" of the grouse; guinea-fowls ery "come-back," guinea-pigs squeak; hares squeak; hawks scream; hens cackle and cluck; horses neigh and whinny; hyenas laugh; jays chatter; kittens mew; lambs baa and bleat; larks sing; linnets chuckle in their call; lions roar; magpies chatter; mice squeak and squeal; monkeys chatter and gibber; nightingales pipe and warble—we also speak of its “jug-jug;” owls hoot and screech; oxen low and bellow; parrots talk; peacocks scream; peewits cry pee-wit; pigeons coo; pigs grunt, squeak, and squeal; ravens croak; red-starts whistle; rooks caw; screech-owls screech or shriek; sheep baw or bleat; snakes hiss; sparrows chirp or yelp; swallows twitter; swans cry—we also speak of the “bombilation” of the swan; thrushes whistle; tigers growl; tits—we speak of the “twit-twit” of the bottle-tit; turkey-cocks gobble; vultures scream; white-throats chirr; wolves howl. (See PARADISE.)

Animosity means animation, spirit, as the fire of a horse, called in Latin equi animositas. Its exclusive use in a bad sense shows that hate stirs the blood more than amiable emotions.

Anna, Donna. A lady beloved by Don Otta'vio, but seduced by Don Giovanni, who also killed her father, the “Commandant of the City,” in a duel.—Mozart's opera of “Don Giovanni.”

An'nabel, in Dryden's satire of “Absalom and Achitophel,” is designed for the duchess of Monmouth. Her maiden name and title were Anne Scott, countess of Buccleuch, the richest heiress in Europe. The duke was faithless to her, and after his death, the widow, still handsome, married again.

An'nates (2 syl.). The claim of the pope to a year's income of any living or ecclesiastical office, at the death of a bishop or incumbent. This is called the “first-fruits.” (Latin, annus, a year.)

Anne. Sister Anne. Sister of Fatima, the seventh and last of Bluebeard's wives. When Fatima was doomed to death, sister Anne ascended the watch-tower to look out for the approach of her brothers, who were expected, and Fatima called out every minute in agony, “Sister Anne, Sister Anne, do you see anybody coming?”—Bluebeard.

Annuncia'tion. Day of the Annunciation. The 25th of March, also called Lady Day, on which the angel announced to the Virgin Mary that she would be the mother of the Messiah.

Annus Mirabilis. The year of wonders, 1666, memorable for the great fire of London and the successes of our arms over the Dutch. Dryden has written a poem with this title, in which he describes both these events.

Anomœans or Unlikists. A sect in the fourth century which maintained that the essence of the Son is wholly unlike that of the Father. (Greek, anomos, unlike.)

Anon is the Anglo-Saxon anon or onone (by and by, immediately), sometimes written anone.

They knewye hym in brekyng of brede, and onone he vanyste awaye fro hem.—MS. Lincoln, A 1, 17.

Spek the lion . . .
To the fox anon he wille,
Wright's “Political Songs.”

Anon-rightes. Right quickly.

He had in town five hundred knyghtes,
He hem (them) of (off) sent anon-r.ghtes.

Anon'yma. A lady of the demi-monde, called by the Times “a pretty horse-breaker,” because the first Anonyma was a famous equestrian.

The word means without a name, or with a name unknown, ladies of this class being unrecognised in society. They are also called Incognita (unrecognised). Miss Berry called this class of ladies la mauvaise compagnie.

Ansa'rian. The Moslems of Medi'na were called Ansarians (auxiliaries) by Mahomet, because they received him and took his part when he was driven from home and home by the Koreishites (Kore-ish'-ites).

An'swer. To answer the bell is to go and see what it was rung for.

To answer the door is to go and open it, when a knock or ring has been given.

In both these instances the word is “answering to a summons.” To swear means literally “to affirm something,” and to an-swear is to “say something by way of rejoinder; but figuratively both the “swer” and the “an-swer” may be made without words. (See SWEAR.)

Ants. “Go to the ant, thou sluggard . . . which provideth her meat in the summer.” (Prov. vi. 6–8; and xxx. 25.) The notion that ants in general gather food in harvest for a winter's store is quite an error: in the first place, they do not live on grain, but chiefly on animal food; and, in the next place, they are torpid in winter, and do not require food. Colonel Sykes, however, says there is in Poonah a grain-feeding species, which stores up millet-seed; but certainly our ants have no claim to the following stanza:—

Who taught the little ant the way
Its narrow hole to bore,
And labour all the summer day
To gather winter store?
Jane Taylor.

Ants never sleep. Emerson mentions this as “a recently-observed fact.”—“Nature,” ch. iv.

Antæ'os, in Greek mythology, was a gigantic wrestler, whose strength was invincible so long as he touched the earth; and every time he was lifted from it, was renewed by touching it again. (See MALE'GAR.)

As once Antæos, on the Libyan strand,
More fierce recovered when he reached the sand,
Hoole's “Ariosto,” book iv.

It was Hercules who succeeded in killing this charmed giant. He Lifts proud Antæos from his mother's plains,

And with strong grasp the struggling giant strains;
Back falls his panting head and clammy hair,
Writhe his weak limbs and dits his life in air.
Darwin, “Economy of Vegetation.”

Antecedents. I know nothing of his antecedents—his previous life, character, or conduct. (Latin, ante-cedens, 'fore-going on.)

Antedilu'vian. Before the Deluge, meaning the Scripture Deluge; but the word is used sometimes in geology for ante-Ad'amic (before Adam was created).

Anth'ia. The lady-love of Abro'omas in Xenophon's romance, called “Ephesi'aca.” Shakespeare has borrowed from this Greek novel the leading incidents of his “Romeo and Juliet,” especially that of the potion and mock entombment. N.B. This is not the historian, but a Xenophon who lived in the fourth Christian era.

Anthony. St. Anthony's Cross. T or Y.

Anthony. St. Patron saint of swineherds, because he always lived in woods and forests. (See PIG.)

Anthony Absolute, Sir. A testy, dogmatical, but kind-hearted gentleman in Sheridan's “Rivals.”

St. Anthony's Fire. Erysip'elas is so called from the tradition that those who sought the intercession of St. Anthony recovered from the pestilential erysipelas called the sacred fire, which proved extremely fatal in 1089.

An Anthony Pig. A pet pig, the smallest of the whole litter. St. Anthony was originally a swineherd, and, therefore, the patron saint of pigs.

Anthropos'opus. The nickname of Dr. Vaughan, rector of St. Bride's, in Bedfordshire; so called from his “Anthroposoph'ia Teomag'ica,” to show the condition of man after death.

Anti-Christ or the Man of Sin, expected by some to precede the second coming of Christ. St. John so calls every one who denies the incarnation of the eternal Son of God.

Anti-Eras'tian Party. Those who wish the church to have the power of punishing ecclesiastical offenders. (See ERASTIAN.)

Anti-pope is a pope elected by a king in opposition to the pope elected by the cardinals; or one who usurps the popedom in opposition to the rightful pope. Geddes gives a list of twenty-four anti-popes, three of whom were deposed by the council of Constance.

Antig'onë. The Modern Antigone. Marie Thérèse Charlotte duchesse d'Angoulême, daughter of Louis XVI.: so called for her attachment to Louis XVIII., whose companion she was. (1778-1851.)

An'timony. Said to be derived from the Greek anti-mon'achos (bad for monks). It is said that Valentine once gave some of this mineral to his convent pigs, who thrived upon it, and became very fat. He next tried it on the monks, who died from its effects; so Valentine said, “tho' good for pigs, it was bad for monks.” This fable is given by Furetière. The more probable derivation is anti-monos (averse to be alone), so called because it is never found except in combination with sulphur or some other substance.

Antino'mian (Greek anti-nomos, exempt from the law). One who believes that Christians are not bound to observe the “law of God,” but “may continue in sin that grace may abound.” The term was first applied to John Agricola by Martin Luther.

Antin'ous (4 syl.). A model of manly beauty. He was the page of Hadrian, the Roman Emperor.

The polished grace of Antin'ous.—Daily Telegraph.

Antip'athy. According to tradition, wolves have a mortal antipathy to scilla-roots; geese to the soil of Whitby; cats to dogs; witches to running water. (See CAT, PIG.)

Antis'thenēs. Founder of the Cynic School in Athens. He wore a ragged cloak, and carried a wallet and staff like a beggar. Soc'ratēs wittily said he could "see rank pride peering through the holes of Antis'thenēs' rags."

Antoni'nus. The Wall of Antonine. A turf entrenchment raised by the Romans from Dunglass Castle, on the Clyde, to Caer Ridden Kirk, near the Frith of Forth, under the direction of Lollius Urb'icus, legate of Antoni'nus Pius, A.D. 140.

Ant'ony. (See ANTHONY.)

Antrus'tions. The vassals of the Frankish kings, who held land in trust. These lands were subsequently hereditary.

Anu'bis. In Egyptian mythology, similar to the Hermēs of Greece, whose office it was to take the souls of the dead before the judge of the infernal regions. Anu'bis is represented with a human head and a dog's body.

Any-how; i.e., in an irregular manner. "He did it any-how," in a careless, slovenly manner. "He went on any-how," in a wild, reckless manner. Any-how, you must manage it for me; by hook or crook; at all events.

Aōn'ian. Poetical, pertaining to the Muses. The Muses, according to Grecian mythology, dwelt in Aōn'ia, that part of Bœo'tia which contains Mount Hel'icon and the Muses' Fountain. Thomson calls the fraternity of poets

The Aonian hive
Who praised are, and starve right merrily.
"Castle of Indolence," ii.

Ape. The buff'foon ape, in Dryden's poem called "The Hind and the Panther," means the Free-thinkers.

Next her (the bear) the buffoon ape, as atheists use,
Mimicked all sects, and had his own to choose.
Pt. i.

He keeps them, like an ape, in the corner of his jaw; first mouthed, to be last swallowed ("Hamlet," iv. 2). Hanmer says—Monkeys in eating throw into a pouch on the side of their jaw that part of their food which they take up first, and there keep it till they have finished eating.

To put an ape into your hood (or) cap—i.e., to make a fool of you. Apes were formerly carried on the shoulders of fools and simpletons.

To say an ape's paternoster, is to chatter with fright or cold, like an ape.

Apellēs. A famous Grecian painter, contemporary with Alexander the Great. There comelier forms embroidered rose to view Than e'er Apelles' wondrous pencil drew.
"Orlando Furioso," bk. xxiv.

Ap'eman'tus. A churlish philosopher, in Shakespeare's "Timon of Athens."

The cynicism of Apemantus contrasted with the real misanthropy of Timon.—Sir Walter Scott.

A-per-se. An A 1; a person or thing of unusual merit. "A" all alone, with no one who can follow, nemo proxi-mus aut secundus.

London, thou art of townēs A-per-se.—MS. Lansd.

Apex originally meant the woollen tassel suspended from the top of the flamens' cap. Festus says it was so called "quod via'culo comprehēdere, anti'qui d'pere dice'bant." In time the word was applied to the cap, and now means the summit or tip.

Aph'rodite (3 syl.). The Greek Venus; so called because she sprang from the foam of the sea. (Greek, aphros, sea-foam; diutithēmi, to constitute—i.e., made of sea-foam.)

Aph'rodite's Girdle. Whoever wore Aphrodite's magic girdle, immediately became the object of love. (Greek myth.)

Apic'ius. A gourmand. Apicius was a Roman gourmand, whose income being reduced by his luxurious living to £80,000, put an end to his life, to avoid the misery of being obliged to live on plain diet.

A-pigga-back. (See PIG-BACK.)

A'pis, in Egyptian mythology, is the bull symbolical of the god Apis. It was not suffered to live more than twenty-five years, when it was sacrificed and buried in great pomp. The madness of Cambysēs is said to have been in retribution for his killing a sacred bull.

Aplomb means true to the plumb-line, but is generally used to express that self-possession which arises from perfect self-confidence. We also talk of a dancer's aplomb, meaning that he is a perfect master of his art.

Apocalyp'tic Number. The mystic number 666. (Rev. xiii. 18.)

Apoc'rypha means things wholly concealed (Greek, apo, intensive, and krupto, to conceal). The canonical books were published, or made public, by the Jews; but the doubtful books were not made public, i.e., they were held back or concealed. An apoc'ryphal narrative is one that is not true, or not authentic; the two causes that decided the rejection of the uncanonical Scriptures.

Apollina'rians. An ancient sect founded in the middle of the fourth century by Apollina'ris, bishop of Laodice'a. They denied that Christ had a human soul, and asserted that the Logos supplied the place of the reasonable soul. The Athanasian creed condemns this heresy.

Apollo. The sun, the god of music. (Roman mythology.)

Apollo's angry, and the heavens themselves
Do strike at my injustice.—"Winter's Tale," iii. 2.

A perfect Apollo. A model of manly beauty, referring to the Apollo Belvidere (q.v.).

The Apollo of Portugal. Luis Camoëns, author of the "Lusiad," so called, not for his beauty, but for his poetry. He was god of poetry in Portugal, but was allowed to die in the streets of Lisbon like a dog, literally of starvation. Poor fellow! he would have gladly exchanged for solid pudding some of his empty praise. (1527-1579.)

Apollo Belvidere (Bel'-ve-dear'). A marble statue, supposed to be from the chisel of the Greek sculptor Cal'amis, who flourished in the fifth ante-Christian era. It represents the god holding a bow in his left hand, and is called Belvidere from the Belvidere Gallery of the Vatican, in Rome, where it stands. It was discovered in 1503, amidst the ruins of Antium, and purchased by pope Julius II.

Apollo'nus. Master of the Rosicrucians. He is said to have had the power of raising the dead, of making himself invisible, and of being in two places at the same time.

Apollodo'ros. Plato says: "Who would not rather be a man of sorrows than Apollodoros, envied by all for his enormous wealth, yet nourishing in his heart the scorpions of a guilty conscience?" (The Repub.) This Apollodoros was the tyrant of Cassandrea (formerly Potidea). He obtained the supreme power B.C. 379, exercised it with the utmost cruelty, and was put to death by Antigones Gon'atas.

Apoll'yon. King of the bottomless pit (Rev. ix. 11). His contest with Pilgrim, in Bunyan's allegory, has made his name familiar. (Greek, the destroyer.)

Apos'tate, The. Julian, the Roman emperor. So called because he forsook the Christian faith and returned to Paganism again. (331, 361-363.)

A poster'io'ri (Latin, from the latter.) An a posteriori argument is proving the cause from the effect. Thus, if we see a watch, we conclude there was a watch-maker. Robinson Crusoe inferred there was another human being on the desert island, because he saw human foot-prints in the wet sand. It is thus we infer the existence and character of deity from his works. (See A PRIORI.)

Apos'tles. The badges or symbols of the fourteen apostles.

Andrew, a cross, because he was crucified on a cross shaped like the letter X.

Bartholomew, a knife, because he was slayed with a knife.

James the Greater, a scallop-shell, a pilgrim's staff, or a gourd bottle, because he is the patron saint of pilgrims. (See SCALLOP-SHELL.)

James the Less, a fuller's pole, because he was killed by a blow on the head with a pole, dealt him by Simeon the fuller.

John, a cup with a winged serpent flying out of it, in allusion to the tradition about Aristodemus, priest of Diana, who challenged John to drink a cup of poison. John made the sign of the cross on the cup, Satan like a dragon flew from it, and John then drank the cup, which was quite innocuous.

Judas Iscariot, a bag, because he had the bag, and "bare what was put therein." (John xii. 6.)

Jude, a club, because he was martyred by a club.

Matthew, a hatchet or halbert, because he was slain at Naddabar with a halbert.

Matthias, a battle-axe, because he was first stoned, and then beheaded with a battle-axe.

Paul, a sword, because his head was cut off with a sword. The convent of La Liza, in Spain, boasts of possessing the very instrument.

Peter, a bunch of keys, because Christ gave him the "keys of the kingdom of heaven." A cock, because he went out and wept bitterly when he heard the cock crow.

Philip, a long staff surmounted with a cross, because he suffered death by being suspended by the neck to a tall pillar.

Simon, a saw, because he was sawn to death, according to tradition.

Thomas, a lance, because he was pierced through the body, at Mel'iapour, with a lance.

(See EVANGELISTS.)

Apostles of Abyssinians, St. Frumentius. (Fourth century.)

Alps, Felix Neff. (1798-1829.)
Ardenues, St. Ilbert. (Eighth century.)
Armenians, Gregory of Armenia. (Fourth century.)
English, St. Augustin. (Died 607.)
Ethiopia. (See ABYSSINIANS.)
Free Trade, Richard Corden. (1804-1865.)
French, St. Denis. (Third century.)
Frisians, St. Wilbrod. (637-738.)
Gauls, St. Irenæus (130-200); St. Martin (316-397).
Genetes, St. Paul.
Germany, St. Boniface. (689-755.)
Highlanders, St. Columba. (521-597.)
Hungary, St. Anastasius. (954-1044.)
Indians, Bartolomé de Las Casas (1474-1566); Rev. John Eliot (1603-1690).
Indies, St. Francis Xavier. (1506-1552.)
Infidelity, Voltaire. (1694-1778.)
Ireland, St. Patrick. (372-493.)
Netherlands. St. Armand, bishop of Maestricht. (589-679.)
North, St. Ansgar or Anscarus (801-834); Bernard Gilpin (1517-1583).
Picts, St. Ninian.
Scottish Reformers, John Knox. (1505-1572.)
Slaves, St. Cyril.
Spain, St. James the Greater.
Temperance, Father Mathew. (1799-1856.)
Yorkshire, Paulinus, bishop of York and Rochester. (597-644.)
Wales, St. David. (Fifth century.)

The Twelve Apostles. The last twelve names on the poll or list of ordinary degrees were so called, when the list was arranged in order of merit, and not alphabetically, as now; they were also called the Chosen Twelve. The last of the twelve was designated St. Paul from a play on the verse 1 Cor. xv. 9.

Apostle of the Sword. So Mahomet was called, because he enforced his creed at the point of the sword. (570-632.)

Prince of the Apostles. St. Peter. (Matt. xvi. 18, 19.)

Apos'tle-spoons. Spoons given at christenings; so called because one of the apostles figured at the top of the handle. Sometimes twelve spoons, representing the twelve apostles; sometimes four, representing the four evangelists; and sometimes only one, was presented. We still give at christenings a silver spoon, though the apostolic handle is no longer retained.

Apostles' Creed. The creed which contains a brief summary of what the Apostles taught. It was first introduced into the daily service by Tullio, bishop of Antioch, in 471.

Apostolic Fathers. Five advocates of the Christian religion contemporary with the apostles, viz., Clement of Rome, Barnabas, Hermas, Ignatius, and Polycarp.

Apostolic Majesty. A title borne by the emperor of Austria, as king of Hungary. It was conferred by pope Sylvester II. on the king of Hungary in 1000.

Apparel. Dress. Properly speaking, the apparels are the ornamental parts of the alb at the lower edge and wrists. The alb was called the apparel by a figure of speech, and the catechumens used to talk of putting on their apparels or fine white surplice for the feast of Pentecost.

Appiades (4 syl.). Five divinities whose temple stood near the fountains of Appius, in Rome. Their names are Venus, Pallas, Concord, Peace, and Vesta. They were represented on horseback, like Amazons.

Appian Way. The oldest and best of all the Roman roads, leading from the Porta Cap'ena of Rome to Cap'ua. This "queen of roads" was commenced by Appius Claudius, the decemvir, A.U.C. 442.

Apple. The apple that gave Newton the hint about gravitation, stood in the garden of Mrs. Conduitt, at Woolsthorpe.

The apple of discord. A moot point. At the marriage of Thetis and Peleus, where all the gods and goddesses met together, Discord threw on the table a golden apple "for the most beautiful." Juno, Pallas, and Venus put in their separate claims; and not being able to settle the point, referred the question to Paris, who gave judgment in favour of Venus. This brought upon him the vengeance of Juno and Pallas, to whose spite the fall of Troy is to be attributed.

Apples of Iskandar are "all sweetness on one side, and all bitterness on the other."

Apples of Paradise, according to tradition, had a bite on one side, to commemorate the gripe given by Eve.

The apple of perpetual youth. This is the apple of Idun, daughter of the dwarf Svald, and wife of Bragi. It is by tasting this apple that the gods preserve their perpetual youth. (Scand. myth.)

Apples of Pyban, says Sir John Mandeville, fed the pigmies with their odour only.

Apples of Sodom. Thevenot says—"There are apple-trees on the sides of the Dead Sea which bear lovely fruit, but within are full of ashes." Witman says the same is asserted of the oranges there. (See Tacitus, "Hist.," v. 7.)

Like to the apples on the Dead Sea's shore,
All ashes to the taste.

Byron, "Childe Harold," iii. 34.

The apple of the eye. Probably a corruption of pupil.

The singing apple had the power of persuading any one to anything. — "Chery and Fairstar," Countess D'Anois.

Prince Ahmed's apple — a cure for every disorder. This apple the prince purchased at Samarcand. — "Arabian Nights," Prince Ahmed, &c.

Apple-pie bed. A bed in which the sheets are so folded that a person cannot get his legs down it; so called from the apple turnover, a sort of pie in which the crust is turned over the apples, so that there is no need of a dish.

Apple-pie order. Prim and precise order: probably a corruption of cap à pied, said of a knight when armed from head to foot in perfect order. Some think it refers to the method of putting apples into a pie-dish in layers, but this derivation is still less satisfactory.

April. The opening month, when the trees unfold, and the womb of nature opens with young life. (Latin, aperire, to open.)

April Fool. Called in France un poisson d'Avril, and in Scotland a gowk (cuckoo). In Hindustan similar tricks are played at the Huli Festival (31st March). So that it cannot refer to the uncertainty of the weather, nor yet to the mockery trial of our Redeemer, the two most popular explanations. I am inclined to think it refers to traditions about the Flood, when the "foolish" were left to the pelting of the pitiless rain.

My April Morn — i.e., my wedding-day; the day when I was made a fool of. The allusion is to the custom of making fools of each other on the 1st of April.

A priori (Latin, from an antecedent). An a priori argument is when we deduce a fact from something antecedent, as when we infer certain effects from given causes. All mathematical proofs are of the a priori kind, whereas judgments in the law courts are of the a posteriori evidence; we infer the animus from the act. (See A POSTERIORI.)

Apron. This is a strange blunder. A napperon, converted into An appron.

"Napperon" is French for a napkin, from nappe (cloth in general). Some English counties still employ the word apperon.

Aqua Regia (royal water). So called because it dissolves gold, the king of metals. It consists of one part of nitric acid, with from two to four of hydrochloric acid.

Aqua Tofa'na or Tofa'nia. A poisonous liquid much used in Italy in the seventeenth century by young wives who wanted to get rid of their husbands. It was invented by a woman named Tofa'ni, who called it the Manna of St. Nicholas of Bari, from the wide-spread notion that an oil of miraculous efficacy flowed from the tomb of that saint.

Aqua Vitæ (water of life). Certain ardent spirits used by the alchemists. Ben Jonson terms a seller of ardent spirits an "aqua vitæ man." — Alchemist, i. 1. The "elixir of life" was made from distilled spirits, which were thought to have the power of prolonging life. (See EAU-DE-VIE.)

Aqua'rians. A sect in the early Christian church which insisted on the use of water instead of wine in the Lord's Supper.

Aqua'rius (the water bearer). One of the signs of the zodiac (Jan. 20 to Feb. 18); so called because it appears when the Nile begins to overflow.

Aqueous Rocks. Rocks produced by the agency of water, such as bedded limestones, sandstones, and clays; in short, all the geological rocks which are arranged in layers or strata.

Aquilant (in "Orlando Furioso"). A knight in Charlemagne's army, son of Olivero and Sigismunda. He was called black from his armour, and his brother Gryphon white. While Aquilant was searching for his brother he met Martano in Gryphon's armour, and took him bound to Damascus, where his brother was.

Aquiline (3 syl.). Raymond's matchless steed, bred on the banks of the Tagus. (See HORSE.)

There the fair mother,
With open mouth, against the breezes held,
Received the gales with warmth prolific filled;
And (strange to tell), inspired with genial seed,
Her swelling womb produced this wondrous steed. — "Jerusalem Delivered," book vii.

N.B. — Virgil has an exactly parallel passage. — "Georgics," iii. 271-277.

Aquin'ian Sage. Ju'venal is so called because he lived at Aquin'um, a town of the Volsians.

Arabesque (Ar-ra-besk'). The gorgeous Moorish patterns, like those in the Alhambra, especially employed in architectural decoration. During the Spanish wars, in the reign of Louis XIV., arabesque decorations were profusely introduced into France. (French, "Arab-like.")

Arabian Nights. First made known in Europe by Antoine Galland, a French Oriental scholar, who translated them and called them The Thousand and One Nights (from the number of nights occupied in their recital). They are of Indian, Persian, and Arabian origin.

N.B.—"The Tales of the Genii," by Sir Charles Morell, are an excellent imitation.

Common English translations—

4 vols., 12mo, 1792, by R. Heron, published in Edinburgh and London.

3 vols., 12mo, 1794, by Mr. Beloe, London.
1798, by Richard Gough, enlarged Paris edition.

5 vols., 8vo, 1802, by Rev. Edward Foster.
1839, by Edw. Wm. Lane.

Arabians. A class of Arabian heretics of the third century, who maintained that the soul dies with the body.

Ar'abic Figures. So called because they were introduced into Europe (Spain) by the Moors or Arabs, who learnt them from the Hindus.

Ar'abs. Street Arabs. The houseless poor; street children. So called because, like the Arabs, they are nomads or wanderers with no settled home.

Arach'nē's Labours. Spinning and weaving. Arach'nē was so skilful a needlewoman, that she challenged Minerva to a trial of skill, and hanged herself because the goddess beat her. Minerva then changed her into a spider.

Arach'nē's labours ne'er her hours divide,
Her noble hands nor looms nor spindles guide.
Huile's "Jerusalem Delivered," bk. ii.

A'raf, Al (the partition). A region, according to the Koran, between Paradise and Jehennam, for those who are neither morally good nor bad, such as infants, lunatics, and idiots. The inmates of Al Araf will be allowed to converse with the blessed and the cursed; to the former this region will appear a hell, to the latter a heaven. (See LIMBO.)

Aras'pēs (in "Jerusalem Delivered"). King of Alexandria, more famed for devices than courage. He joined the Egyptian armament against the Crusaders.

Ara'tos of Achæa, in Greece, murdered Nic'oclēs, the tyrant, in order to restore his country to liberty, and would not allow even a picture of a king to exist. He was poisoned by Philip of Macedon.

Aratus, who awhile relumed the soul
Of fondly-lingering liberty in Greece.
Thomson, "Winter."

Arba'ces (3 syl.). A Mede and Assyrian satrap, who conspired against Sardanapalus, and founded the empire of Me'dia on the ruins of the Assyrian kingdom.—Byron, "Sardanapalus."

Arbor Judæ. Said to be so called because Judas Iscariot hanged himself thereon. This is one of those word-resemblances so delusive to etymologists. Judæ is the Spanish judi'a (a French-bean), and Arbor Judæ is a corruption of Arbol Judia (the bean-tree), so called from its bean-like pods.

Ar'cades. Ar'cadēs ambo, both alike eccentric. From Virgil's "Eclogues," where Cor'ydon and Thyrsis are described as both Arcadians. (Ecl. vii.)

Arca'dian. A shepherd, a fancy farmer; so called because the Arcadians were a pastoral people, and hence pastoral poetry is called Arca'dic.

An Arcadian youth. A dunce or blockhead; so called because the Arcadians were the least intellectual of all the Greeks.

Archangels. According to the Koran, there are four archangels. Go'brîel, the angel of revelations, who writes down the divine decrees; Mî'chuel, the champion, who fights the battles of faith; Az'raël, the angel of death; and Az'raël, who is commissioned to sound the trumpet of the resurrection.

Arch-monarch of the World. Napoleon III. of France.

Arche'gosaurus or Arche'gosaur (Greek, "the first type of the saurians"). A fossil reptile found in the coalfields of Bavaria and Westphalia.

Ar'chers. Domitian, the Roman Emperor, could shoot his arrows with precision between the fingers of a man at a considerable distance. The tale of William Tell is a mere repetition of the Scandinavian fable of Egil, who was commanded by King Nidung to perform the very same exploit. Robin Hood, Little John, and many others, have been equally skilful with the bow.

Arch'es. The Court of Arches, the most ancient consistory court of England, the dean of which anciently held his court under the arches of Bow Church. Of course we refer to the old church, which was arched from pillar to pillar; the present structure was the work of Sir Christopher Wren.

Archicar'nifex. Thomas Norton, persecutor. (1532-1584.)

Archiloch'ian Bitterness. Ill-natured satire, so named from Archil'ochos, the Grecian satirist. (B.C. 714-676.)

Ar'chimage (3 syl.). The name given by Thomson to the "demon Indolence." Archima'gus is the title borne by the High Priest of the Persian Magi.

I will (he cried), so help me God! destroy
That villain Archimage.
Thomson, "Castle of Indolence," c. ii.

Archima'go (Hypocrisy). In Spenser's "Faëry Queen." He assumes the guise of the Red Cross Knight, and deceives Una; but Sansloy sets upon him, and reveals his true character. When the Red Cross Knight is about to be married to Una, he presents himself before the king of Eden, and tells him that the Knight is betrothed to Duessa. The falsehood being exposed, Archimago is cast into a vile dungeon (book i.). In book ii. the arch-hypocrite is loosed again for a season, and employs Bragadoccio to attack the Red Cross Knight. These allegories are pretty obvious: thus the first incident means that Truth (Una), when Piety (the Red Cross Knight) is absent, is in danger of being led astray by Hypocrisy, but any Infidel (Sansloy) can lay bare religious hypocrisy.

Archime'dës Principle. The quantity of water removed by any body immersed therein will equal in bulk the bulk of the body immersed. This scientific fact was noted by the philosopher Archime'dës.

Archime'dës Screw. An endless screw, used for raising water, propelling ships, &c., invented by Archime'dës of Syracuse.

Ar'chitect of his own Fortune. Appius says, "Fabrum suæ esse quemque fortunæ."

Archon'idës of Argos, says Aristotle, could eat salt beef for a week or more without ever caring for drink.

Archon'tics. Heretics of the second century, who held a number of idle stories about creation, which they attributed to a number of agents called "archons." (Greek, archon, a prince or ruler.)

Ar'cite (2 syl.). A young Theban knight, made captive by duke Theseus, and shut up with Pal'amon in a prison at Athens. Here both the captives fell in love with Emily, the duke's sister-in-law. After a time both captives gained their liberty, and Emily was promised by the duke to the victor in a tournament. Arcite was the victor, but, as he was riding to receive the prize of his prowess, he was thrown from his horse, and died. So Emily became the bride of Pal'amon. —Chaucer, "The Knight's Tale."

Ar'cos Barbs. War-steeds of Arcos, in Andalu'sia, very famous in Spanish ballads.

Arctic Region means the region of Areturos (the Bear stars). Ark in Sanskrit means "to be bright," applied to stars or anything bright. The Greeks translated ark into arkt(os), "a bear;" hence Areturos (the Bear Stars), and Arctic region, the region where the north star is found.

Arctoph'onos. One of Ori'on's dogs.

Arctoph'ylox. The constellation Boö'tis, near Ursa Major.

Arden, Enoch. Mr. G. R. Emerson, in a letter to the Athenæum (Aug. 18, 1866), points out the resemblance of this tale by Alfred Tennyson to one entitled "Homeward Bound," by Adelaide Anne Procter, in a volume of "Legends and Lyrics," 1858. Mr. Emerson concludes his letter thus—"At this point (i.e., when the hero sees his wife seated by the fire, whispering baby words and smiling on the father of her child") Ten-nyson departs from the story. Enoch departs broken-hearted to die, without revealing his secret; but Miss Procter makes the three recognise each other, and the hero having blessed his wife, leaves her, to roam 'over the restless ocean.'"

Area-sneak. A boy or girl who sneaks about areas to commit petty thefts.

Areop'agos or Mars' Hill. The seat of a famous tribunal in Athens; so called because the first cause tried there was that of Mars or Arës, accused by Neptune of the death of his son Alkyrothius.

Then Paul stood in the midst of Mars' Hill.
Acts xvii. 22.

Ar'etine (3 syl.), or rather Piëtro Areti'no, patronised by François I. of France. A poet noted for his disreputable life and licentious verses. (1492-1557.)

Aretin'ian Syllables. Ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la, used by Guido d'Arezzo for his system of hexachords. (See Do.)

Argan, a miserly hypochondriac. He reduced himself to this dilemma: If his apothecary would not charge less, he could not afford to be sick; but if he swallowed fewer drugs, he would suffer in health.—Molière's "Le Malade Imaginaire."

Argand' Lamp. A lamp with a circular wick, through which a current of air flows, to supply oxygen to the flame, and increase its brilliancy. Invented by M. Argand, 1789.

Argan'te. A giantess of unbridled licentiousness, in Spenser's "Faëry Queen."

Argan'tes (3 syl.). A Circassian of high rank and matchless courage, but fierce to brutality, and an ultra-despiser of the sect of the Nazarenes. He was sent as an ambassador from Egypt to king Al'adine. He and Solyman were by far the most doughty of the Pagan knights. The former was slain by Rinaldo, and the other by Tancred.—Tasso, "Jerusalem Delivered."

Bonaparte stood before the deputies like the Argantès of Italy's heroic poet, and gave them the choice of peace and war, with the air of a superior being, capable at once of dictating their fate.—Sir Walter Scott.

Argé'nis. A political allegory by John Barclay, containing allusions to the state of Europe, and more especially to France, during the time of the league. (1582-1621.) (See UTOPIA.) Argenk. A famous giant in Persian mythology.

Arg'entile and Cur'an. Argentile was the daughter of king Ad'elbright, who, on his deathbed, committed her in charge to king Edel. Edel kept her a close prisoner, under hope of getting into his possession her lands and dominion. Cur'an, the son of a Danske king, in order to woo her, became a kitchen drudge in Edel's household, and Edel resolved to marry Argentile to this drudge, but she fled away. Cur'an now turned shepherd, and fell in love with a neatherd's maid, who turned out to be Argentile. The two were married, and Cur'an claiming his wife's dominions, became king of Northumberland, and put Edel to death.—Percy's "Reliques."

Argent'ine Republic. The Republic of the Argentine, or Silver River; in other words, the Confederation of the Rio de la Plata.

Arge'o (in "Orlando Furioso"). Baron of Servia, and husband of Gabri'na. He is a sort of Potiphar. His wife tries to seduce Philander, a young Dutch knight, and failing in her effort, she accuses him to her husband of adultery; whereupon Arge'o throws the "faithless guest" into durance. In the course of time Gabri'na implores the young captive to defend her against a wicked knight who has assailed her virtue. He consents to be her champion, and is placed in concealment. Presently a knight draws near, and Philander, rushing on him, dispatches him; but the supposed "adulterer" is, in reality, Arge'o himself; and Gabri'na, being now a widow, is free to marry her Dutch "Joseph."

Ar'gillan (in "Jerusalem Delivered"). A haughty, turbulent knight, born on the banks of the Trent. Accusing Godfrey and his brother of having murdered Rinaldo, he induces the Latians to revolt. The revolt spreads to the Swiss and English, but Godfrey succeeds in restoring order. Argillan is arrested, but makes his escape, and is slain in battle by Solyman (bks. viii. ix.).

Argo. A ship sailing on an adventure. The galley of Jason that went in search of the Golden Fleece was so called, from the Greek argos (swift).

Ar'gonauts. The sailors of the ship Argo. Apollonios of Rhodes wrote an epic poem on the subject. (Greek, argo naus.)

Ar'gosie. A merchant's freight; so called from the ship Argo, which went to Colchis to fetch away the Golden Fleece.

He hath an argosy bound to Tripolis, another to the Indies . . . a third to Mexico, a fourth to England.—Merchant of Venice, i. 3.

Argot (Ar'go). Slang or flash language; a corruption of narquois (jargon). Thus, parler le narquois (to talk gibberish), or to talk the language of a narquin (beggar or thief). The French ergoter (to quibble), is quite another word, being from the Latin ergo used in argument, and meaning to "ergo" or make a puzzling inference.

Ar'gus-eyed. Jealously watchful. According to Grecian fable, Argos had 100 eyes, and Juno set him to watch Io, of whom she was jealous. Argos being slain, Juno transplanted his eyes into the tail of her peacock.

Argyle (2 syl.)—of whom Thomson says, in his "Autumn"—

On thee, Argyle,
Her hope, her stay, her darling, and her boast,
Thy fond, imploring country turns her eye—was John, the great duke, who lived only two years after he succeeded to the dukedom. Pope says—

Argyle the state's whole thunder born to wield,
And shake alike the senate and the field.

Aria'na. An ancient name of Khorassan in Persia.

A'rians. The followers of Arius, a presbyter of the church of Alexandria, in the fourth century. He maintained (1) that the Father and Son are distinct beings; (2) that the Son, though divine, is not equal to the Father; (3) that the Son had a state of existence previous to his appearance on earth, but not from eternity; and (4) that the Messiah was not real man, but a divine being in a case of flesh.

Ari'deus (A-ri'-duce). In "Jerusalem Delivered," herald in the Christian army. The other herald is Pindo'rus.

A'riel. A spirit of the air and guardian of innocence. He was enslaved to the witch Syc'orax, who overtaken him, and in punishment for not doing what was beyond his power, shut him up in a pine-rit for twelve years. On the death of Sycorax, Ariel became the slave of Caliban, who tortured him most cruelly. Prospero liberated him from the pine-rit, and the grateful fairy served him for sixteen years, when he was set free.—Shakespeare, "Tempest."

A'riel. The sylph that watched over Belinda.—Pope, "Rape of the Lock," i.

A'riel. One of the angels cast out of heaven. The word means lion of God.—Milton, "Paradise Lost," bk. vi. 371.

A'riës. One of the spring constellations (March 21 to April 20).

At last from Aries rolls the bounteous sun.
Thomson, "Winter."

Ariman'es (4 syl.). "The prince of earth and air," and the fountain-head of evil. It is a personage in Persian mythology, introduced into Grecian fable under the name of Ariman'nis. Byron introduces him in his drama called " Manfred."

Arimas'pians. A one-eyed people of Scythia, who adorned their hair with gold. They were constantly at war with the gryphons who guarded the gold mines.

As when a gryphon, through the wilderness . . .
Pursues the Arimasian, who by stealth
Had from his wakeful custody purloined
The guarded gold.—Paradise Lost, ii.

A'rioch. One of the fallen angels cast out of heaven. The word means a fierce lion.—Milton, "Paradise Lost," vi. 371.

A'ri'on. A Greek musician, cast into the sea by mariners, but carried to Tæ'naros on the back of a dolphin.

A'ri'on. The wonderful horse which Herenlës gave to Adras'tos. It sprang from Cerës and Neptune, had the power of speech, and its feet on the right side were the feet of a man.

Arios'to was privately married to Alessandra Benucci, widow of Tito Strozzi; she is generally called his mistress.

Ariosto of the North. So Lord Byron calls Sir Walter Scott.—"Childe Harold," iv. 40.

Ariste'as. The wandering Jew of Grecian fable. (See JEW.)

Aristi'des (4 syl.). Surnamed The Just. An Athenian general.

Then Aristides lifts his honest front,
Spotless of heart; to whom the unflattering voice
Of Freedom gave the noblest name of "Just,"
Thomson, "Winter."

The British Aristides. Andrew Marvell. (1620-1678.)

Aristoc'racy. The cold shade of the aristocracy; i.e., the unsympathising patronage of the great. The expression first occurs in Sir W. F. P. Napier's "History of the Peninsular War."

The word "aristocracy" is the Greek aristo-cratos (greatest power).

Aristoph'anēs. The English or modern Aristophanes. Samuel Foote. (1722-1777.)

The French Aristophanes. J. Baptiste Poquelin de Molière. (1622-1673.)

Aristotle loved a woman named Pyth'ias, and at death paid her divine honours.

Aristotle of China. Tehuhe, who died A.D. 1200, called the "Prince of Science."

Aristotle of the nineteenth Century. George Cuvier, the great naturalist. (1769-1832.)

Aristote'lian Philosophy. Aristotle maintained that four separate causes are necessary before anything exists; the material cause, the formal, the final, and the moving cause. The first is that which gives matter its individuality; the moving cause is that which causes matter to assume its individual forms; and the final cause is that which makes matter retain the form imposed upon it by the moving cause. According to Aristotle, matter is eternal.

Aristote'lian Unities. Aristotle, the Greek philosopher, laid it down as a rule that every tragedy, properly constructed, should contain but one catastrophe; should be limited to only one scene; and be circumscribed to the action of one single day. These are called the Aristotel'ic or Dramatic unities. To these the French have added a fourth, the unity of uniformity, i.e., in tragedy all the "dramatis personæ" should be tragic in style, in comedy comic, and in farce farcical.

Ark. You must have come out of the ark, or you were born in the ark; because you are so old-fashioned, and ignorant of current events.

Arma'da. The Spanish armada. The fleet assembled by Felipe II. of Spain, in 1588, for the conquest of England. Used for any fleet.

Arme'nians. A religious sect so called from Arme'nia, where Christianity was introduced in the second century. They attribute only one nature to Christ, and hold that the Spirit proceeds from the Father only. They enjoin the adoration of saints, have some peculiar ways of administering baptism and the Lord's supper, but do not maintain the doctrine of purgatory.

Ar'mida. One of the prominent female characters in Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered." She was a beautiful sorceress, with whom Rinaldo fell in love, and wasted his time in voluptuous pleasure. Two messengers were sent from the Christian army with a talisman to disenchant him. After his escape, Armida followed him in distraction, but not being able to allure him back, set fire to her palace, rushed into the midst of a combat, and was slain.

In 1806, Frederick William of Prussia declared war against Napoleon, and his young queen rode about in military costume to arouse the enthusiasm of the people. When Napoleon was told of it, he wittily said of her: "She is Ar'mida, in her distraction setting fire to her own palace."

Armin'ians (Anti-Calvinists); so called from James Harmensen of Holland, whose name, Latinised, is Jaco'bus Armin'ius. He asserted that God bestows forgiveness and eternal life on all who repent and believe; that he wills all men to be saved; and that his predestination is founded on his foreknowledge.

Ar'mory. Heraldry is so called, because it first found its special use in direct connection with military equipments, knightly exercises, and the mêlée of actual battle.

Arms. In the Bayeux tapestry, the Saxons fight on foot with javelin and battle-axe, and bear shields with the British characteristic of a boss in the centre. The men were moustached.

The Normans are on horseback, with long shields and pennoned lances. The men are not only shaven, but most of them have a complete tonsure on the back of the head, whence the spies said to Harold, "There are more priests in the Norman army than men in Harold's."

Royal Arms of England. The three lions leoparded were the cognisance of William the Conqueror; the lion rampant in the second quarter is from the arms of Scotland; and the harp in the third quarter represents Ireland. The lion supporter is in honour of England, and the unicorn in honour of Scotland. These two supporters were introduced by James I.

William I. had only two lions passant guardant; the third was introduced by Henry II. The lion rampant first appeared on Scotch seals in the reign of Alexander II. (1214-1249.) The harp was assigned to Ireland in the time of Henry VII.; before that time the arms of Ireland were three crowns. The unicorn was not a supporter of the royal arms of Scotland before the reign of Mary Stuart.

Arn-monat. A corruption of Barn-month (Barn-month), the Anglo-Saxon name for August, because it was the month for garnering the corn.

Arnauts (brave men). Albanian mountaineers.

Stained with the best of Arnaut's blood.
Byron, "The Giaour."

Arnold. Son of Melch'tal, patriarch of the forest cantons of Switzerland. He was in love with Matilda, a sister of Gessler, the Austrian governor of the district. When the tyranny of Gessler drove the people into rebellion, Arnold gave up Matilda and joined the insurgents, but when Gessler was shot by William Tell, he became united to her in marriage.—Rossini's opera of "Guglielmo Tell."

Arnol'dists. The partisans of Arnold of Brescia, who raised his voice against the abuses and vices of the papacy in the twelfth century. He was burnt alive by pope Adrian IV.

Arod, in the satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," by Dryden and Tate, is designed for Sir William Waller. (Part ii.)

Aron'teus (3 syl.), in "Jerusalem Delivered." An Asiatic king, who joined the Egyptian armament against the Crusaders, "not by virtue fired, but vain of his titles and ambitious of fame."

Ar'oundight. The sword of Sir Launcelot of the Lake.

It is the sword of a good knight,
Though homespun was his mail.
What matter if it be not hight,
Joyeuse, Cola'da, Durindale, Excalibar, or Ar'oundight?—Longfellow.

Arovnt thee. Get ye gone, be off. In Cheshire they say, rynt ye, witch; and milk-maids say to their cows when they have done milking them, rynt ye, my beauties. (Saxon a-rennan, run off; Gothic a-rinnan; Welsh rhin, a channel for water; whence Rhine.)

Arras tapestry. So called from Arras, in the French Netherlands, where it was manufactured. When rooms were hung with tapestry it was a common thing for persons to hide behind it, especially the arras curtain before the door. Hubert concealed the two villains who were to put out Arthur's eyes behind the arras. Polo'nus was slain by Hamlet while concealed behind the arras. Falstaff proposed to hide behind the arras at Windsor, &c.

Arrot, the weasel, in the tale of "Reynard the Fox."

Arrow. The broad arrow, used as a Government mark, is made thus ↗, the broad a of the Druids. This letter was typical of rank and authority. It occurs on coins and precious stones as the symbol of Mithras; the Germans used it to symbolise the moon; and in churches it is employed as the symbol of the "Sun of Righteousness." (See A 1.)

Arsch. The throne of deity. (Mahom. myth.)

Ars'e'tes (in "Jerusalem Delivered"). The aged eunuch who brought up Clo-rin'da, and attended her steps.

Artaxerxes, called by the Persians Kai-Ardeshir, and surnamed diaz-dest (long-handed), because his right hand was longer than his left. The Greeks translated diaz-dest into Greek, and the Romans into longo-maneus.

Art'egal, Sir (in Spenser's "Faëry Queen"), is the hero of the fifth book, and impersonates Justice, the foster-child of Astræa. In the previous books he occasionally appears, and is called Sir Arthegal. It is said that Arthur lord Grey of Wilton was the "Academy Figure" of this character. He was sent to Ireland as Lord Lieutenant in 1580, and the poet was his secretary. In book iv., canto 6, Sir Art'egal is married to Brit'omart, and proceeds to succour Ire'na (Ireland), whose heritage had been withheld by the tyrant Grantorto. (See ARTHEGAL.)

Arte'mus Ward. A showman, very 'cute, very American, and very vain. The hypothetical writer of the essays or papers so called, the real author being Charles F. Browne.

Arte'sian Wells. So called from Artesium (the Latin for Artois), in France, where they were first perforated.

Artful Dodger. A young thief, a most perfect adept in villany, up to every sort of wicked dodge.—Dickens, "Oliver Twist."

Arthegal. Uterine brother of prince Arthur. Spenser, in his "Faëry Queen" (book iii.), makes Brit'omart see his person and name in the magic glass. She falls in love with the looking-glass hero, and is told by Merlin that she will marry him, and become the mother of a line of kings that would supersede both the Saxons and Normans. He referred, of course, to the Tudors, who were descendants of Cadwallador. (See ARTEGAL.)

Arthur. King of the Sil'urës, a tribe of ancient Britons, was mortally wounded in the battle of Camlan, in Cornwall, raised by the revolt of his nephew, Modred. He was taken to Glastonbury, where he died.

His wife was Guinevère, who committed adultery with Sir Launcelot of the Lake, one of the Knights of the Round Table.

He was the natural son of Uther and Igerna (wife of Gorlois, duke of Cornwall), and was brought up by Sir Ector.

He was born at Tintad'gel or Tintagel, a castle in Cornwall.

His habitual residence was Caerleon, in Wales; and he was buried at Av'alon.

His sword was called Excal'ibar or Excal'ibor; his spear, Rone (one syl.), and his shield, Pridwin. (See ROUND TABLE, KNIGHTS.)

Arthur. The romance of King Arthur may be divided into six parts.

(1) The romance of the "San Graal." By Robert Borron.

(2) "The Merlin," which celebrates the birth and exploits of King Arthur. By Walter Mapes.

(3) "The Launcelot." By Walter Mapes.

(4) The search or "Quest of the San Graal." It is found by Sir Gal'ahad, a knight of pure heart and great courage; but no sooner does he find it than he is taken up to heaven. By Walter Mapes.

(5) The "Mort d'Artus," or Death of Arthur. By Walter Mapes.

(6) "Sundry Tales," but especially the adventures of Sir Tristan. By Luke Gast, of Salisbury.

Arthur's Seat, a hill near Edinburgh, is A'rd Seir (hill of arrows), where people shot at a mark.

Articles of Roup (Scotch). Conditions of sale at an auction announced by a crier. (Roup is the Teutonic re-open, to cry out.)

Artists. The Prince of Artists, Albert Direr; so called by his countrymen. (1471-1528.)

Ar'totyrites (4 syl.). Certain heretics from among the Montanists; so called because they offered bread and cheese to God. They admitted women to the priesthood. (Greek, artos, barley-bread, and tyros, cheese.)

Arts. Degrees in Arts. In the mediæval ages the full course consisted of the three subjects which constituted the Trivium, and the four subjects which constituted the Quadrivium:—

The Trivium was grammar, logic, and rhetoric.

The Quadrivium was music, arithmetic, geometry, and astronomy.

The Master of Arts was the person qualified to teach or be the master of students in arts; as the Doctor was the person qualified to teach theology.

Aru'na. The Phaëton of Indian mythology.

Ar'undel. The family name is from their heraldic device, a corruption of hirondelles (swallows).

Arundel. The charger of Bevis of Southampton.

Arundelian Marbles. A collection of ancient sculptures collected at great expense by Thomas Howard earl of Arundel, and presented to the University of Oxford in 1667 by his grandson, Henry Howard, afterwards duke of Norfolk. They contain tables of ancient chronology, especially that of Athens, from B.C. 1582 to 353, engraved in old Greek capitals. Date of the tables, B.C. 264.

Arva'kur. One of the horses of the sun. (Scand. myth.) (See ASLO.)

A'ryans. The parent stock of what is called the Indo-European family of nations. They lived probably in Bactria, i.e., between the river Oxus and the Hindu-koosh mountains. The Aryan family of languages are the Teutonic, Celtic, Slavonic, Hellenic, Italian, Iranian, and Indian.

Arz'na. A river that flows into the North Sea, near Wardhus, where Sir Willoughby's three ships were frozen, and the whole crew perished of starvation.

In these fell regions in Arzina caught,
And to the stony deep his idle ship
Immediate scold, he with his hapless crew . . .
Froze into statues.—Thomson, "Winter."

As you were, in military drilling, means, Return to the position in which you were before the last exercise. As you were before.

Asa-lor or Lokë. Descended from the giants and received among the celestials. He is represented as a treacherous malignant power, fond of assuming disguises, and plotting evil. One of his progeny is Hela (q.v.). (Scandinavian mythology.)

Asa-thor. The first-born of mortals. (Scand. myth.)

A'saph. A famous musician in David's time (1 Chron. xxv. 1, 2). Mr. Tate, who wrote the second part of "Absalom and Achitophel," lauds Dryden under this name.

While Judah's throne and Sion's rock stand fast,
The song of Asaph and the fane shall last.
"Absalom and Achitophel," pt. ii.

As'bolos. One of Actæon's dogs. The word means soot-coloured. (See AMARYNTHOS.)

Asca'aphos. Turned by Proserpine, for mischief-making, into an owl.

As'capart. A giant conquered by Sir Bevis of Southamton. He was thirty feet high, and the space between his eyes was twelve inches. This mighty giant, whose effigy figures on the city gates of Southamton, could carry under his arm without feeling distressed Sir Bevis with his wife and horse.

As Bevis of Southamton fell upon Ascapart.
2 Henry VI., Act ii. 3.

Ascendant. In casting a horoscope the easternmost star, representing the house of life, is called the ascendant, because it is in the act of ascending. This is a man's strongest star, and so long as it is above the horizon his fortune is said to be in the ascendant. When a man's circumstances begin to improve, and things look brighter, we say his star is in the ascendant. (See HOUSES, STARS.)

Ascension Day or Holy Thursday. The day which commemorates our Lord's ascension. It is the day for beating the bounds or riding the marches.

Asch'moun. The Tyrian Escula'pius.

Ascod'rogites (4 syl.). Certain heretics who said "they were vessels full of new wine" (Greek, askos). By new wine they meant the Gospel. (Matt. ix. 17.)

Ascræ'an Poet or Sage. Hesiod, the Greek didactic poet, born at Asera, in Bæotia. Virgil calls him the "Old Ascræon." (Ecl. vi.)

As'en. The three gods next in rank to the twelve male Asir (q.v.).

As'gard. The fortress of the Asir or Northern gods, the Olympus of Scandinavian mythology. It is said to be situate in the centre of the universe, and accessible only by the rainbow-bridge (Bifrost). The word As means a "god," and gard an "enclosure," our "yard." Odin was priest of Asgard before he migrated to the lake Logur or Mælar Sea.

Ash-tree, or "Tree of the Universe." (See YGGDRASIL.)

Ash Wednesday. The first day in Lent, when the undistributed branches of consecrated palm are burnt; and the officiating priests sign the sign of the cross with the ashes on the forehead of their congregations, saying, "Remember thou art but dust and ashes, and to dust thou shalt return."

Ashford, Isaac. "A wise, good man, contented to be poor."—Crabbe, "Parish Register."

Ashmo'lean Museum. Presented to the University of Oxford in 1682 by Elias Ashmole. Sometimes called the Trades'cant, because it belonged to the Trades'ant family.

Ash'taro'oth. The goddess-moon in Syrian mythology, called by Jeremiah "the queen of heaven."

Moonëd Ashtaroth,
Heaven's queen and mother both.—Milton.

As'inus. As'inus as'inum fricat (Latin, "one ass rubs another"), that is, we fraternise with persons like ourselves; or, in other words, "Birds of a feather flock together." The allusion needs no explanation.

A'sir. The twelve gods and twelve goddesses of Scandinavian mythology. The gods are: Odin, Thor, Baldur, Niord, Frey, Tyr, Bragi, Heimdall, Vidar, Vali, Ullur, and Forseti. The four chief goddesses are Frigga, Freyja, Idu'na, and Saga.

Ask. The vulgar Ax is the more correct (Saxon axion, Greek axiōō). In assenting to bills, the king used to reply, "Be it as it is axed." Chaucer says in the "Doctor of Medicine's Tale," "For my werke, nothing will I axe." Launfal, 1027, has, "Ho that wyll there axsy justus." Other quotations could easily be added.

Ask and Embla. The Adam and Eve made by Odin, one from ash-wood and the other from elm.

Aslo. One of the horses of the sun. (Scandinavian myth.) (See ARVAKUR.)

Asmode'us (the destroyer). The demon of vanity and dress, called in the Talmud "the king of devils."

The Asmode'us of domestic peace (in the Book of Tobit). Asmode'us falls in love with Sara, daughter of Rag'u'el, and causes the successive death of seven husbands, each on his bridal night. After her marriage to Tobit, he was driven into Egypt by a charm, made by Tobias of the heart and liver of a fish burnt on perfumed ashes, and being pursued was taken prisoner and bound.

Better pleased
Than Asmode'us with the fishy fume
That drove him, though enamoured, from the spouse
Of Tobit's son, and with a vengeance sent
From Media post to Egypt, there fast bound.
Milton, "Paradise Lost," iv.

Asmode'us. The companion of Don Cle'ofas in "The Devil on Two Sticks."

Asmode'us flight. Don Cle'ofas, catching hold of his companion's cloak, is perched on the steeple of St Salva'dor. Here the foul fiend stretches out his hand, and the roofs of all the houses open in a moment, to show the Don what is going on privately in each respective dwelling.

Could the reader take an Asmodeus-flight, and, waving open all roofs and privacies, look down from the roof of Notre-Dame, what a Paris were it!—Carlyle.

As'oka of Magad'ha. In the third century the "nursing father" of Buddhism, as Constantine was of Christianity. He is called "the king beloved of the gods."

Aso'ors. Evil genii of the Indians.

Aspa'sia, a courtesan. She was the most celebrated of the Greek Heteræ, to whom Peric'les attached himself. On the death of Pericles, she lived with Lysic'les, a cattle-dealer.

Aspasia, in the "Maid's Tragedy" of Beaumont and Fletcher, is noted for her deep sorrows, her great resignation and the pathos of her speeches. Amyn'tor deserts her, women point at her with scorn, she is the jest and bye-word of every one, but she bears it all with patience.

As'pen. The aspen leaf is said to tremble, from shame and horror, because our Lord's cross was made of this wood. The fact is this: the leaf is broad, and placed on a long leaf-stalk so flexible as scarcely to be able to support it in an upright position. The upper part of the stalk, on which the leaf mainly depends, is flattened; and, being at right angles with the leaf, is peculiarly liable to be acted on by the least breath of air.

Aspen Leaf. Metaphorically, a chattering tongue, never quiet.

Those aspen leaves of theirs never leave wagging.
Sir T. More.

Asper'sions properly means "sprinklings" or "scatterings." The word was applied by the Romans to libations or offerings to the infernal gods, in contradistinction to oblations, which were always to celestial deities. Its present meaning is base insinuations or slanders.

No sweet aspersions (rain) shall the heavens let fall

To make thi contract grow.
Shakespeare, "Tempest," iv. 1.

Asphaltic Lake. The Dead Sea, where asphalt abounds both on the surface of the water and on the banks. Asphalt is a bitumen, from the Greek asphaltēs (firm stuff).

Asra'el. The Angel of Death. Mahomet describes him as being of immeasurable height, and says his eyes "are 70,000 days' journey apart." His dwelling is in the third heaven. (See AZRAEL.)

Ass. The ass on which Mahomet went to heaven to learn the will of God was called Al Borak (the lightning).

Ass. There is a dark stripe running down the back of an ass, crossed by another at the shoulders. The tradition is that this cross was communicated to the creature when our Lord rode on the back of an ass in his triumphant entry into Jerusalem.

Ass, deaf to music. This tradition arose from the hideous noise made by "Sir Balaam" in braying. Because Midas had no power to appreciate music, Apollo gave him the ears of an ass. (See ASS-EARED.)

Avarice is as deaf to the voice of virtue, as the ass to the voice of Apollo.—"Orlando Furioso," xvi.

To mount the ass (French). To become bankrupt. The allusion is to a custom very common in the sixteenth century of mounting a bankrupt on an ass, with his face to its tail. Thus mounted, the defaulter was made to ride through the principal thoroughfares of the town.

The ass waggeth his ears. This proverb is applied to those who lack learning, and yet talk as if they were very wise; men wise in their own conceit. The ass, proverbial for having no "taste for music," will nevertheless wag its ears at a "concord of sweet sounds," just as if it could well appreciate it.

An ass in a lion's skin. A coward who hectors, a fool that apes the wise man. The allusion is to the fable of an ass that put on a lion's hide, but was betrayed when he began to bray.

An ass with two panniers. A man walking the streets with a lady on each arm. This occupies the whole pavement, and is therefore bad manners well meriting the reproach. In Italy they call such a simpleton a pitcher with two handles, his two arms akimbo forming the two handles. In London we call it walking bodkin, because the man is sheathed like a bodkin and powerless. Our expression is probably a corruption of the French Faire le panier à deux anses ("put your arms akimbo" or "make yourself a basket with two handles").

Till the ass ascends the ladder—i.e., never. A rabbinical expression. The Romans had a similar one, Cum asinus in tegulis ascenderit (when the ass climbs to the tiles). And Buxtorf has Si ascenderit asinus per scalas. What would the ancients say, if they could hear our street acrobats promising to perform their impossibility for the small charge of twopence more!

Asses that carry the mysteries (asinus portat mysteria). A classical knock at the Roman clergy. The allusion is to the custom of employing asses to carry the cista which contained the sacred symbols, when processions were made through the streets.—"Divine Legislation," ii. 4.

Ass. (See GOLDEN ASS.)

Asses' Bridge. Prop. 5, Book I. of Euclid. This is the first difficult proposition in geometry, and stupid boys rarely get over it the first time without tripping.

Asses, Feast of. (See FOOLS.)

Ass-eared. Midas had the ears of an ass. The tale says Apollo and Pan had a contest, and chose Midas to decide which was the better musician. Midas gave sentence in favour of Pan, and Apollo, in disgust, changed his ears into those of an ass.

Assabi'nus. The name given by the Ethiopians to the sun-god.

Assas'sins. A band of Carmathians, collected by Hassan, subah of Nishapur, called the Old Man of the Mountains, because he made Mount Leb'anon his stronghold. This band was the terror of the world for two centuries, when it was put down by sultan Bib'aris. The assasins stupefied their victims with haschisch (bang), an intoxicating drink, and either from this liquor or from the founder, received their name (A.D. 1090).

M. Volney derives the word from hass (to be in ambush, to kill), and Lane from hushhush (drunk with hemp).

Assay' or Essay'. To take the assay is to taste—wine to prove it is not poisoned. Hence to try, to taste; a savour, trial, or sample. Holished says, "Wolsey made dukes and earls serve him of wine with a say taken" (p. 847).

Edmund, in "King Lear," says to Edgar, "Thy tongue, some say of breeding breathes;" i.e., thy speech gives indication of good breeding—it savours of it. Hence the expressions, I make my first assay (trial).

(He) makes vow before his uncle, never more
To give the assay of arms against your majesty.
Shakespeare, "Hamlet," ii. 2.

Assaye Regiment, The 74th Foot, so called because they first distinguished themselves in the battle of Assaye, where 2,000 British and 2,500 Sepoy troops under Wellington defeated 30,000 Mah-rattas, commanded by French officers, in 1803.

Assien'to Treaties (Spanish agreement treaties). Contracts entered into by Spain with Portugal, France, and England, to supply her South American colonies with negro slaves. England joined in 1713, after the peace of Utrecht.

Assine'go. A young ass, a simpleton (a Portuguese word).

Thou hast no more brain than I have in mine elbows; an assinego may tutor thee.
"Troilus and Cressida," ii. 1.

Assumption Day. The 15th of August, so called in honour of the Virgin Mary, who (according to the Roman and Greek Churches) was taken to heaven that day (A.D. 45), in her corporeal form, being at the time seventy-five years of age.

Astag'oras (in "Jerusalem Delivered"). A female fiend, who had the power of raising storms, and whose partners were the three Furies: Tisiph'onë, Meg'ara, and Alec'to.

Astartë. Goddess of the Moon, in Phœnician mythology.

With these in troops
Came Astoreth, whom the Phœnicians called Astartë, queen of heaven, with crescent horns.
Milton, "Paradise Lost,"

As'tarte (2 syl.). The lady beloved by Manfred. In order to see and speak to her, the magician entered the hall of Arim'anës, and the spirits called up the phantom of the young lady, which told the count that "to-morrow would end his earthly ills." When Manfred asked her if she loved him, she sighed, "Manfred," and vanished.—Byron, "Manfred."

As'terism. That branch of astrology which is limited to the fixed stars, as in India and Arabia. (Astra, fixed stars.)

As'tolat. Guildford, in Surrey.

Astolpho (in "Orlando Furioso"). An English duke (son of Otho), who joined Charlemagne against the Saracens. He was carried on the back of a whale to Alei'a's isle; but when Aleina tired of him, she turned him into a myrtle. He was disenchanted by Melissa. Astolpho descended into the infernal regions, and his flight to the moon (bk. xviii.) is one of the best parts of the whole poem. (See INFERNO.)

It came upon them like a blast from Astolpho's horn; i.e., it produced a panic. Logistilla gave Astolpho a magic horn, and whatever man or beast heard its blast was seized with panic, and became an easy captive.—"Orlando Furioso," bk. viii.

Like Astolpho's book it told you everything. The same fairy gave Astolpho a book, which would not only direct him aright in his journeys, but would tell him anything he desired to know.—"Orlando Furioso," bk. viii.

Astoreth or Ashtaroth. A Phœnician goddess-moon, sometimes called "the queen of heaven" (Jer. vii. 18), sometimes "goddess of the Zidonians."

Astræ'a. Equity, innocence. During the Golden Age this goddess dwelt on earth, but when sin began to prevail, she reluctantly left it, and was metamorphosed into the constellation Virgo.

When hard-hearted interest first began
To poison earth, Astræa left the plain.
Thomson, "Castle of Indolence," canto 1.

Astral Spirits. The spirits of the stars. According to the mythology of the Persians, Greeks, Jews, &c., each star has its special spirit, which may be termed its soul or vital principle. Paracelsus maintained that every man had his attendant star, which received him at death, and took charge of him till the great resurrection.

Astre'a. A poetical name of Mrs. Aphra Behn, born of good family in the reign of Charles I. Her works are very numerous, including seventeen dramatic pieces. Died 1689, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

The stage how loosely does Astrea treat.—Pope.

Astrology. (See DIAPASON, MICRO-COSM.)

Astrophel. Sir Philip Sidney, "Phil. Sid.," being a contraction of Philos Sidus, and the Latin sidus being changed to the Greek astron, we get astron-philos (star-lover). The "star" that he loved was Penelope Devereux, whom he called Stella (star), and to whom he was betrothed. Edmund Spenser wrote a pastoral called "Astrophel," to the memory of his friend and patron, who fell at the battle of Zutphen. (1554-1585.)

Astu'te (2 syl.). Literally, city-like (Greek, astu, a city), the opposite of rustic. The word means that mixture of acuteness and cunning which persons living in large cities generally acquire.

Asylum means, literally, a place where pillage is forbidden (Greek, a synalō, not to pillage). The ancients set apart certain places of refuge, where the vilest criminals were protected, both from private and public assaults.

Asynier. The Celtic word for goddesses.

Atē. Goddess of vengeance and mischief. This goddess was driven out of heaven, and took refuge among the sons of men.

With Atē by his side come hot from hell, . . .
Cry "havoc" and let slip the dogs of war.
Shakespeare, "Julius Cæsar," iii. 1.

Atella'næ. Interludes in the Roman theatres, introduced from Atella, in Campania. The characters of Mæchus and Bucco are the foundations of our harlequin and clown.

Atergata. A deity with the upper part like a woman, and the lower part like a fish. She had a temple at Ascalon. (See DAGON.)

Athana'sian Creed, so called because it embodies the opinions of Athanasius respecting the Trinity. It was compiled in the fifth century by Hilary, bishop of Arles.

Athelstane (3 syl.), surnamed "The Unready," thane of Coningsburgh.—Sir W. Scott, "Ivanhoe."

Athenæum (the review so called) was founded by James Silk Buckingham in 1829.

Athe'nian Bee. Plato, a native of Athens, was so called because his words flowed with the sweetness of honey.

Athens. The Modern Athens—i. e., Edinburgh. Willis says that its singular resemblance to Athens, approached from the Piræus, is very striking.

An imitation Acropolis is commenced on the Calton Hill, and has the effect of the Parthenon. Hymettus is rather more lofty than the Pentland hills, and Penteleus is farther off and grander than Arthur's Seat; but the old Castle of Edinburgh is a noble feature, superbly magnificent.—Pencilings.

Athens of Ireland. Cork.

Athens of the New World. Boston, noted for its literary merit and institutions.

Athens of the West. Cor'dova, in Spain, was so called in the Middle Ages.

A'thor. The Venus of Egyptian mythology.

Atin. Strife. The squire of Pyrochles, and stirrer up of contention.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. ii.

Atlan'tēs. Figures of men used in architecture instead of pillars. So called from Atlas, who in Greek mythology supported the world on his shoulders. Female figures are called Caryat'idēs (q. v.). (See TELAMONES.)

Atlan'tēs (in "Orlando Furioso"). A sage and a magician who lived in an enchanted palace, and brought up Rogero to all manly virtues.

Atlan'tian or Atlante'an Shoulders. Shoulders able to bear a great weight, like those of Atlas, which, according to heathen mythology, supported the whole world.

Sage he stood,
With Atlantean shoulders fit to bear
The weight of mightiest monarchies.
Milton, "Paradise Lost," bk. ii.

Atlan'tic Ocean. The ocean that washes the base of the Atlas mountains.

Atlant'is. A mythological island which contained the Elysian Fields.

The New Atlantis. An island imagined by Lord Bacon, where was established a philosophical commonwealth bent on the cultivation of the natural sciences. (See UTOPIA, CITY OF THE SUN.)

Atlas. King of Maurita'nia in Africa, fabled to have supported the world upon his shoulders. Of course, the tale is merely a poetical way of saying that the Atlas mountains prop up the heavens, because they are so lofty. We call a book of maps an "Atlas," because it contains or holds the world. The word was first employed in this sense by Mercator, and the title-page of his collection of maps had the figure of Atlas, with the world on his back.

But Atlas, propping heaven, as poets feign,
His subterranean wonders spread.
Thomson, "Autumn."

At'omic theory is, that every material substance is made up of congeries of atoms, not united fortuitously, but according to fixed laws. The four laws of Dalton are—constant proportion, reciprocal proportion, multiple proportion, and compound proportion.

Atomic volume. The proportion by bulk in which atoms unite or have united in any given substance.

Atomic weights. The proportion by weight in which atoms unite, or have united in any given substance.

Atos'sa. Sarah, duchess of Marlborough; so called by Pope, because she was the friend of Lady Wortley Montague, whom he calls Sappho. Herodotus says that Atossa, the mother of Xerxes, was a follower of Sappho.

Atrip. An anchor is atrip when it has just been drawn from the ground in a perpendicular direction. A top-sail is atrip which has just started from the cap. The word is from trip.

Atsh or Adesh. The Assyrian Venus.

At'tabeg, a title founded by Sandjar, sultan of Persia, 1118. (Atta, father; beg, prince.)

At'terocop. An ill-tempered person, who mars all sociability. Strictly speaking, the attercop is the poison-spider. (Anglo-Saxon, atter, poison; cop, spider. Our cob-web should be cop-web, i.e., spider-web.)

Attic. The Attic Bee. Sophocles, the tragic poet, a native of Athens; so called from the great sweetness of his compositions. (B.C. 495-405.)

The Attic Bird. The nightingale; so called because Philomel was the daughter of the king of Athens.

Where the Attic bird
Thrills her thick-warbled notes the summer long.
Milton, "Paradise Regained," iv.

The Attic Muse. Xenophon, the historian, a native of Athens; so called because the style of his composition is a model of elegance. (B.C. 444-359.)

Attic salt. Elegant and delicate wit. Salt, both in Latin and Greek, was a common term for wit, or sparkling thought well expressed: thus Cicero says, "Scipio omnes salē superabat" (Scipio surpassed all in wit). The Athenians were noted for their wit and elegant "turns of thought," and hence Attic salt means wit as pointed and delicately expressed as by the Athenians.

Attic storey. The head: the body being compared to a house, the head is the highest, or attic storey. Professor Goldstücker refers the word "attic" in this sense to the Sanskrit attaka, a room on the top of a house.

Queer in the attic storey. Fuddled, partially intoxicated.

Ill furnished in the attic storey. Not clever, dull.

Atticus. The most elegant and finished scholar of the Romans. His admirable taste and sound judgment were so highly thought of that even Cicero submitted to him several of his treatises.

The English Atticus. Joseph Addison; so called by Pope, on account of his refined taste and philosophical mind. (1672-1719.)

The Christian Atticus. Reginald Heber, Bishop of Calcutta. (1783-1826.)

The Irish Atticus. George Faulkner; so called by Lord Chesterfield. (1700-1775.)

Attin'gians. He etics of the eighth century, who solemnised baptism with the words, "I am the living water."

Attire originally meant a head-dress. (French atour, a tour de tête.) Subsequently extended to the dress generally.

With a linen mitre shall he (the high priest) be attired—i.e., dressed as to the head (Lev. xvi. 4). (Aholah and Aholibah) exceeded in dyed attire upon their heads (Ezek. xxiii. 15).

Attock. The forbidden river, beyond which no pure Hindu can pass.

Attorney means a substitute (French, ad tourner, to turn-to, to substitute for), meaning one substituted for another, one who has deputed power to act on his client's behalf. Hence the deed which formally assigns to another the power of acting on our behalf is called power of attorney. A solicitor is one who solicits or petitions in the Court of Chancery on behalf of his clients. Properly speaking, solicitors belong to the Chancery Court, and attorneys to the other courts.

A'tys. Metamorphosed into a fir-tree by Cyb'elë.

Au Courant (French), "acquainted with." To keep one au courant of everything that passes, is to keep one familiar with, or informed of, passing events.

Au Fait (French). Skilful, thorough master of; as He is quite au fait in those matters, i.e., quite master of them or conversant with them.

Au Revoir. (French.) "Good by'e for the present." Literally, till seeing you again.

Aubry's Dog. (See Dog.)

Au'deanism. The doctrine of Au'deus of Mesopotamia, who lived in the fourth century. He maintained that the Old Testament justifies the belief that God has a sensible form (Gen. i. 26).

Audhum'la (the nourishing-power), in Scandinavian mythology, is the cow created by Surt to nourish Ymir. She supplied him with four rivers of milk, and was herself nourished by licking the rocks. (See Ymir.)

Audley. We will John Audley it— i.e., abridge it. A theatrical phrase. In the eighteenth century one Shuter had a travelling company which visited different fairs. It was his custom to lengthen out his performance till a goodly number of new comers had collected on the open stage of his theatre, when a boy called out John Audley, and the play which was going on inside was brought to an end as soon as possible.

Aud'rev. A country wench, who jilted William for Touchstone.—Shakespeare, "As You Like It."

Au'gean Stables. An accumulation of corruption or filth almost beyond the power of man to remedy. Au'geas, king of Elis, in Greece, had never cleansed his stalls for thirty years, though he kept in them a herd of 3,000 oxen. One of the tasks assigned to Hercules was to cleanse this stew, which he did by causing two rivers to run through it.

Augsburg Confession. The chief standard of faith in the Lutheran church; so called because, while the diet of the German empire was sitting at Augsburg, in 1530, the confession of faith drawn up by Melancthon and Luther was presented to Charles V.

An'gury means properly the science of bird-talk (avium garrulus). St. Pierre says: "The first navigators, when out of sight of land, watched the seed and the flight of birds, as indications of the shore, and with no other guidance discovered many new islands." From this custom (he says) arose the practice of consulting the flight of birds before entering on any important enterprise.—Studies.

August. The eighth month; so called in compliment to Augustus Cæsar of Rome, whose "lucky month" it was, in which occurred many of his most fortunate events.

Augusta. London; so called by the Romans.

Oft let me wander o'er the dewy fields,
Or ascend
Some eminence, Augusta, in thy plains,
And see the country far diffused around.
Thomson, "Spring."

Augustan. Augustan Age of English Literature—i.e., its best period. Beginning in the reign of Elizabeth and ending with the Restoration. The term Augustan is from Augustus the emperor of Rome, the most palmy time of Latin literature.

The Augustan Age of French Literature.
The age of Louis XIV. (1640-1740.)

Augustine. A monk or nun of the Augustine order, established in the eleventh century in commemoration of St. Augustine, and in imitation of the ancient order founded by him in the fourth century.

The Second Augustine. Thomas Aquinas, also called the Angelic Doctor. (1224-1275.)

Augustin'ians. Divines who maintained, on the authority of St. Augustine, that grace is effectual absolutely, quite independent of the person who receives it.

Augustus. No proper name, but a mere title given to Octavian, because he was head of the priesthood. In the reign of Diocle'tian, the two emperors were each styled Augustus (sacred majesty), and the two viceroys Cæsar. Prior to that time Ha'drian limited the title of Cæsar to the heir presumptive.

Augustus. Philippe II. of France: so called because he was born in the month of August. (1165, 1180-1223.)

Sigismund II. of Poland. (1520, 1548-1572.)

Auld Brig and New Brig, of Robert Burns, refers to the bridges over the river Ayr, in Scotland.

Auld Hornie. After the establishment of Christianity, the heathen deities were degraded by the Church into fallen angels, and Pan, with his horns, crooked nose, goat's beard, pointed ears, and goat's feet, was transformed to his Satanic majesty, and called Old Horny.

O thou, whatever title suit thee,
Auld Hornie, Satan, Nick, or Clootie.

Burns.

Auld Reekie. Edinburgh old town, so called from the filthy state of its streets, always reeking with exhalations.

Au'lic Council, from the Latin aula (a court), was one of the highest courts of the old German empire, from which there was no appeal. (1495-1806.)

Aunt Sally. A game in which a wooden head is mounted on a pole. The fun of the game is to knock the nose of the figure, or break the pipe stuck in its mouth. This is to be done by throwing at it, from a stated distance, a short club. The word aunt was anciently applied to any old woman: thus in Shakespeare, Puck speaks of

The wisest aunt telling the saddest tale.
"Midsummer Night's Dream," ii. 1.

Sally is a play upon the common name, and the verb sally (to dart or shoot at something).

Aure'ola. A circle of light, emblematical of glory, placed by the old painters round the heads of martyrs and saints. The notion was derived from Exod. xxv. 25. Facies cor'o'nam aure'olam (thou shalt make another crown of gold), besides the crown of gold which God promised to the faithful. — Donne's "Sermons."

Au'ri. Auri sacra famēs (the cursed hunger for wealth), applied to that restless craving for money which is almost a menomania.

Auro'ra. Early morning. According to Grecian mythology, the goddess Aurora, called by Homer "rosy-fingered," sets out before the sun, and is the pioneer of his rising.

You cannot shut the windows of the sky,
Through which Aurora shows her brightening face.

Thomson, "Castle of Indolence," canto 11.

Auro'ra Bore'a'lis (Latin). The electrical lights occasionally seen in the northern part of the sky; also called "Merry Dancers."

Auro'ra Raby. A rich, noble English orphan; left to the care of guardians; a Catholic in religion; and in person

A rose with all its sweetest leaves yet folded.
Byron, "Don Juan," canto 15.

Auso'nia. An ancient name of Italy, so called from Auson, son of Ulysses, and father of the Auso'nēs.

All the green delights Ausonia pours.
Thomson, "Summer."

Aus'picēs. Under your good auspices, i.e., through your influence, or the influence of your good name. In Rome only the commander-in-chief was allowed to take the auspices of war. If a legate gained a victory, he was said to win it under the good auspices of his superior in command.

Aus'ter. A wind pernicious to flowers and health. In Italy one of the South winds was so called; its modern name is the Sirocco. (Greek aust'eros, hot, dry.) In England it is a damp wind, generally bringing wet weather.

Naught but putrid streams and noisome fogs,
For ever hung on drizzly Aus'ter's beard.

Thomson, "Castle of Indolence," canto 11.

Austin Friars. Friars of the order of St. Augustine. (See BEGGING.)

Austrian Lip. The thick lip, so characteristic of the house of Haps'burg, derived from Cymbarga, daughter of Ziemovitz, duke of Maso'via, and niece of the then king of Poland. Cymbarga was noted for her beauty and unusual strength.

Aut Cæsar aut nullus (Latin Either Cæsar or no one), everything or nothing; all or not at all. Cæsar used to say, "he would sooner be first in a village than second at Rome." Milton makes Satan say, "Better to reign in Hell than serve in Heaven." (See SIX.)

Authen'tic Doctor. Gregory of Rimini. (Fourteenth century.)

Auto da Fé (Portuguese, and Auto de Fé, Spanish), "an act of faith." A day set apart by the Inquisition for the examination of "heretics." Those not acquitted were burnt. The reason why inquisitors burnt their victims was, because they are forbidden "to shed blood;" an axiom of the Roman Catholic Church being, "Ecclesia non novit sanguinem" (the church is untainted with blood).

Autolycos. The craftiest of thieves. He stole the flocks of his neighbours, and changed their marks. Si'syphos outwitted him by marking his sheep under their feet, a device which so tickled the rogue that he instantly "cottoned" to him. Shakespeare introduces him in "The Winter's Tale" as a pedlar, and says he was called the son of Mercury, because he was born under that "thieving planet."

Autolycus is no lapidary, though he drives a roaring trade in flash jewellery.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Autom'aton—plural, automatons or automata. Machines which imitate the actions, &c., of living creatures. The most famous are the following:—(1) The pigeon that could fly, made, B.C. 400, by Archytos, of Tarentum; (2) the wooden eagle of Regiomontanus, the German, which flew from the city of Königsberg to meet the emperor, saluted him, and returned, 1436-1476; (3) the duck of Vaucanson of Grenoble, which could eat and drink, and even in a way digest food; its wings, viscera, bones, &c., minutely resembled those of a living animal. (Greek, autos-mao, I self-move). (See ANDROID.)

Autom'edon. A coachman. He was the charioteer of Achilles.

Autumn. He is come to his autumn—i.e., to be hanged, to "his fall." A pun on the plan of "turning a man off" by dropping the plank on which he stands. The drop is the "leaf," and autumn is called the "fall," or "fall of the leaf."

A'va, in Birmah, has marble quarries of which idols are made, and only priests are allowed to trade there.—Symes, vol. ii., p. 376.

As on Ava's shore,
Where none but priests are privileged to trade
In that best marble of which gods are made,
T. Moore, "Lalla Rookh," part i.

Av'alanche (3 syl.) means properly a "gulp," something swallowed (French, avaler, to swallow). The word is applied to land-slips and snow-slips, which swallow up or overwhelm forests, villages, and all they fall upon. Metaphorically, we speak of an "avalanche of applause," an "avalanche of bouquets" showered on the stage, &c.

Av'alon. An ocean island, where King Arthur resided and was buried. The word means "Apple-green island" (aval, apple; yn', island); and it is generally thought to mean Glastonbury, a name derived from the Saxon glastn (green like grass).

Avant Courier. French for a "messenger sent before" to get things ready for a party of travellers, or to announce their approach. Anything said or done to prepare the way for something more important to follow; a feeler, a harbinger.

A-vast there! Stop, not so fast, hold tight. A sailor's phrase. (German, basta, stop; Italian, basta, enough.)

Ava'tar. The incarnation of deity in Hindu mythology, or the appearance of a god in a visible form. It properly means "out of the boat," and the allusion is to the wide-spread tradition of Noah coming out of the ark. The ten avatars of Vishnu are the most celebrated.

Ave Mari'a (Hail, Mary!). The first two words of the angel's salutation to the Virgin Mary (Luke i. 28). In the Roman Catholic Church the phrase is applied to an invocation to the Virgin beginning with those words; and also to the smaller beads of a rosary, the larger ones being termed pater-nosters.

Avenel (2 syl.). White Lady of Avenel. A tutelary spirit in Scott's "Monastery."

Aver'nus (Greek a-ornos, "without birds"). A lake in Campania, so called from the belief that its sulphurous and mephitic vapours killed any bird that happened to inhale them. Poets call it the entrance to the infernal regions; hence the proverb, The descent to Avernus is easy, but coming back again is quite another matter, meaning that all bad habits are easily acquired, but very hard to be abandoned.

Av'ertin, St. The patron saint of lunatics; so called from the French avertineux (lunatics).

Avesta. The sacred scriptures of the Magians, composed by Zoroaster.

Aveu'gle. Son of Erebus and Nox. —Spenser, "Faëry Queen."

Avie'nus. A writer of fables in the decline of the Roman empire. In the Middle Ages, a collection of fables used to be called Av'ynet, or E'sopet.

Aviz. An order of knighthood in Portugal, founded by Sancho I., and having for its object the subjugation of the Moors.

Avoid Extremes. The wise saw of Pit'tacos of Mityl'ëné. (B.C. 652-569.)

Avoir. Avoir Martel en tête (French), "to be jealous." Martel is the Italian martello (jealousy).

Av'oirdupois. Avers, old French for "goods in general," and poise (weights). Whence avoirdupois weight means the "weights for goods and chattels generally." (See TROY WEIGHT.)

Awake. "Awake! arise! or be for ever fallen."—Paradise Lost.

A wide-awake. A hat which has no nap in its material; as it never has a "nap," it must always be wide awake.

He is wide awake. On his guard, on the watch, alive to all the difficulties, well aware of what he is doing.

A-weather. The reverse of a-lee. "A-weather" is towards the weather, or the side on which the wind strikes. "A-lee" is in the lee or shelter, and therefore opposite to the wind side.

Awkward. Not dexterous or right-handed. Awk means the left hand. Hence in Holland's "Plutarch" we have "The awke or left hand;" and again, "They receive her awky when she presenteth . . . the right hand."

Awl. "I'll pack up my awls and begone"—i.e., all my goods. The play is on awl and all.

Axe. "To hang up one's axe." To retire from business, to give over a useless project. The allusion is to the ancient battle-axe, hung up to the gods when the fight was done. All classical scholars will call to mind the allusion of Horace to a similar Roman custom. Being saubbed by Pyrrha, he says, "He will hang up his axe upon her wall," or, more literally, his "drenched garments on the temple-walls of Neptune." (See ASK.)

Ax'inoman'ci. Divination by an axe; much practised by the ancient Greeks with the view of discovering crime. An agate was placed on a red-hot axe, and indicated the guilty person by its motion. (Greek, ax'inē manteia.)

A'yah (Anglo-Indian). A nurse or lady's maid.

Aye'shah (3 syl.). Mahomet's second and favourite wife. He married her when she was only nine years old, and died in her arms. She was called The Virgin, because, of all the wives that the Arabian "prophet" married, she alone was a maiden at the time.

Ayr'shire Poet. Robert Burns, born near the town of Ayr. (1759-1796.)

Azaz'el. The scape-goat; so called by the Jews, because the high priest cast lots on two goats; one lot was for the Lord, and the other lot for Azaz'el or Satan, and the goat on which the latter lot fell was the scape-goat.

Azaz'iel. A seraph who fell in love with An'ah, a grand-daughter of Cain. When the flood came, he carried her under his wing to some other planet.—Byron, "Heaven and Earth."

Azaz'il. In Milton's "Paradise Lost," Azaz'il is the standard-bearer of the infernal host. According to the Koran, when God commanded the angels to worship Adam, Azaz'il replied, "Why should the son of fire fall down before a son of clay?" and God cast him out of heaven. His name was then changed to Eblis, which means "despair."

Then straight commands that, at the warlike sound
Of trumpets loud and clarions, be upreared
His mighty standard; that proud honour claimed Azazil, as his right, a cherub tall.

"Paradise Lost," bk. i.

Azim. The young convert who joined "the creed and standard" of the veiled prophet of Khorassan, in Moore's "Lalla Rookh." When he was witness of the prophet's infamy, he joined the caliph's army, and was mainly instrumental in defeating that of the veiled prophet.

Az'o, marquis of Esté, married Parisi'na, who fell in love with Hugo, a natural son of Azo. The marquis ordered Hugo to be beheaded; but no one knows what the fate of Parisi'na was. Azo, at any rate, married again, and had a family. This Azo was in reality Niccolò of Ferrara.—Byron, "Parisina."

Az'o's Mirror. Zemi'ra is the name of the lady, and Azor that of the bear, in Marmontel's tale of "Beauty and the Beast." Zemi'ra treats the kind monster to let her see her father, if only for a few moments; so drawing aside a curtain, he shows him to her in a magic mirror. This mirror was a sort of telescope, which rendered objects otherwise to be far off distinctly visible.

Az'oth. The panacea of Paracelsus, regarded by his followers as "the tincture of life."

Az'rael (3 syl.). The angel that watches over the dying, and takes the soul from the body. The angel of death. He will be the last to die, but will do so at the second trump of the archangel.

The Mohammedan doctors say that Az'rail was commissioned to inflict the penalty of death on all mankind.—H. Christmas.

Az'rafil. The archangel commissioned to blow the trumpet of the resurrection.—The Koran.

Azuce'na. An old gipsy who stole Man'rico, the infant son of the conte di Luna's brother. She brought up the child as her own son, and justified her conduct on the plea that Garzia, his father, had ordered her daughter to be burnt to death as a witch.—Verdi's opera of "Il Trovatore."

Azu'riel. The fairy who owned what we call Holland Park. King Oberon gave him his daughter Kenna in marriage when he drove Albion from his empire. Albion invaded Kensington, the territory of king Oberon, but was slain in battle by Azuriel.—Tickell.

Az'ymites (3 syl.). The Roman Catholics are so called by the Greek Church, because the holy wafers used by them in the eucharist are made of unleavened bread. (Greek, azymos, unleavened.)

B

B. This letter is the outline of a house. It is called in Hebrew beth (a house).

Marked with a B (French) — i.e., a poor thing. In the French language almost all personal defects begin with the letter B; e.g., bîgle (squint-eyed), borgne (one-eyed), bossu (humpty), boîteux (lame), &c.

Not to know B from a battledore. Not to know the simplest thing; to be very stupid. Miege tells us that horn-books used to be called battledores. The phrase, therefore, means not to know your A B from (i.e., out of) your horn book.

I know B from a Bul's foot, similar to the proverb, "I know a hawk from a heronshaw." (See HAWK.) The bull's parted hoof somewhat resembles a B.

B. C. Marked with B. C. (bad character). When a soldier has disgraced himself by insubordination or treason, he is marked with B. C. before he is drummed out of the regiment.

He called me a B. C. A genteel-looking young woman complained to Mr. Ingham of having been abused by a person who called her a B. C. The magistrate asked what B. C. meant, when he was told that C. meant "cat," but B. was too shocking to be uttered aloud. She consented, however, to whisper the naughty word into his worship's ear. Mr. Ingham heard the mysterious "libel," and, though he could not grant the summons, B. C. has become the stereotyped exponent of a ridiculous charge of libel.—22nd July, 1866, Wandsworth.

B. K. S. The name of "residence" given by officers in mufti, who do not wish to give up their address. The word stands for Barrack KS.

B Flats. Bugs. The pun is "B" (the initial letter), and "flat," from the flatness of the obnoxious insect. Also called Norfolk Howards, from Mr. Bugg, who advertised in the Times that he should in future change his name into "Norfolk Howard." (See F SHARP.)

Baal plur., Baalim, a title of honour. The chief male deity of the Phœnicians. The name was very commonly adopted by the Phœnicians and Carthaginians, as in Hanni-bal, Hasdru-bal, and so on.

Baal-Peor or Belphegor. The Priests of the Mo'abites and Midianites.

Ba'ba. Same as papa (Turkish). Ali-baba is "father Ali."

Babes in the Wood. (See CHILDREN.)

Babies. Babies in the eyes. The reflection of oneself in the eyes of another.

She clung about his neck, gave him ten kisses,
Toyed with his locks, looked babies in his eyes.
Heywood, "Love's Mistress."

Babel. A perfect Babel. A thorough confusion. "A Babel of sounds." A confused uproar, in which nothing can be heard but hubbub. The allusion is to the confusion of tongues at Babel.—Genesis xi.

God . . . comes down to see their city,
 . . . and in derision sets
Upon their tongue a various spirit, to raze
Quite out their native language, and instead
To sow a jangling noise of words unknown.
Forthwith a hideous gabble rises loud
Among the builders; each to other calls,
Not understood. . . . Thus was the building left Ridiculous, and the work "Confusion" named.
Milton, "Paradise Lost," bk. xii.

Baby Charles. So James I. used to call his son Charles, afterwards Charles I.

Babylon. The modern Babylon. So London is sometimes called, on account of its wealth, luxury, and dissipation.

Babylonish Captivity. The seventy years that the Jews were captives in Babylon. They were made captives by Nebuchadnezzar, and released by Cyrus (B.C. 538).

Ba'ca. The Valley of Baca. The vale of tears. This world is so called in Scripture, because of sin and its consequent sorrow.—Psalms lxxxiv. 6.

Our sources of common pleasure dry up as we journey on through the vale of Ba'ca.—Sir Walter Scott, "The Antiquary."

Baccant. A person given to habits of drinking; so called from the "baccants," or men admitted to the feasts of Bacchus.

Baccante (2 syl.). A female wine-bibber; so called from the "baccantës," or female priestesses of Bacchus.

Bacchana'lia. Festivals in honour of Bacchus, distinguished for their licentiousness and debauchery. Plato says he has seen the whole population of Athens drunk at these festivals.

Bacchana'lian. Drunken, rollicksome, devoted or pertaining to Bacchus (q. v.).

Bacchus (wine). In Roman mythology the god of wine. (Greek, iacho, I shout) As jolly Bacchus, god of pleasure,
Charmed the wide world with drink and dances,
And all his thousand airy fancies,
Alas! he quite forgot the while
His favourite vines in Lesbo's isle.—Parnell.

Bacchus, in the "Lusiad," is the evil demon or antagonist of Jupiter, the lord of destiny. As Mars is the guardian power of Christianity, Bacchus is the guardian power of Mahometanism.

Bacchus sprang from the thigh of Zeus. The tale is that Sem'elë asked Zeus to appear before her in all her glory, but the foolish request proved her death. Zeus saved the child which was prematurely born by sewing it up in his thigh till it came to maturity. The Arabian tradition is that the infant Bacchus was nourished during infancy in a cave of Mount Meros. As "Meros" is Greek for a thigh, the Greek fable is readily explained.

What has that to do with Bacchus?—i.e., what has that to do with the matter in hand? When Thespis introduced recitations in the vintage songs, the innovation was suffered to pass, so long as the subject of recitation bore on the exploits of Bacchus; but when, for variety sake, he wandered to other subjects, the Greeks pulled him up with the exclamation, "What has that to do with Bacchus?"

Bachelor. In Hindusta'ni, bachalarka (a young man); Scotch, baich (a child); Welsh, bachgen (a boy child); Portuguese, bacillo (the shoot of a vine, &c.); French, bachelette (a damsel).

A Bachelor of Arts. Talbot derives this word from the Spanish bachillir (a babbler), so called from the disputations held in the school before the first degree is conferred, whence also a good disputer is in Cambridge still termed a wrangler. The word used to be spelt bachiller; thus in the "Proceedings of the Privy Council," vol. i., p. 72, we read:—"The king ordered that the bachillers should have reasonable pay for their trouble."

N. B.—It is rather remarkable that the French bachelette should mean a damsel, and the Norman demoiselle should mean a young gentleman. (See DOMISELLUS.)

Bachelor's Buttons. The campion flower.

So called from a custom still sometimes observed by rustics of carrying the flower in their pockets to know how they stand with their sweethearts. If the flower dies, it is a bad omen; but if it does not fade, they may hope for the best.

To wear bachelor's buttons is to remain a bachelor. In allusion to the custom mentioned above, and by a play on the word bachelor.

Back. To support: as to "back a friend." A commercial term meaning to endorse. When a merchant backs or endorses a bill, he guarantees its value.

Falstaff says to the Prince—

You care not who sees your back. Call you that backing of your friends? A plague upon such backing!

Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV.," ii. 4.

To back and fill. A mode of tacking, when the tide is with the vessel and the wind against it.

To back the sails. So to arrange them that the ship may move backwards.

To see his back; to see the back of anything. To get rid of a person or thing; to see it leave.

Back the oars is to row them backwards, that the boat may move the reverse of its ordinary direction.

Backgammon is the Saxon back-gamen (back game); so called because the art of the game is for each player to bring his men back into his adversary's table.

Background. Placed in the background—i.e., made of no consequence. Pictures have three distances, called grounds: the foreground, where the artist is supposed to be; the middle ground, where the most salient part of the picture is placed; and the background or distance, beyond which the eye cannot penetrate.

Back-hander. A blow on the face with the back of the hand. Also one who keeps back the decanter in order to hand himself a second glass before he passes it.

Back-out. To retreat from a promise not convenient to perform. Many horses are unwilling to go out of a stable head foremost, and are backed out.

Back-stair Influence. Private or unrecognised influence. It was customary to build royal palaces with a staircase for state visitors, and another for those who sought the sovereign upon private matters. If any one wanted a private interview with royalty, it was highly desirable to conciliate those appointed to guard the back stairs, as they had full power to admit or exclude a visitor. Back-stair influence is influence gained over functionaries, who, indirectly, have immense power to promote your object.

Once, we confess, beneath the patriot's cloak
From the cracked haz the dropping guineas broke,
And, jingling down the back stairs, told the crew
"Old Cato is as great a rogue as you."
Pope, "Epistle to Lord Bathurst."

Back Water. (1) Water not required for a water-wheel; so called because arrangements are made for backing it, or diverting it into another channel. (2) A current of water from the inland, which clears off the deposit of sand and silt left by the action of the sea; as the Backwater of Weymouth.

Bacon. The Bacon of Theology. Bishop Butler, author of the "Analogy." (1692-1752.)

Bacon's brazen head. (See BRAZEN.)

To save one's bacon. To baste your bacon. The Saxons were called hogs by their Norman lords. Henry VIII. speaks of the common people as the "swinish multitude;" and Falstaff says to the travellers at Gadshill, "On, bacons, on!" ("1st Henry IV.," ii. 2). Bacon is the outside portion of the back and sides of pork, and may be considered generally as the part which would receive a blow. To "baste one's bacon" is to strike one; and to "save one's bacon" is to escape a castigation.

There seems to be another sense in which the term is used—viz., to escape loss; and in this sense the allusion is to the care taken by our forefathers to save from the numerous dogs that frequented their houses the bacon which was laid up for winter store, the loss of which would have been a very serious calamity.

He may fetch a fitch of bacon from Dunmow—i.e., he is so amiable and good-tempered he will never quarrel with his wife. The allusion is to a custom founded by Juga, a noble lady, in 1111, and restored by Robert de Fitzwalter in 1244; which was, that "any person from any part of England going to Dunmow, in Essex, and humbly kneeling on two stones at the church-door, may claim a gammon of bacon, if he can swear that for twelve months and a day he has never had a household brawl or wished himself unmarried."

Baco'nian Philosophy. A system of philosophy based on principles laid down by Francis Bacon, lord Verulam, in the 2nd book of his "Novum Organum." It is also called inductive philosophy.

Bac'trian Sage. Zoroaster, a native of Bactria (Balkh), about 500 years before the birth of Christ.

Bad. Charles le mauvais. Charles II. of Navarre. (1332-1387.)

He is gone to the bad. Has become a ruined man, or a depraved character. He has gone amongst bad people, in bad ways, or to bad circumstances.

Badge of Poverty. In the reign of William III., those who received parish relief had to wear a badge. It was the letter P, with the initial of the parish to which they belonged, in red or blue cloth, on the shoulder of the right sleeve. (See DYVOUR.)

Might I but know thee by thy household badge.
Shakespeare, "2 Henry VI.," v. 1.

Badge-men. Alms-house men; so called because they wear some special dress, or other badge, to indicate that they belong to a particular foundation.

He quits the gay and rich, the young and free,
Among the badge-men with a badge to be.
Crabbe, "Borough."

Badger. To tease or annoy by superior numbers. In allusion to the ancient custom of badger-baiting. A badger was kennelled in a tub, where dogs were set upon him to worry him out. When dragged from his tub by his tormentors, the poor beast was allowed to retire to it till he recovered from the attack. This process was repeated several times a day, especially in public-houses, where a badger was kept for the delectation of the customers.

Badger. It is a vulgar error that the legs of a badger are shorter on one side than on the other.

I think that Titus Oates was as uneven as a badger.—Lord Macaulay.

Drawing a badger is drawing him out of his tub by means of dogs.

Badinage. Playful raillery, quizzing. From the French badin (a switch). In France they catch wild ducks by covering a boat with switches, in which the ducks seek protection. A person quizzed is like these wild ducks.

Bad'minton is properly a "copus cup," made of claret spiced and sweetened, a favourite with the duke of Beaufort of Badminton. As the duke used to be a great patron of the prize ring, the "gentlemen of that ilk" use Badminton or claret as the synonym of blood.

Bad'oura. A Chinese princess, who fell in love with prince Camaral'zaman the moment she set eyes on him.—"Arabian Nights," Prince Camaral'zaman.

Bag. Bag and baggage, as "Get away with you, bag and baggage"—i.e., get away, and carry with you all your belongings. The bag or sack is the pouch in which a soldier packs his few articles when he moves from place to place. Baggage is a contemptuous term for a woman, either because soldiers send their wives in the baggage wagons, or from the Italian bagascia (a harlot), French bagasse, Spanish bagazo, Persian bagā.

Got the bag. (See SACK.)

Bags. A slang word for trousers, which are the bags of the body. When the pattern is very staring and "loud," they are called howling bags.

Bag-man. A commercial traveller, who carries a bag with specimens to show to those whose custom he solicits. In former times commercial travellers used to ride a horse with saddle-bags sometimes so large as almost to conceal the rider.

Bag o' Nails. Some hundreds of years ago there stood in the Tyburn Road, Oxford Street, a public-house called "The Bacchanals:" the sign was Bacchus and the Satyrs. The jolly god, with his cloven hoof and his horns, was called "The devil;" and the word Bacchanals soon got corrupted into "Bag o' Nails." The "Devil and the Bag o' Nails" is a sign not uncommon even now in the midland counties.

Bail (French, bailler). To deliver up.

Common bail or bail below. A bail given to the sheriff, after arresting a person, to guarantee that the defendant will appear in court at any day and time the court demands.

Special bail or bail above, consists of persons who undertake to satisfy all claims made on the defendant, and to guarantee his rendering himself up to justice when required; if he fails to do what they guarantee, they undertake to do it themselves.

Bail. (See LEG-BAIL.)

Bailey. The rampart of a castle. (Middle-age Latin, balium or baltium, a corruption of vallum.)

When there were two courts to a castle, they were distinguished as the outer and inner bailey (rampart). Subsequently, the word included the court and all its buildings; and when the court was abolished, the term was attached to the castle, as the Old Bailey (London) and the Bailey (Oxford).

Bailiff. At Constantinople, the person who had charge of the imperial children used to be called the bajulos, from baios, a child. The word was subsequently attached to the Venetian consul at Constantinople, and the Venetian ambassador was called the balio, a word afterwards extended to any superintendent or magistrate. In France the bailli was a superintendent of the royal domains and commander of the troops. In time, any superintendent of even a private estate was so called, whence our farmer's bailiff. The sheriff is the king's bailiff—a title now applied almost exclusively to his deputies or officers. (See BUM-BAILIFF.)

Bailif, Herry. Mine host in Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales." When the poet began the second "Fit" of the "Rime of Sir Thopas," Herry Bailif interrupts him with unmitigated contempt:—

"No m r of this, for Goddes dimitte!"
Quod our host, "for thou makest me
So wery . . . that Mine eerēs aken for thy nasty speeche."
Verse 15,327.

Bairam (2 syl.). The name given to two movable Moslem feasts. The first, which begins on the first day of Lent, and lasts three days, is a kind of Paschal feast. The second occurs seventy days later, and is not unlike the Jewish Feast of Tabernacles.

Bait. Food to entice or allure, as bait for fish. Bait for travellers is a "feed" by way of refreshment taken en passant. (Saxon, butan, to bait or feed.)

Baju'ra. Mahomet's standard.

Baker's Dozen. Thirteen for twelve. When a heavy penalty was inflicted for short weight, bakers used to give a surplus number of loaves, called the inbread, to avoid all risk of incurring the fine.

To give a man a baker's dozen, in slang phraseology, is to give him a sound drubbing—i.e., all he deserves and one stroke more.

Bakshish. A Persian word for a gratuity. These gifts are insolently demanded by all sorts of officials in Turkey, Egypt, and Asia Minor, more as a claim than a gratuity.

Balaam. The earl of Huntingdon, one of the rebels in Monmouth's army.

And, therefore, in the name of dulness, be
The well-hung Balaam.
Dryden, "Absalom and Achitophel."

Balaam. A "citizen of sober fame," who lived hard by the monument of London; "he was a plain, good man; religious, punctual, and frugal," his week-day meal being only "one solid dish." He grew rich; got knighted; seldom went to church; became a courtier; "took a bribe from France;" was hanged for treason, and all his goods were confiscated to the state.—Pope, "Moral Essays," Ep. iii.

Balaam. Matter kept in type for filling up odd spaces in periodicals. These are generally refuse bits—the words of an oaf, who talks like "Balaam's ass."—Numb. xxii. 30. (American.)

Balaam-box, in printers' slang of America, is the place where rejected articles are deposited. (See above.)

Balafré, Le (the gashed). Henri, son of François, second duke of Guise. In the battle of Dormans he received a sword-cut which left a frightful scar on his face. (1550-1588.)

Le Balafré. So Ludovic Lesly, an old archer of the Scottish Guards, is called, in Sir Walter Scott's "Quentin Durdward."

Balak, in the second part of "Absalom and Achitophel," a satire by Dryden and Tate, is meant for Dr. Burnet, author of "Burnet's Own Time."

Bala'm the ox, and the fish Nun, are the food of Mahomet's paradise; the mere lobes of the livers of these animals will suffice for 70,000 saints.—Al Koran.

Balan. A cruel giant in the "Amadis of Gaul."

Balance, according to Martial, is the Latin bilanc or bis-lanc (a couple of dishes or pans).

Balance of power. The states of Europe being so balanced that no one nation shall have such a preponderance as to endanger the independence of another.

Balance of trade. The money-value difference between the exports and imports of a nation.

Baland of Spain. A man of herculean strength, who called himself Fierabras (q.v.).

Bald. Charles le Chauve. Charles I., son of Louis le Débonnaire. (823, 840-877.)

Baldassa're. Chief of the monastery of St. Jacopo di Compostella.—Donizetti's opera "La Favorita."

Balder, the god of peace, was the son of Odin and Frigga. He was killed by the blind war-god Höder, at the instigation of Loki, but restored to life at the general request of the gods. (Scandinavian Mythology.)

N.B.—Sydney Dobell (born 1824) has a poem entitled Balder, published in 1854.

Balderdash. Ribaldry, jargon. (Spanish, balda, a trifle; baldonar, to insult with abuse; Welsh, baldors, to prattle.)

Baldwin. The youngest and comeliest of Charlemagne's paladins; and the nephew of Sir Roland.

Baldwin (in "Jerusalem Delivered"). The restless and ambitious duke of Boioigna, leader of 1,200 horse in the allied Christian army. He was Godfrey's brother; not so tall, but very like him.

Baldwin, the Ass (in the tale of "Reynard the Fox"). In the third part of the Beast-epic he is called "Dr. Baldwin." (Old German, bold friend.)

Bale up. Deliver up, stand and deliver. A phrase imported from the Australian bush-rangers. (French, bailler, to deliver.)

Baliol College, Oxford, founded, in 1263, by John de Baliol, knight (father to Baliel, king of the Scots).

Balios. One of the horses given by Neptune to Peleus on his wedding-day. It afterwards belonged to Achilles.

Balitsa'ma. The realm of Bali, the Indian Pluto.

Balisar'da or Balisardo. Røge'ro's sword, made by a sorceress, and capable of cutting through enchanted substances.

With Balisarda's slightest blow
Nor helm, nor shield, nor cuirass could avail,
Nor strongly-tempered plate, nor twisted mail.
"Orlando Furioso," b. xxiii.

Baliverso (in "Orlando Furioso"). The basest knight in the Saracen army.

Balk means the high ridge between furrows (Saxon and Welsh, bale); hence a rising ground. A balker is one who takes up his position on an eminence to direct herring-fishers.

A balk of timber is a beam running across the ceiling, &c., like a ridge. As the balk is the part not cut by the plough, therefore "to balk" means to leave untouched, or to disappoint.

Balkis. The queen of Sheba or Saba, who visited Solomon.—"Al Koran," c. ii.

Balls. The three golden balls. The emblem of St. Nicholas, who is said to have given three purses of gold to three virgin sisters to enable them to marry.

As the cognisance of the Medici family, it probably represents three golden pills—a punning device on the name. Be this, however, as it may, it is from the Lombard family (the first great money-lenders in England) that the sign has been appropriated by pawnbrokers.

Ballad means, strictly, a song to dance-music, or a song sung while dancing. (Italian, ballare, to dance; our ballet, q.v.)

Ballads. "Let me make the ballads, and who will may make the laws." Andrew Fletcher of Saltoun said to the earl of Cromarty, "I knew a very wise man of Sir Christopher Masgrave's sentiment. He believed, if a man were permitted to make all the ballads, he need not care who should make the laws." (1703.)

Ballet is the recital of some adventure or intrigue by gesture and dancing. Baltazari'ni, director of music to Catharine de' Medici, was the inventor of modern ballets.

Balmung or Gram. The sword of Siegfried, forged by Wieland, the Vulcan of the Scandinavians. Wieland, in a trial of merit, clove Amil'ias, a brother smith, through steel helmet and armour, down to the waist; but the cut was so fine that Amilias was not even aware that he was wounded till he attempted to move, when he fell into two pieces. (Scandinavian Mythology.)

Balmy. "I am going to the balmy"—i. e., to "Balmy sleep;" one of Dick Swiveller's pet phrases.—Dickens, "Old Curiosity Shop."

Balnibar'bi. A land occupied by projectors.—Swift, "Gulliver's Travels."

Baltha'zar. One of the kings of Cologne—i. e., the three Magi, who came from the East to pay reverence to the infant Jesus.

Baltic. The Mediterranean of the north (Swedish, balt; Danish, bælt; Latin, ballæus; English, belt), the belt round the islands in its channel.

Bambi'no. A picture of the infant Jesus, swaddled, and watched by angels. (Italian, bambino, a little boy.)

Bamboc'ciades (pron. *bam-box'-se-aid*s). Grotesque scenes in low life, such as country wakes, penny weddings, and so on. They are so called from the Italian word bamboccio (a cripple), a nickname given to Pieter van Laer, the first Dutch painter of such scenes, distinguished in Rome.

Bamboc'cio or Bamboche. (See MICHAEL-ANGELO DES BAMBOCHES.)

Bamboozle. To cheat by cunning, or daze with tricks. It is a Chinese and gipsy word, meaning to dress a man in bamboos to teach him swimming. Like the bladders used for the same purpose by little wanton boys, the apparatus is dangerous and deceitful.

Bampton Lectures. Founded by the Rev. John Bampton, canon of Salisbury. He left an estate to the university of Oxford, to pay for eight divinity lectures on given subjects, to be preached at Great St. Mary's, and printed afterwards.

Ban is from the Saxon bannan, to proclaim or publish.

Marriage bans. The publication of marriage in church for three successive Sundays by the officiating minister.

To ban is to make a proclamation of outlawry. To banish is to proclaim a man an exile. (See BANDIT.)

Lever le ban et l'arrière ban. To levy the national army by proclamation. In this phrase, the arrière ban is a corruption of heribannum, from herē, an army.

Ban'at. A territory under a ban (lord), from the Illyrian word bojan, a lord. The Turks gave this title to the lords of frontier provinces—hence the Banat of Temēs, which now belongs to Austria.

Banbury. A Banbury-man—i. e., a puritan (Ben Jonson); a bigot. From the reign of Elizabeth to that of Charles II. Banbury was noted for its number of Puritans and its religious "zeal."

As thin as Banbury cheese. In "Jack Drum's Entertainment" we read, "You are like a Banbury cheese, nothing but paring;" and Bardolph compares Slender to Banbury cheese ("Merry Wives," i. 1). The Banbury cheese is a rich milk cheese about an inch in thickness.

Banco. Sittings in Banco. In term time the superior courts of common law sit in banco; that is, the judges thereof occupy their respective benches. (Banc is Italian for "bench" or "seat of justice.")

So much banco—i. e., in bank money. The current money of Hamburg, &c., is inferior to "bank money."

Banda'na. A pocket-handkerchief. It is an Indian word, properly applied to silk goods, but now restricted to cotton handkerchiefs having a dark ground of Turkey red or blue, with little white or yellow spots.

Bandbox. He comes out of a bandbox—i. e., he is so neat and precise, so carefully got up in his dress and person, that he looks like some company dress, carefully kept in a bandbox.

Neat as a bandbox. Neat as clothes folded and put by in a bandbox.

Bande Noire. Properly, the black band; metaphorically, the Vandal Society. Those capitalists that bought up the church property confiscated in the great French Revolution were so called, because they recklessly pulled down ancient buildings and destroyed relics of great antiquity.

Bandit is the French ban dit (pronounced an outlaw). As these outlaws very often became robbers, the term soon came to signify banded highwaymen.

Bands. Clerical bands are a relic of the ancient amice, a square linen tippet tied about the neck of priests during the administration of mass.

Legal bands are a relic of the wide collars which formed a part of the ordinary dress in the reign of Henry VIII., and which were especially conspicuous in the reign of the Stuarts. In the showy days of Charles II. the plain bands were changed for lace ends.

The eighth Henry, as I understand,
Was the first prince that ever wore a band.
Taylor, the Water Poet.

Bandy. I am not going to bandy words with you—i.e., to dispute about words. The reference is to a game called Bandy. The players have each a stick with a crook at the end to strike a wooden or other hard ball. The ball is banded from side to side, each party trying to beat it home to the opposite goal. (Bandy is from "bend;" Saxon, bendan; French, bander; German, binden; Latin, pando; whence "bandy-legged.")

Bang-up, or Slap-bang. First-rate, thumping, as a "thumping legacy," or "thumping baby." It is a slang punning synonym of thumping or striking. Slap-bang is double bang, or doubly striking.

Bango'rian Controversy. A theological paper-war stirred up by a sermon preached March 31, 1717, before George I., by Dr. Hoadley, bishop of Bangor, on the text "My kingdom is not of this world." The best reply is by Law, in a series of "Letters to Hoadley."

Banian Days (Ban-yan). Days when no meat is served to a ship's crew. The term is derived from the Banians, a class of Hindu merchants, who carried on a most extensive trade with the interior of Asia, but being a caste of the Vaisya, abstained from the use of meat. (Sanskrit, banij, a merchant.)

Bank, from the Italian banco (a bench or table). In Greek a money-changer is called trapez'itēs, from trapeza (a four-legged table). In Latin a banker is mensa'rius, from mensa (a table).

Bankrupt. Money-lenders in Italy used to display the money they had to lend out on a banco or bench. When one of these money-lenders was unable to continue business, his bench or counter was broken up, and he himself was spoken of as a bancorotto—i.e., a bankrupt.

Banks' Horse. A learned horse, called Morocco, belonging to one Banks, in the reign of queen Elizabeth. It is said that his shoes were of silver; and one of his exploits was "the ascent of St. Paul's steeple."

Bankside. Part of the borough of Southwark, noted in the time of Shakespeare for its theatres and retreats of the demi-monde.

Ban'natyne Club. A literary club which takes its name from George Ban'natyne, to whose industry we owe the preservation of very much of the early Scotch poetry. It was instituted in 1823 by Sir Walter Scott, and had for its object the publication of rare works illustrative of Scotch history, poetry, and general literature. The club was dissolved in 1859.

Banner means a piece of cloth. (Saxon, fana; Latin, pannus; Welsh, baner; Italian, bandiera; French, bannière.)

An emperor's banner should be sixte foote longe, and the same in breadth; a king's banner five foote; a prince's and a duke's banner, four foote; a marquys's, an erle's, a viscount's, a baron's, and a banneret's banner shall be but three foote square.—Parks.

The banner of the Prophet is called Sanjak-sherif, and is kept in the Eyab mosque of Constantinople.

The two black banners borne before the Califs of the house of Abbas were called Night and Shadow.

The sacred banner of France is the Oriflamme (q.v.).

Banners in churches. These are suspended as thank-offerings to God. Those in St. George's Chapel, Windsor; Henry VII.'s Chapel, Westminster, &c., are to indicate that the knight whose banner is hung up, avows himself devoted to God's service.

Ban'neret. One who leads his vassals to battle under his own banner. A knight made in the field was called a banneret, because the chief ceremony was cutting or tearing off the pointed ends of his banner.

Banns of Marriage. (See BAN.)

Ban'quo. A Scotch general of royal extraction, who obtained several victories over the Highlanders and Danes in the reign of Donald VII. He was murdered by the order of Macbeth, and his ghost haunted the guilty usurper.—Shakespeare, "Macbeth."

Banshee. (See BENSHEE.)

Bantam. A little bantam cock. A little, plucky fellow that will not be bullied by a person bigger than himself. The bantam cock will encounter a dunghill cock five times his own weight, and is therefore said to "have a great soul in a little body." The bantam originally came from Bantam, in Java.

Banting. Doing Banting. Reducing superfluous fat by living on meat diet, and abstaining from beer, farinaceous food, and vegetables, according to the method adopted by William Banting, a London undertaker, once a very fat man (1863).

Bantling. A child. (Irish, bandle-ling, a little two-foot thing.)

Banus. One of Actæon's dogs. (See ASELOS.)

Bap or Bap'homet. An imaginary idol or symbol, which the Templars were said to employ in their mysterious rites. The word is a corruption of Mahomet.

Bap'tes (2 syl.). Priests of the goddess Cotty'to, whose midnight orgies were so obscene that they disgusted even Cotty'to, the goddess of obscenity. They received their name from the Greek verb bapto, to wash, because they bathed themselves in the most effeminate manner.—Juvenal, ii. 91.

Baptist. John the Baptist. His symbol is a sword, the instrument by which he was beheaded.

Barata'ria. Sancho Panza's island-city, over which he was appointed governor. The table was presided over by doctor Pedro Rezio de Ague'ro, who caused every dish set upon the board to be removed without being tasted—some because they heated the blood, and others because they chilled it; some for one ill effect, and some for another; so that Sancho was allowed to eat nothing. The word is from barato (cheap).

The meat was put on the table, and whisked away, like Sancho's inauguration feast at Barataria.—Thackeray.

Barb. An arrow. The feathers under the beak of a hawk were called barb feathers (beard feathers). The point of an arrow has two iron "feathers," which stick out so as to hinder the extraction of the arrow.

Barb. A Barbary steed, noted for docility, speed, endurance, and spirit.

Bar'bari. Quod non fece'runt Bar'bari, fece'runt Barberi'ni (What the barbarians left standing, Barberini contrived to destroy). Pope Barberini robbed the roof of the Pantheon to build the Baldachi'no, or canopy of St. Peter's. It is made entirely of bronze, and weighs ninety tons.

Barbarians is certainly not derived from the Latin barba (a beard), as many suppose, because it is a Greek word, and has many analogous ones (the Chaldee barbar, from bara, means abroad; Irish, barba; Russian, varzar). The Greeks and Romans called all foreigners barbarians (outsiders); the Jews called them Gentiles (other nations); the Russians Ostiaks (foreigners). The reproachful meaning crept in from the natural egotism of man. It is not very long ago that an Englishman looked with disdainful pity on a foreigner, and the French still retain much of the same national exclusiveness.

If I know not the meaning of the voice (words), I shall be unto him that speaketh a barbarian (a foreigner), and he that speaketh will be a barbarian unto me. (1 Cor. xiv. 11.)

Barbarossa (Red-Beard, similar to Rufus). The surname of Frederick I. of Germany. (1121-1190.)

Barbary. St. Barbary, the patron saint of arsenals and powder magazines. Her father delivered her up to Mart'anus, governor of Nicome'dia, for being a Christian. After she had been subjected to the most cruel tortures, her unnatural father was about to strike off her head, when a lightning-flash laid him dead at her feet. Hence, those who invoke saints select St. Barbary in thunderstorms. (See BARBE.)

Road Barbary. The favourite horse of Richard II.

O, how it yearned my heart when I beheld
In London streets that coronation day,
When Bolingbroke rode on roan Barbary!
That horse that thou (Rich. II.) so often hast hestrid,
That horse that I so carefully have dressed.
 Shakespeare, "Richard II.," v. 5.

Bar'bason. A fiend mentioned by Shakespeare in the "Merry Wives of Windsor," ii. 2, and in "Henry V.," ii. 1.

Barbe, Ste. The powder-room in a French ship, so called from St. Barbary, the patron saint of artillery. (See BAR-BARY.)

Bar'becue (3 syl.). A West Indian dish, consisting of a hog roasted whole, stuffed with spice, and basted with Madeira wine. Any animal roasted whole is so called.

Oldfield, with more than harpy throat subdued,
Cries, "Send me, ye gods, a whole hog barbecued!"
Pope, "Imitations of Horace."

Barbéd Steed (a corruption of bardel). A horse in armour. (French, bardé, caparisoned.)

Barbel. Latin, barba (the barbed fish), so called from the dorsal fin, which is armed with a barb or strong spine, having an edge like a saw.

Barber. Every barber knows that (Omni'bus notum ton'soribus.—Hor.). In Rome the tonstri'næ or barbers' shops were the fashionable resort of loungers and idlers. Here every scandal was known, and all the talk of the town was repeated.

Barber Poet. Jacques Jasmin, last of the Troubadours, who was a barber of Gascony. (1798-1864.)

Barber's Pole. The gilt knob at the end represents a brass basin, which is sometimes actually suspended on the pole. The basin has a notch cut in it to fit the throat, and was used for lathering customers who came to be shaved. The pole represents the staff held by persons in venesection; and the two spiral ribbons painted round it represent the two bandages, one for twisting round the arm previous to blood-letting, and the other for binding. Barbers used to be the surgeons, but have fallen from "their high estate" since science has made its voice "to be heard on high."

N.B.—The "barber-surgeons" still retain their ancient "hall" in Monkwell Street, Cripplegate.

Barclayans. (See BERE'ANS.)

Barcoche'bah. Antichrist.

Shared the fall of the Antichrist Barcochebah.
—Ecce Homo.

Bar'desanists. Followers of Bar'desan, founder of the Gnostic sect in the second century.

Bardit. The ancient German chant, which incited to war.

Bardolph. One of Falstaff's inferior officers. Falstaff calls him "the knight of the burning lamp," because his nose was so red, and his face so "full of meteors." He is a low-bred, drunken swaggerer, without principle, and poor as a church mouse.—"Merry Wives," "Henry IV.," i., ii.

We must have better assurance for Sir John than Bardolf's. We like not the security.—Lord Macaulay.

Bards. The oldest bardic compositions that have been preserved are of the fifth century; the oldest existing manuscript is the "Psalter of Cashel," a collection of bardic legends, compiled in the ninth century by Cormac Mac Culinan, bishop of Cashel and king of Munster.

Bard of Avon. Shakespeare, who was born and buried at Stratford-upon-Avon. (1564-1616.)

Bard of Ayrshire. Robert Burns, a native of Ayrshire. (1759-1796.)

Bard of Hope. Thomas Campbell, author of "The Pleasures of Hope." (1777-1844.)

Bard of the Imagination. Mark Akenside, author of "Pleasures of the Imagination." (1721-1770.)

Bard of Memory. Rogers, author of "The Pleasures of Memory." (1762-1855.)

Bard of Olney. Cowper, who resided at Olney, in Bucks, for many years. (1731-1800.)

The Bard of Prose. "He of the Hundred Tales of Love," i.e., Boccaccio. — "Childe Harold," iv. 56.

The Bard of Rydal Mount. William Wordsworth, so called because Rydal Mount was his mountain home. Also called the "Poet of the Excursion," from his principal poem. (1770-1850.)

Bard of Twickenham. Alexander Pope, who resided at Twickenham. (1688-1744.)

Bare. Sailing under bare poles means that the ship has no sail exposed, because the wind is so high.

Barebone's Parliament. The parliament convened by Cromwell in 1653; so called from Praise-God Barebone, a fanatical leader, who overruled it.

Barefooted. Certain monks and nuns, who either for a time or altogether abandoned the use of shoes. The Jews and Romans used to put off their shoes in mourning and public calamities, by way of humiliation. The practice is defended by the command of our Lord to his disciples: "Carry neither purse, nor scrip, nor shoes."—Luke x. 4.

Bar'guest. a frightful goblin, armed with teeth and claws, who passes along the streets at night, making the most horrid shrieks, to scare folks from their sleep. (North of England.)

Barking Dog. A barking dog will never bite. Dogs in their wild state never bark; they howl, whine, and growl, but do not bark. Barking is an acquired habit; and as only domesticated dogs bark, this effort of a dog to speak is no indication of a savage temper.

Bar'laam. A hermit who converted Josaphat, an Indian prince. This Greek romance, entitled Barlaam and Josaphat, was immensely popular in the Middle Ages, and has been erroneously attributed to John Damascene.

Barley-bree. Ale; liquor brewed from barley. (Scotch.)

The cock may crow, the day may daw,
And aye we'll taste the barley bree,
Burns, "Willie Brew'd a Peck o' Maud."

Barleycorn. John or Sir John Barleycorn. A personification of malt liquor; the term has been made popular by Robert Burns.

Inspiring bold John Barleycorn,
What dangers thou canst make us scorn!
Burns.

Barley-mow. A heap of barley housed, or where it is housed. (Saxon, mowe, a heap; Italian, mucchio; Spanish, mucha.)

Bar'mecide (3 syl.). The word is used to express the uncertainty of things on which we set our heart. As the beggar looked forward to a feast, but found only empty dishes; so many a joy is found to be mere illusion when we come to partake of it.

To-morrow! the mysterious, unknown guest
Who cries aloud, 'Remember Bar'mecide!
And tremble to be happy with the rest.'
Longfellow.

Bar'mecide's Feast. A feast where there is nothing to eat; any illusion. Bar'mecide asked Schac'abac, a poor, starving wretch, to dinner, and set before him an empty plate. "How do you like your soup?" asked the merchant. "Excellently well," replied Schac'abac. "Did you ever see whiter bread?" "Never, honourable sir," was the civil answer. Wine was then brought in, and Schacabac was pressed to drink, but excused himself by saying he was always quarrelsome in his cups. Being over-persuaded, he fell foul of his host, and was provided with food to his heart's content. — "Arabian Nights, Barber's Sixth Brother."

Bar'nabas. St. Barnabas Day. June 11. St. Barnabas was a fellow-labourer of St. Paul.

Bar'nabites (3 syl.). An order of monks, so called, because the Church of St. Barnabas, in Milan, was given to them to preach in. They are also called "Canons of St. Paul," because the original society made a point of reading St. Paul's Epistles.

Bar'naby. St. His symbol is a rake, because the 11th of June, St. Barnaby's Day, is the time of hay-harvest.

Barnaby Lecturers. Four lecturers in the University of Cambridge, elected annually on St. Barnabas' Day (June 11), to lecture on mathematics, philosophy, rhetoric, and logic.

Barnaby Rudge. A half-witted lad whose companion is a raven. — Dickens, "Barnaby Rudge."

Bar'nacle. The Solan goose. The strange tales of this creature have arisen from a tissue of blunders. The Latin pernac'ula is a "small limpet," and bernac'ula (Portuguese bernaça, French bar'nacle) is the Scotch hren-clake or "Solan goose." Both words being corrupted into "bar'nacle," it was natural to look for an identity of nature in the two creatures, and the cirri of the limpet were soon found to resemble the feathers of a bird; so it was given out that the goose was the offspring of the limpet. Gerard, in 1636, speaks of "broken pieces of old ships on which is found certain spume or froth, which in time breedeth into shells, and the fish which is hatched therefrom is in shape and habit like a bird."

Bar'nacles. Spectacles, or rather reading-glasses; so called because in shape they resemble the twitchers used by farriers to keep under restraint unruly horses during the process of bleeding, dressing, or shoeing. This instrument, formerly called a barnacle, consisting of two branches joined at one end by a hinge, was fixed on the horse's nose. Dr. Latham considers the word a corruption of binocles (double-eyes).

Barn-burners. A term of reproach given to an American democratic section, supposed to be in sympathy with the Anti-renters.

Barnwell, George. The chief character in a prose tragedy, so called, by George Lillo. He was a London apprentice, who fell in with a wanton in Shore-ditch, named Sarah Millwood, whom he visited, and to whom he gave £200 of his master's money, and ran away. He next robbed his uncle, a rich grazier at Ludlow, and beat out his brains. Having spent the money, Sarah turned him out of doors, and each informed against the other. Sarah Millwood and George Barnwell were both hanged.—Lillo, 1693-1739.

Bard-Devel. The great god of the gypsies. His son is named Alako.

Baron properly means a delt, from the Latin baro (a thorough fool). It was a term applied to a serving-soldier, then to a military chief, and ultimately to a lord. The reverse of this is seen in our word slace (a servile menial), which is the Slavonic word slav (noble, illustrious); but the Slavi being conquered by the Romans, were reduced to the hard condition of "hewers of wood and drawers of water." (See IDIOT.)

The Baron. So Italians call the baron Ricasoli, a first-rate statesman and true patriot. "I know lands (said the baron to the Italian parliament) which Italy has to conquer, but I know no one in Italy who either can or will give up."

Baron Munchausen. Said to be a satire on Bruce, the Abyssinian traveller, to whom the work was dedicated. The author was Raspe, a German fugitive from the officers of justice, living in Cornwall (1785). The chief incidents were compiled from various sources, such as the "Menda'cia Ridic'ula" of J. P. Lange; Lucian's "True History of Things Discovered in the Moon;" "Rabelais;" and the "Folhe'to de Ambas Lis'boa."

Baron of Beef. So called because it is the baron (back part) of the ox, called in Danish the rug. It is not so called because it is "greater" than the sir-loin (q. v.).

Barracks means huts made of the branches of trees (Gaelic, barr, the top of anything; barrach, the top-branches of trees; barrachad, a hut made of branches). Our word is plural, indicative of the whole collection; but the French baraque is singular. (See B.K.S.)

Barrell's Blues. The 4th Foot; so called from the colour of their facings, and William Barrell, colonel of the regiment. (1734-1749.)

Barrica'de (3 syl.). To block up. The term rose in France in 1588, when Henri de Guise returned to Paris in defiance of the king's order. The king sent for his Swiss guards, and the Parisians tore up the pavement, threw chains across the streets, and piled up barrels filled with earth and stones, behind which they shot down the Swiss as they passed through the streets. The French for barrel is barrique, and to barricade is to stop up the streets with these barrels.

The day of the Barricades:

(1.) May 12, 1588, when the people invested the Swiss guards in the Louvre, and forced Henri III. to flee from Paris.

(4.) June 23, 1848, when Affre, Archbishop of Paris, was shot in his attempt to quell the insurrection.

(5.) Dec. 2, 1851, the day of the coup d'état, when Louis Napoleon made his appeal to the people for re-election to the presidency for ten years.

Barrier Treaty. Nov. 5, 1715, by which the Dutch reserved the right of holding garrisons in certain fortresses of the Spanish Netherlands.

Bar'rikin. Jargon words not understood. (Old French, baracan; modern French, baragouin, gibberish.)

Barring-out. A practice of barring the master out of the schoolroom, in order to dictate terms to him. It was once common, but is now numbered with past customs. Miss Edgeworth has a tale so called.

Barrister. One admitted to plead at the bar; one who has been "called to the bar." The bar is the rail which divides the counsel from the audience; tantamount to the rood-screen of a church, which separates the chancel from the rest of the building. Both these are relics of the ancient notion that the laity are an inferior order to the privileged class.

Barrow. A tumulus. It is the same as borough, bury, burg, &c., and means a hill. (Saxon, beorg, a mound.)

A barrow pig. A baronet; so called because he is not looked upon as a nobleman by the aristocracy, nor as a commoner by the people. In like manner a barrow pig is neither male nor female; neither hog or sow.

Barry Cornwall. A nom de plume of Bryan Waller Proctor. It is an imperfect anagram of his name.

Barsa'nians. Heretics which arose in the sixth century. They made their sacrifices consist in taking wheat flour on the tip of their first finger, and carrying it to their mouth.

Barthol'omew, St. The symbol of this saint is a knife, in allusion to the knife with which he was flayed alive.

St. Bartholomew's Day, August 24. Probably Bartholomew is the apostle called "Nathanael" by St. John the Evangelist (i. 45-51).

Bartholomew Fair. Held in West Smithfield (1133-1855) on St. Bartholomew's day.

Massacre of St. Bartholomew. The slaughter of the French Protestants in the reign of Charles IX., begun on St. Bartholomew's day, i.e., between the 24th and 25th August, 1572. It is said that 30,000 persons fell in this dreadful persecution.

A Bartholomew pig. A very fat person. At Bartholomew fair one of the chief attractions used to be a pig, roasted whole, and sold piping hot. Falstaff calls himself

A little tidy Bartholomew boar-pig.—"2 Henry VI.," ii. 4.

Barthram's Dirge (in Sir Walter Scott's "Border Minstrelsy"). J. Noel Paton, in a private letter to me, says: "The subject of this dirge was communicated to Sir Walter as a genuine fragment of the ancient "Border Muse" by his friend Mr. Surtees, who is in reality its author. The ballad has no foundation in history; and the fair lady, her lover, and the nine brothers, are but the creation of the poet's fancy." Mr. Paton adds: "I never painted a picture of this subject, though I have often thought of doing so; the engraving which appeared in the Art Journal was executed without my concurrence from the oil sketch, still, I presume, in the collection of Mr. Pender, the late M.P., by whom it was brought to the Exhibition of the Royal Scottish Academy here" (at Edinburgh). (Nov. 19, 1866.)

Bartol'do. A rich old miser, who died of fear and penurious self-denial. Fazio rifled his treasures, and being accused by his own wife Bianca, was put to death.—Dean Milman, "Fazio."

Bartole (2 syl.). He knows his "Bartole" as well as a cordelier his "Dormi." (French.) Bartole was a lawyer of the 14th century, whose authority amongst French barristers is equal to that of Blackstone with us. The cordeliers were instituted especially for preaching; and the most noted recueil of sermons was a compilation called Dormi, containing the best specimens of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. This compilation was called "Dormi," from the first word in the book. The compilation is anonymous.

Barzill'ai (3 syl.). The duke of Ormond, a friend and staunch adherent of Charles II. The allusion is to Barzillai, who assisted David when he was expelled by Absalom from his kingdom (2 Sam. xvii. 27—29).

Barzillai crowned with honours and with years.....
In exile with his godlike prince he mourned,
For him he suffered, and with him returned.
Dryden, "Absalom and Achitophel."

Bas Bleu. (See BLUE STOCKING.)

Base. The basis, or that on which an animal walks (Greek, baino, to go). The foot is the foundation—hence, base of a pillar, &c. It is also the lowest part, and hence the notion of worthless. Bass in music (Italian, basso) is the lowest part, or the part for the lowest compass of voice.

Bashaw'. An arrogant, domineering man; so called from the Turkish viceroys and provincial governors, each of whom bears the title of basch (pacha).

A three-tailed bashaw. A beglerbeg or prince of princes among the Turks, having a standard of three horse-tails borne before him. The next in rank is the bashaw with two tails, and then the bey, who has only one horse-tail.

Basil'ian Monks. Monks of the order of St. Basil, who lived in the fourth century. This order has produced fourteen popes, 1,805 bishops, 3,010 abbots, and 11,085 martyrs.

Basili'cs or Basil'ica. A digest of laws begun by the Byzantine emperor Basilius in 867, and completed by his son Leo the philosopher in 880.

Basil'ica. Originally the court of the Athenian archon, called the basileus, who used to give judgment in the stoa basil'ios. At Rome these courts of justice had their nave, aisles, porticoes, and tribunals; so that when used for Christian worship very little alteration was needed. The church of St. John Lat'cran at Rome was an ancient basilica.

Basilid'ians. A sect of Gnostic heretics, followers of Basil'idës, who taught that from the unborn Father "Mind" was begotten; from Mind proceeded "The Word;" from the Word or Logos proceeded "Understanding;" from Understanding "Wisdom" and "Power;" from Wisdom and Power "Excellencies," "Princes," and "Angels," the agents which created heaven. Next to these high mightinesses come 365 celestial beings, the chief of whom is Abraxas (q.v.), and each of whom has his special heaven. What we call Christ is what the Basilidians term The first-begotten "Mind."

Basilisco. A braggart; a character in an old play entitled "Soliman and Perseda." Shakespeare makes the Bastard say to his mother, who asks him why he boasted of his ill-birth, "Knight, knight, good mother, Basilisco-like"—i.e., my boasting has made me a knight. —"King John," i. 1.

Basilisk. The king of serpents (Greek, basileus, a king), supposed to have the power of "looking any one dead on whom it fixed its eyes." Hence Dryden makes Clytus say to Alexander,

"Nay, frown not so; you cannot look me dead." This creature is called a king from having on its head a mitre-shaped crest.

Like a boar
Plunging his tusk in mastiff's gore,
Or basilisk, when roused, whose breath,
Teeth, stung, and eyeballs all are death.
King, "Art of Love."

Basilissa. The Venus of the Tarentines.

Baso'chians. French lawyers. When the French parlement ceased to be the council of the king, and confined itself to the administration of justice, a distinction of name became imperative; so the nobles or court party called themselves courtiers, and the lawyers took the name of baso'chians or king's-men, from the Greek basileus (a king).

Basra has 120,000 rivers or streams. —Ebn Haukal.

Basso Reliëvo (rel-i-a'-vo). Low relief (Italian). Figures cut on wood, stone, or marble, with very slight relief —i.e., not much raised. (See ALTO, MEZZO.)

Ba'ste (1 syl.). I'll baste your jacket for you—i.e., cane you. I'll give you a thorough basting—i.e., beating. (Spanish, baston, a stick; Italian, bastone; French, bâton.)

Bastille means simply a building (French, bastir, now bâtir, to build). Charles V. built it as a royal château; Philippe-Auguste enclosed it with a high wall; St. Louis administered justice in the park, under the oak-trees; Philippe de Valois demolished the old château and commenced a new one; Louis XI. first used it as a state prison; and it was demolished by the rabble in the French revolution, July 14, 1789.

Bastina'do. A beating (Italian, bastonnato, from baston, a stick). The Chinese, Turks, and Persians punish offenders by beating them on the soles of the feet. The Turks call the punishment zarb.

Bat. On his own bat. On his own hook; on his own account. A cricketer's phrase.

Bat-horses and Bat-men. Bat-horses are those which carry officers' baggage during a campaign (French, bât, a pack-saddle). Bat-men are those who look after the pack-horses.

Bata'via The Netherlands; so called from the Bata'vi, a Celtic tribe who dwelt there.

Flat Batavia's willowy groves.
Wordsworth.

Bate me an ace. (See BOLTON.)

Bath. Knights of the Bath. This name is derived from the ceremony of bathing, which used to be practised at the inauguration of a knight, as a symbol of purity. The last knights created in this ancient form were at the coronation of Charles II. in 1661. G.C.B. stands for Grand Cross of the Bath (the first class); K.C.B. Knight Commander of the Bath (the second class); C.B. Companion of the Bath (the third class).

King of Bath. Richard Nash, generally called Beau Nash, a celebrated master of the ceremonies at Bath for fifteen years. (1674-1761.)

There, go to Bath with you! Don't talk nonsense. Insane persons used to be sent to Bath for the benefit of its mineral waters. The implied reproof is, what you say is so silly, you ought to go to Bath and get your head shaved.

Bath-kol (daughter of the voice). A sort of divination common among the ancient Jews after the gift of prophecy had ceased. When an appeal was made to Bath-kol, the first words uttered after the appeal were considered oracular.

Bath'sheba. The duchess of Portsmouth, a favourite court lady of Charles II. The allusion is to the wife of Uri'ah the Hittite, criminally beloved by David (2 Sam. xi.). The duke of Monmouth says—

My father, whom with reverence I name,
Charmed into ease, is careless of his fame;
And, bribed with petty sums of foreign gold,
Is grown in Bathsheba's embraces old.
Dryden's "Absalom and Achitophel."

Ba'trachomy'omach'ia. A storm in a puddle; much ado about nothing. The word is the name of a mock heroic poem in Greek, supposed to be by Pi'grès of Caria, and means The Battle of the Frogs and Mice.

Batta or Batty (Hindustanee). Perquisites; wages. Properly, an allowance to East Indian troops in the field. In garrison they are put on half-batta.

Battar, Al (the Trenchant). One of Mahomet's swords, confiscated from the Jews when they were exiled from Medi'na.

Battersea. You must go to Battersea to get your simples cut. A reproof to a simpleton, or one who makes a very foolish observation. The market gardeners of Battersea used to grow simples (medical herbs), and the London apothecaries went there to select or cut such as they wanted.

Battle. Professor Creasy says there are fifteen decisive battles; that is, battles which have decided some political change: 490, Mar'athon; 413, Syracuse; 331, Arbe'la; 207, Metau'rus; the defeat of the Romans by Varus, 9; Chalons, 451; Tours, 732; Hastings, 1066; Joan of Arc's victory at Orléans, 1429; the Arna'da, 1558; Blenheim, 1704; Pultow'a, 1709; Saratoga, 1777; Valmy, 1792; and Waterloo, 1815.

Battle royal. A certain number of cocks, say sixteen, are pitted together; the eight victors are then pitted, then the four, and last of all the two; and the winner is victor of the battle royal. Metaphorically, the term is applied to chess, &c.

Battle scenes. Le Clerc could arrange on a small piece of paper not larger than one's hand an army of 20,000 men.

The Battle-painter or Delle Battaglie. (See MICHAEL ANGELO.)

Battle of the Books. A satire, by dean Swift, on the contention among literary men whether ancient or modern authors were the better. In the battle the ancient books fight against the modern books in St. James's Library.

Battle of the Giants; i.e., the battle of Marignan (Ma-rin'-yan) in 1515, when François I. won a complete victory over 12,000 Swiss, allies of the Milanese.

Battle of the Herrings, in 1428. A sortie made by the men of Orléans, during the siege of their city, to intercept a supply of salt herrings sent to the besiegers.

Battle of the Moat. A skirmish or battle between Mahomet and Abu Sofian (chief of the Koreishites) before Medi'na; so called because the "prophet" had a moat dug before the city to keep off the invaders; and in the moat much of the fighting took place.

Battle of the Standard, in 1138, when the English overthrew the Scotch, at Northallerton, in Yorkshire. The standard was a high crucifix borne by the English on a wagon.

Battle of the Spurs (1302), in which the allied citizens of Ghent and Bruges won a famous victory over the chivalry of France under the walls of Courtray. After the battle more than 700 gilt spurs (worn by French nobles) were gathered from the field.

In English history the battle of Gtinegate (1513) is so called, "because the French spurred their horses to flight, almost as soon as they came in sight of the English troops."

Wager of Battle. One of the forms of ordeal or appeal to the judgment of God, in the old Norman courts of the kingdom. It consisted of a personal combat between the plaintiff and defendant, in the presence of the court itself. Abolished by 59 Geo. III., c. 46.

Battledore (3 syl.) means, properly, a baton or beetle for washing linen by striking on it to knock out the dirt. The plan is still common in France. The word is battre d'eau, or bat d'eau-er (a thing for beating out the water of wet linen). (See B.)

Battles. Rations or "commons" allowed to students at the University of Oxford. A corruption of battens, from the verb batten (to feed).

Battle Bills. Buttery bills at the universities. (See above.)

Baabee. Jenny's baabee. Her marriage portion. The word means, properly, a debased copper coin, equal in value to a halfpenny, issued in the reign of James VI. of Scotland. (French, bas billon, debased copper money.)

Bauble. A fool should never hold a bauble in his hand. "'Tis a foolish bird that fouls its own nest." The bauble was a short stick, ornamented with ass's ears, carried by licensed fools. (French, babiole, a plaything.)

Ba'viad, The. A merciless satire by Gifford on the Della Cruscan poetry, published 1794. The word is from Virgil's "Eclogue," iii. 9.

He may with foxes plough, and milk he-goats,
Who praises Bavius or on Mevius dotes.

Bavie'ca. The Cid's horse.

Ba'vius. Any bad poet. (See BA- VIAD.)

May some choice patron bless each grey goose quill,
May every Bavius have his Bufo still.

Pope, "Prologue to the Satires."

Baxterians. Those who entertain the same religious views as Richard Baxter. The chief points are—(1) that Christ died in a spiritual sense for the elect, and in a general sense for all; (2) that there is no such thing as reprobation; (3) that even saints may fall from grace. Dr. Isaac Watts and Dr. Doddridge held these views.

Bay. The colour of a withered bay leaf.

Bay. The withering of a bay-tree was supposed to be the omen of a death.

'Tis thought the king is dead. We'll not stay—
The bay-trees in our country are withered.
Shakespeare, "Richard II." ii. 4.

Bay. Supposed to be an antidote against thunder, because it was the tree of Apollo. Hence Tiberius and some other of the Roman emperors wore a wreath of bay as an amulet, especially in thunder-storms.—Pliny.

Reach the bays—
I'll tie a garland here about his head;
'Twill keep my boy from lightning.
The White Devil.

Crowned with bays, in sign of victory. The general who obtained a victory among the Romans was crowned with a wreath of bay leaves.

The Queen's Bays. The 2nd Dragoon Guards; so called because they are mounted on bay horses. Now called The Queen's.

Bay Salt is salt of a bay colour. It is the salt of sea-water hardened by the heat of the sun.

Bays's Troops. "Dead men may rise again, like Bays's troops, or the savages in the Fantocini" ("Something New"). In the "Rehearsal," by George Villiers, duke of Buckingham, a battle is fought between foot-soldiers and great hobby-horses. At last Drawcansir kills all on both sides. Smith then asks how they are to go off; to which Bays replies, "As they came on—upon their legs;" upon which they all jump up alive again.

Bayadère (bah-ya-dare). A dancing girl dressed in Eastern costume; so called from the "bajaderes" of India, whose duty is to dance before the images of the gods; but the grandees employ similar dancers for their private amusements. The word is a corruption of the Portuguese bailadeira.

Ba'yard. Le chevalier sans peur et sans reproche. (1476-1524.)

The British Bayard. Sir Philip Sidney. (1554-1584.)

The Polish Bayard. Prince Joseph Poniatowski. (1763-1814.)

Ba'yard. A horse of incredible swiftness, belonging to the four sons of Ay'mon. If only one of the sons mounted, the horse was of the ordinary size; but if all four mounted, his body became elongated to the requisite length. The name is used for any valuable or wonderful horse, and means a "high bay" (bay-ard). — Villeneuve, "Les Quatre-Fils Aymon."

Keep Bayard in the stable—i.e., keep what is of value under lock and key. (See above.)

Bold as blind bayard. Foolhardy. If a blind horse leaps, the chance is he will fall into a ditch. Grose mentions the following expression, To ride bayard of ten toes—"Going by the marrow-bone stage"—i.e., walking.

Bayar'do. The famous steed of Rinaldo, which once belonged to Am'adis of Gaul.

Bayardo's Leap. Three stones, about thirty yards apart, near Sleaford. It is said that Rinaldo was riding on his favourite steed Bayardo, when the demon of the place sprang behind him; but the animal in terror took three tremendous leaps and unhorsed the fiend.

Bayes, in the "Rehearsal" by the duke of Buckingham, was designed to satirise John Dryden, the poet laureate. (See DRAWCANSIR.)

Bayeux Tapestry. Supposed to be the work of Matilda, wife of William the Conqueror. It represents the mission of Harold to the duke, and all the incidents of his history from that event till his death at Hastings in 1066. It is called Bayeux from the place where it is preserved. A drawing, on a reduced scale, of this curious antique is preserved in the Guildhall Library.

Bayle. The dances of the common people were so called in Spain, in opposition to the stately court dances, called danza. The Bayle were of Moorish invention, the most celebrated being La Sarabanda, La Chacona, Las Gambelas, and El Hermano Bartolo.

Bayonet. So called from La Bayonnette, a lower ridge of the Montagne d'Arrhune. A Basque regiment, early in the seventeenth century, running short of powder, stuck their knives into their muskets, and charged the Spaniards with success. It is an error to derive this word from Bayonne.

Bead (Saxon) means a prayer. When little balls with a hole through them were used for keeping account of the number of prayers repeated, the term was applied to them also. (See BEADSMAN.)

St. Cuthbert's Beads. Single joints of the articulated stems of encrinites. They are perforated in the centre, and bear a fanciful resemblance to a cross; hence, they were once used for rosaries (beads). St. Cuthbert was a Scotch monk of the sixth century, and may be called the St. Patrick of the north of England and south of Scotland.

Bead-house. An almshouse for beadsmen.

Bead-roll. A list of persons to be prayed for; hence, also, any list.

Beadle. A person whose duty it is to bid or cite persons to appear to a summons; also a church servant, whose duty it is to bid the parishioners to attend the vestry, or to give notice of vestry meetings. (Saxon, bædel, from beodan, to bid or summon.)

Beadsman or Beadsman. An inhabitant of an almshouse, so called because in Catholic times most charities of this class were instituted that the inmates might "pray for the soul of the founder." (See BEAD.)

Seated with some grey beadsman.

Crabbe, "Borough."

Beak. A magistrate. (Saxon beag, a gold collar worn by civic magistrates.)

Beaker. A drinking glass (German becker, Italian beccar, to swallow.)

Beam. Thrown on my beam-ends—driven to my last shift. A ship is said to be on her beam-ends when she is laid by a heavy gale completely on her beams or sides. Not unfrequently the only means of righting her in such a case is to cut away her masts.

On the starboard beam. A distant point out at sea, on the right-hand side, and at right angles to the keel.

On the larboard beam. A similar point on the left-hand side.

On the weather beam. On that side of a ship which faces the wind.

Bean. Every bean has its black. Nemo sine vitii nascitur, "every one has his faults." The bean has a black eye. (Ogni grano ha la sua semola.)

He has found the bean in the cake, he has got a prize in the lottery, has come to some unexpected good fortune. The allusion is to twelfth cakes in which a bean is buried; when the cake is cut up and distributed, he who gets the bean is the twelfth-night king.

Beans. Property, money. (French, biens, goods.)

Pythagoras forbade the use of beans to his disciples; not the use of beans as a food, but the use of beans for political elections. Magistrates and other public officers were elected by beans cast by the voters into a helmet, and what Pythagoras advised was, that his disciples should not interfere with politics or "love beans"—i. e., office.

Aristotle says the word bean means venery, and that the prohibition to "abstain from beans" was equivalent to "keeping the body chaste."

Beans are in flower, "les fèves fleurissent," and this will account for your being so silly. Our forefathers imagined that the perfume of the flowering bean was bad for the head, and made men silly or light-headed.

Bean Feast. Much the same as Wayz-goose (q. v.), a feast given by an employer to those he employs. The bean-goose is next in size to the Grey Lag goose. The term comes from the northern counties, where the bean (goose) is common.

Bean King. A king elected by ballot. The Greeks used beans in voting by ballot. (See BEANS.)

Bean-King's festival. Twelfth-day, when he who has the bean is king for the night. (See BEAN.)

Bear, in Stock-Exchange slang, is one who bears or forces down the price of stock, in order to make a purchase. A bull is one who tosses or forces it up, in order to sell stock. Dr. Warton says the term came from the proverb of "Selling the skin before you have caught the bear," and referred to those who entered into contracts in the South Sea Scheme to transfer stock at a stated price. It does not seem necessary to go to the proverb for so simple a pun.

So was the huntsman by the bear oppressed,
Whose hide he sold before he caught the beast.
Waller, "Battle of the Summer Islands," c. ii.

The Bear. Albert, margrave of Brandenburg. He was also called "The Fair." (1106-1170.)

The Great Bear and Little Bear. The constellations so called are specimens of a large class of blunders founded on approximate sounds. The Sanskrit arch means "to be bright;" the Greeks corrupted the word into archtos, arktos, which means a bear; so that the "bear" should in reality be the "bright ones." The fable is that Calisto, a nymph of Diana, had two sons by Jupiter, which Juno changed into bears, and Jupiter converted into constellations.

The wind-shaked surge, with high and monstrous mane,
Seems to cast water on the burning bear,
And quench the guards of th' ever-fixed pole.
Shakespeare, "Othello," ii. 1.

'Twas here we saw Calisto's star retire
Beneath the waves, unawed by Juno's ire.
Camoëns, "Lusiad," bk. v.

The Northern Bear. Russia.

A Bridled Bear. A young nobleman under the control of a travelling tutor. (See BEAR-LEADER.)

The bloody Bear, in Dryden's poem called the "The Hind and Panther," means the Independents.

The bloody bear, an independent beast,
Unlicked to form, in groans her hate expressed.
Pt. i.

The Bear and Ragged Staff. A public-house sign in Smithfield, &c., in compliment to Warwick, the king-maker, whose cognisance it was. The first earl was Arth or Arthgal, of the Round Table, whose cognisance was a bear, because arth means a bear (Latin, ursi). Morvid, the second earl, overcame, in single combat, a mighty giant, who came against him with a club, which was a tree pulled up by the roots, but stripped of its branches. In remembrance of his victory over the giant, he added "the ragged staff."

The Bear and the Tea-kettle (Kamschatka). Said of a person who injures himself by foolish rage. One day a bear entered a hut in Kamschatka, where a kettle was on the fire. Master Bruin went to the kettle, and smelling at it burnt his nose; being greatly irritated, he seized the kettle with his paws, and squeezed it against his breast. This, of course, made matters worse, for the boiling water scalded him terribly, and he growled in agony till some neighbours put an end to his life with their guns.

As the bear has no tail, for a lion he'll fail. The same as Nesutor supra crepidam, "let not the cobbler aspire above his last." Robert Dudley, earl of Leicester, being a descendant of the Warwick family, changed his own crest, which was "a green lion with two tails," for the Warwick crest, a "bear and ragged staff." When made governor of the Low Countries, he was suspected of aiming at absolute supremacy, or the desire of being the monarch of his fellows, as the lion is monarch among beasts. Some wit wrote under his crest the Latin verse, "Ursa caret cauda non queat esse leo."

Your bear for lion needs must fail,
Because your true bears have no tail.

Bear-garden. This place is a perfect bear-garden—that is, full of confusion, noise, tumult, and quarrels. Bear-gardens were places where bears used to be kept and baited for public amusement.

Bear's Garlic. A translation of Allium ursinum, a Latin corruption of curs-inon or urs-inon, a hot, pungent onion. (See HORSE.)

Bear-leader. One who undertakes the charge of a young man of rank on his travels. It was once customary to lead muzzled bears about the streets, and to make them show off in order to attract notice and gain money.

Bear! (said Dr. Pangloss to his pupil). Under favour, young gentleman, I am the bear-leader, being appointed your tutor.—G. Colman's "Heir-at-Law."

Beard. Kissing the beard. In Turkey wives kiss their husband, and children their father, on the beard.

To make one's beard (Chaucer). This is the French faire la barbe à quelqu'un, and refers to a barber's taking hold of a man's beard to dress it, or to his shaving the chin of a customer. To make one's beard is to have him wholly at your mercy.

To beard one is to defy him, to contradict him flatly, to insult by plucking the beard. Among the Jews, no greater insult could be offered to a man than to pluck or even touch his beard.

To laugh at one's beard. To attempt to make a fool of a person—to deceive by ridiculous exaggeration.

"By the prophet! but he laughs at our beards," exclaimed the Pacha, angrily. "These are foolish lies."—Marryat, "Pacha of Many Tales."

Tax upon beards. Czar Peter imposed a tax upon beards. Every one above the lowest class had to pay 100 rubles, and the lowest class had to pay a copeck, for enjoying this "luxury." Clerks were stationed at the gates of every town to collect the beard-tax.

Cutting the beard. The Turks think it a dire disgrace to have the beard cut. Slaves who serve in the seraglio have clean chins, as a sign of their servitude.

Bearded Master (Magistrum barbatum). So Persius styled Socrates, under the notion that the beard is the symbol of wisdom. (B.C. 468-399.)

Pogonatus (Bearded). Constantine IV., emperor of Rome. (618-685.)

The Bearded. Geoffrey the Crusader, and Bouchard of the house of Montmorency.

Handsome-beard. Baldwin IV., earl of Flanders. (1160-1186.)

John the Bearded. Johann Mayo, the German painter, whose beard touched the ground when he stood upright.

Bearded Women:

Bartel Grættje, of Stuttgart, born 1562.

The duke of Saxony had the portrait taken of a poor Swiss woman, remarkable for her large, bushy beard.

In 1726 a female dancer appeared at Venice with a large, bushy beard.

Charles XII. had in his army a woman whose beard was a yard and a half long. She was taken prisoner at the battle of Pultowa, and presented to the Czar, 1724.

Mlle. Bois de Chêne, born at Geneva in 1834, was exhibited in London in 1852-3; she had a profuse head of hair, a strong black beard, large whiskers, and thick hair on her arms and back.

Julia Pastrana was exhibited in London in 1857; died, 1862, at Moscow; was embalmed by professor Suckaloff; and the embalmed body was exhibited at 191, Piccadilly. She was found among the Digger Indians of Mexico.

Margaret of Holland had a long, stiff beard.

Bearnais, Le. Henri IV. of France; so called from Le Béarn, his native province. (1553-1610.)

Beasts, heraldic:Couchant, lying down.Counter-passant, moving in opposite directions.Dormant, sleeping.Gardant, full-faced.Issuant, rising from the top or bottom of an ordinary.Nascent, rising out of the middle of an ordinary.Passant, walking.Passant gardant, walking, and with full face.Passant regardant, walking and looking behind.Rampant, rearing.Regardant, looking back.Sejant, seated.Salient, springing.Statant, standing still.

Beastly Drunk. It was an ancient notion that men in their cups exhibited the vicious qualities of beasts. Nash describes seven kinds of drunkards:—

- (1) The Ape-drunk, who leaps and sings;
- (2) The Lion-drunk, who is quarrelsome;
- (3) The Swine-drunk, who is sleepy and puking;
- (4) The Sheep-drunk, wise in his own conceit, but unable to speak;
- (5) The Martin-drunk, who drinks himself sober again;
- (6) The Goat-drunk, who is lascivious; and
- (7) The Fox-drunk, who is crafty, like a Dutchman in his cups. Besides these, there is the Maudlin-drunk, which does not belong to the "beasts," but means the man who weeps with kindness.

Beat. A track, line, or appointed range. A policeman's beat. The man was out of his beat—i.e., his proper appointed walk. It is not in my beat—in my way, in the range of my talents. The word means a beaten path.

To beat in a game of skill does not mean to strike, which is the Saxon beatan, but to be the better, from the Saxon betan (to be the superior).

To beat hollow is to beat wholly.

Dead beat. So completely beaten or vanquished that he is like one dead—there is no longer any fight left in him.

That beats Termagant. Your ranting, raging, pomposity, or exaggeration surpasses that of Termagant (q.v.).

That beats Banagher. Wonderfully inconsistent and absurd—exceedingly ridiculous. Banagher is a town in Ireland, on the Shannon, in the King's County. It formerly sent two members to parliament, and was, of course, a famous pocket borough. When a member spoke of a family borough where every voter was a man employed by the lord, it was not unusual to reply, "Well, that beats Banagher."

Beat. To strike. (Saxon, beatan.)

To beat or drum a thing into one. To repeat, as a drummer repeats his strokes on a drum.

To beat up our supporters. To hunt them up or call them together, as soldiers are by call of drum.

To beat an alarm. To give notice of danger by beat of drum.

To beat a retreat; to beat to arms; to beat a charge. Military terms similar to the above.

To be beat out. To be dog-tired. The allusion is to beating out metal, &c., in order to make it very thin.

Beat. (French, abattre, to abate.)

To beat down. To make a seller "abate" his price.

Beaten to a Mummy. Beaten so that one can distinguish neither form nor feature. Diodorus Siculus says the people of the Balearic Isles "beat with clubs the bodies of the dead, to render them flexible, in order that they may be deposited in earthen pots, called mummæ" (v. I). They beat them to mummocks (pieces).

Beating about the Bush. Not coming directly to the matter in hand, but feeling your way timidly by indirections, as persons beat bushes to ascertain if game is lurking under them.

Beating the Bounds. On Holy Thursday or Ascension Day, it used to be customary for the parish school children, accompanied by the clergyman and parish officers, to walk through their parish from end to end. The boys had willow wands, with which they struck the lines of boundary. Before maps were common, the boys were thus taught to know the bounds of their own parish. The custom still prevails in many parishes.

Beatific Vision. A vision of the blessed in the realms of heaven. Mahomet had such a vision; and so had the apostles Paul and John.

Beatrice. A warm-hearted, witty, capricious, proud beauty, with whom Benedict falls in love.—Shakespeare, "Much Ado about Nothing."

She was not a Lesbia, nor a Beatrice, nor a Laura, nor a Highland Mary, destined to live in song for ever.—The Times.

Beau.

Beau Fielding, called "Handsome Fielding" by Charles II.

Beau Nash. Son of a Welsh gentleman, a notorious diner-out. He undertook the management of the bath-rooms at Bath, and conducted the public balls with a splendour and decorum never before witnessed. In old age he sank into poverty. (1674-1761.)

Beau Brummel. George Bryan. (1778-1840.)

Beau Tibbs, noted for his finery, vanity, and poverty.—In Goldsmith's "Citizen of the World."

Beau Ide'al. The model of beauty or excellency formed by fancy. The statue called the "Apollo Belvidere" is the beau ideal of manly beauty. The Utopia of Sir Thomas More is his beau ideal of a good government. The eclectics, whether in painting, sculpture, architecture, drama, or philosophy, select the beauties of different systems to form a beau ideal after their own conception. (French for ideal beauty.)

Beau Monde. The fashionable world; people who make up the coterie of fashion. (English-French.)

Beau Trap. A loose pavement under which water lodges, and which squirts up filth when trodden on, to the annoyance of the smartly dressed.

Beauclerc (good scholar). Applied to Henry I., who had clerk-like accomplishments, very rare in the time in which he lived. (1068, 1100-1135.)

Beaune's Problem. A problem which entitles Florimond de Beaune, the French mathematician, to be considered the founder of the integral calculus. (1601-1652.)

Beautiful. Beautiful or fair as an angel. Throughout the Middle Ages it was common to associate beauty with virtue, and ugliness with sin; hence the expressions given above, and the following also—"Seraphic beauty," "Cherubic loveliness," "Ugly as sin," &c.

Beautiful Parricide. Beatrice Cenci, the daughter of a Roman nobleman, who plotted the death of her father, because he violently defiled her. (Died 1599.)

Beauty and the Beast. The hero and heroine of M^{me}. Villeneuve's fairy tale. Beauty saved the life of her father by consenting to live with the Beast; and the Beast, being disenchanted by Beauty's love, became a handsome prince, who married her.—Contes Marins, 1740.

Beauty of Buttermere. Mary Robinson, married to John Hatfield, a heartless impostor, executed for forgery at Carlisle in 1803.

Beaver. A hat, so called from its being made of beaver-skins.

Beaver. That part of the helmet which lifted up to enable the wearer to drink. Similarly bever, the afternoon draught in the harvest-field, called fours's. (Italian, bevere, to drink; Spanish, beber; Latin, bibere; French, buvcur, a drinker; Armoric, beurrauh, beverage, &c.)

Bed. The great bed of Ware. A bed twelve feet square, and capable of holding twelve persons; assigned by tradition to the earl of Warwick, the king-maker.

Although the sheet were big enough for the bed of Ware in England.

Shakespeare, "Twelfth Night," iii. 2.

You got out of bed the wrong way, or with the left leg foremost. Said of a person who is patchy and ill-tempered. It was an ancient superstition that it was unlucky to set the left foot on the ground first on getting out of bed. The same superstition applies to putting on the left shoe first, a "fancy" not yet wholly exploded.

Bed of Justice. (See Lit.)

Bed-post. In the twinkling of a bed-post. As quickly as possible. In the ancient bed-frames a movable post or staff was inserted on each side to keep the clothes from falling off. These bed-staffs were sometimes used in self-defence, and in making the bed to beat the feathers. In the reign of Edward I. Sir John Chichester had a mock skirmish with his servant (Sir John with his rapier and the servant with the bed-staff), in which the servant was accidentally killed. Wright, in his "Domestic Manners," shows us a chamber-maid of the seventeenth century using a bed-staff to beat up the bedding. "Twinkling" means a rapid twist or turn. (Old French, guincher; Welsh, gwing, gwingaw, our wriggle.)

I'll do it instantly, in the twinkling of a bed-staff.—Shadwell, "Virtuoso," 1676.

He would have cut him down in the twinkling of a bed-post.—"Rabelais," done into English.

Bobadil, in "Every Man in his Humour," and Lord Duberley, in the "Heir-at-Law," use the same expression.

Be'der. A valley famous for the victory gained by Mahomet, in which "he was assisted by 3,000 angels, led by Gabriel, mounted on his horse Hiazum."—Al Koran.

Beder. Prince of Persia, who marries queen Labè, and turns her into a mare; being restored to her proper shape by the assistance of her mother, she turns Beder into an owl.—Arabian Nights, "Beder, Prince of Persia."

Bedford. Saxon, Bede-an-forda (fortress ford)—that is, the ford at the fortress of the river Ouse.

Bedfordshire. I am off to Bedfordshire, i.e., to bed. A similar pun is "to the land of Nod."

Bed'iver. A knight of the Round Table, and the butler of king Arthur.

Bedlam. A lunatic asylum or mad-house; a contraction for Bethlehem, the name of a religious house in London, converted into a hospital for lunatics.

Tom o' Bedlam. (See TOM.)

Bedlamite (3 syl.). A madman, a fool, an inhabitant of a Bedlam.

Bedouins (Bed-wins). The homeless street poor are so called. Thus the Times calls the ragged houseless boys "the Bedouins of London." The Bedouins are the nomadic tribes of Arabia.

Bed'reddin' Hassan, in the story of "Nour'eddin' and his Son," in the "Arabian Nights."

Comparing herself to Bedreddin Hassan, whom the vizier . . . discovered by his superlative skill in composing cream-tarts with pepper in them.—Scott, "Heart of Midlothian."

Bee. The Athenian Bee. Plato, so called from the sweetness of his style. (B.C. 429-348.)

The Bee of Athens. Sophocles, the tragic poet. (B.C. 495-405.)

Bee. You have a bee in your bonnet; your head is full of bees; full of devices, crotchets, fancies, inventions, and dreamy theories. The connection between bees and the soul was once generally maintained; hence Mahomet admits bees to Paradise. Porphyry says of fountains they are "adapted to the nymphs, or those souls which the ancients called bees." The moon was called a bee by the priestesses of Cerès, and the word lunatic or moon-struck still means one with "bees in his head." (See MAGGOT.) Spenser, describing the human body, refers to the bees and flies in the chamber of Fantasy:—

And all his chamber fill'd was with flies,
Which buzzed about him
Like many swarms of bees . . .
These flies are idle thoughts and fantasies,
Devices, dreams, opinions, schemes unsound . . .
"Faëry Queen," bk. ii.

To have a bee in your bonnet, is, also, to carry a jewel or ornament in your cap; from the Anglo-Saxon, beigh. (See above.)

Bees. In the empire of France the royal mantle and standard have both been thickly sown with golden bees, instead of Louis flowers, because more than 300 golden bees were found in the tomb of Childeric, when it was opened in 1653. The modern opinion is that what we call a fleur de lis is a bee with its wings outstretched. (See FLEUR DE LIS.)

Beef, Ox. The former is Norman, and the latter Saxon. The Normans had the cooked meat, and when set before them used the word they were accustomed to. The Saxon was the herdsman, and while the beast was under his charge called it by its Saxon name.

Old Alderman Ox continues to hold his Saxon title while he is under the charge of serfs and bondsmen; but becomes Beef, a fiery French gallant, when he arrives before the worshipful jaws that are destined to consume him.—Loamhoe.

Weaver's beef of Colchester—i.e., sprats, caught abundantly in the neighbourhood.—Faller, "Worthies."

Beef-eaters. Yeomen of the Guard; so called because they used to watch the buffet, and hence were called buffetiers or bouffitiers in Norman-French—i.e., "waiters at the side-board."

Beef-steak Club owed its origin to an accidental dinner taken by lord Peterborough in the scene-room of Rich, over Covent Garden Theatre. The original gridiron on which Rich broiled the peer's steak is still preserved in the palladium of the club, and the members have it engraved on their buttons.—History of the Clubs of London.

N.B.—The club is still held at the Lyceum Theatre.

Beefington or Milor Beefington, introduced in "The Rovers." Casimere is a Polish emigrant, and Beefington an English nobleman, exiled by the tyranny of king John.

"Will without power," said the sagacious Casimir to Milor Beefington, "is like children playing at soldiers."—Macaulay.

Beelzebub. God of flies, supposed to ward off flies from his votaries. One of the gods of the Philistians. (See ACHOR.) The Greeks had a similar deity, Zeus Apomyios. The Jews, by way of reproach, changed Beelzebub into Balzebul (god of dung), and placed him among the demons. Milton says he was next in rank to Satan, and stood "with Atlantean shoulders, fit to bear the weight of mightiest monarchies." (Bk. ii.)

One next himself in power, and next in crime,
Long after known in Palestine, and named Beelzebub. "Paradise Lost," i.

Beer. (See ALE.)

Beetle-crusher. A large, flat foot. The expression was first used in Punch, in one of Leech's caricatures. Those who know London, know how it is overrun with black-beetles or cockroaches.

Beff'na. The good fairy of German children, who is supposed to fill their stockings with toys when they go to bed on Twelfth night. Some one enters the children's bedroom for the purpose, and the wakeful youngsters cry out, "Ecco la Beff'na." According to legend, Beffana was too busy with house affairs to look after the Magi when they went to offer their gifts, and said she would wait to see them on their return; but they went another way, and Beffana every Twelfth night watches to see them. The name is a corruption of Epiphania.

Beggars. King of the Beggars. Bampfylde Moore Carew. (1693-1770.)

Beggar's Bush. To go by beggar's bush (or) Go home by beggar's bush—i.e., to go to ruin. Beggar's bush is the name of a tree which once stood on the left hand of the London road from Huntingdon to Caxton, so called because it was a noted rendezvous for beggars. These punning phrases and proverbs are very common.

Beggar's Daughter. Bessee, the beggar's daughter of Bednall Green. Bessee was very beautiful, and was courted by four suitors at once, a knight, a gentleman of fortune, a London merchant, and the son of the innkeeper at Romford. She told them that they must obtain the consent of her father, the poor blind beggar of Bethnal Green. When they heard that, they all slunk off, except the knight, who went to ask the beggar's leave to wed the "pretty Bessee." The beggar gave her £3,000 for her dower, and £100 to buy her wedding gown. At the wedding feast he explained to the guests that he was Henry, son and heir of Sir Simon de Montfort. At the battle of Evesham, the barons were routed, Montfort slain, and himself left on the field for dead. A baron's daughter discovered him, nursed him with care, and married him; the fruit of this marriage was "pretty Bessee." Henry de Montfort assumed the garb and semblance of a beggar to escape the vigilance of king Henry's spies.—Percy's "Reliques."

Begging Hermits were of the Augustine order; they renounced all property, and lived on the voluntary alms of "the faithful."

Begging the Question. Assuming a proposition, which, in reality, involves the conclusion. Thus, to say that parallel lines will never meet because they are parallel, is simply to assume as a fact the very thing you profess to prove. The phrase is a translation of the Latin term, petitio principii, and was first used by Aristotle.

Beghards. A religious order of St. Francis established at Antwerp in 1228, and so named from St. Beghe, their patroness.

Begtash'i. A religious order in the Ottoman empire, which had its origin in the fourteenth century. The word is derived from Hadji Begtash, a dervise, its founder.

Beguines (Beg-wins). The earliest of all lay societies of women united for religious purposes. So called from their beguin, or linen cap.

Behe'moth (Hebrew). The hippopotamus, once thought to be the rhinoceros. (See Job xl. 15.)

Behold! in plaited mail,
Behe'moth rears his head. Thomson.

Behesth. The Elysian fields of Persian mythology.

Beh'menists. A sect of visionary religionists, so called from Jacob Behmen, their founder. (1575-1625.)

Behram. The most holy kind of fire, according to Parseeism. (See ADARAN.)

Be'jan. A freshman or greenhorn. This term is employed in the French and Scotch universities, and is evidently a corruption of bec jaune (yellow beak), a French expression to designate a nestling or unfledged bird. In the university of Vienna the freshman is termed beanus, and in France footing-money is bejania.

Bel Esprit (French). A vivacious wit; a man or woman of quick and lively parts, ready at repartee. (Plural, beaux esprits.)

Belch. Sir Toby Belch. A reckless, roistering, jolly knight of the Elizabethan period. — Shakespeare, "Twelfth Night."

Belcher. A pocket-handkerchief—properly, a blue ground with white spots. So called from Jim Belcher, the pugilist who adopted it.

Beldam. An old woman; literally, a "beautifful lady." The French also use belle age for old age.

Old men and beldams in the streets
Do prophesy upon it dang'rously.
Shakespeare, "King John," iv. 2.

Bel'enus. The Apollo of the Druids.

Bele'ses (3 syl.). A Chaldean soothsayer and Assyrian satrap, who told Arba'cès, governor of Media, that he would one day sit on the throne of Sardanapalus, king of Nineveh and Assyria. His prophecy was verified, and he was rewarded by Arba'cès with the government of Babylon. — Byron, "Sardanapalus."

Bel'ford. A friend of Lovelace, in Richardson's "Clarissa Harlow." These "friends" made a covenant to pardon every sort of liberty which they took with each other.

Belfry. A military tower, pushed by besiegers against the wall of a besieged city, that missiles may be thrown more easily against the defenders. (Greek belos, a missile, and phreo, to dart forth.) Probably a church steeple is called a belfry from its resemblance to these towers, and not because bells are hung in it.

Belial (Hebrew). The worthless or lawless one—i.e., the devil. Milton, in his pandemonium, makes him a very high and distinguished prince of darkness. — Paradise Lost.

What concord hath Christ with Belial?—2 Cor. vi. 15.

Belial came last—than whom a spirit more lewd
Fell not from heaven, or more gross to love
Vice for itself.

Milton, "Paradise Lost," bk. ii.

Sons of Belial. Lawless, worthless, rebellious people. (See above.)

Now the sons of Eli were sons of Belial.—1 Sam. ii. 12.

Belin'da. The heroine of Pope's heroï-comical poem, entitled the "Rape of the Lock." The poem is based on a real incident:—Lord Petre cut off a lock of Miss Fermor's hair, and this liberty gave rise to a bitter feud between the two noble families. The poet says that Belinda wore on her neck two curls, one of which the baron cut off with a pair of scissors borrowed of Clarissa. Belinda, in anger, demanded back the ringlet; but it had flown to the skies and become a meteor, which "shot through liquid air, and drew behind a radiant trail of hair."

If to her share some female errors fall,
Look on her face, and you'll forget them all.
Canto ii.

Belinun'cia. A herb sacred to Belis, with the juice of which the Gauls used to poison their arrows.

Belisa'ma (queen of heaven). The supreme goddess of the Gauls.

Belisarius. Belisarius begging for an obolus. Belisarius, the greatest of Justinian's generals, being accused of conspiring against the life of the emperor, was deprived of all his property; and his eyes being put out, he lived a beggar in Constantinople. The tale is that he fastened a bag to his road-side hut, and had inscribed over it—"Give an obolus to poor old Belisarius." This tradition is of no historic value.

Bell. Acton, Currer, and Ellis. Assumed names of Anne, Charlotte, and Emily Brontë.

Bell, The Giant. (See BELLE.)

In spite of bell, book, and candle—i.e., in spite of all the opposition which the Christian hierarchy can offer. (See CURSING.)

Of the students, 233, in spite of bell, book, and candle, are Catholics.—The Times.

Bell, book, and candle shall not drive me back.
King John, iii. 3.

Who is to bell the cat?—who will risk his own life to save his neighbours? Any one who encounters great personal hazard for the sake of others undertakes to "bell the cat." The allusion is to the fable of the cunning old mouse, who suggested that they should hang a bell on the cat's neck to give notice to all mice of her approach. "Excellent," said a wise young mouse, "but who is to undertake the job?" (See BELL-THE-CAT.)

Is there a man in all Spain able and willing to bell the cat (i.e., persuade the queen to abdicate).—The Times.

To bear the bell. To be first fiddle; to carry off the palm; to be the best. Before cups were presented to winners of horse-races, &c., a little gold or silver bell used to be given for the prize.

Jockey and his horse were by their masters sent, To put in for the bell.
They are to ran, and cannot miss the bell.
North's "Forest of Varieties."

Ringing the hallowed bell. Bells were believed to disperse storms and pestilence, drive away devils, and extinguish fire. In France it is still by no means unusual to ring church bells to ward off the effects of lightning. Nor is this peculiar to France, for even in 1852 the bishop of Malta ordered the church bells to be rung for an hour, to "lay a gale of wind" Of course, the superstitious efficacy of a bell resides in its having been consecrated.

Fu'era plango, fu'zura frango, sab'bata pango,
Exer'to lentos, dis'sipo ven'tos, paco cruentos.

Death's tale I tell, the winds dispel, ill-feeling quell,
The slothful shake, the storm-clouds break, the sab-bath wake.

Tolling for church. A relic of the Ave Bell, which, before the Reformation, was tolled before service to invite worshippers to a preparatory prayer to the Virgin.

The Passing Bell is the hallowed bell which used to be rung when persons were in extremis, to scare away evil spirits, which were supposed to lurk about the dying to pounce on the soul while "passing from the body to its resting-place." A secondary object was to announce to the neighbourhood the fact that all good Christians might offer up a prayer for the safe passage of the dying person into Paradise. We now call the bell rung at a person's decease the "passing bell."

The Athenians used to beat on brazen kettles at the moment of a decease to scare away the Furies.

Bells. The Koran says that bells hang on the trees of Paradise, and are set in motion by wind from the throne of God, as often as the blessed wish for music.—Salé.

Bells as musical
As those that, on the golden-shafted trees
Of Eden, shook by the eternal breeze.

T. Moore, "Lalla Rookh," part 1.

The sweet bells of his intellect are jangled, out of tune ("Hamlet," iii. 1). A most exquisite metaphor for a deranged mind, such as that of Don Quixote.

Ringing the bells backwards, is ringing a muffled peal. Backwards is often used to denote "in a contrary direction" (tout le contraire), as, "I hear you are grown rich."—"Yes, backwards." To ring a muffled peal, is to ring a peal "over the left."

I'll not hang all my bells on one horse; I'll not leave all my property to one son. The allusion is manifest.

Give her the bells and let her fly. Don't throw good money after bad; make the best of the matter, but do not attempt to bolster it up; pay the fellow his wages, and dismiss him. When a hawk was worthless, the bells were taken off, and the bird was suffered to escape; but the advice given above is to "leave the bells," and let the hawk go.

At three bells, at five bells, &c. A term on board ship pretty nearly tantamount to our expression o'clock. Five out of the seven watches last four hours, and each half-hour is marked by a bell, which gives a number of strokes corresponding to the number of half-hours passed. Thus, "three bells" denotes the third half-hour of the watch, "five bells" the fifth half-hour of the watch, and so on. The two short watches, which last only two hours each, are from four to six and six to eight in the afternoon. (See WATCH.)

Do you there hear? Clean shirt and a shave for muster at five bells.—Easil Hall.

Bell of Patrick's Will (clog an eadhachta Phatraic) is six inches high, five broad, and four deep. It certainly was in existence in the sixth century. In the eleventh century a shrine was made for it of gold and silver filigree, adorned with jewels.

Bell Savage. A contraction of Isabelle Savage, who originally kept the inn. It is somewhat remarkable that the sign of the inn was a pun on the Christian name, a "bell on the Hope" (hoop), as may be seen in the Close Roll of 1453. The hoop seems to have formed a garter or frame to most signs.

They now returned to their inn, the famous Bell Savage.—Scott, "Kenilworth," xiii.

Bell-the-Cat. Archibald Douglas, earl of Angus, was so called. James III. made favourites of architects and masons; one mason, named Cochrane, he created earl of Mar. The Scotch nobles held a council in the church of Lauder for the purpose of putting down these upstarts, when lord Gray asked, "Who will bell the cat?" "That will I," said Douglas, and he fearlessly put to death in the king's presence the obnoxious minions. (See BELL.)

Bella Wilfer. A lovely, laughing, wilful, spoilt darling, who loves every one, and whom every one loves. She marries John Rokesmith. Bella Wilfer is one of the most charming characters of fiction.—Dickens, "Mutual Friend."

Belladonna (Italian, beautiful lady). This shade was given to the Deadly Nightshade, from a practice once common among ladies of touching their eyes with it to make the pupils large and lustrous.

Bell'aston, Lady. A profligate, whose conduct and conversation are a life-like photograph of the court "beauties" of Louis XV.—Fielding, "Tom Jones."

Belle. A beauty. The belle of the room, the most beautiful lady in the room. (French.)

He leaps like a Belle giant, i.e., tells the most marvellous stories. It is said that a giant named Belle mounted his sorrel horse at a place since called "Mount Sorrel;" he leaped a mile, and the spot on which he lighted was called "One-leap" (Wanlip); thence he leaped another mile, but in so doing burst all his girths, whence the spot was called "Burstall." Once more he leaped a mile, but died from over-exertion, and the spot of his death and interment was called "Belle grave."

La belle France. A common French phrase applied to France, as "Merry England" is to our own country.

Belle de Nuit (beauty of the night). A species of convolvulus which blooms only after sunset.

Belles Lettres. Polite literature. (French.)

Bellefontaine, Benedict. The most wealthy farmer of Grand Pré (Nova Scotia), and father of Evangeline. When the inhabitants of his village were exiled, and he was about to embark, he died of a broken heart, and was buried on the sea-shore.—Longfellow, "Evangeline."

Bellerophon. The Joseph of Greek mythology, Antæa, the wife of Prætos, being the "Potiphar's wife" who tempted him, and afterwards falsely accused him. Being successful in various enterprises, he attempted to fly to heaven on the winged horse Pegasus, but Zeus sent a gad-fly to sting the horse, and the rider was overthrown.

Letters of Bellerophon. Letters or other documents either dangerous or prejudicial to the bearer. Prætos sent Bellerophon with a letter to the king of Lycia, his wife's father, recounting the charge, and praying that the bearer might be put to death.

Pausanias, the Spartan, sent messengers from time to time to king Xerxes, with similar letters; the discovery by one of the bearers proved the ruin of the traitor.

Belle'rus. Belle'rium is the Land's End, Cornwall, the fabled land of the giant Belle'rus.

Sleep'st by the fable of Belle'rus old.
Milton, "Comus."

Bellin. The ram, in the tale of "Reynard the Fox." The word means gentleness. Grimm says bel lenitas, placiditas. (Deutsch Mythology.)

Bellisant. Sister to king Pepin of France, wife of Alexander, emperor of Constantinople. Being accused of infidelity, the emperor banished her, and she became the mother of Valentino and Orson.—Valentine and Orson.

Bellman. Before the new police force was established, watchmen or bellmen used to parade the streets at night, and at Easter a copy of verses was left at the chief houses, under the hope of obtaining an offering. These verses were the relics of the old incantations sung or said by the bellman to keep off elves and hobgoblins.

Bello'na. Goddess of war and wife of Mars. (Roman Mythology.)

Her features, late so exquisitely lovely, inflamed with the fury of frenzy, resembled those of a Bellona.—Sir Walter Scott.

Bellwether of the Flock. A jocos and rather depreciating term applied to the leader of a party. Of course, the allusion is to the wether or sheep which leads the flock with a bell fastened to its neck.

Belly. The belly has no ears. A hungry man will not listen to advice or arguments. The Romans had the same proverb, Venter non habet aures; and in French, Ventre affame n'a point d'oreilles.

The belly and its members. The fable of Menenius Agrippa to the Roman people when they seceded to the Sacred Mount: "Once on a time the members refused to work for the lazy belly; but as the supply of food was thus stopped, they found there was a necessary and mutual dependence between them." Shakespeare introduces the fable in his "Coriolanus," i. 1.

Belomancy (Greek). Divination by arrows. Labels being attached to a given number of arrows, the archers let them fly, and the advice on the label of the arrow which flies furthest is accepted and acted on. This practice is common with the Arabs.

Beloved Disciple. St. John. (John xiii. 23, &c.)

Beloved Physician. St. Luke. (Col. iv. 14.)

Belphe'gor. A nasty, licentious, obscene fellow. Bel Phe'gor was a Moabitish deity, whose rites were celebrated on mount Phe'gor, and were noted for their obscenity. The Standard, speaking of certain museums in London, says, "When will men cease to be deluded by these unscrupulous Belphe'gors?"

Belphe'be, meant for queen Elizabeth. She was sister of Am'oret. Equally chaste, but of the Diana and Minerva type. Cold as an icicle, passionless, immovable. She is a white flower without perfume, and her only tender passion is that of chivalry. Like a moonbeam, she is light without warmth. You admire her as you admire a marble statue. She is one of those strong-minded and correct virgins who would go to a battle-field and nurse her dying lover with propriety.—Spenser, "Faery Queen," book iii.

Bel'tane (2 syl.). A festival observed in Ireland on June 21, and in some parts of Scotland on May-day. A fire is kindled on the hills, and the young people dance round it, and feast on cakes made of milk and eggs. It is supposed to be a relic of the worship of Baal. The word is Gaelic, and means Bel's fire; and the cakes are called beltane-cakes.

Belted Knight. The right of wearing belt and spurs was restricted to knights. Even to the present day knights of the shire are "girt with a belt and sword," when the declaration of their election is officially made.

Belted Will. Lord William Howard, warden of the western marches. (1563-1640.)

His Bilboa blade, by marchmen felt,
Hung in a broad and studded belt;
Hence, in rude phrase, the borderers still Called noble Howard Belted Will.—Scott.

Beltene'bros. Am'adis of Gaul so calls himself after he retires to the Poor Rock. His lady-love is Oria'na.—"Amadis de Gaul," ii. 6.

Belvedere (bel-ve-dear). A sort of pleasure-house or look-out on the top of a house. The word is Italian, and means a fine prospect.

Belvide'ra (in Otway's "Venice Preserved"). Sir Walter Scott says, "More tears have been shed for the sorrows of Belvide'ra and Monimia than for those of Juliet and Desdemona."

And Belvidera pours her soul in love,
Thomson, "Winter."

Be'ly. A famous Indian giant.

Bemuse (2 syl.). To get into a dreamy, half intoxicated state.

Bemusing himself with beer.—Sala, "Gaslight and Daylight."

Ben. The Neptune of the Saxons.

Big Ben of Westminster. A name given to the large bell, which weighs 13 tons 10 cwt., and is named after Sir Benjamin Hall, the chief commissioner of works when the bell was cast. (1856.)

Ben Jochanan', in the satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," by Dryden and Tate, is meant for the Rev. Samuel Johnson, who suffered much persecution for his defence of the right of private judgment.

A Jew (Englishman) of humble parentage was he;
By trade a Levite (clergyman), though of low degree.
Part ii.

Bena'cus, i. e., the Lago di Gardë.

Benai'ah (3 syl.), in the satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," by Dryden and Tate, is meant for George Edward Sackville, called General Sackville, a gentleman of family, and a zealous partisan of the duke of York. Benai'ah was captain in David's army, and was made by Solomon generalissimo. (1 Kings ii. 35.)

Nor can Benai'ah's worth forgotten lie,
Of steady soul when public storms were high;
Whose conduct, while the floors fierce onsets
made,
Secured at once our honour and our trade.
Part ii.

Bena'res (3 syl.). One of the "most holy" cities of the Hindus, equally revered by them as Mecca is by the Mahometans.

Benbo, Admiral, in an engagement with the French near St. Martha, on the Spanish coast, in 1701, had his legs and thighs shivered into splinters by a chain-shot, but, supported in a wooden frame, he remained on the quarter-deck till morning, when Du Casse bore away. Almeyda, the Portuguese governor of India, in his engagement with the united fleet of Cambaya and Egypt, had his legs and thighs shattered in a similar manner; but, instead of retreating, had himself bound to the ship's mast, where he "waved his sword to cheer on the combatants," till he died from loss of blood.

Whirled by the cannon's rage, in shivers torn,
His thighs far shattered o'er the waves are borne;
Bound to the mast the god-like hero stands;
Waves his proud sword and cheers his woful bands;
Though winds and seas their woe and deny,
To yield he knows not, but he knows to die.
Camoens, "Lusiad," bk. x.

Benbow. A sot, generous, free, idle, and always hanging about the ale-house. He inherited a good estate, spent it all, and ended life in the workhouse. The tale is in Crabbe's "Borough."

Benbow, a boon companion, long approved
By jovial sets, and (as he thought) beloved,
Was judged as one to joy and friendship prone
And deemed injurious to himself alone.
Letter xvi.

Bench. Bench of bishops. The whole body of English prelates, who sit together on a bench in council.

Bench and Bar. Judges and pleaders. The bench is the seat on which a judge sits. The bar of a court was formerly a wooden barrier, to separate the superior from the lower pleaders. The inferior counsel used to sit outside the barrier, and were called outer barristers; but the superior sat within the barrier, and were termed inner barristers. The bar does not now exist, but the serjeants and queen's counsels sit in the front rows, and the juniors behind.

Benchers. Senior members of the Inns of Court; so called from the bench on which they used to sit. They exercise the function of calling students to the bar, and even claim the right of expelling the obnoxious.

Bend Sinister. He has a bend sinister. He was not born in lawful wedlock. In heraldry, a band running from the upper right-hand corner to the lower left-hand corner (as the shield appears before you on paper) is called a bend-sinister, and indicates bastardy.

Ben'demeer'. A river that flows near the ruins of Chil'minar' or Istachar', in the province of Chusistan' in Persia.

There's a bower of roses by Bendmeer's stream,
And the nightingale sings round it all the day long.

T. Moore, "Lalla Rookh," part i.

Bender. Sixpence; so called because it is easily bent.

Ben'digo. A rough fur cap, named from a noted pugilist.

Benedicite (5 syl.) is two words, benedici te (bless you).

Ben'edick. A young lord of Padua who vows celibacy, but falls in love with Beatrice, whom he marries.—Shakespeare, "Much Ado About Nothing."

Be'nedict. A married man ; from the Latin, benedict-us (a happy man), and a skit on the order of St. Benedict, famous for their ascetic habits, and, of course, rigidly bound to celibacy. Shakespeare, in "Much Ado About Nothing," avails himself of this joke in making Bendick, the young lord of Padua, "rail against marriage," but afterwards marry Beatrice, with whom he falls in love.

Benedictines (4 syl.). Monks who follow the rule of St. Benedict, viz., implicit obedience, celibacy, abstaining from laughter, spare diet, poverty, the exercise of hospitality, and unremitted industry.

Ben'efice (3 syl.). Under the Romans, certain grants of lands made to veteran soldiers were called beneficia, and in the Middle Ages an estate held ex mero beneficio of the donor was called "a benefice." When the popes assumed the power of the feudal lords with reference to ecclesiastical patronage, a "living" was termed by them a benefice held under the pope as superior lord. This assumption roused the jealousy of France and England, and was stoutly resisted.

Benefit of Clergy. Exemption of the clerical order from civil punishment, based on the text, "Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm" (1 Chron. xvi. 22). In time it comprehended not only the ordained clergy, but all who, being able to write and read, were capable of entering into holy orders. This law was abolished in the reign of George IV.

Ben'en-ge'li. (See HAMET.)

Benêt (French). A simpleton, so called from the benêt or exorcist of the Roman Catholic Church, whose office is to cast out evil spirits by eau benêt (holy water) or water from the "benetoire."

Benevolence. A "forced" gratuity, under the excuse of a loan, exacted by some of the Plantagenet kings. It was declared illegal by the Bill of Rights in 1689.

Benev'olus, in Cowper's "Task," is John Courtney Throckmorton, of Weston Underwood.

Bengal Tigers. The 17th Foot, whose badge is a green tiger.

Bengalese (3 syl.). A native of Bengal.

Benicia Boy. John C. Heenan, the American pugilist, who challenged and fought Tom Sayers for "the belt" in 1860; so called from Benicia, in California, his birth-place.

Benjamin. The pet, the youngest-Queensland is the Benjamin of our colonial possessions. The allusion is to Benjamin, the youngest son of Jacob (Gen. xxxv. 18).

Benjamin. A smart coat ; so called from a tailor of the name, and rendered popular by its association with Joseph's "coat of many colours."

Benjamin's Mess. The largest share. The allusion is to the banquet given by Joseph, viceroy of Egypt, to his brethren. "Benjamin's mess was five times so much as any of theirs." (Gen. xliii. 34.)

Benshie, Benshee, or Banshee. Each Highland family has a domestic spirit, called a Benshie, who takes a lively interest in its prosperity, and intimates approaching disaster or death by wailings and shrieks (Irish Celtic, ben, "woman," and sighe, "fairy"). The Scottish Bodach Glay, or "Grey Spectre," is a similar superstition.

Bent. Inclination ; talent for something. Out of my bent, not in my way, not in the range of my talent. Bent on it, inclined to it. As a thing bent is inclined, so a bent is an inclination or bias. Genius or talent is a bent or bias.

They fool me to the top of my bent—i.e., as far as the bow can be bent without snapping.—"Hamlet," iii. 2.

Benvolio. Nephew to Montague, a testy, litigious gentleman, who would "quarrel with a man that had a hair more or a hair less in his beard than he had." Mercutio says to him, "Thou hast quarrelled with a man for coughing in the street, because he hath wakened thy dog that hath lain asleep in the sun."—Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet," iii. 1.

Beppo. The contraction of Guiseppè, and therefore equal to our Joe. Husband of Laura, a Venetian lady. He was taken captive in Troy, turned Turk, joined a band of pirates, grew rich, and, after several years' absence, returned to his native land, where he discovered his wife at a carnival ball with her cavilier servant. He made himself known to her and they lived together again as man and wife.—Eggon, “Boppo.”

Berch'ta (the white lady). This fairy, in Southern Germany, answers to Hulda (the gracious lady) of Northern Germany; but after the introduction of Christianity, when pagan deities were represented as demons, Berch'ta lost her former character, and became a bogie to frighten children.

Berë'ans. The followers of the Rev. John Barclay, of Kincardineshire (1773). They believe that all we know of God is from revelation; that all the Psalms refer to Christ; that assurance is the proof of faith; and that unbelief is the unpardonable sin. They took their name from the Bereans, mentioned in the book of the Acts (xvii. 11), who “received the word with all readiness of mind, and searched the Scriptures daily.”

Berëcyn'thian Hero. Midas, the Phrygian king; so called from mount Berëcynthus, in Phrygia.

Berenga'rians. Followers of Berenger, archdeacon of Angers, the learned opponent of Lanfranc (eleventh century). He said that the bread by consecration did not become the very body of Christ “generated on earth so many years before, but becomes to the faithful, nevertheless, the blessed body of Christ.”

Bereni'ce (4 syl.). The sister-wife of Ptolemy III., who vowed to sacrifice her hair to the gods, if her husband returned home the vanquisher of Asia. She suspended her hair in the temple of the war-god, but it was stolen the first night, and Conon of Samos told the king that the winds had wafted it to heaven, where it still forms the seven stars near the tail of Leo.

Berg-Folk. Pagan spirits doomed to live on the Scandinavian hills till the day of redemption. (Scandinavian myth.)

Bergelmir. A frost-giant, father of the Jötuns, or second dynasty of giants. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Berkshire. Saxon, Beotoc - scire (forest-shire), a name peculiarly appropriate to this county, which contains the forest districts of Windsor and Bagshot.

Berlin Decree. A decree issued at Berlin by Napoleon I., forbidding any of the nations of Europe to trade with Great Britain (1806). This mad fancy was the first step to the great man's fall.

Berlin Time. The new Berlin Observatory is 44° 14' east of Paris, and 53° 35' east of Greenwich. The Berlin day begins at noon, but our civil day begins the midnight preceding.

Berliners. The people of Berlin, in Prussia.

Bermeja. Insula de la Torré, from which Amadis of Gaul starts when he goes in quest of the Enchantress-Damsel, daughter of Fin'etor the necromancer.

Bernard, St. Abbot of the monastery of Clairvaux in the twelfth century. His fame for wisdom was very great, and few church matters were undertaken without his being consulted.

Petit Bernard. Solomon Bernard, engraver, of Lyons. (Sixteenth century.)

Poor Bernard. Claude Bernard, of Dijon, philanthropist. (1588-1641.)

Lucullus. Samuel Bernard, capitalist. (1651-1739.)

Le gentil Bernard. Pierre Joseph Bernard, the French poet. (1710-1775.)

Bernardo del Carpio. One of the most favourite subjects of the Spanish minstrels; the other two being the Cid and Lara's seven infants.

Bernesque Poetry. Serio-comic poetry, so called from Francesco Berni, of Tuscany, who greatly excelled in it. (1490-1536.)

Bernouilli's Numbers or Numbers of Bernouilli. A series of numbers of great importance in algebra, first used by James Bernouilli, professor of mathematics at Basle. (1654-1705.)

Berser'ker. Grandson of the eight-handed Starka'der and the beautiful Alfhildë. He was called ber-serkr (bare of mail), because he always went into battle unharnessed. He married the daughter of Svafurlam, and had twelve sons. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Berth. He has tumbled into a nice berth. A nice situation or fortune. The place in which a ship is anchored is called its berth, and the sailors call it a good or bad berth as they think it favourable or otherwise. The space also allotted to a seaman for his hammock is called his berth. (Norman, berth, a cradle.)

Bertha. The betrothed of John of Leyden, but being a vassal of count Oberthal, she was unable to marry without her lord's consent. When she went with her mother to ask permission of marriage, the count, struck with her beauty, determined to make her his mistress. She afterwards makes her escape from the castle, and, fancying that the "prophet" had caused the death of her lover, goes to Munster fully resolved to compass his death by setting fire to the palace. She is apprehended, and being brought before the prophet-king, recognises her lover in him, saying, "I loved thee once, but now my love is turned to hate," and stabs herself.—Meyerbeer's opera "Le Prophète."

Berthe au Grand Pied. Mother of Charlemagne, and great-granddaughter of Charles Martel; so called because she had a club-foot.

Bertolde (Bar-told). Imperturbable as Bertolde, i.e., not to be taken by surprise, thrown off your guard, or disconcerted at anything. Bertolde is the hero of a little jeu d'esprit in Italian prose, entitled Crocè. He is a comedian by profession, whom nothing astonishes; and is as much at his ease with kings and queens as with persons of his own rank and vocation.

Bertram. One of the conspirators against the republic of Venice "in whom there was a hesitating softness, fatal to a great enterprise." He betrayed the conspiracy to the senate.—Byron, "Marino Faliero."

Bertram Risingham. The vassal of Philip of Mortham. Oswald Wycliffe induced him to shoot his lord at Marston Moor, and for this vile deed the vassal demanded of him all the gold and movables of his late master. Oswald, being a villain, tried to outwit Bertram, and even murder him; but in the end it turns out that Mortham was not killed, neither was Oswald his heir; for Redmond O'Neale, the page of Rokeby, is found to be Mortham's son.—Scott, "Rokeby."

Bertra'mo. The fiend-father of Robert le Diable. After alluring his son to gamble away all his possessions, he meets him near the rocks St. Irène, and Ite'na seduces him in the "Dance of Love." When Bertra'mo at last comes to claim his victim, he is resisted by Alice, the foster-sister of the duke, who reads to him his mother's will, and angels come to celebrate the triumph of good over evil.—Meyerbeer's opera of "Roberto il Diavolo."

Beryl Molozane (3 syl.). The lady beloved by George Geith; a laughing, loving beauty, all sunshine and artlessness, tender, frank, full of innocent chatter, helping every one and loving every one. Her lot is painfully unhappy, and she dies.—F. G. Trafford (J. H. Riddell), "George Geith."

Berzak (the interval). The space between death and the resurrection.—The Koran.

Besants or Bezants. Circular pieces of bullion without any impression, supposed to represent the old coinage of Byzantium, and to have been brought to Europe by the Crusaders.

Bess. Good queen Bess. Queen Elizabeth. (1533-1603.)

Bess o' Bedlam. A female lunatic vagrant. Bedlam is a common name for a madhouse, and Bess is a national name for a woman, especially of the lower order. The male lunatic is a Tom o' Bedlam.

Bessemer Iron. Iron refined by the process patented in 1856-7 by Mr. Bessemer.

Bessus. A cowardly, bragging captain, a sort of Bob'adil (q.v.).—Beaumont and Fletcher, "A King and No King."

Bestials. Books on zoology were so called in the Middle Ages.

Bete Noir. The thorn in the side, the bitter in the cup, the spoke in the wheel, the black sheep, the object of aversion. A black sheep has always been considered an eyesore in a flock, and its wool is really less valuable. In times of superstition it was looked on as bearing the devil's mark.

The Dutch sale of tin is the bête noir of the Cornish miners.—The Times.

Bethlemenites (4 syl.). Followers of John Huss, so called because he used to preach in the church called Bethlemen of Prague.

Betty. A name of contempt given to a man who interferes with the duties of female servants, or occupies himself in female pursuits; also called a "Molly."

Betu'bium. Dumsby or the Cape of St. Andrew, in Scotland.

The north-inflated tempest foams
O'er Orka's and Betuhium's highest peak.
Thomson, "Autumn."

Beuves (1 syl.) or Bu'vo of Aggre-mont. The father of Malagigi, and uncle of Rinaldo.

Bev'er. A "drink" between meals (Italian, bevère, to drink—our beverage; Latin, bibere—our im-bibe). At Eton they have "Bever days," when extra beer is served to the students.

He . . . will devour three breakfasts . . . without prejudice to his bevers.
Beaumont and Fletcher, "Woman Hater," i. 3.

Bevil. A model gentleman in Steele's "Conscious Lovers."

Whate'er can deck mankind,
Or charm the heart, in generous Bevil shewed.
Thomson, "Winter."

Be'vis. The horse of lord Marmion.—Sir Walter Scott.

Bevis of Southampton. A knight of romance, whose exploits are recounted in Drayton's "Polyolbion." The French call him Beuves de Hantone.

Bev'y. A bevy of ladies. A throng or company; properly applied to roebucks, quails, and pheasants. The word is allied to bivouac, i.e., be-awake (to be on the watch), because one of the bevy is on the watch to warn the herd of danger.

Beza'liel, in the satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," by Dryden and Tate, is meant for the marquis of Worcester, afterwards duke of Beaufort.

Bezael with each grace and virtue fraught,
Serene his looks, serene his life and thought;
On whom so largely Nature heaped her store,
There scarce remained for arts to give him more.
Part II.

Bezo'nian. A beggar (French, besoin; Italian, bisogno, want). Sir Walter Scott adopted in his "Waverley" the motto—

Under which king, Bezonian? speak or die.
Shakespeare, "2 Henry IV.," v. 3.

Bhava'ni. Wife of Shiva. (Hindu mythology.)

Bheem or Bhîma. One of the five Pandoos, or brotherhoods of Indian demigods, famous for his strength. He slew the giant Kinchick, and dragged his body from the hills, thereby making the Kinchick ravine.

Bian'ca. Wife of Fazio. When Fazio became rich, and got entangled with the marchioness Aldabella, she accused him to the duke of Florence of being privy to the death of Bartoldo, an old miser. Fazio was arrested and condemned to death. Bianca now repented of her jealous rashness, and tried to save her husband, but failing in her endeavours, went mad, and died of a broken heart.—Dean Milman, "Fazio."

N.B.—The name is employed by Shakespeare both in his "Taming of the Shrew" and also in "Othello."

Bias. The weight in bowls which makes them deviate from the straight line; hence any favourite idea or pursuit, or whatever predisposes the mind in a particular direction.

Bible means simply a book, but is now exclusively confined to the "Book of Books."

The headings of the chapters were prefixed by Miles Smith, bishop of Gloucester, one of the translators.

The division into chapters is ascribed to archbishop Lanfranc in the eleventh century, and archbishop Langton in the thirteenth century. But T. Hartwell Horne says the real author was cardinal Hugo de Sancto Caro, in the thirteenth century.

The division into chapters. The Jewish scribes divided the Old Testament into 669 parashahs (sections); subsequently the Pentateuch was portioned out into 54 lessons. In the thirteenth century the Vulgate was divided into chapters, subdivided by paragraphs marked A, B, C, &c., by Langton, and improved by Cardinal Hugo de Sancto Caro.

The division into verses was begun by rabbi Nathan about 1445, and finished by Athias, a Jew, in 1662. Robert Stephens introduced verses into his Greek Testament, published in 1551.

The Breches Bible. So called because Gen. iii. 7 was rendered, "The eyes of them botle were opened . . . and they sewed figge-tree leaves together, and made themselves breeches." Printed 1579.

The Vinegar Bible. So called because the heading to Luke xx. is given as "The parable of the Vinegar" (instead of Vineyard). Printed at the Clarendon Press in 1717.

The Wicked Bible. So called because the word not is omitted in the seventh commandment, making it, "Thou shalt commit adultery." Printed by Barker and Lucas, 1632.

Bishop's Bible. The revised edition of archbishop Parker's version. Published 1568.

Cranmer's Bible. So called because archbishop Cranmer wrote the preface. This was Tindal's Bible, revised by Miles Coverdale. (1540.)

King James's Bible. The present version; so called because it was undertaken by command of James I. Published 1613.

Matthews' Bible is Tindal's version; it was so called by John Rogers, superintendent of the English churches in Germany. It was published with notes under the fictitious name of Thomas Matthews. (1537.)

Bible-Clerk. A sizar of the Oxford university; a student who gets certain pecuniary advantages for reading the Bible aloud at chapel. The office is almost a sinecure now, but the emolument is given to the sons of poor gentlemen, either as a free gift, or as the reward of merit tested by examination.

Biblia Pau'perum (the poor-man's Bible). Some forty or fifty pictures of Bible subjects used in the Middle Ages, when few could read, to teach the leading events of Scripture history. (See MIRROR OF HUMAN SALVATION.)

Biblical. Father of Biblical criticism and exegesis. Origen. (185-254.)

Biblomancy. Forecasting future events by the Bible. The plan was to open the sacred volume at random, and lay your finger on a passage without looking at it. The text thus pointed out was supposed to be applicable to the person who pointed it out. (Greek, biblia, Bible; manteia, prophecy.) (See SORTES.)

Bib'ulus. Colleague of Julius Cæsar, a mere cipher in office, whence his name has become proverbial for one in office who is a mere fainçnant.

Biceps. A man's arm: properly, the protruding muscles of his arm or leg, so called because it has two heads. (Latin, biceps, two heads.)

Bickerstaff, Isaac. A name assumed by dean Swift in a satirical pamphlet against Partridge, the almanack-maker. This produced a paper war, so diverting that Steele issued the "Tatler," under the editorial name of "Isaac Bickerstaff, Esq., Astrologer" (1709).

Bidding-Prayer. The prayer for the souls of benefactors said before the sermon; a relic of this remains in the prayer used in cathedrals, university churches, &c. Bidding is from bead or bede. (Saxon, biddan, to pray for the souls of benefactors.) (See BEADSMAN.)

Bidëford Postman. Edward Capern, the poet, so called because at one time he was a letter-carrier in Bidëford.

Bidi. A Malabar deity, about equal to the classic Destiny.

Bidpai. (See PILPAI.)

Biel (2 syl.). The god-protector of forests. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Bifrost, in Scandinavian mythology, is the name of the bridge between heaven and earth; the rainbow may be considered to be this bridge, and its various colours are the reflections of its precious stones. (Old Norse, bifa-rost, to move through space.)

Big-bird. To get the big bird (i.e., the goose). To be hissed on the stage. A theatrical expression.

Big-en'dians. A religious party in the empire of Lilliput, who made it a matter of conscience to break their eggs at the big end; they were looked on as heretics by the orthodox party, who broke theirs at the small end. The Big-endians are the Catholics, and the Little-endians the Protestants.

Big-wig. A person in authority, a "nob." Of course, the term arises from the custom of judges, bishops, and so on, wearing large wigs. Bishops no longer wear them.

Biggen. A coffee-pot made in imitation of a Beguine (cap).

Bighes (pron. bes). Jewels, female ornaments.

She is all in her bighes to-day—i.e., in full fig, in excellent spirits, in good humour.

Bight. To hook the bight—i.e., to get entangled. The bight is the bend or doubled part of a rope, and when the rope of one anchor gets into the "bight" of another, it gets "hooked."

Biglow Papers are by Professor James Russell Lowell, of Boston, U.S.

Big'ot means simply a worshipper (Anglo-Saxon, bigan, to worship, whence begine, a religious woman; German, beigott). M. Beschorelle insists that the English word is a corruption of the oath By-God; and the German Bei Gott, he says, confirms it.—Dict. Nation.

Archbishop Trench says it means the mustachio-man (i.e., the Spaniard), and derives the word from the Spanish bigote (a mustachio). Hombre de bigote is a "man of resolution," one that wears a mustachio; tener bigotes is "to stand firm." Bishop Hall calls a pervert to Rome a "bigot," and we all know that Spain is still the land proverbial for mustachios and bigotry.—Study of Words.

The grey friars were called in Italy bigiotti, from bigio, grey; and bizorro, a word derived from bigiotto, means hypocrite.

"Bil'bilis (Spain). Famed for its highly-tempered steel blades.

Bil'bo. A rapier or sword. So called from Bilbo'a, in Spain, once famous for its finely-tempered blades. Falstaff says to Ford—

I suffered the pangs of three several deaths; first, an intolerable fright, to be detected . . . ; next, to be compassed, like a good bilbo, . . . hit to point, heel to head; and then . . . —"Merry Wives," iii. 5.

Bilboes. A bar of iron with fetters annexed to it, by which mutinous sailors are linked together. The word is derived from Bilbo'a, in Spain, where they were first made. Some of the bilboes taken from the Spanish armada are still kept in the Tower of London.

Bilge Water. Filthy drainings. The bilge is the lowest part of a ship, and as the rain or sea-water which trickles down to this part is hard to get at, it is apt to become foul and very offensive.

Bilk. To cheat, to obtain goods and decamp without paying for them. (Gothic, biluikan, to mock or deceive.)

Bill. To pay a bill. The word bill means a stick (French, bille, a billet or rod), and the allusion is to the custom of keeping accounts by tallies, or notches cut on small billets of wood. (See TALLY.)

A true bill. I confess what you say is true. The case against the accused is first submitted to the grand jury. If they think the charge has a fair colour, they write on the declaration "A true bill," and the case is submitted to the petty jury. Otherwise they write "No true bill," and the case is at once dismissed or "ignored."

Bill of Health. A clean bill of health. A document duly signed by the proper authorities, to certify that when the ship set sail, no infectious disorder existed in the place.

A foul bill of health is a document to show that the place was suffering from some infection when the ship set sail. If a captain cannot show a clean bill, he is supposed to have a foul one.

Bill of Lading. A document signed by the master of a ship in acknowledgment of goods laden in his vessel. In this document he binds himself to deliver the articles in good condition to the persons named in the bill, certain exceptions being duly provided for. These bills are generally in triplicate, one for the sender, one for the receiver, and one for the master of the vessel.

Bill of Quantities. An abstract of the probable cost of a building.

Bill of Rights. The declaration delivered to the prince of Orange on his election to the British throne, confirming the rights and privileges of the people. (Feb. 13, 1689.)

Bill of Sale. When a person borrows money and delivers goods as security, he gives him a bill of sale, that is, permission to sell the goods, if the money is not returned on a stated day.

Bills of Mortality took their rise in 1592, when a great pestilence broke out, which continued till 1595. We use the term now for those abstracts from parish registers which show the births, deaths, and baptisms of the district. These bills, which are weekly, monthly, or yearly, are very useful to show the sanitary condition of a parish, the causes of death, the increase or decrease of population, and so on.

Billet-doux (pron. billy-do). A love-letter. French for a sweet or affectionate letter.

Billingsgate. That's Billingsgate. Vulgar and coarse, like the manners and language of Billingsgate fish-fags.

Parnassus spoke the cant of Billingsgate.—Dryden, "Art of Poetry," c. 1.

To talk Billingsgate—i.e., to slang, to scold in a vulgar, coarse style.

You are no better than a Billingsgate fish fag—i.e., you are as rude and ill-mannered as the women of Billingsgate fish-market (Saxon, hellan, "to bawl," and gate, "quay," meaning the noisy quay). The French say "Maubert," instead of Billingsgate, as Your compliments are like those of the Place Maubert—i.e., no compliments at all, but vulgar dirt-flinging. The "Place Maubert" has long been noted for its market.

Billy. A policeman's staff, which is a little bill or billet.

Billy Barlow. A street droll, a merry Andrew. So called from a half idiot of the name, who fancied himself "some great personage." He was well known in the east of London, and died in Whitechapel workhouse. Some of his sayings were really witty, and some of his attitudes really droll.

Billy Wix. An owl. Billy is a play upon the beak or bill, which is very striking in the owl, and Wix is the German weck (a wig), alluding to the "judge-like" appearance of Master Madgo.

Bi'nary Theory. A theory which supposes that all definite chemical salts are combinations of two bodies.

Bingham's Dandies. The 17th Lancers. So called from their colonel, the earl of Lucan, formerly lord Bingham. The uniform is noted for its admirable fit and smartness.

Bin'nacle. The case of the mariner's compass, which used to be written bittacle, a corruption of the French boite d'aiguille (box of the needle).

Birchin Lanc. I must send you to Birchin Lane—i.e., whip you. The play is on birch (a rod).

Bird. An endearing name for girl.

And by my word, your bonnie bird
In dancer shall not tarry;
So though the waves are raging white,
I'll row you o'er the ferry.

Campbell, "Lora Ulín's Daughter."

The green bird tells everything a person wishes to know.—Chery and Fairstar.

The talking bird spoke with a human voice, and could bid all other birds join in concert.—Arabian Nights.

Bird. A little bird told me so. From Eccles. x. 20: "Curse not the king, no not in thy thought . . . for a bird of the air shali carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter." Bellenden Ker says it is the Dutch Er lij't el baerd (i.e., By telling you I shall betray the person who told me), and certainly that is the meaning implied.

A Bird of ill-omen. A person who is regarded as unlucky; one who is in the habit of bringing ill news. The ancients thought that some birds indicated good luck, and others evil. Even to the present day many look upon owls, crows, and ravens as unlucky birds; swallows and storks as lucky ones.

Ravens, by their acute sense of smell, discern the savour of dying bodies (like sharks), and, under the hope of preying on them, light on chimney-tops or flutter about sick rooms; hence the raven indicates death. Owls screech when bad weather is at hand, and as foul weather often precedes sickness, so the owl is looked on as a funeral bird.

Bird of Estë. The white eagle, the cognisance of the house.

His dazzling way

The bird of Estë soars beyond the solar ray.
"Jerusalem Deliv.," x.

Birds of Paradise are described by old naturalists as being destitute of feet, dwelling ever in the air, wafted about in the bright sunbeams without the mechanism of wings, nourished on dew and the odour of flowers, like houris or the spirits of paradise.

Tavernier says that birds of paradise come in flocks during the nutmeg season to the south isles of India. The strength of the nutmeg intoxicates them, and, while they lie in this state on the earth, the ants eat off their legs, whence it is said that birds of paradise have no feet.

Those golden birds that in the spice-time drop
About the gardens, drunk with that sweet food
Whose scent hath lured them o'er the summer flood.
T. Moore, "Lalla Rookh," i.

Bird's-eye View. A mode of perspective drawing in which the artist is supposed to be over the objects delineated, in which case he beholds them as a bird in the air would see them.

Birmingham Poet. John Freeth, who died at the age of seventy-eight in 1808. He was wit, poet, and publican, who not only wrote the words and tunes of songs, but sang them also, and sang them well.

Bis. Bis dat, qui cito dat (he gives twice who gives promptly)—i.e., prompt relief will do as much good as twice the sum at a future period.

Purple and bis, i.e., purple and fine linen (Latin, byssus, fine flax). The spelling is sometimes biss, bys, &c.

Biscuit (French-Latin, bis, twice; cuit, baked). So called because it was originally twice ovened. The Romans had a bread of this kind.

In pottery, earthenware or porcelain, after it has been hardened in the fire, but has not yet been glazed, is so called.

Bise. A wind that acts notably on the nervous system. It is prevalent in those valleys of Savoy that open to the north.

Bishop. The bishop hath put his foot in it. Said of milk or porridge that is burnt, or of meat over-roasted. Tyndale says, "If the podeshe be burned to, or the meate over roasted, we saye the byshope hath put his fote in the potte," and explains it thus—"because the bishopes burn who they lust." Such food is also said to be bishopped.

Bishop Barnaby. The May-bug, lady-bird, &c.

"Barnaby" is bairn-bye or bairnie-bye, the bairn's insect, the child's favourite.

Another suggestion is worth notice—the Low Dutch Burn-bie (fire-fly), in allusion to the fiery red colour of its wings. This may have suggested the nursery rhyme—

Barnaby, Barnaby, fly away home;
Your house is on fire, your children will burn.

Your house is on fire is, "you are yourself on fire," and your fiery wings will burn your children.

"Bishop" is a corruption of the Saxon bysig (busy); Dutch bezig, verb bysigian. (See LADY BIRD.)

Bishop. Middleham is said to have been always ranting in praise of water-drinking, but to have killed himself by secret intoxication.

Bismarquer. To cheat; to play foul at cards or billiards. A word made out of the name of count Bismarck, the Prussian minister, whose tricky policy in 1865-1866 roused the indignation of all Europe.

Bissextile. Leap-year. We add a day to February in leap-year, but the Romans counted the 24th of February twice. Now, the 24th of February was called by them "sextilis" (sexto calendas Martii), the sextile or sixth day before the 1st of March; and this day, being reckoned twice (bis) in leap-year, was called the bis-sextile, or sextile repeated.

Bisson or Beesen (blind) is the Saxon bisen. Shakespeare ("Hamlet," ii. 2) speaks of bisson rheum (blinding tears), and in "Coriolanus," ii. 1, "What harm can your bisson conspectivities glean out of this character?"

Biston'ians. The Thracians; so called from Biston, son of Mars, who built Biston'ia on the lake Bis'tonis.

So the Bistonian race, a maddening train,
Exult and revel on the Thraean plain;
With milk their bloody banquets they allay
Or from the lion rend his panting prey;
On some abandoned savage fiercely fly,
Seize, tear, devour, and think it luxury.
Pub., "Statius," bk. ii.

Bit. To bit the cable is to fasten it round the "bit" or frame made for the purpose, and placed in the fore part of the vessel.

Bit Money. The word is used in the West Indies for a half pistorien (5d.). In Jamaica, a bit is worth 6d. English; in America, 12½ cents; in Ireland, 10d. In England it is the slang term for a fourpenny piece.

Bite. A cheat; one who bites us. "The biter bit" explains the origin. We say "a man was bitten" when he "burns his fingers" meddling with something which promised well but turned out a failure.

Bit'elas. Sister of Fairlimb, and daughter of Rukewaw, the apo, in the story of "Reynard the Fox."

Biting. A biting remark. Nearchos ordered Zeno, the dialectician, to be pounded to death in a mortar. When the philosopher was nearly bruised out of his life, he called the tyrant to his side, as if to make an important communication. Nearchos bent over the mortar, and put his ear close to the lips of the dying man, when Zeno bit it off. Hence the proverb, "A remark more biting than Zeno's." (See BRIDLE.)

Black for mourning was a Roman custom (Juvenal, x. 245) borrowed from the Egyptians.

Black in blazonry means constancy, wisdom, and prudence.

Black in several of the Oriental nations is a badge of servitude, slavery, and low birth. Our word blackguard seems to point to this meaning. The Latin niger meant bad, unpropitious. (See BLACK-GUARD.)

Beaten black and blue, so that the skin is black and blue with the marks of the beating.

I must have it in black and white, i.e., in plain writing; the paper being white and the ink black.

To say black's his eye, i.e., to vituperate, to blame. The expression, Black's the white of his eye, is a modern corruption. Here black is the Latin niger, meaning evil. "If thine eye be evil thy whole body is full of darkness" (Matt. vi. 23). To say the eye is black or evil, is, therefore, to accense a person of an evil heart or great ignorance. (See BLACK PRINCE.)

A fool may do all things, and no man say Black's his eye. The "Tell Tale."

Blackacre, Widow. The best of Wycherley's comic characters; a masculine, litigious, pettifogging, headstrong woman.—"The Plain Dealer."

Black Act. 9 Geo. I. c. 22 is so called, because it was directed against the Waltham deer-stealers, who blackened their faces for disguise, and, under the name of Blacks, appeared in Epping Forest. This Act was repealed in 1827.

Black Acts. Acts of the Scottish parliament between the accession of James I. and the year 1587, so called because they were printed in black or Saxon characters.

Black Art. The art practised by conjurors, wizards, and others, who professed to have dealings with the devil. Black here means diabolical or wicked.

Black Assize. 6th July, 1577, when a putrid pestilence broke out at Oxford during the time of assize.

Black-balled. Not admitted to a club; the candidate proposed is not accepted as a member. In voting by ballot, those who accept the person proposed drop a white or red ball into the box, but those who would exclude the candidate drop into it a black one.

Black Book. A book exposing abuses in Church and State, which furnished much material for political reform in the early part of the present century. (See BLACK BOOKS.)

Black Books. To be in my black books. In bad odour; in disgrace; out of favour. The black books were those compiled in the reign of Henry VIII. to set forth the scandalous proceedings of the English monasteries, and were so called from the colour of their binding. We have similarly the Blue Book, the Red Book, and so on.

Black Cap, or the Judgment Cap, worn by a judge when he passes sentence of death on a prisoner. This cap is part of the judge's full dress. The judges wear their black caps on November 9, when the Lord Mayor is presented in the Court of Exchequer. Covering the head was a sign of mourning among the Israelites, Greeks, Romans, and Anglo-Saxons. (2 Sam. xv. 30.)

Black Brunswickers. A corps of 700 volunteer hussars under the command of Frederick William, duke of Brunswick, who had been forbidden by Napoleon to succeed to his father's dukedom. They were called "Black" because they wore mourning for the deceased duke. Frederick William fell at Quatre-Bras, 1815. One of Millais' best pictures is called "The Black Brunswicker."

Black Cattle. Oxen for slaughter; so called because black is their prevailing colour, at least in the north.

Black Death. A putrid typhus, in which the body turned black with rapid putrefaction. It occurred in 1348, and carried off 25 millions in Europe alone, while in Asia and Africa the mortality was even greater.

Black Diamonds. Coals; also clever fellows of the lower orders. Coals and diamonds are both carbon.

Black Dog. A fiend still dreaded in many country places. (See Dog.)

Black Douglas. William Douglas, lord of Nithsdale. Died, 1390.

Black Friars. The Dominicans are so called from the colour of their habit.

Black Friday. The 6th December, 1745, the day on which the news arrived in London that the Pretender had reached Derby.

Black-guards. Miss Strickland says: "The scullions and inferior servants of the English court for many centuries were clad in black, and were familiarly called the royal black guard, or the black-guards of England."—Henry VIII., vol. iii., p. 245.

Gifford, in his edition of Ben Jonson, says: "In all great houses there were a number of dirty dependents, whose office it was to attend the wool-yards, sculleries, &c. Of these the most forlorn were selected to carry coals to the kitchen. They rode with the pots and pans, and were in derision called the black-guards."

In the lord steward's office a proclamation (May 7, 1683) begins thus: "Whereas.....a sort of vicious, idle, and masterless boyes and rogues, commonly called the Black-guard, with divers other lewd and loose fellows.....do usually haunt and follow the court.....Wee do hereby strictly charge.....all those so called.....with all other loose, idle.....men.....who have intruded themselves into his Majesty's court and stables.....to depart upon pain of imprisonment."

A mob is called the fourth regiment of Foot Guards. The first is the Grenadiers; the second, the Coldstream; the third, the Scotch Fusiliers; and the fourth, the Black-guards.

Black Hole of Calcutta. A dark cell in a prison into which Suraja Dowlah thrust 146 British prisoners. Next morning only twenty-three were found alive. (1756.)

Black Horse. The 7th Hussars are called "The Black Horse," because they are a horse regiment, and their regimental facings are black.

Black Jack. Black Jack rides a good horse (Cornish). The miners call blende or sulphide of zinc "Black Jack," the occurrence of which is considered by them a favourable indication. The blende rides upon a lode of good ore.

Black-leg. A swindler, especially in cards and races. So called from gamecocks, whose legs are always black.

Black Letter. The Gothic or German type. So called because of its black appearance.

Black Letter Day. An unlucky day; one to be recalled with regret. The Romans marked their unlucky days with a piece of black charcoal, and their lucky ones with white chalk.

Black-letter dogs. Literary antiquaries who poke and pry into every hole and corner to find out black-letter copies of books.

By fell black-letter dogs.....
That from Gothic kennels eager strut.
Matthias, "Pursuits of Literature."

Black Lists. Lists of insolvency and bankruptcy, for the private guidance of the mercantile community. (See BLACK BOOKS.)

Black Mail. Money given to freebooters by way of exempting property from depredation. (Saxon, mal, "rent-tax;" French maille, an old coin worth 0.83 farthing). Grass mail was rent paid for pasturage. Mails and duties (Scotch) are rents of an estate in money or otherwise. "Black," meaning unlawful, wicked, is found in such expressions as black-art, black-guard, &c.

To levy black mail now means to exact exorbitant charges; thus the cabs and omnibuses during the Great Exhibition years "levied black mail" on the public.

Black Man. The Evil One.

Black Monday. Easter Monday, April 14, 1360, was so called. Edward III. was with his army lying before Paris, and the day was so dark, with mist and hail, so bitterly cold and so windy, that many of his horses and men died. Monday after Easter holidays is called "Black Monday," in allusion to this fatal day. Launcelot says—

It was not for nothing that my nose fell a-bleeding on Black Monday last, at six o'clock in the morning.—Shakespeare, "Merchant of Venice," ii. 5.

February 27, 1865, was so called in Melbourne from a terrible sirocco from the N. N. W., which produced dreadful havoc between Sandhurst and Castlemaine.

Black Money. Base coin brought to England by foreigners, and prohibited by Edward III.

Black Ox. The black ox has trod on his foot—i.e., misfortune has come to him. Black oxen were sacrificed to Pluto and other infernal deities, consequently they were held accursed, and for one of these animals to tread on your foot was a sign of evil at hand.

Black Prince. Edward, prince of Wales, son of Edward III. Froissart says he was "styled black by terror of his arms" (c. 139). Strutt confirms this saying: "for his martial deeds surnamed Black the Prince" (Antiquities). Meyrick says there is not the slightest proof that Edward, prince of Wales, ever wore black armour (vol. ii.); indeed, we have much indirect proof against the supposition. Thus Shaw (vol. i., plate 31) gives a fac-simile from a picture on the wall of St. Stephen's Chapel, Westminster, in which the prince is clad in gilt armour. Stothard says "the effigy is of copper gilt." In the British Museum is an illumination of Edward III. granting to his son the duchy of Aquitaine, in which both figures are represented in silver armour with gilt joints. The first mention of the term "Black Prince" occurs in a parliamentary paper of the second year of Richard II.; so that Shakespeare has good reason for the use of the word in his tragedy of that king—

Brave Gaunt, thy father and myself
Rescued the Black Prince, that young Mars of men,
From forth the ranks of many thousand French.
"Richard II." ii. 3.

Black Republicans. The Republicans were so called by the pro-slavery party of the States, because they resisted the introduction of slavery into any State where it was not already recognised.

Black Rod of Scotland. The "piece of the true cross" or rod, set in an ebony crucifix, which Margaret, the wife of king Malcolm, left at death to the Scottish nation. It passed into various hands, but was lost at the Reformation.

Black Saturday. The 4th August, 1621; so called in Scotland, because a violent storm occurred at the very moment the Parliament was sitting to enforce episcopacy on the people.

Black Sea. So called from the abounding black rock in the extensive coal-fields between the Bosphorus and Heraclea.

Black Sheep (Kârâ-Koin-loo). A tribe of Turkomans, so called from their standards. This tribe was extirpated by the White Sheep (q.v.).

Black Sheep. A disgrace to the family; a mauvais sujet; a workman who will not join in a strike. Black sheep are looked on with dislike by shepherds, and are not so valuable as white ones.

Black Standard. The dress, turbans, and standards of the Abasside caliphs were all black.—D'Herbelot.

Black Swan. (See RARA AVIS.)

Black Thursday. February 6, 1851; so called in the colony of Victoria, from a terrible bush-fire which then occurred.

Black Watch. Companies employed to watch the Highlands of Scotland. They dressed in a "black" or dark tartan (1725). Subsequently they were enrolled into the 42nd regiment, under the earl of Crawford, in 1737. Their tartan is still called "The Black Watch Tartan."

Blackamoor. Washing the blackamoor white—i.e., engaged upon a hopeless and useless task. The allusion is to one of Aesop's fables so entitled.

Blackness. All faces shall gather blackness (Joel ii. 6)—i.e., be downcast in consequence of trouble.

Blacksmith. The learned blacksmith. Elihu Burritt, U.S. Born, 1811.

Blad'amour. The friend of Par'ide', in Spenser's "Faëry Queen." The poet had his eye upon the earl of Northumberland, one of the leaders in the northern insurrection of 1569. (See PAR'IDEL.)

Blade. A knowing blade, a sharp fellow; a regular blade, a buck or fop. (Saxon, blad or blad, a branch or sprig.)

Bladud. A mythical king of England, and father of king Lear. He built the city of Bath, and dedicated the medicinal springs to Minerva. Bladud studied magic, and attempting to fly, fell into the temple of Apollo, and was dashed to pieces.—Geoffrey of Monmouth.

Inexhaustible as Bladud's well.—Thackeray.

Blaise, St. Patron saint of wool-combers, because he suffered martyrdom by being torn to pieces with iron combs.

Blanche-fleur. The heroine of Boccaccio's prose romance called "Il Filocopo." Her lover Florès is Boccaccio himself, and Blanche-fleur was a young lady passionately beloved by him, the natural daughter of king Robert. The story of Blanche-fleur and Florès is substantially the same as that of Dorigen and Aurelius, by Chaucer, and that of Diano'ra and Ansaldo in the "Decameron." (See DIANORA and DORIGEN.)

Blan'diman. The faithful manservant of fair Bellissant (q.v.), who attended her when she was divorced. — Valentine and Orson.

Blaney. A wealthy heir, ruined by dissipation, in Crabbe's "Borough."

Misery and mirth are blended in his face.
Much innate villainess and some outward grace; ...
The serpent's cunning and the sinner's fall.
Letter xiv.

Blanket. So called from Thomas Blanket, who established a manufactory for these goods at Bristol, in 1340.

Blare. To cry with a great noise, like a child in a tricky temper; to bellow. (Old Belgic, blaren; Teutonic, blarren; Latin, ploro, to weep with noise.)

Blarney. None of your blarney. Soft, wheedling speeches to gain some end; sugar-words. Cormuck Macarthy held the castle of Blarney in 1602, and concluded an armistice with Carew, the lord president, on condition of surrendering the fort to the English garrison. Day after day his lordship looked for the fulfilment of the terms, but received nothing except protocols and soft speeches, till he became the laughing-stock of Elizabeth's ministers, and the dupe of the lord of Blarney.

To kiss the Blarney Stone. Whoever does this shall be able to persuade to anything. The Blarney Stone is triangular, lowered from the north angle of the castle, about twenty feet from the top, and containing this inscription: "Cormack Mac Carthy fortis me fieri fecit, A.D. 1446."

The word Blarney, which is Bladh-ey (flowery island), may have given use to the strange tradition.

Blasphemous Balfour. Sir James Balfour, the Scottish judge, was so called because of his apostasy. He died 1583.

Blatant Beast. "A dreadful fiend of gods and men, ydrad;" type of "Common Rumour" or "Slander." He has 100 tongues and a sting; with his tongues he speaks things "most shameful, most unrighteous, most untrue;" and with his sting "steeps them in poison." Sir Calidore muzzled the monster, and drew him with a chain to Faëry Land. After a time the beast broke his chain and regained his liberty. (Saxon, blatan, to bellow.)—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bks. v., vi.

Blayne's Bloodhounds. The 89th Foot is so called because of their unerring certainty, and untiring perseverance in hunting down the Irish rebels in 1798, when the corps was commanded by lord Blayne.

Blazon, Blazonry. To blazon is to announce with a trumpet, hence the Ghost in "Hamlet" says, "But this eternal blazon must not be to ears of flesh and blood"—i.e., this babbling about eternal things, or things of the other world, must not be made to persons still in the flesh. Knights were wont to be announced by the blast of a trumpet on their entrance into the lists; the flourish was answered by the heralds, who described aloud the arms and devices borne by the knight; hence to blazon came to signify to "describe the charges borne;" and blazonry is "the science of describing or deciphering arms." (German, blasen, to blow.)

Blear-eyed, The. Aurelius Brandolini, the Italian poet, called Il Lippo. (1440-1497.)

Bleed. To make a man bleed is to make him pay dearly for something; to victimise him. Money is the life-blood of commerce.

Blefus'ca. An island severed from Lilliput by a channel 800 yards wide, inhabited by pigmies. Swift meant it for France.—Gulliver's Travels.

Blemmyes (of Africa). Men said to have no head, their eyes and mouth being placed elsewhere. (See ACERNA-LITES.)

Blenheim Dog. A small spaniel, so called from Blenheim palace in Oxfordshire, where the breed has been preserved ever since the palace was built.

Blenheim House (Oxfordshire). The house given by the nation to the duke of Marlborough, for his victory over the French at Blenheim, in Bavaria, in the reign of queen Anne (1704).

When Europe freed confessed the saving power
Of Marlborough's hand, Britain, who sent him forth,

Chief of confederate hosts, to fight the cause
Of liberty and justice, grateful raised
This palace, sacred to the leader's fame,

Littleton, "Blenheim."

Blessing.

The Pope blesses with three fingers, symbolical of the Trinity, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

The inferior orders of the hierarchy bless with both hands, in the name of the holy archangels and angels. "Utraque manus in benedicendo clericis inferioribus necessaria est."

The humblest clerks, such as deacons and sacristans, bless with brushes which sprinkle holy water, the superiority of number making up for the inferiority of rank.

Blest. I'll be blest if I do it. I am resolved not to do it. A euphemism for curst.

Blets. Rotten spots upon apples, pears, &c. (Saxon, blætha, a blotch. Blotting means rotting.)

Blikian'daböl (splendid misery). The canopy of the goddess Hel (q.v.).

Blimber. Miss Blimber. A blue stocking, who knows the dead languages, and wears learned spectacles. She is the daughter of Dr. Blimber, a fossil schoolmaster of the high and dry grammar type.—Dickens, "Dombey and Son."

Blind. Blind leaders of the blind. The allusion is to a sect of the Pharisees, who were wont to shut their eyes when they walked abroad, and often ran their heads against a wall or fell into a ditch. (Matt. xv. 14.)

That's a mere blind. A pretence; something ostensible to conceal a covert design. The metaphor is from window-blinds, which prevent outsiders from seeing into a room.

A blind alley. A "cul de sac," an alley with no outlet. It is blind because it has no "eye" or passage through it.

A blind ditch. One which cannot be seen. Here blind means obscure, as a blind village.

Blind as a beetle. Beetles are not blind, but the dor-beetle or hedge-chaffer, in its rapid flight, will occasionally bump against one as if it could not see. (See MOLE.)

The Blind:—

Francesco Bello, called Il Cieco.

Luigi Groto, called Il Cieco, the Italian poet. (1541-1585.)

Lieutenant James Holman, The Blind Traveller. (1787-1857.)

Ludwig III., emperor of Germany, L'aveugle. (880, 890-934.)

John Parry, the blind harper, died 1739.

Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green. A public-house sign in the Whitechapel Road.—Hotten, "History of Sign-boards." (See BEGGAR.)

Blind Harry. A Scotch minstrel of the fifteenth century. His epic of "Sir William Wallace" runs to 11,861 lines.

Blindman's Holiday. The hour of dusk, when it is too dark to work, and too soon to light candles. All then are exempt from work, like blind men, who, for the most part, keep perpetual holiday.

Blockhead. A stupid person; one without brains. The allusion is to a wig-maker's dummy or tête à perruque, on which he fits his wigs.

Your wit will not so soon out as another man's will; 'tis strongly wedged up in a block-head.—Shakespeare, "Coriolanus," ii. 3.

Blood. A rake, a fast man; common in the regency of George IV. A term taken from blood horses.

Blood of our Saviour. An order of knighthood in Mantua, so called because their special office was to guard "the drops of the Saviour's blood" preserved in St. Andrew's church, Mantua.

Blood and iron policy—i.e., war policy. No explanation needed.

Laws written in blood. Dema'düs said that the laws of Draco were written in blood, because every offence was punished by death.

The field of blood. Acel'dama (Acts i. 19), the piece of ground purchased with the blood-money of our Saviour, and set apart for the burial of strangers.

The field of the battle of Cannæ, where Hannibal defeated the Romans, B.C. 216.

Bloodhound. Figuratively, one who follows up an enemy with pertinacity. Bloodhounds used to be employed for tracking wounded game by the blood spilt; subsequently they were employed for tracking criminals and slaves who had made their escape, and were hunters of blood, not hunters by blood.

Bloody, The. Otho II., emperor of Germany. (955, 973-983.)

The Bloody Eleventh. So called from their having been several times nearly annihilated, as at Alamanza, Fontenoy. Roucoux, Ostend, and Salamanca.

Bloody Assizes. The infamous assizes held by Judge Jeffreys in 1685, when some 300 persons were executed, more whipped or imprisoned, and nearly a thousand sent to the plantations as slaves.

Bloody Bill. The 31st Henry VIII., c. 14, which denounced death by hanging or burning on all who denied the doctrine of transubstantiation.

Bloody-bones. A hobgoblin.

Bloody Butcher. (See BUTCHER.)

Bloody Wedding. St. Bartholomew's slaughter in 1572 is so called because it took place during the marriage feast of Henri (afterwards Henri IV.) and Marguerite (daughter of Catharine de' Medici).

Bloom'erism. A female costume, so called from Mrs. Amelia Bloomer, of New York, who tried in 1849 to introduce the fashion.

Blount, Charles. Author of some deistical writings in the time of Charles II. (1654-1693.)

He heard of Blount, &c.—Crabbe, "Borough."

Blouse. A short smock-frock, worn by the artisans of France; so called from its ordinary colour, which is blue.

N.B.—The French mob is often called The blouses.

Blow. To inform against a companion; to "peach." The reference is to the announcing of knights by blast of trumpet.

To blow hot and cold (or) To blow hot and cold with the same breath. To be inconsistent. The allusion is the fable of a traveller who was entertained by a satyr. Being cold, the traveller blew his fingers to warm them, and afterwards blew his hot broth to cool it. The satyr, in great indignation, turned him out of doors, because he blew both hot and cold with the same breath.

I will blow him up sky high. Give him a good scolding. A regular blowing up is a thorough jobation. The metaphor is from blasting by gunpowder.

Blow a Cloud. To smoke a cigar or pipe. This term was in use in Queen Elizabeth's reign.

Blow Me (an oath). You be blowed (an oath), a play on the word Dash me, which is a euphemism for a more offensive oath.

Blow Out. A "tuck in," or feast which swells out the paunch.

Blown Herrings are bloated herrings, so dried with smoke as to bloat or swell them. The French bouffti (blown) is analogous to both expressions.

Blowselin'da. A country maiden in Gay's pastoral called "The Shepherd's Week."

Sweet is my toil when Blowzelind is near;
Of her bereft, 'tis winter all the year. . . .
Come, Blowzelinda, ease thy swain's desire,
My summer's shadow and my winter's fire.
Pastoral I.

Blubber. To cry like a child, with noise and slaverling. Connected with slobber, slaver.

Blue or Azure is the symbol of Divine eternity and human immortality. Consequently, it is a mortuary colour—hence its use in covering the coffins of young persons. When used for the garment of an angel, it signifies faith and fidelity. As the dress of the Virgin, it indicates modesty. When worn at the celebration of the mass, it denotes humanity and expiation. In blazonry, it signifies chastity, loyalty, fidelity, and a spotless reputation.

The Covenanters wore blue as their badge, in opposition to the scarlet of royalty. They based their choice on Numb. xv. 38, "Speak unto the children of Israel, and bid them that they make them fringes in the borders of their garments . . . and that they put upon the fringe . . . a ribband of blue."

Butchers wear blue aprons and blouses, because blue does not show the stains of blood, like white, &c. A blood-stain on blue does not dry red, but purple.

True Blue. This is a Spanish phrase, and refers to the notion that real aristocratic families have blue blood in their veins, while the blood of inferior persons approaches more or less to a black hue. Hence the French phrases, sang bleu (aristocratic blood) and sang noir (commoners' blood). (See SANG.)

True blue will never stain. A really noble heart will never disgrace itself. The reference is to blue aprons, &c., which do not show stains. (See the two preceding.)

'Twas Presbyterian true blue (Hudibras, i. 1). The allusion is to the blue apron which some of the Presbyterian preachers used to throw over their preaching-tub before they began to address the people. In one of the Rump songs we read of a person going to hear a lecture, and the song says—

Where I a tub did view,
Hung with an apron blue;
'Twas the preacher's, I conjecture.

The Blue Ribbon of the Turf. The Derby. Lord George Bentinck sold his stud, and found to his vexation that one of the horses sold won the Derby a few months afterwards. Bemoaning his ill-luck, he said to Disraeli, "Ah! you don't know what the Derby is." "Yes, I do," replied Disraeli; "it is the blue ribbon of the turf," alluding to the term cordón blue (q.v.).

To look blue. To be disconcerted. He was blue in the face: aghast with wonder. The effect of fear and wonder is to drive the colour from the cheeks, and give them a pale-bluish tinge.

Blues. The Blues of Constantinople were a political party in the reign of Justinian, opposed to the Greens of Anastasius. Ever since this time blue has been the emblem of royalty at Rome.

Blue-apron. A blue-apron statesman. A lay politician, a tradesman who interferes with the affairs of the nation. The reference is to the blue apron once worn by almost all tradesmen, but now restricted to butchers, poulterers, fishmongers, and so on.

Bluebeard. A bogey, a merciless tyrant, in Charles Perrault's "Contes du Temps." The tale of Bluebeard (Chevalier Kaoul) is known to every child, but many have speculated on the original of this despot. Some say it was a satire on Henry VIII., of wife-killing notoriety. Dr. C. Taylor thinks it is a type of the castle lords in the days of knight-errantry. Holinshed calls Giles de Retz, Marquis de Laval, the original Bluebeard. This Giles or Gilles lived at Machecoul, in Brittany, was accused of murdering six of his seven wives, and was ultimately strangled and burnt in 1440.

The Bluebeard chamber of his mind, into which no eye but his own must look.—Carlyle.

Blue Blood. (See TRUE BLUE.)

Blue Boar. A public-house sign; the cognisance of Richard III. In Leicester, is a lane in the parish of St. Nicholas, called the Blue Boar Lane, because Richard slept there the night before the battle of Bosworth Field.

The bristly boar, in infant gore,
Wallows beneath the thorny shade.
Gray, "The Bard."

Blue Book. Parliamentary reports presented by royalty to both Houses of Parliament. Each volume is in folio, and covered with a blue wrapper.

Blue Bottle. A policeman; so called from the colour of his dress. Shakespeare makes Doll Tearsheet denounce the Beadle as a "blue-bottle rogue" (2 Hen. IV., v. 4).

Blue Caps or Blue Bonnets. The Scotch.

He is there, too, . . . and a thousand blue caps more.—Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV.," ii. 4.

England shall many a day
Tell of the bloody fray,
When the blue bonnets came over the border.
Sir Walter Scott.

Blue-coat School. Christ's Hospital is so called because the boys there wear a long blue coat girded at the loins with a leather belt. Those who attend the mathematical school are termed King's boys, and those who constitute the highest class are Grecians.

Blue Devils (or) A fit of the blues. A fit of spleen, low spirits. Roach and Esquirol affirm, from observation, that indigo dyers are especially subject to melancholy; and that those who dye scarlet are choleric. Paracelsus also asserts that blue is injurious to the health and spirits. There may, therefore, be more science in calling melancholy blue than is generally allowed. The German blei (lead) which gives rise to our slang word blue or bluey (lead), seems to bear upon the "leaden downcast eyes" of melancholy.

Blue-gowns. The bedesmen, to whom the kings of Scotland distributed certain alms. Their dress was a cloak or gown of coarse blue cloth, with a pewter badge; and their number was equal to that of the king's years, so that an extra one was added every returning birthday. These paupers were privileged to ask alms through the whole realm of Scotland. No new member has been added since 1833. (See GABERLUNZIE.)

Blue Hen. Captain Caldwell used to say that no cock could be truly game whose mother was not a blue hen. As Caldwell commanded the 1st Delaware regiment in the war, the State of Delaware was nicknamed blue hen.

Your mother was a blue hen, no doubt. A reproof given to a braggart. (See above.)

Blue-light Federalists. A name given to those Americans who were believed to have made friendly ("blue-light") signals to British ships in the war. (1812.)

Blue-mantle. The English pursuivant-at-arms is so called from his official robe.

Blue-noses. The Nova Scotians.

Blue Peter. A flag with a blue ground and white square in the centre, hoisted as a signal that the ship is about to sail. Peter is a corruption of the French partir (leave or notice of departure), the flag being hoisted to give notice to the town that any person having a money-claim may make it before the ship starts, and that all about to sail are to come on board.

Blue Ruin. Gin. Called blue from its tint, and ruin from its effects.

Blue Stocking. A female pedant. In 1400 a society of ladies and gentlemen was formed at Venice, distinguished by the colour of their stockings, and called de la calza. It lasted till 1590, when it appeared in Paris, and was the rage among the lady savantes. From France it came to England in 1780, when Mrs. Montague displayed the badge of the Bas-bleu club at her evening assemblies. Mr. Stillingfleet was a constant attendant of the soirées, and went by the name of Blue Stockings. The last of the clique was Miss Monckton, afterwards countess of Cork, who died 1840.

Bluff Harry or Hal. Henry VIII., so called from his bluff and burly manners. (1491-1547.)

Blunderbore. The giant who was drowned, because Jack scuttled his boat. — Jack the Giant Killer.

Blunderbuss. A blunderer; the pun is on the word blunder.

Blunt. Silver money, from the French blond. So copper coins are called browns; gold, yellow boys; and the silver or white penny a wgn (Welsh, gwyn, white). There is also a small white Moorish coin called blanquillo.

Blunt, Major-General. An old cavalier officer, rough in speech, but very brave and honest, of good understanding, and a true patriot. — Shadwell, "The Volunteers."

Bo or Boh, in old Runic, was a fierce Gothic captain, son of Odin. His name was used by his soldiers when they would fight or surprise the enemy. — Sir William Temple.

From this name comes our bogie, a hobgoblin or little Bo. Gifford castle is called Bo Hall, being said to have been constructed by bogies or magic. (See BOGIE.)

You cannot say Bo! to a goose—i.e., you are a coward who dare not say bo! even to a fool. When Ben Jonson was introduced to a nobleman, the peer was so struck with his homely appearance that he exclaimed, "What! are you Ben Jonson? Why, you look as if you could not say Bo! to a goose." "Bo!" exclaimed the witty dramatist, turning to the peer, and making his bow.

Bo-tree. A corruption of Bodhidra'ma (the tree of wisdom), under which Sakya-muni used to sit, when he concocted the system called Buddhism.

Boa. Pliny says the word is from box (a cow), and arose from the supposition that the boa sucked the milk of cows.

Boaner'gēs (4 syl.). A pet parson of the lion genus, who anathematizes and deals out his doctrines of election and reprobation with fearless assurance. Mrs. Oliphant, in her "Salem Chapel," describes this popular pulpiter as one who "preaches real rousing-up discourses, but sits down pleasant to his tea, and makes himself friendly."

Boanerges (sons of thunder). A name given to James and John, the sons of Zeb'edee, because they wanted to call down "fire from heaven" to consume the Samaritans for not "receiving" the Lord Jesus (Luke ix. 54; see Mark iii. 17).

Boar. The Boar. Richard III.; so called from his cognisance.

The wretched, bloody, and usurping boar
That spoiled your summer fields and fruitful vines;
This foul swine . . . lies now . . .
Near to the town of Leicester, as we learn.

Shakespeare, "Richard III.," v. 3.

The bristled Baptist boar. So Dryden denominates the Anabaptists in his "Hind and Panther."

The bristled Baptist boar, impure as he (the ape),
But whitened with the foam of sanctity,
With fat pollutions filled the sacred place,
And mountains levelled in his furious race.

Pt. i.

The wild boar of Ardennes (Le sanglier des Ardennes). Guillaume, comte de la Marek, so called because he was fierce as the wild boar, which he delighted to hunt. Introduced by Sir Walter Scott as William, count of la Marek, in "Quentin Durward."

Boar's Head. The Christmas dish. Freyr, the Scandinavian god of peace and plenty, used to ride on the boar Guillinbursti; his festival was held at Yuletide (winter solstice), when a boar was sacrificed to his honour.

The Boar's Head. This tavern, made immortal by Shakespeare, used to stand in Eastcheap, on the site of the present statue of William IV. It was the cognisance of the Gordons, the progenitor of which clan slew, in the forest of Huntley, a wild boar, the terror of all the Merse. (1093.)

Board. The Board of Trade, Board of Admiralty, Board of Directors, &c. So called from the custom, still observed at the universities, of writing the members' names on a board. Hence, to be a member is to have one's name on the board.

To board. To feed and lodge together, is taken from the custom of the university members, &c., dining together at a common table or board.

Board, in sea-phrase, is all that space of the sea which a ship passes over in tacking. Hence the phrases—

To make a good board,
To make a short board,
To make a stern board,
To leave the land on back-board, &c.

I'll board him presently ("Hamlet," ii. 2). Accost. (French, aborder, to accost.)

I will board her, tho' she chide as loud
As thunder.
Shakespeare, "Taming of the Shrew," i. 2.

Boat. Both in the same boat. Both treated alike; both placed in the same conditions. The reference is to the boat launched when a ship is a wreck.

To be represented in a boat is the ordinary symbol of apotheosis. Many sovereigns are so represented on coins.

Boatswain. The officer who has charge of the boats, sails, rigging, anchors, cordage, cables, and colours. Swain is the Saxon swēin (a boy, servant), Swedish swēn. Hence, a shepherd is a swain, and a sweetheart is a woman's servant or swain.

Boatswain. The name of Byron's favourite dog, buried in Newstead Abbey garden.

Boaz and Jachin. The names of the two brazen pillars set up by Solomon at the entrance of his temple—Boaz (strength) on the left hand, and Jachin (stability) on the right (1 Kings vii. 21).

Two pillars raising by their skill profound,
Boaz and Jachin, thro' the East renowned,
Crabbe, "Borough."

Bob. A shilling. A contraction of baubee (q.v.).

To give the bob to any one. To deceive, to balk. The word is a corruption of pop. The bob of a pendulum or mason's plumb-line is the weight that pops backwards and forwards. The bob of a fishing-line pops up and down when fish nibble at the bait. To bob for apples or cherries is to try and catch them while they swing backwards and forwards. As this is very deceptive, it is easy to see how the word signifies to balk, &c. (See BO-PEEP.)

To bob means also to thump, and a bob is a blow.

Whom our fathers
Have in their own land beaten, bobbed, and thumped.

Shakespeare, "Richard III.," v. 3.

He that a fool doth very wisely hit,
Doth very foolishly, although he smart,
Not to seem senseless of the bob.
Shakespeare, "As You Like It," ii. 7.

Bear a bob. Be brisk. The allusion is to the bobbing of apples, in which it requires great agility and quickness to avoid a thump on the mouth.

Bob'adil. A military braggart of the first water. Captain Bobadil is a character in Ben Jonson's comedy of "Every Man in his Humour."

Bobadil is the author's best invention, and is worthy to march in the same regiment with Bessus and Pistol, Parolles, and the Copper Captain (q.v.).—B. W. Procter.

Bobbish. Pretty bobbish. Pretty well (in spirits and health), from bob, brisk. (See above.) A very ancient expression.

Bobby. A policeman; so called either because they bob or beat with a staff, or because Sir Robert Peel introduced the force, at least into Ireland. Probably the pun has given currency to the word.

Bockland or Bookland. Land severed from the folcland, and converted into a private estate of perpetual inheritance by a short and simple deed or bock.

Bod. The divinity invoked by Indian women who desire fecundity. Children born after an invocation to Bod must be redeemed, or else serve in the temple of the goddess. (Indian mythology.)

Boden-See. The Lake of Constance is so called because the Bodmanno, or king's messenger of the Carolingian dynasty, used to reside in the vicinity.

Bodkin. To ride bodkin. To ride in a carriage between two others, the accommodation being only for two. You are a little instrument sheathed like a bodkin or small dagger, and thrust at the side of your companions.

He himself might his quietus make
With a bare bodkin.
Shakespeare, "Hamlet," iii. 1.

Bodle. A Scotch coin, worth the sixth of a penny; so called from Bothwell, a mint-master.

Bodle'ian Library (Oxford). So called because it was restored by Sir Thomas Bodley, in 1597.

Bœmond ("Jerusalem Delivered"). The Christian king of Antioch who tried to teach his subjects arts, laws, and religion. Pyrrhus delivered to him a fort, by which Antioch was taken by the Christians after an eight months' siege. Bœmond and Roge'ro were two brothers, the sons of Roberto Guiscardo, of the Norman race.

Bœot'ian. A rude, unlettered person; a dull blockhead. The ancient Bœotians took no interest in the Athenian refinement and intellectual greatness. They loved agriculture and pastoral pursuits far better; so the witty Athenians used to say they were dull and thick as their own atmosphere. Yet Hesiod, Pindar, Corinna, Plutarch, Pelop'idas, and Epaminondas were all Bœotians.

Boëthius. Last of the Latin authors, properly so called. Alfred the Great translated his "De Consolatione Philosophiæ" into Anglo-Saxon.

Bogie. A scarecrow, a goblin. (Bulgarian, bog, a god; Slavonic, bogu; Welsh, bwg, a goblin, our bugbear.)

The Assyrian mothers used to scare their children with the name of Narsēs (Gibbon); the Syrians with that of Richard Cœur de Lion; the Dutch with Boh, the Gothic general (Warton); the Jews with Lilith; the Turks with Mathias Corv'nus, the Hungarian king; and the English with the name of Lunsford (q.v.). (See Bo.)

Bo'gio (in "Orlando Furioso"). One of the allies of Charlemagne. He promised his wife to return within six moons, but was slain by Dardinello.

Bogomi'li. A religious sect of the twelfth century, whose chief seat was Thrace. So called from their constant repetition of the words, "Lord, have mercy upon us," which, in Bulgarian, is bog (Lord), milui (have mercy).

Bogtrotters. Irish tramps. So called from their skill in crossing the Irish bogs, from tussock to tussock, either as guides or to escape pursuit.

Bogus. Bogus currency. Forged or sham bills. Bogus transactions. Fraudulent transactions. The word is a corruption of Borghese, a swindler who did a great business in supplying America with counterfeit bills, bills on fictitious banks, and sham mortgages.—Boston Daily Courier.

Bohe'mia. The Queen of Bohemia. A public-house sign in honour of lady Elizabeth Stuart, daughter of James I., who was married to Frederick, elector palatine, for whom Bohemia was raised into a separate kingdom. It is through this lady that the Brunswick family succeeded to the throne of Great Britain.

Bohe'mian. A gipsy, an impostor. The first gypsies that entered France came from Bohemia, and appeared before Paris in 1427. They were not allowed to enter the city, but were lodged at La Chapelle St. Denis.

A slang term applied to literary men and artists of loose and irregular habits, living by what they can pick up by their brains.

Never was there an editor with less about him of the literary Bohemian. A strong contrast to his unhappy contemporary, Chatterton.—Fortnightly Review, "Paston Letter."

Bohe'mian Brethren. A religious sect, formed out of the remnants of the Hussites. They rose at Prague in the fifteenth century, and were nicknamed Cave-dwellers, because they lurked in caves to avoid persecution.

Boi'es (2 syl.). Priests of the savages of Florida. Each priest has his special idol, which must be invoked by the fumes of tobacco. (American Indian mythology.)

Boil. Old people's boil. A "push," or boil, on the nape of the neck. So called because the elderly are most subject to it.

Boiling-point. He was at boiling-point. Very angry indeed. Properly the point of heat at which water, under ordinary conditions, boils. (212° Fahrenheit, 100° Centigrade, 80° Reaumur.)

Boissere'an Collection. A collection at Stuttgart of the early specimens of German art, made by the three brothers Boisseree.

Boiva'ni. Goddess of destruction. (Hindu Mythology.)

Bo'lay or Boley. The giant which the Indians say conquered heaven, earth, and the inferno. (Indian mythology.)

Bold. Bold as Beauchamp (Beech-um). It is said that Thomas Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, with one squire and six archers, overthrew 100 armed men at Hoggess, in Normandy, in 1346.

This exploit is not more incredible than that attributed to Capta!-de-Buch, who, with forty followers, cleared Meaux of the insurgents called "La Jaquerie," 7,000 of whom were slain by this little band, or trampled to death in the narrow streets as they fled panic-struck (1358).

Bole'rium Promontory. The Land's End.

Bole'ro. A Spanish dance; so called from the name of the inventor.

Bolingbroke. Henry IV. of England; so called from Bolingbroke, in Lincolnshire, where he was born. (1366, 1399-1413.)

Bollen. Swollen. (Saxon, bolge.) Hence "joints bolne-big" (Golding), and "bolne in pride" (Phaer).

The barley was in the ear, and the flax was boiled.—Exod. ix. 31.

Bolo'gna Stone, being placed in the light, will imbibe and for some time retain it, so as to illuminate a dark place.—Richardson.

Bolognese School. There were three periods to the Bolognese School in painting—the Early, the Roman, and the Eclectic. The first was founded by Marco Zoppo, in the fifteenth century, and its best exponent was Francia. The second was founded in the sixteenth century by Bagnacavallo, and its chief exponents were Primaticcio, Tibaldi, and Nicolo dell' Abate. The third was founded by the Carracci, at the close of the sixteenth century, and its best masters have been Domenichino, Lanfranco, Guido, Solimena, Guercino, and Albani.

Bolt. An arrow, a shaft (Saxon, bolta; Danish, bolt; Greek, ballo, to cast; Latin, pello, to drive). A door bolt is a shaft of wood or iron, which may be shot or driven forward to secure a door. A thunderbolt is a shaft cast from the clouds. Cupid's bolt is Cupid's arrow.

The fool's bolt is soon spent. A foolish archer shoots all his arrows so heedlessly that he leaves himself no resources in case of need.

I must bolt: be off quickly. To bolt out of the house: to run off unceremoniously.

To bolt food: to swallow it quickly without waiting to chew it.

To bolt out the truth: to blurt it out without consideration.

All these expressions refer to the flight of bolts or arrows.

Bolt in Tun, a public-house sign, is heraldic. In heraldry it is applied to a bird-bolt, in pale piercing through a tun. The punning crest of Serjeant Bolton, who died 1787, was "on a wreath a tun erect proper, transpierced by an arrow fesseways or." Another family of the same name has for crest "a tun with a bird-bolt through it proper." A third, harping on the same string, has "a bolt gule in a tun or." The public-house sign distinguished by this device or name adopted it in honour of some family claiming one of the devices mentioned above.

Bolt Upright. Straight as an arrow. A bolt is an arrow with a round knob at the end, used for shooting at rooks, &c.

Bolton. The Bolton Ass. This creature is said to have chewed tobacco and taken snuff.—Dr. Doran.

Bate me an ace, quoth Bolton. Give me some advantage. What you say must be qualified, as it is too strong. Ray says that a collection of proverbs were once presented to the Virgin Queen, with the assurance that it contained all the proverbs in the language; but the queen rebuked the boaster with the proverb, "Bate me an ace, quoth Bolton," a proverb omitted in the compilation. John Bolton was one of the courtiers who used to play cards and dice with Henry VIII., and flattered the king by asking him to allow him an ace or some advantage in the game.

Bolus. An apothecary. Apothecaries are so called because they administer boluses. Similarly Mrs. Suds is a washerwoman; Boots is the shoeblack of an inn, &c.

George Colman adopts the name for his apothecary, who wrote his labels in rhyme, one of which was—

When taken,
To be well shaken;

but the patient being shaken, instead of the mixture, died.

Bomba. King Bomba. A nickname given to Ferdinand II., late king of Naples, in consequence of his cruel bombardment of Messina in 1848, in which the slaughter and destruction of property was most wanton.

Bomba II. is the nickname given to his son Francis II. for bombarding Palermo in 1860. He is also called Bombatino (Little Bomba).

Another meaning equally applicable is "Vox et præterea nihil," Bomba being the explosion made by puffing out the cheeks, and causing them suddenly to collapse. Liar, break-promise, worthless.

Bombast literally means the produce of the bombyx, but is applied to cotton used instead of silk; hence bombase (cotton), bombazine (silk cloth crossed with wool), fustian. In literature bombast is cotton palmed off on the public for silk. Bomb, the shell filled with gunpowder, is the bombycia arundo, or cane in which silk-worms were carried from place to place.

We have received your letters full of love, . . .
And in our maiden council rated them . . .
As bombast and as lining to the time.
Shakespeare, "Love's Labour's Lost," v. 2.

Bombastēs Furio'so. One who talks big and uses long sesquipedalian words; the ideal of bombast. He is the hero of a burlesque opera so called, by William Barnes Rhodes.

Bombas'tus. The family name of Paracelsus. He is said to have kept a small devil prisoner in the pommel of his sword.

Bombastus kept a devil's bird
Shut in the pommel of his sword.
That taught him all the cunning pranks
Of past and future mountebanks.
Hudibras, pt. ii. 3.

Bon Mot (French). A good or witty saying; a pun; a clever repartee.

Bon Vivant (French). A free liver; one who indulges in the "good things of the table."

Bona Fidē. Without subterfuge or deception; really and truly. Literally, in good faith (Latin).

Bona-ro'ba. A courtesan (Italian). So called from the smartness of their robes or dresses.

We know where the bonarobas were.
Shakespeare, "2 Henry IV.," iii. 2.

Bone (1 syl.). To filch. Probably a corruption of bonnet (a gambling cheat, who sharks your money slyly). A sham bidder at an auction is a bonnet, his object being to run up the price of the articles. These cheats bonnet, or trust the bonnet over the eyes of their victim, that their deception may not be detected.

I have a bone to pick with you. An unpleasant matter to settle with you. At the marriage banquets of the Sicilian poor, the bride's father, after the meal, used to hand the bridegroom a bone, saying, "Pick this bone; for you have taken in hand a much harder task."

Bone of Contention. A disputed point; a point not yet settled. The metaphor is taken from the proverb about "Two dogs fighting for a bone," &c.

Bones. Deucalion, after the deluge, was ordered to cast behind him the bones of his mother, i.e., the stones of mother earth. Those thrown by Deucalion became men, and those thrown by his wife, Pyrrha, became women.

To make no bones about the matter, i.e., no difficulty, no scruple. Dice are called "bones," and the French flutter le dé (to mince the matter) is the opposite of our expression. To make no bones of a thing is not to flatter, or "make much of," or humour the dice, in order to show favour. I do not think the phrase has anything to do with a dog that eats meat, bones and all.

Boned. I boned him. Caught or seized him. (See BONE.)

Bonese (2 syl.). The inhabitants of Bo'ni, one of the Celebes.

Bonfire. A beacon-fire. (Welsh, ban, a beacon, whence banffagl, a lofty blaze; Danish, bønn; Scotch, banefire.) The Athenæum, Oct. 6, 1866, gives several quotations from the materials prepared for the Philological Society's English Dictionary, to show that the word means a fire made of bones; one runs thus, "In the worship of St. John, the people . . . made three manner of fires: one was of clean bones and no wood, and that is called a bonefire; another of clean wood and no bones, and that is called a wood-fire . . . and the third is made of wood and bones, and is called "St. John's fire" (Quatuor Sermones, 1499).

Another quotation is from Leland's "Collectanea," 1550: "I have heard of a custom that is practised in some parts of Lincolshire, where, on some peculiar nights, they make great fires in the publicstreets . . . with bones . . . in memory of burning their dead." This was on the 22nd of May, or Ascension Day. Certainly bone is the more ancient way of spelling the first syllable of the word.

Bon'homie'. Kindness, good nature; free and easy manners; cordial benevolence. (French.)

Bonhomme (2 syl.). Jacques Bonhomme (French). A peasant who ventures to interfere in politics. Hence the peasants' rebellion, in 1358, was called La Jacquerie. The term means "James Goodfellow;" we also often address the poor as "My good fellow."

Bon'iface. A sleek, good-tempered, jolly landlord. From Farquhar's comedy of "The Beaux Stratagem."

A regular British Boniface.—The John Bull.

St. Boniface. The apostle of Germany, an Anglo-Saxon, whose original name was Winfred or Winfrit. (680-750.)

Bonnet. A pretended player at a gaming table, or bidder at an auction, to lure others to play. So called because he blinds the eyes of his dupes, just as if he had struck their bonnet over their eyes. (See BONE.)

A man who sits at a gaming table, and appears to be playing against the table; when a stranger appears the Bonnet generally wins.—The Times.

Bonnet Rouge. The red cap of Liberty worn by the leaders of the French revolution. It is the emblem of Red Republicanism.

Braid Bonnet. The old Scotch cap, made of milled woollen, without seam or lining.

Bonnet Lairds. Local magnates of Scotland, who wore the Braid Bannet.

Glenquarry Bonnet. The highland bonnet, which rises to a point in front.

Bonnet-piece. A gold coin of James V. of Scotland, the king's head on which wears a bonnet. (See BEE.)

He has a green bonnet. Has failed in trade. In France it used to be customary, even in the seventeenth century, for bankrupts to wear a green bonnet (cloth cap).

Bonnyclabber. A drink made of beer and buttermilk. (Irish, baine, milk; clabar, anything that thickens it, as rennet, &c.)

With beer and buttermilk, mingled together . . .
To drink such a bonny-clabber.
Ben Jonson, "The New Inn," i. 3.

Bontemps. Roger Bontemps (French). The personification of "Never say die." The phrase is from Béranger.

Vous pauvres, pleins d'envie;
Vous rich, désireux;
Vous, dont le char dévie
Après un cours heureux;
Vous, qui perdrez peut-être
Des titres éclatans,
Eh! gai! prenez pour maître
Le gros Roger Bontemps.—Béranger.
Ye poor, with envy goaded;
Ye rich, for more who long;
Ye who by fortune loaded,
Find all things going wrong;
Ye who by some disaster
May see your cables break,
From henceforth for your master
Bluff Roger Bontemps take.

Bonus. A bounty over and above the interest of a share in any company. (Latin, bonus questus, a good profit or bounty. The interest or fruit of money put out in an investment was by the Romans called the questus.)

Bonzes (sing. Bon'zè). Indian priests. In China they are the priests of the Fohists; their number is 50,000, and they are represented as idle and dissolute. In Japan they are men of rank and family. In Tonquin every pagoda has at least two bonzès, and some as many as fifty.

Booby. A spiritless fool, who suffers himself to be imposed upon. In the West Indies there is a sort of pelican, called a booby, which allows itself to be attacked by other birds, and yields to them the fish it has taken almost without resistance. In England the Solan goose is called a booby or noddy.

Lady Booby. A caricature on Richardson's "Pam'ela." A vulgar upstart, who tries to seduce Joseph Andrews.—Fielding, "Joseph Andrews."

A booby will never make a hawk. The booby pelican, that allows itself to be fleeced by other birds, will never become a bird of prey itself.

Book (Saxon, bor, a beech-tree; Danish, beuke; German, buche). Beech-bark was employed for carving names on, before the invention of printing.

Here on my trunk's surviving frame,
Carved many a long-forgotten name . . .
As love's own altar, honour me:
Spare, woodman, spare the beechen tree.

Campbell.

Book. Logistilla gave Astolpho, at parting, a book which would tell him anything he wanted to know, and save him from the power of enchantment.—"Orlando Furioso," bk. viii.

Book, bell, and candle. (See BELL.)

He is in my books (or) in my good books. The former is the older form; both mean to be in favour. The word book was at one time used more widely, a single sheet or even a list being called a book. To be in my books is to be on my list of friends. (See BLACK BOOKS.)

Bring him to book. Make him give an account.

To speak by the book. With minute exactness.

To speak without book. Without authority.

He was booked at last. Caught and disposed of.

All these are mercantile terms, and refer to book-keeping.

Beware of a man of one book. Never attempt to controvert the statement of any one in his own special subject. A shepherd who cannot read will know more about sheep than the wisest book-worm. This caution is given by St. Thomas Aquinas.

That does not suit my book. Does not accord with my arrangements. The reference is to betting-books, in which the bets are formally entered.

Book-keeping.

Waste-book. A book in which items are not posted under heads, but are left scattered, as each transaction occurred. (Welsh, gwsgaru, to scatter; Spanish, gastar; Portuguese, gastar, &c.)

Ledger (Dutch, legen, to lay). The book which is laid up in counting-houses; from the same word we have ledger lines in fish-tackling.

Ledger lines in music are lines which lie over or below the staff. (Dutch, legger, to lie.)

Bookworm. One always poring over his books. So called in allusion to the insect that eats holes in books, and lives both in and on its leaves.

Books. Battle of the books. The Boyle controversy. (See BATTLE, BOYLE CONTROVERSY.)

Boot. I will give you that to boot, i.e., in addition. The Anglo-Saxon boot or bōt means "compensation." (Gothic, botjan, profit.)

As any one shall be more powerful . . . or higher in degree, shall he the more deeply make boot for sin, and pay for every misdeed.—Laws of King Ethelred.

Boot of a carriage. A corruption of the French boîte, a box.

Boots. Seven-leagued boots. The boots worn by the giant in the fairy tale, called "The Seven-leagued Boots." These boots would stride over seven leagues at a pace.

I measure five feet ten inches without my boots. The allusion is to the chopine or high-heeled boot, worn at one time to increase the stature. Hamlet says of the lady actress, "You are nearer heaven than when I saw you last, by the altitude of a chopine."—ii. 2.

Boots. An instrument of torture made of four pieces of narrow board nailed together, of a competent length to fit the leg. The leg being placed therein, wedges were inserted till the sufferer confessed or fainted.

All your empiries could never do the like cure upon the gout as the rack in England, or your Scotch boots.—Marston, "The Malcontent."

To be in his boots. To be very tipsy. (Welsh, bozi, pron. boot-zi, to be saturated with liquor.)

Booth. Husband of Amelia.—Fielding, "Amelia."

Bootless errand. An unprofitable or futile message. The Saxon bot means 'reparation'—'overplus to profit'; as "I will give you that to boot;" "what boots it me?" (what does it profit me).

I sent him,
Bootless home and weather-heaten back.
"1 Henry IV," iii. 1.

You have often
Begun to tell me what I am, but stopped,
And left me to a bootless inquisition.
Miranda to Prospero, "The Tempest," i. 2.

Boötes (Bo-o'-tes), or the ox-driver, a constellation. According to ancient mythology, Boötes invented the plough, to which he yoked two oxen, and at death, being taken to heaven with his plough and oxen, was made a constellation. Homer calls it "the wagoner."

Wide o'er the spacious regions of the north,
That see Boötes urge his lardy wain.
Thomson, "Winter."

Boozy. Partly intoxicated. (Russian, busa, millet-beer; Medical Latin, buzza, from bua, to fill; Welsh, bozi; Old Dutch, bayzen, to tipple.)

In Egypt there is a beer called "Boozer," which is intoxicating.—Morning Chronicle, Aug. 27, 1852.

Bor, in Norfolk, is a familiar term of address to a lad or young man; as, "Well, bor, I saw the morthor you spoke of"—i.e., "Well, sir, I saw the lass. . . ." "Bor" is the Dutch boer, a farmer; and "mor" the Dutch moer, a female.

Borach'io. A drunkard. From the Spanish borach'oe or borrach'o, a bottle made of pig's skin, with the hair inside, dressed with resin and pitch to keep the wine sweet.—Minsheu.

Borachio. A follower of Don John, in "Much Ado About Nothing," who thus plays upon his own name:—

I will, like a true drunkard (Borachio), utter all to thee. (iii. 5.)

Borak or Al Borak (the lightning). The horse brought by Gabriel to carry Mahomet to the seventh heaven. It had the face of a man, but the cheeks of a horse; its eyes were like jacinths, but brilliant as the stars; it had the wings of an eagle, spoke with the voice of a man, and glittered all over with radiant light. This creature was received into Paradise. (See CAMEL.)

Bord Halfpenny. A toll paid by the Saxons to the lord for the privilege of having a bord or bench at some fair for the sale of articles.

Borda'rii or Bordmen. A class of agriculturists superior to the Villa'ni, who paid their rent by supplying the lord's board with eggs and poultry.—Domesday Book.

Border Minstrel. Sir Walter Scott, who traced his descent to the dukes of Buccleuch, the great border family. (1771-1832.)

The Border. The frontier of England and Scotland, which, from the eleventh to the fifteenth century, was the field of constant forays, and a most fertile source of ill blood between north and south Britain.

March, march, Ettrick and Teviotdale;
Why, my lads, dinna march forward in order?
March, march, Eskdale and Liddesdale—
All the blue bonnets are over the border.
Sir Walter Scott.

Bordlands. Lands kept by lords in Saxon times for the supply of their own board or table.

Bordlode. Service paid by bordmen, or borda'rii, for the use of the land which they occupied.

Bordon. This family name is from their heraldic device, three bords or pilgrims' staves.

Bore, in pugilistic language, is one who bears or presses on a man so as to force him to the ropes of the ring by his physical weight; figuratively, one who bears or presses on you by his pertinacity.

All beggars are liable to rebuffs, with the certainty besides of being considered bores.

Prince Albert, 1859.

Bore'al. Having an Auro'ra Borea'lis.

In radiant streams,
Bright over Europe, bursts the Boreal morn.
Thomson, "Autumn."

Bor'eas. The north wind. According to mythology, he was the son of Astræus, a Titan, and Eos, the morning, and lived in a cave of Mount Hæmus, in Thrace. (Greek, boros, voracious, or boa-reo, to flow with violence; Russian, boria, storm; Hebrew, borach, rapidity.)

Cease, rude Boreas! blustering railer.

Debutin.

Borgese (Bor-ga'-zy). The princess Borgese pulled down a church contiguous to her palace, because the incense turned her sick and the organ made her head ache.

Bor'gia. (See LUCREZIA.)

Bormo'nia or Borro. Two divinities of the ancient Sequanians and Eduans of Gaul, who presided over the hot springs. It is said that Bourbonne-des-Bains is named from Bormon.

Boroon. An Indian sea-god.

Borough English is where the youngest son inherits instead of the eldest. It is of Saxon origin, and is so called to distinguish it from the Norman custom. Wharton says that the custom obtains in the manors of Lambeth, Hackney, part of Islington, Heston, Edmonton, &c.—Law Lexicon.

Borowe. St. George to borowe, i.e., St. George being surety. (Danish, borgen, bail; Swedish, borgau, a giving of bail.)

Borr. Son of Ymer, and father of Odin, Ville, Ve, and Hertha or Earth. The Celtic priests claimed descent from this deity. (Celtic mythology.)

Borrow. A pledge. To borrow is to take something which we pledge ourselves to return.

Ye may retain as borrows my two priests.—Scott, "Ivanhoe," c. xxxiii.

Bortell. The bull, in the tale of "Reynard the Fox."

Bosh. Nonsense (Turkish, bosh lakerdi, silly talk; German, bossch, swipes). A gipsy word introduced with Morier's novel, "Hajji Baba," in 1828.

Bossum. One of the two chief deities of the negroes on the Gold Coast, the other being Demonio. Bossum, the principle of good, is said to be white; and Demonio, the principle of evil, black. (African mythology.)

Bostal or Borstal. A narrow road-way up the steep ascent of hills or downs. (Anglo-Saxon, biorth, a hill; stigellē, a rising path; our stile.)

Bot'any means a treatise on fodder (Greek, bot'anē, fodder, from boskein, to feed). The science of plants would be "phytol'ogy," from phylon-logos (plant-spell).

Botch. A patch. Botch and patch are the same word; the older form was bodge, whence boggle. (Italian, pezzo, pronounced putzo.)

Bother, i.e., pother (Hibernian). Halliwell gives us blother, which he says means to chatter idly.

Grose suggests both-ears as the derivation, and defends his guess by the remark that when two persons are talking at the same time, one on one side and one on the other, the person talked to is perplexed and annoyed. The fact is certain, and the derivation must go for what it is worth.

Sir, cries the umpire, cease your pother,

The creature's neither one nor t'other.

Lloyd, "The Chameleon."

Bothie System. The Scotch system of building a sort of barrack in different parts of the town for young unmarried men. (Gaelic, bothag, a cot or hut, our booth.)

The bothie system prevails, more or less, in the eastern and north-eastern districts.—J. Begg, D.D.

Botley Assizes. The joke is to ask a Botley man, "When the assizes are coming on?" and an innuendo is supposed to be implied to the tradition that the men of Botley once hanged a man because he could not drink so deep as his neighbours.

Bottle. Looking for a needle in a bottle of hay. Looking for a very small article amidst a mass of other things.

Bottle is a diminutive of the French botte, a bundle; as botte de foin, a bundle of hay.

Hang me in a bottle. (See CAT.)

Bottle-chart. A chart to show the track of sealed bottles thrown from ships into the sea.

Bottle-holder. One who gives moral but not material support. The allusion is to boxing or prize-fighting, where each combatant has a bottle-holder to wipe off blood, refresh with water, and do other services to encourage his man to persevere and win.

Lord Palmerston considered himself the bottle-holder of oppressed States. He was the steadfast partisan of constitutional liberty in every part of the world.—The Times.

Bottle-imps. The Hebrew word for familiar spirits is oboth, leather bottles, to indicate that the magicians were wont to imprison in bottles those spirits which their spells had subdued.

Bottled Beer is said to have been discovered by dean Nowell as a most excellent beverage. The dean was very fond of fishing, and took a bottle of beer with him in his excursions. One day, being disturbed, he buried his bottle under the grass, and when he disinterred it some ten days afterwards, found it so greatly improved that he ever after drank bottled beer.

Bottom. Nick Bottom, the weaver. A man who fancies he can do everything, and do it better than any one else. Shakespeare has drawn him as profoundly ignorant, brawny, mock heroic, and with an overflow of self-conceit. He is in one part of "Midsummer Night's Dream" represented with an ass's head, and Titania, queen of the fairies, under a spell, caresses him as an Adonis.

When Goldsmith, jealous of the attention which a dancing monkey attracted, said, "I can do that," he was but playing Bottom.—R. G. White.

A ship's bottom is that part which is used for freight or stowage.

Goods imported in British bottoms are those which come in our own vessels.

Goods imported in foreign bottoms are those which come in foreign ships.

A full bottom is where the lower half of the hull is so disposed as to allow large stowage.

A sharp bottom is when a ship is capable of speed.

Never venture all in one bottom—i.e., one ship. "Do not put all your eggs into one basket."

A horse of good bottom means of good stamina, good foundation.

Bottomless. The bottomless pit. A ludicrous skit on William Pitt, who was remarkably thin.

Botty. Conceited. The frog that tried to look as big as an ox was a "botty" frog (Norfolk). A similar word is "swell," though not identical in meaning. "Bumpkin" and "bumptious" are of similar construction. (Welsh, bot, a round body, our bottle: both, the boss of a shield; bothel, a rotundity.)

Bouders or Boudons. A tribe of giants and evil genii, the guard of Shiva. (Indian mythology.)

Boudoir, properly speaking, is the room to which a lady retires when she is in the sulks. (French, bouder, to pout or sulk.)

The first boudoirs were those of the mistresses of Louis XV. (See BOWER.)

Bougie. A wax candle; so called from Bougieh, in Algeria, whence the wax was imported.

Boule or Boule-work. A kind of marquetry; so called from André Charles Boule, a cabinetmaker, to whom Louis XIV. gave apartments in the Louvre. (1642-1732.)

Boul'janus. An idol worshipped at Nantes, in ancient Gaul. An inscription was found to this god in 1592. (Celtic mythology.)

Bouncer. That's a bouncer, a gross exaggeration, a braggart's lie. (French, bouclir, to leap; Dutch, bonzen; our bounce.)

He speaks plain cannon, fire, and smoke, and bounce. Shakespeare, "King John," ii. 2.

Bounty. Queen Anne's Bounty. The produce of the first-fruits and tenths due to the crown, made over by queen Anne to a corporation established in the year 1704, for the purpose of augmenting church livings under £50 a-year.

Bouquet. French for nosegay.

The bouquet of wine, also called its nosegay, is its aroma.

Bouquet de crotte. Splashes of mud, especially on the lower part of the trousers.

Bourbon. So named from the castle and seignior of Bourbon, in the old province of Bourbonnais. The Bourbon family is a branch of the Cap'et stock, through the brother of Philippe le Bel.

Bourgeoisie (French). The merchants, manufacturers, and master-tradesmen considered as a class. Citoyen is a freeman, a citizen of the state; bourgeois, an individual of the Bourgeoisie class. Molière has a comedy entitled "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme."

Bouse. (See BOOZY.)

Boustrap'a. Napoleon III. The word is compounded of the first syllables Bou-logne and Stra-sbourg, and alludes to his escapades in 1840 and 1836.

Bouts-rimés (end-rhymes). A person writes a line, and gives the last word to another person, who writes a second line to rhyme with it, and so on. Dean Swift employs the term for a poem, each stanza of which terminates with the same word. He has given a poem of nine verses, each of which ends with Domitilla, to which, of course, he finds nine rhymes. (French.)

Bovey Coal. A lignite found at Bovey, in Devonshire.

Bow (to rhyme with flow).

He has two strings to his bow. Two means of accomplishing his object; if one fails, he can try the other. The allusion is to the custom of the British bowmen carrying a reserve string in case of accident.

Draw not your bow till your arrow is fixed. Have everything ready before you begin. The allusion is to the custom of fixing the arrow to the bowstring before drawing it.

He has a famous bow up at the castle. Said of a braggart or pretender.

To unstring the bow will not heal the wound (Italian). René of Anjou, king of Sicily, on the death of his wife, Isabeau of Lorraine, adopted the emblem of a bow with the string broken, and with the words given above for the motto, by which he meant, "Lamentation for the loss of his wife was but poor satisfaction."

Bow (to rhyme with now).

On the bow. Something seen over the bow of a ship within a range of 45° on one side or the other of the prow.

Bow-bells. Born within sound of Bow-bells. A true cockney. St. Mary-le-Bow has long had one of the most celebrated bell-peals in London. John Dun, mercer, gave in 1472 two tenements to maintain the ringing of Bow-bell every night at nine o'clock, to direct travellers on the road to town; and in 1520 William Copland gave a bigger bell for the purpose of "sounding a retreat from work." Bow Church is nearly the centre of the city.

Bow-hand. The left hand, the hand which holds the bow.

To be too much of the bow-hand. To fail in a design; not be sufficiently dexterous.

Bow-wow Word. A word in imitation of the sound made, as hiss, cackle, murmur, cuckoo, whip-poor-will, &c. The word is suggested by Max Müller. I should prefer the word sound-spell in imitation of the word god-spell (gospel).

Bowden. Not every man can be vicar of Bowden. Not every one can occupy the first place. Bowden is one of the best livings in Cheshire. (Cheshire proverb.)

Bower. A lady's private room. (Saxon, bur, a chamber.) (See BOUDOIR.)

Bower Anchor. The smaller anchor or anchors carried at the ship's bow.

Bower of Bliss, in Wandering Island, the enchanted residence of Acrasia, destroyed by Sir Guyon.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. ii.

Bowie Knife. A long, stout knife, carried by hunters in the Western states of America. So called from Colonel Jim Bowie, one of the most daring characters of the States.

Bowing. We uncover the head when we wish to salute any one with respect; but the Jews, Turks, Siamese, &c., uncover their feet. The reason is this: With us the chief act of investiture is crowning or placing a cap on the head; but in the East it is putting on the slippers. To take off our symbol of honour is to confess we are but "the humble servant" of the person whom we thus salute.

Bowled. He was bowled out. Was ousted. A term in cricket.

Bowling. Tom Bowling. The type of a model sailor in Smollett's "Roderick Random."

Here a sheer hulk lies poor Tom Bowling,
The darling of the crew.—Dublin.

Bowyer God. The same as the "archer god," meaning Cupid.

The Sylvan goddess and the bowyer god.
Camoens, "Lusiad," bk. 135.

Box. I've got into the wrong box. I am out of my element. Lord Lyttelton used to say he ought to have been brought up to some business; that whenever he went to Vauxhall and heard the mirth of his neighbours, he used to fancy pleasure was in every box but his own. Wherever he went for happiness, he somehow always got into the wrong box. (See CHRISTMAS BOX.)

A box o' the ears. This is the Greek pux (a fist), a blow with the fist. A boxer is one who uses his fists.

For the box o' the ear that the prince gave you, he gave it like a rude prince, and you took it like a sensible lord.—Shakespeare, "2 Henry IV.," i. 2.

Box and Cox. The two chief characters in John M. Morton's farce, usually called "Box and Cox."

Box the Compass is Spanish, boxar (to sail round).

Box Days. Two days in spring and autumn, and one at Christmas, during vacation, in which pleadings may be filed. This custom was established in 1690, for the purpose of expediting business. Each judge has a private box with a slit, into which informations may be placed on box days, and the judge, who alone has the key, examines the papers in private.

Boxing. (Greek, pux, the fist; Irish, bogsa; German, buchshum.)

Boxing Day. (See CHRISTMAS BOX.)

Boy Bachelor. William Wotton, D.D., was admitted at St. Catherine's Hall before he was ten, and took his B.A. when he was twelve and a-half. (1666-1726.)

Boy Bishop. St. Nicholas. From his cradle he is said to have manifested marvellous indications of piety, and was therefore selected for the patron saint of boys. (Fourth century.)

Boy Bishop. The custom of choosing a boy from the cathedral choir, &c., on St. Nicholas Day (6th December), as a mock bishop, is very ancient. The boy possessed episcopal honour for three weeks, and the rest of the choir were his prebends. If he died during the time of his prelate, he was buried in pontica libus. Probably the reference is to Jesus Christ sitting in the Temple among the doctors while he was a boy. The custom was abolished in the reign of Henry VIII. In Salisbury cathedral the visitor is shown a very small sarcophagus which the verger says was made for a boy bishop.

Boyle Controversy. A book-battle between the Hon. Charles Boyle, third earl of Orrery, and the famous Bentley, respecting the "Epistles of Phalaris." Charles Boyle edited the "Epistles of Phalaris" in 1695. Two years later, Bentley published his celebrated "Dissertation," to prove that the epistles were not written till the second century after Christ, instead of six centuries before that epoch. In 1699 he published another rejoinder, and utterly annihilated the Boyleists.

Boyle's Law. "The volume of a gas is inversely as the pressure." If we double the pressure on a gas, its volume is reduced to one-half; if we quadruple the pressure, it will be reduced to one-fourth; and so on. So called from the Hon. Robert Boyle. (1627-1691.)

Boyle Lectures. Eight sermons a year in defence of Christianity, founded by the Hon. Robert Boyle.

Boz. Charles Dickens.

Boz, my signature in the Morning Chronicle (he tells us, was the nickname of a pet child, a younger brother, whom I had dubbed Moses, in honour of the "Vicar of Wakefield;" which, being pronounced Bozis, got shortened into Boz.)

Bozzy. James Boswell, the biographer of Dr. Johnson. (1740-1795.)

Brabançonne. A Belgian patriotic song, composed in the revolution of 1830, and so named from Brabant, of which Brussels is the chief city.

Brabancons. Troops of adventurers and bandits, who made war a trade, and lent themselves for money to any one who would pay them. So called from Brabant, their great nest. (Twelfth century.)

Brace. The Brace Tavern, south-east corner of King's Bench; originally kept by two brothers named Partridge, i.e., a brace of birds.

Brad'amant or Bradaman'të. Sister of Rinaldo, in Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso." She is represented as a most wonderful Christian Amazon, possessed of an irresistible spear, which unhorsed every knight that it touched. The same character appears in the "Orlando Innamorata" of Bojardo.

Bradley Headstone. An upper village schoolmaster, iron-willed, of most headstrong purpose, and uncontrolled passion. He loves Lizzie Hexham, and dogs Wrayburn for several weeks to murder him, because Lizzie loves the gay gentleman better than the plotting pedagogue.—Dickens, "Mutual Friend."

Bradwardine, Rose. The daughter of Baron Bradwardine, and the heroine of Scott's "Waverley." She is in love with young Waverley, and ultimately marries him.

Brag. A game at cards. So called because the players brag of their cards to induce the company to make bets. The principal sport of the game is occasioned by any player bragging that he holds a better hand than the rest of the party, which is declared by saying "I brag," and staking a sum of money on the issue.—Hoyle.

Brag is a good dog, but Holdfast is a better. Talking is all very well, but doing is far better.

Jack Brag. A vulgar, pretentious braggart, who gets into aristocratic society, where his vulgarity stands out in strong relief. The character is in Theodore Hook's novel of the same name.

He was a sort of literary Jack Brag.
T. H. Burton.

Braggado'chio. A braggart. One who is very valiant with his tongue, but a great coward at heart. A barking dog that bites not. The character is from Spenser's "Faëry Queen," and a type of the "Intemperance of the Tongue." After a time, like the jackdaw in borrowed plumes, Braggadochio is stripped of all his "glories:" his shield is claimed by Sir Marinel; his lady is proved by the golden girdle to be the false Florimel; his horse is claimed by Sir Guyon; Talus shaves off his beard and scourges his squire; and the pretender sneaks off amidst the jeers of every one. It is thought that the poet had Felipe of Spain in his eye when he drew this character.

Brag'mar'do'. When Gargantua took the bells of Notre Dame de Paris to hang about the neck of his horse, the citizens sent Bragmardo to him with a remonstrance.—Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel."

Brag'i. Son of Odin and Frigga. According to Scandinavian mythology, he was the inventor of poetry; but, unlike Apollo, he is always represented as an old man with a long white beard. His wife was Idunna.

Brah'ma (Indian). The self-existing and invisible Creator of the Universe; represented with four heads looking to the four corners of the world. The divine triad is Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva.

Brahma. One of the three beings created by God, to assist in the creation of the world. The Brahmins claim him as the founder of their religious system.

Whate'er in India holds the sacred name
Of piety or lore, the Brahmins claim;
In wildest rituals, vain and painful, lost,
Brahma, their founder, as a god they boast.
Camoens, "Lusiad," bk. vii.

Brah'mi. One of the three goddess-daughters of Vishnu, representing "creative energy."

Brahmin. A worshipper of Brahma, the highest caste in the system of Hinduism, and of the priestly order.

Bramble, Matthew. A testy, gouty, benevolent, country squire, in Smollett's novel of "Humphrey Clinker." Colman has introduced the same character as Sir Robert Bramble in his "Poor Gentleman." Sheridan's "Sir Anthony Absolute" is of the same type.

A'n't I a baronet? Sir Robert Bramble, at Blackberry Hall, in the county of Kent? 'Tis time you should know it, for you have been my clumsy, two-fisted valet-de-chambre these thirty years.—"The Poor Gentleman," iii. 1.

Bran. If not Bran, it is Bran's brother. If not the real "Simon Pure," it is just as good. A complimentary expression. Bran was Fingal's dog, a mighty favourite.

Bran-new is fire-new, fresh from the anvil (Dutch, brand-nieuw); like a horse-shoe, or piece of iron-work just forged.

Brand. He has the brand of villain in his looks. It was once customary to brand the cheeks of felons with an F. The custom was abolished by law in 1822.

The Cliquot brand, &c., the best brand, &c. That is the merchant's, or excise mark branded on the article itself, the vessel which contains the article, the wrapper which covers it, the cork of a bottle, &c., to guarantee its being genuine, &c. Madame Cliquot, of champagne notoriety, died in 1866.

Brandenburg. Confession of Brandenburg. A formulary or confession of faith drawn up in the city of Brandenburg by order of the elector, with the view of reconciling the tenets of Luther with those of Calvin, and to put an end to the disputes occasioned by the confession of Augsburg.

Bran'dimarti, in "Orlando Furioso," is Orlando's brother-in-law, husband of For'delis, and son of Monodantès. He was one of the bravest knights in Charlemagne's army, and was slain by Gradasso.

Brandon, the juggler, lived in the reign of Henry VIII.

Brandy Nan. Queen Anne, who was very fond of brandy. (1664-1714.) On the statue of queen Anne in St. Paul's Churchyard, a wit wrote—

Brandy Nan, Brandy Nan, left in the lurch,
Her face to the gin-shop, her back to the church.

On the site of Dakin's tea-shop stood a "gin palace" at the time.

Brangtons, The. Vulgar, malicious, jealous women. The characters are taken from Miss Burney's novel called "Evelina." One of the brothers is a Cockney snob.

Brank. A gag for scolds. (Dutch, pranghe, the yoke of a pillory.)

Brasenose (Oxford). Over the gate is a brass nose, the arms of the college; but the word is a corruption of brasenhuis, a brascie or brewhouse. (Latin, brasin'ium.)

Brass. Impudence. A lawyer said to a troublesome witness, "Why, man, you have brass enough in your head to make a teakettle." "And you, sir," replied the witness, "have water enough in yours to fill it."

Sampson Brass. A knavish attorney; servile, affecting sympathy, but making his clients his lawful prey.—Dickens, "Old Curiosity Shop."

Brat. A child; so called from brat, a child's pinafore; and brat is a contraction of brattack, a cloth, also a standard.

Every man must repair to the brattack of his tribe.—Scott.

Brave. The Brave.

Alfonso IV. of Portugal. (1290-1357.)

John Andr. van der Mersch, patriot, The brave Fleming. (1734-1792.)

Bravery. Finery is the French braverie. The French for courage is bravoure.

What woman in the city do I name
When I say, "The city woman bears
The cost of princes on unworthy shoulders?"
Who can come in and say that I mean her?...
Or what is he of baser function
That says, "His bravery is not of my cost?"
Shakespeare, "As You Like It," ii. 7.

Bravest of the Brave. Marshal Ney. So called by the troops of Friedland (1807), on account of his fearless bravery. Napoleon said of him, "That man is a lion." (1769-1815.)

Brawn. The test of the brawn's head. A little boy one day came to the court of king Arthur, and, drawing his wand over a boar's head, declared, "There's never a cuckold's knife can carve this head of brawn." No knight in the court except Sir Cradock was able to accomplish the feat.—Percy's "Reliques."

Bray. (See VICAR.)

Brazen. To brazen out; a face of brass (or) brazen-faced fellow. Brass is the emblem of impudence, insolence, and self-will; iron symbolises warfare and military adventure.

What a brazen-faced varlet art thou!
Shakespeare, "King Lear," ii. 2.

Brazen Age. The age of war and violence. It followed the silver age.

To this next came in course the brazen age,
A warlike offspring, prompt to bloody rage,
Not impious yet, Hard steel succeeded then,
And stubborn as the metal were the men.
Dryden, "Metam.," l.

Brazen-faced. Bold (in a bad sense), without shame.

Brazen Head.

The first on record was by Albertus Magnus, which cost him thirty years' labour, and was broken into a thousand pieces by Thomas Aquinas, his disciple.

The second was that of Friar Bacon.

Bacon trembled for his brazen head.
"Dunciad," iii. 104.

Quoth he, My head's not made of brass,
As friar Bacon's noddle was.—Butler, ii. 2.

The third, that of the marquis de Vilena, of Spain.

The fourth, that by a Polander, a disciple of Escotillo, an Italian.

Probably The Invisible Girl, who made the tour of Europe, explains the mystery.

Brazen Head. A gigantic head kept in the castle of the giant Fer'ragus, of Portugal. It was omniscient, and told those who consulted it whatever they required to know, past, present, or to come.—Valentine and Orson.

Bread. He took bread and salt, i.e., he took his oath. Bread and salt were formerly eaten when an oath was taken.

Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days (Eccles. xi. 1). When the Nile overflows its banks, the weeds perish and the soil is disintegrated. The rice-seed being cast into the water, takes root, and is found in due time growing in healthful vigour.

Break.

To break your back. Make you bankrupt. The metaphor is from carrying burdens on the back.

To break up housekeeping. To discontinue keeping a separate house. A school term.

Breakers Ahead. Hidden danger at hand. Breakers in the open sea always announce sunken rocks, sandbanks, &c.

Brèche de Roland. A deep defile in the crest of the Pyrenes, some 300 feet in width, between two precipitous rocks. The legend is that Roland, the paladin, cleft the rock in two with his sword Durandal, when he was set upon by the Gascons at Roncesvallés.

Then would I seek the Pyrenean breach,
Which Roland clove with huge two-handed sway.
Woraworth.

Breeches. To wear the breeches. Said of a woman who usurps the prerogative of her husband. Similar to The grey mare is the better horse. (See GREY.)

The phrase is common to the French, Dutch, Germans, &c., as Elle porte les braves. De vrouw draagder de broek. Sie hat die Hosen.

Breeches Bible. (See BIBLE.)

Breeze. House-sweepings, as fluff, dust, ashes, and so on, thrown as refuse into the dust-bin. We generally limit the meaning now to small ashes and cinders used for coals in burning bricks. The word is a corruption of the French débris (rubbish, or rather the part broken or rubbed off by wear, tear, and stress of weather).

The Breeze-fly. The gad-fly; so called from its sting. (Saxon, briose; Gothic, bry, a sting.)

Breidablik (wide-shining). The palace of Baldur. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Brenda Troil. Daughter of Magnus, and sister of Minna Troil.—Scott, "Pirate."

Brennus. A Latin form of the Kymric word Brenhin (a war-chief). In times of danger the Druids appointed a brenn to lead the confederate tribes to battle.

Brent-goose. A barnacle or goose the colour of burnt bread. (Brent, burnt.)

Brentford. Like the two kings of Brentford smelling at one nosegay. Said of persons who were once rivals, but have become reconciled. The allusion is to an old farce called "The Rehearsal," by the duke of Buckingham. "The two kings of Brentford enter hand in hand," and the actors, to heighten the absurdity, used to make them enter "smelling at one nosegay" (Act ii., s. 2).

Bressommer or Brest-Sommer. The beam into which the girders are framed. (German, brets, planks; sommer, a master-beam—i.e., the planks' master-beam. It is not correctly derived from the French brace à mur.)

Bretwalda (wielder of Britain). The chief of the kings of the heptarchy who exercised a certain undefined power over the other rulers, something like that of Hugues Cap'et over his peers.

Brevet Rank is rank one degree higher than your pay. Thus, a brevet-major has the title of major, but the pay of captain. In familiar language, we say a man who addresses an unmarried woman as Mrs., gives her brevet rank. (French, brevet, a patent, a concession.)

Breviary. An epitome of the old office of matins and lauds for daily service in the Roman Catholic Church at the seven different hours, according to the saying of David, "Seven times a day do I praise thee."—Psalm cxix. 164.

Brew. Brew me a glass of grog, i.e., mix one for me. Brew me a cup of tea, i.e., make one for me. The tea is set to brew, i.e., to draw. The general meaning of the word is to boil or mix, the restricted meaning is to make malt liquor. (Saxon, brēan, to make broth; Danish, bræwen, to mix; Welsh, berw, a boiling.)

Brewer. The Brewer of Ghent. James van Arteveld. (Fourteenth century.)

It may here be remarked, that it is a great error to derive proper names of any antiquity from modern words of a similar sound or spelling. As a rule, very few ancient names are the names of trades; and to suppose that such words as Bacon, Hogg, and Pigg refer to swineherds, or Gaiter, Miller, Tanner, Ringer, and Bottle to handicrafts, is a great mistake. A few examples of a more scientific derivation will suffice for a hint:—

BREWER. This name, which exists in France as Bruhière and Brugière, is not derived from the Saxon brīwan (to brew), but the French bruyère (heath), and is about tantamount to the German "Plantagenet" (broom-plant).

BACON is from the High German verb bagan (to fight), and means "the fighter."

PIGG and BIGG are from the old High German pīchan (to slash).

HOGG is the Anglo-Saxon hyge (scholar), from the verb hogan (to study).

BOTTLE is the Anglo-Saxon Bot'el (little envoy). Norse, bodi; Danish, bud.

GAITER is the Saxon Gaid-cr (the darter). Celtic, gais, our goad.

MILLER is the old Norse melia, our mill and maul, and means a "mauler" or "fighter."

RINGER is the Anglo-Saxon hring gar (the mailed warrior).

SMITH is the man who smites.

TANNER, German "Thanger;" old German "Danegaud" is the Dane-Goth.

This list might easily be extended.

Briar'eös or Ege'on. A giant with fifty heads and a hundred hands. Homer says the gods called him Briar'eös, but men called him Egeon.—"Iliad," i. 403.

Not he who brandished in his hundred hands His fifty swords and fifty shields in fight, Could have surpassed the fierce Argantes' might. "Jerusalem Delivered," bk. vii.

Then, called by thee, the monster Titan came,
Whom gods Briar'eös, men Egeon name
Pope, "Iliad," i.

Shakespeare employs the word as a dissyllable:—

He is a gouty Briareus; many hands,
And of no use.—"Troilus and Cressida," i. 2.

The Briareus of languages. Cardinal Mezzofanti, who knew fifty-eight different tongues. Byron called him "a walking polyglot; a monster of languages; a Briareus of parts of speech." (1774-1849.)

Bribo'ci. Inhabitants of part of Berkshire and the adjacent counties referred to by Cæsar in his "Commentaries."

Brick. A regular brick. A jolly good fellow.

To read like a brick. To read hard.

The word is University slang, and comes round about thus: A brick is deep red, so a deep-read man is a brick. To read like a brick, is to read in order to become deep read.

A deep read man is a "good man" in University phrase; a good man is a jolly fellow with non-reading men; ergo, a jolly fellow is a brick.

Brick-and-Mortar Franchise. A Chartist phrase for the £10 household system.

Brickdusts. The 53rd Foot; so called from the brickdust-red colour of their facings. Also called Five and three'pennies, a play on the number and daily pay of the ensigns.

Bride. The bridal wreath is a relic of the cor'ona nuptialis used by the Greeks and Romans to indicate triumph.

Bride Cake. A relic of the Roman Confarræatio, a mode of marriage practised by the highest class in Rome. It was performed before ten witnesses by the Pontifex Maximus, and the contracting parties mutually partook of a cake made of salt, water, and flower (far). Only those born in such wedlock were eligible for the high sacred offices.

Bride (or Wedding) Favours represent the true lover's knot, and symbolise union.

Bride's Maids. A relic of the ten witnesses mentioned above. (See BRIDE CAKE.)

Bride's Veil. The Anglo-Saxons used to hold a veil over the bride and bridegroom, to conceal the blushes of the lady from the company. Widows were not veiled on being re-married.

Bride of Aby'dos. Zuleika, daughter of Giaffir, pacha of Aby'dos. As she was never wed, she should be called the affianced or betrothed.—Byron.

Bride of the Sea. Venice; so called from the ancient ceremony of the doge, who threw a ring into the Adriatic, saying, "We wed thee, O sea, in token of perpetual domination."

Bridegroom is the old Dutch groom (a young man). Thus, Groom of the Stole is the young man over the wardrobe. Groom, an ostler, is quite another word, being the Persian garma (a keeper of horses), unless, indeed, it is a contracted form of stable-groom (stable-boy). The Anglo-Saxon gome (a man) was in use even in the civil wars.

Bridegroom's Men. In the Roman marriage by confarreatio, the bride was led to the Pontifex Maximus by bachelors, but was conducted home by married men. Polydore Virgil says that a married man preceded the bride on her return, bearing a vessel of gold and silver. Moresin says the grooms-men all received from the bride a pair of gloves for their service.

Bridewell. The city Bridewell, Bridge Street, Blackfriars, was built over a holy well of medical water, called St. Bride's Well, where was founded a hospital for the poor. After the Reformation, Edward VI. chartered this hospital to the city. Christ Church was given to the education of the young, St. Thomas's Hospital to the cure of the sick, and Bridewell was made a penitentary for unruly apprentices and vagrants. Strange that St. Bride or St. Bridget, the model of purity and innocence, should give her name to a penitentiary and prison!

Bridge of Jehennam. (See SERA'T.)

Bridge of Sighs, which connects the palace of the doge with the state prisons of Venice. Over this bridge the state prisoners were conveyed from the judgment-hall to the place of execution.

I stood in Venice, on the Bridge of Sighs,

A palace and a prison on each hand.

"Child Harold's Pilgrimage," canto iv. 1.

Bridgenorth, Major Ralph. A Roundhead in Scott's "Peveril of the Peak."

Bridgewater Treatises. Instituted by the Rev. Francis Henry Egerton, earl of Bridgewater, in 1825, who left the interest of £8,000 to be given to the author of the best treatise on "The power, wisdom, and goodness of God, as manifested in creation." Eight are published by the following gentlemen:—(1) The Rev. Dr. Chalmers, (2) Dr. John Kidd, (3) the Rev. Dr. Whewell, (4) Sir Charles Bell, (5) Dr. Peter M. Roget, (6) the Rev. Dr. Buckland, (7) the Rev. W. Kirby, and (8) Dr. William Prout.

Bridle. To bite on the bridle is to suffer great hardships. The bridle was an instrument for punishing a scold; to bite on the bridle is to suffer this punishment.

Bridle Road or Way. A way for a riding-horse, but not for a horse and cart.

Bridlegoose, Judge, who decided the causes brought to him by the throw of dice.—Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel."

Bridport. Stabbed with a Bridport dagger, i.e., hanged. Bridport, in Dorsetshire, was once famous for its hempen goods, and monopolised the manufacture of ropes, cables, and tackling for the British navy. The hangman's rope being made at Bridport gave birth to the proverb.—Faller, "Worthies."

Brig'adore (3 syl.). Sir Guyon's horse, which had a distinguishing "black spot in his mouth."—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," v. 3.

Brigand properly means light-armed people. The Brigands were light-armed, irregular troops, like the Bashi-Bazouks, and like them were addicted to marauding. The Free Companies of France were Brigands.

Brigandine. The armour of a brigand, consisting of small plates of iron on quilted linen, and covered with leather, hemp, or something of the kind.

Another derivation is the Celtic brigant, a mountaineer, from brig, a summit.

Bright's Disease. A degeneration of the tissues of the kidneys into fat, first investigated by Dr. Bright. The patient under this disease has a flabby, bloodless appearance, is always drowsy, and easily fatigued.

Brigians. The Castilians; so called from one of their ancient kings, named Brix or Brigus, said by monkish fabulists to be the grandson of Noah.

Edward and Pedro, emulous of fame . . .
Thro' the fierce Brigian, hewed their bloody way,
Till in a cold embrace the striplings lay.
Camoens, "Lusad," v.

Brigliado'ro (golden bridle). The name of Orlando's and also of Sir Guyon's steed. (See HORSE.)

Brilliant Madman. Charles XII. of Sweden. (1682-1718.)

Macedonia's madman or the Swede.
Johnson, "Vanity of Human Wishes."

Brims. You have brims in your tail. You are restless, you are always gadding about. A brim is a gad-fly, and when one of these insects gets on the tail of an animal, the creature is wild and restless.

Briney or Briny. I'm on the briny. The sea, which is salt like brine.

Brioche (2 syl.). A sort of bun or cake common in France, and now pretty generally sold in England. When Marie Antoinette was talking about the bread riots of Paris during the 5th and 6th October, 1789, the duchesse de Polignac naïvely exclaimed, "How is it that these silly people are so clamorous for bread, when they can buy such nice brioches for a few sous!" This was in spirit not unlike the remark of our own princess Charlotte, who avowed "that she would for her part rather eat beef than sturves" and wondered that the people should be so obstinate as to insist upon having bread when it was so scarce.

Bris. Il conte di San Bris, governor of the Louvre, was father of Valentina, and leader of the St. Bartholomew massacre.—Meyerbeer's opera, "Gli Ugonotti."

Brissotins. A nickname given to the advocates of reform in the French Revolution, because they were "led by the nose" by Jean Pierre Brissot. The party was subsequently called the Girondists.

Bristol Board. A stiff drawing-paper, originally manufactured at Bristol.

Bristol Boy. The Thomas Chatterton, the poet. Also called "The Marvellous Boy;" or as Byron has it, "The wondrous boy who perished in his pride." (1752-1770.)

Bristol Milk. Sherry sack, at one time given by the Bristol people to their friends.

Bristol Diamonds. Brilliant crystals of colourless quartz found in St. Vincent's Rock, near Bristol.

Bristol Waters. Mineral waters near the city of Bristol, with a temperature not exceeding 74°; especially celebrated in cases of pulmonary consumption.

Britain. By far the most probable derivation of this word is that given by Bochart, from the Phœnician Baratanic (country of tin), contracted into B'atan'. The Greek Cassiter'idēs (tin islands) is a translation of Baratanic, once applied to the whole known group, but now restricted to the Scilly Isles. Aristotle, who lived some 350 years before the Christian era, calls the island Britannic, which is so close to Bratanic that the suggestion of Bochart can scarcely admit of a doubt.—De Mundo, sec. 3.

Great Britain consists of "Britannia prima" (England), "Britannia secunda" (Wales), and "North Britain" (Scotland), united under one sway.

Britan'nia was first struck on our coins by the Romans. Charles II., in 1667, revived the device, and the new Britannia was a fac-simile of Frances Theresa Stuart, afterwards duchess of Richmond, a celebrated court beauty. The figure was by Evelyn and engraved by Roettier.

Brit'omart (sweet maid). Daughter of king Ryence of Wales, whose desire was to be a heroine. She is the impersonation of saintly chastity and purity of mind. She encounters the "savage, fierce bandit and mountaineer," without injury; is assailed by "hag and unlaidd ghost, goblin, and swart fairy of the mine," but "dashes their brute violence into sudden adoration and blank awe." It must be remembered that Britomart is not the impersonation of celibacy, as she is in love with an unknown hero, but of "virgin purity."—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. iii.

She charmed at once and tamed the heart,
Incomparable Britomart.—Scott.

Brit'omartis. A Cretan nymph, very fond of the chase. King Minos fell in love with her, and persisted in his advances for nine months, when she threw herself into the sea. (Cretan, britus-martis, sweet maiden.)

Brit'tany. The damsel of Brittany. Eleanora, daughter of Geoffrey, second son of Henry II., king of England and duke of Brittany. At the death of prince Arthur, she was the real heir to the crown, but John confined her in the castle of Bristol till death (1241).

Broach. To broach a new subject. To start one in conversation. The allusion is to beer tubs. If one is flat, another must be tapped. A broach is a peg or pin, and to broach a cask is to bore a hole in the top for the vent peg.

I did broach this business to your highness.
Shakespeare, "Henry VIII.," ii. 4.

Broad Arrow, on Government stores. It was the cognisance of Henry, viscount Sydney, earl of Romney, master-general of the ordnance. (1693-1702.)

Broadcloth. The best cloth for men's clothes. So called from its great breadth. It required two weavers, side by side, to fling the shuttle across it.

Broadside. Printed matter spread over an entire sheet of paper. The whole must be in one type and one measure, i.e., must not be divided into columns. A folio is when the sheet is folded, in which case a page occupies only half the sheet.

In naval language, it means the whole side of a ship; and to "open a broadside on the enemy" is to discharge all the guns on one side at the same moment.

Broddingnag. The country of gigantic giants, to whom Gulliver was a pigmy "not half so big as a round little worm plucked from the lazy finger of a maid."

You high church steeple, you cawky stag,
Your husband must come from Broddingnag.
Kane O'Hara, "Mias."

Broddingnagian. Colossal; tall as a church steeple. (See above.)

Limbs of Broddingnagian proportions.—The Star.

Brocken. The spectre of the Brocken.

This is the shadow of men and other objects greatly magnified and reflected in the mist and cloud of the mountain opposite. The Brocken is the highest summit of the Hartz range.

Brogue properly means the Irish brog, or shoe of rough hide. The application of brog to the dialect or manner of speaking is similar to that of buskin to tragedy, and sock to comedy.

Brogues. Trousers. From the Irish brog, resembling those still worn by some of the French cavalry, in which trousers and boots are all one garment.

And put my clouted brogues from off my feet.
Shakespeare, "Cymbeline," iv. 2.

Broker. Properly speaking, is one who sells refuse. In German, called mäklers, that is, "sellers of damaged stores." (Teutonic, brak or wrak, refuse.)

Brontës. A blacksmith personified; one of the Cyclops. The name signifies Thunder.

Not with such weight, to frame the forked brand,
The ponderous hammer falls from Brontës' hand.
Hoole, "Jerusalem Delivered," bk. xx.

Bronzomar'te. The sorrel horse of Sir Launcelot Greaves.—Smollett, "Adventures."

Brook, Master. The name assumed by Ford when he visits Sir John Falstaff. The amorous knight tells Master Brook all about his amour with Mrs. Ford, and how he duped her husband by being stowed into a basket of dirty linen.

Ford. I'll give you a pottle of burned sack to give me recourse to him, and tell him my name is Brook, only for a jest.

Host. My hand, bully. Thou shalt have egress and regress, . . . and thy name shall be Brook.
Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," ii. 1.

Broom. A broom is hung at the mast-head of ships about to be sold, to indicate that they are to be swept away. The idea is popularly taken from Admiral Tromp, but probably this allusion is more witty than true. The custom of hanging up something to attract notice seems very common. Thus, an old piece of carpet from a window indicates household furniture for sale; a wisp of straw indicates oysters for sale; a bush means wine for sale; an old broom, ships to sell, &c. &c. (See PENNANT.)

Brosier. Eating one out of house and home. At Eton, when a dame keeps an unusually bad table, the boys agree together on a day to eat, pocket, or waste everything eatable in the house. The censure is well understood, and the hint generally effective. (Greek, broso, to eat.)

Brother or Frère. A friar not in priest's orders. (See FATHER.)

Brother Benedict. A married man. (See BENEDICT.)

Brother Blade. Properly, a fellow-soldier, but now any one of the same calling as yourself.

Brother Brush. A fellow-painter.

Brother Chip. A fellow-carpenter.

Brother Clergyman. A fellow-clergyman.

Brother (M. or N.). A fellow-barrister.

Brother Whip. A fellow-coachman.

Brother German. A real brother. A uterine brother is a brother by the mother's side only.

Brother Jonathan. When Washington was in want of ammunition, he called a council of officers, but no practical suggestion could be offered. "We must consult brother Jonathan," said the general, meaning his excellency Jonathan Trumbull, the elder governor of the state of Connecticut. This was done, and the difficulty was remedied. To consult brother Jonathan then became a set phrase, and brother Jonathan grew to be the John Bull of the United States. — J. R. Bartlett, "Dictionary of Americanisms."

Brother Sam. The brother of Lord Dundreary (q.v.), the hero of a comedy based on a German drama, by John Oxenford, with additions and alterations by E. A. Sothorn and T. B. Buckstone. — Supplied by T. B. Buckstone, Esq.

Browbeat. To beat or put a man down by knitting the brows.

Brown. A copper. (See BLUNT.)
To be done brown. To be roasted, deceived, taken in.

Brown, Jones, and Robinson. Three Englishmen, who travel together; their adventures were published in Punch, and were the production of Richard Doyle. They typify the middle-class English abroad, and hold up to ridicule their gaucherie and contracted notions, their vulgarity and extravagance, their conceit and snobism.

Brown Bess means brown barrel. The barrels were browned to keep them from rusting. (Dutch, bus, a gun-barrel; Low German, büsse; Swedish, byssa. Our arquebus, blunderbuss.) (See below.)

Brown Bill. A kind of halbert, used by English foot-soldiers before muskets were employed. We find in the mediæval ballads the expressions "brown brand," "brown sword," "brown blade," &c. Sometimes the word rusty is substituted for brown, as in Chaucer: "And in his side he had a rousy blade;" which being the god Mars, cannot mean a bad one. Keeping the weapons bright is a modern fashion; our forefathers preferred the honour of blood-stains. Some say the weapons were varnished with a brown varnish to prevent rust, and some affirm that one Brown was a famous maker of these instruments, and that Brown bill is a phrase similar to Armstrong gun and Colt's revolver. (See above.)

So, with a band of bowmen and of pikes,
Brown bills and targetiers.

Marlowe, "Edward II." 1622.

Brown Study. Absence of mind; apparent thought, but real vacuity. The corresponding French expression explains it—sombre rêverie. Sombre and brun both mean sad, melancholy, gloomy, dull.

Invention flags, his brain grows muddy.
And black despair succeeds brown study.
Congreve, "An Impossible Thing."

Brownie. The house spirit in Scottish superstition. He is called in England Robin Goodfellow. At night he is supposed to busy himself in doing little jobs for the family over which he presides. Farms are his favourite abode. Brownies are brown or tawny spirits, in opposition to fairies, which are fair or elegant ones.

It is not long since every family of considerable substance was haunted by a spirit they called Brown, which did several sorts of work: and this was the reason why they gave him offerings . . . on what they called "Brown's stou."—Martin, "Scotland."

Brownists. Followers of Robert Brown, of Rutlandshire, a violent opponent of the Established Church in the time of queen Elizabeth. The present "Independents" hold pretty well the same religious tenets as the Brownists. Sir Andrew Agnecheek says:—

I'd as lief be a Brownist as a politician.
Shakespeare, "Twelfth Night," iii. 2.

Bruel. The goose, in the tale of "Reynard the Fox." The word means little-roarer.

Bruin. One of the leaders arrayed against Hudibras. He was Talgol, a Newgate butcher, who obtained a captain's commission for valour at Naseby. He marched next Orsin (Joshua Gosling, landlord of the bear gardens, at Southwark).

The gallant Bruin marched next him (Orsin),
With visage formidably grim
And ragged as a Saracen
Or Turk of Mahomet's own kin.—Pt. i., c. 3.

Bruin, Sir. The name of the bear in the famous German beast-epic, called "Reynard the Fox." (Dutch for brown.)

Brumaire. The celebrated 18th of Brumaire (9th November, 1799) was the day on which the Directory was overthrown, and Napoleon established his supremacy.

Brum'magem. Worthless or very inferior metallic articles made in imitation of better ones. Birmingham, once called Brumwicham, is the great mart and manufactory of gilt toys, cheap jewellery, imitation gems, mosaic gold, and such small deer.

Brunhild or Brunkil'da. Daughter of the king of Iceland, beloved by Günther, one of the two great chieftains of the Niebelungen or Teutonic liad. She was to be carried off by force, and Günther asked his friend Siegfried to help him. Siegfried contrived the matter by snatching from her the talisman which was her protector, but she never forgave him for his treachery. (Old German, brun, coat of mail; hilt, battle.)

Brunello (in "Orlando Furioso"). A deformed dwarf of Biserta, to whom king Ag'ramant gave a ring which had the virtue to withstand the power of magic (Book ii.). He was leader of the Tingitani'ans in the Saracen army. He also figures in Bojardo's "Orlando Innamorato."

Brunswicker. A native of Brunswick. (See BLACK BRUNSWICKER.)

Brush. The tail of a fox or squirrel, which is brushy.

Brother brush is a fellow-painter.

Brush away. Get along.

Brush off. Move on.

He brushed by me. He just touched me as he went quickly past. Hence also brush, a slight skirmish.

All these are metaphors from brushing with a brush.

Give it another brush. A little more attention; bestow a little more labour on it; return it to the file for a little more polish. The allusion is to bread baking. When bread was baked under a tin, if it was found insufficiently done, the housewife used to sweep the hearth, and put it down again.

Brut. A rhyming chronicle, as the "Brut d'Angleterre," and "Le Roman de Brut," by Wace (twelfth century). Brut is the Romance word bruit (a rumour, hence a tradition, or a chronicle based on tradition). It is by mere accident that the word resembles "Brute" or "Brutus," the traditional king. (See below.)

Brut d'Angleterre. A chronicle of the achievements of king Arthur and his Knights of the Round Table. Arthur is described as the natural son of Uther, pendragon (or chief) of the ancient Britons. He succeeded his father, in 516, by the aid of Merlin, who gave him a magic sword, with which he conquered the Saxons, Picts, Scots, and Irish. Besides the Brut referred to, several other romances record the exploits of this heroic king. (See ARTHUR.)

Brute, Sir John. A coarse, pot-valiant knight, ignobly noted for his absurdities.—Vanbrugh, "The Provoked Wife."

Brute or Brutus, in the mythological history of England, the first king of the Britons, was son of Sylvius, brother of Ascanius, and therefore grandson of Æneas. Having inadvertently killed his father, he first took refuge in Greece, and then in Britain. In remembrance of Troy, he called the capital of his kingdom Troy-novant (New Troy), now London.

Brute, in University slang, is a man who has not yet matriculated. The play is evident. A "man," in college phrase, is a collegian; and as matriculation is the sign and seal of acceptance, a scholar before that ceremony is not a "man," and therefore only a "biped brute."

From matriculation to the end of the first year, a collegian is called a Freshman; in his second year he is a Junior Soph; in his third and last year a Senior Soph. Soph, of course, is the Greek soph-os (a wise man), learned in all the learning of the University.

Brutum Fulmen (Latin). A noisy but harmless threatening; an innocuous thunderbolt.

His (the Pope's) denunciations are but a brutum fulmen.—The Standard.

Brutus, Junius, the first consul of Rome, condemned to death his own two sons for joining a conspiracy to restore to the throne the banished Tarquin.

The public Father (Brutus), who the private quelled,

As on the dread tribunal sternly sad,
Thomson, "Winter."

The Spanish Brutus. Alphonso Perez de Guzman. (1258-1320.)

Brutus, Marcus, Cæsar's friend, joined the conspirators to murder him, because he made himself a king.

And thou, unhappy Brutus, kind of heart,
Whose steady arm, by awful virtue urged,
Lifted the Roman steel against thy friend.
Thomson, "Winter."

Bruxellois. The inhabitants of Brussels or Bruxelles.

Brydport Dagger. (See BRIDPORT.)

Bub. Drink. Connected with bubble—Latin, bibo (to drink), our imbibe; bubbly, i.e., ubbo (a woman's breast). (See GRUB.)

Bubas'tis. The Diana of Egyptian mythology; daughter of Isis and sister of Horus.

Bubble. A scheme of no sterling worth and of very ephemeral duration—as worthless and frail as a bubble.

The Bubble Act, 6 George I. cap. 18; published 1719, and repealed July 5, 1825. Its object was to punish the promoters of bubble schemes.

A bubble scheme. A project for getting money from subscribers to a scheme of no value.

A bubble company. A company whose object is to enrich themselves at the expense of subscribers to their scheme.

The whole scheme [the Fenian raid on British America] was a collapsed bubble.—The Times.

Bubble and Squeak. Cold boiled meat and greens fried. They first bubbled in water when boiled, and afterwards hissed or squeaked in the frying-pan.

Bucca. A goblin of the wind, supposed by the ancient inhabitants of Cornwall to foretell shipwrecks.

Buc'caneer' means sellers of smoke-dried meat, from the Caribbean word boucan (smoke-dried meat). The term was first given to the French settlers in Hayti, whose business it was to hunt animals for their skins. The flesh they smoke-dried and sold, chiefly to the Dutch.

When the Spaniards laid claim to all America, many English and French adventurers lived by buccaneering, and hunted Spaniards as lawful prey. After the peace of Ryswick, this was no longer tolerated, and the term was then applied to any desperate, lawless, piratical adventurer.

Buccleuch or Buckcleuch. According to tradition, Kenneth Mac-Alpin, king of Scotland, was one day hunting, when a buck stood at bay in a certain glen or cleuch. John of Galloway came up at this juncture, seized the buck by the horns, threw it on its back, and, running to the king, laid it at his feet. The king was so pleased with the adventure, that he gave the bold huntsman permission to add Buck's-cleuch to his name.

Bucen'taur. A monster, half-man and half-ox. The Venetian state-galley employed by the doge when he went to wed the Adriatic was so called. (Greek, bous, ox; centauros, centaur.)

Buceph'alos (bull-headed). A horse. Strictly speaking, the charger of Alexander the Great, bought of a Thessalian for thirteen talents (£3,500).

True, true; I forgot your Bucephalus.
The Antiquary.

Buchanites (3 syl.). A sect of fanatics who appeared in the west of Scotland in 1783. They were named after Mrs. or Lucky Buchan, their founder, who called herself "Friend Mother in the Lord," claiming to be the woman mentioned in Rev. xii., and maintaining that the Rev. Hugh White, a convert, was the "man-child."

I never heard of alewife that turned preacher, except Luckie Buchan in the West.
Scott, "St. Rowan's Well," c. ii.

Buck. A dandy. (See below.)

Buck-basket. A linen basket. Buck is the lye or liquor in which clothes are washed; hence, also, the clothes so washed. A buck is one whose clothes are buck, or nicely got up. When Cade says his mother was "descended from the Lacies," two men overheard him, and say, "She was a pedlar's daughter, but not being able to travel with her furred pack, she washes bucks here at home."—"2 Henry VI.," iv. 2.

Buck-bean. A corruption of bog-bean, a native of wet bog-lands.

Buckhorse. A severe blow or slap on the face. So called from a boxer of that name.

Buckingham. Saxon, boccen-ham (beech-tree village). Fuller, in his "Worthies," speaks of the beech-trees as the most characteristic feature of this county.

Bucklaw or rather Frank Hayston, lord of Bucklaw, a wealthy nobleman, who marries Lucia di Lammermoor (Lucy Ashton), who had pledged her troth to Edgar, master of Ravenswood. On the wedding-night Lucy murders him, goes mad, and dies.—Donizetti's opera of "Lucia di Lammermoor." Sir Walter Scott's "Bride of Lammermoor."

Buckle. I can't buckle to. I cannot give my mind to work. The allusion is to buckling on one's armour or belt.

He cannot buckle his distempered cause
Within the belt of rule.

Shakespeare, "Macbeth," v. 2.

Bucklersbury (London) was at one time the noted street for druggists and herbalists; hence Falstaff says—

I cannot cog, and say thou art this and that, like a many of these lipping hawthorn huds, that come like women in men's apparel, and smell like Bucklersbury in simple time.—Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," iii. 3.

Buckmaster's Light Infantry. The 3rd West India Regiment was so called from Buckmaster, the tailor, who used to issue "Light Infantry uniforms" to the officers of the corps without any authority from the Commander-in-Chief.

Buckra. Superior, excellent. That's buckra. A buckra coat is a smart coat; a buckra man, a man of consequence. This word among the West Indians does the service of burra among the Anglo-Indians: as burra saib (great master, i.e., white man), burra khana (a magnificent spread or dinner).

Buckshish or Baksheesh. A gratuity, pour boire. A term common to India, Persia, and indeed all the East.

Buckwheat. A corruption of bor. German, buche, beech-wheat; it is so called because it is triangular, like beech-mast. The botanical name is Fagopyrum (beech-wheat).

Buddha means the Wise one. From the Indian word budh (to know). The title was given to prince Siddhartha, generally called Saky'a-muni, the founder of Buddhism.

Buddhist. One whose system of religion is Buddhism.

Buddhism. A system of religion established in India in the third century. The general outline of the system is that the world is a transient reflex of deity; that the soul is a "vital spark" of deity; and that after death it will be bound to matter again till its "wearer" has, by divine contemplation, so purged and purified it that it is fit to be absorbed into the divine essence.

Bude or Gurney Light. The latter is the name of the inventor, and the former the place of his abode. Goldsworthy Gurney, of Bude, Cornwall.

Budge is lambskin with the wool dressed outwards, worn on the edge of capes, bachelors' hoods, and so on. Budge Row, Cannon Street, is so called because it was chiefly occupied by budge-makers.

O foolishness of men! that lend their ears
To those budge-doctors of the stoc fur
Milton, "Comus."

The verb to budge is the French louger, to stir.

Budge Bachelors. A company of men clothed in long gowns lined with budge or lambs' wool, who used to accompany the Lord Mayor of London at his inauguration.

Budget. The statement which the Chancellor of the Exchequer lays before the House of Commons every session, respecting the national income and expenditure, taxes and salaries. The word is the old French bougette (a bag), and the present use arose from the custom of bringing to the House the papers pertaining to these matters in a leather bag, and laying them on the table. Hence, to open the budget or bag, i.e., to take the papers from the bag and submit them to the House. "Budget of News," &c.

Cry Budget. A watchword or shibboleth. Thus Slender says to Shallow:—

We have a nay-word how to know one another. I come to her in white and cry mum; she cries budget; and by that we know one another.
Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," v. 2.

Buff. To stand buff. Stripped to the skin like boxers. The skin is called buff by a kind of play on the words buff-leather and buff, a military uniform. They say in Yorkshire, "stand in buff."

And for the good old cause stood buff
Gainst many a bitter kick and cuff.
Hudibras.

Buffer of a railway carriage is a spring to rebuff or resist with a rebound the carriages that bear against it.

A regular buffer is a jovial companion; a buffet man, a buffetier. Our expression "cupboard love," which indicates regard founded on the love of eating, is of a similar type.

Buffoon means one who puffs out his cheeks, and makes a ridiculous explosion by causing them suddenly to collapse. This being a standing trick with clowns, caused the name to be applied to low jesters. Buffa (middle-age Latin), "a slap on the face," our buffet. The Italian buffare is "to puff out the cheeks for the purpose of making an explosion;" our puff.

Buffoons. Names synonymous with Buffoon:—

Bobèche. A clown in a small theatre in the Boulevard du Temple, Paris. (1815-1825.)

Galimafré. A contemporary and rival of the former.

Tabarin. } (Of the seventeenth Brasembille. } century.)
Grimaldi. (1779-1837.)

Bufs. The 3rd Regiment of Foot in the British army, once called the Holland regiment; so called because their coats were lined and faced with buff; they had buff waistcoats, buff breeches, and buff stockings. They are sometimes called The Old Bufs.

The 31st, raised in 1702, wore buff waistcoats, breeches, and stockings, and were once called The Young Bufs.

Buff is a contraction of bufle or buffalo; and buff skin is the skin of the buffalo prepared. The colour so called resembles the buffalo skin in hue.

Bug. Snug as a bug in a rug. A rug is a shaggy dog. (German, ranch, shaggy; Swedish, rugg; Danish, rug, rough; our rugged.)

Bugbear. A scarecrow. Bug is the Welsh bug, a hobgoblin, called in Russia buka. Perhaps bear is the Welsh barog, spiteful. Spenser says, "A ghastly bug doth greatly them affear" (Bk. ii. cant. 3); and "Hamlet" has "bugs and goblins" (v. 2).

Warwick was a bug that feared us all.
Shakespeare, "3 Henry IV.," v. 2.

To the world no bugbear is so great
As want of figure and a small estate.—Pope.

Buggaboo. A monster, orc, or goblin, introduced into the tales of the old Italian romancers. (See above.)

Buggy. A light vehicle without a hood, drawn by one horse. A carriage for the bourgeois.

Buhl-work. Cabinet-work, inlaid with brass; so called from Segr. Boule, the inventor, who settled in Paris during the reign of Louis XIV.

Build. Make, applied to dress. Not so bad a build after all, not so badly made. A man of strong build is a man of robust make. The metaphor is evident. A milliner is jestingly called a "bonnet builder."

Builder's Square. Emblematic of St. Thomas, patron of architects.

Bulbul. The nightingale. A Persian word, familiarised by Tom Moore.

Bulgruddery (Dennis and Mrs.). In "John Bull," by G. Colman.

Bull. One of the twelve signs of the Zodiac (April 20 to May 21). The time for ploughing, which in Egypt was performed by oxen or bulls.

At last from Aries rolls the bounteous sun,
And the bright Bull receives him.
Thomson, "Spring."

Bull. A blunder, or inadvertent contradiction of terms, for which the Irish are proverbial. The British Apollo, 1740, says the term is derived from one Obadiah Bull, an Irish lawyer of London, in the reign of Henry VII., whose blundering in this way was notorious.

Bull is a five-shilling piece. "Half a bull" is half-a-crown. From bulla (a great leaden seal). Hood, in one of his comic sketches, speaks of a crier who, being apprehended, "swallowed three hogs (shillings) and a bull."

The pope's bull. So called from the bolla or capsule of the seal appended to the document. Subsequently the seal was called the bolla, and then the document itself.

The edict of the emperor Charles IV. had a golden bolla, and was therefore called the golden bull. (See GOLDEN BULL.)

Bull. A public-house sign, the cognisance of the house of Clare. The bull and the boar were signs used by the partisans of Clare, and Richard duke of Gloucester (Richard III.).

To bull is to raise the price of stocks when operating for a sale. (See BEAR.)

John Bull. An Englishman. Applied to a native of England in Arbuthnot's ludicrous "History of Europe." This history is sometimes erroneously ascribed to dean Swift. In this satire the French are called Lewis Baboon, and the Dutch Nicholas Frog.

One would think, in personifying itself, a nation would . . . picture something grand, heroic, and imposing; but it is characteristic of the peculiar humour of the English, and of their love for what is blunt, comic, and familiar, that they have embodied their national oddities in the figure of a sturdy, corpulent old fellow, . . . with red waistcoat, leather breeches, and a stout oxen cudgel, . . . (whom they call) John Bull.—Washington Irving.

Bull and Gate. } Public-house
Bull and Mouth. } signs. A corruption of Boulogne Gate or Mouth, adopted out of compliment to Henry VIII., who took Boulogne in 1544.

Bull-dogs, in University slang, are the two myrmidons of the proctor, who attend his heels like dogs, and are ready to spring on any offending undergraduate like bull-dogs. The best bait to elude their fangs is to drop a half-crown.

Bull's Eye. A small cloud suddenly appearing, seemingly in violent motion, and growing out of itself. It soon covers the entire vault of heaven, producing a tumult of wind and rain. (1 Kings xviii. 44.)

Bull's Eye. The centre of a target.

Bull-necked. The Bull-necked Forger. Cagliostro, the huge impostor, was so called. (1743-1795.)

Bulletin. French for a certificate. An official report of an officer to his superior, or of medical attendants respecting the health of persons high in rank. So called because they were authenticated by an official bulla or seal. (Spanish, boletín, a warrant; Italian, bulletino, a roll.)

Bulling the Barrel is pouring water into a rum-cask, when it is nearly empty, to prevent its leaking. The water which gets impregnated with the spirit, and is very intoxicating, is called bull.

Seamen talk of bulling the teapot (making a second brew), bulling the coffee, &c. (French, boullir, whence bouilloire, a tea-kettle; bouillon, the decoction of meat, to which vegetables, salt, and pepper are added.)

Bullion properly means the mint where bolla, little round coins, are made. Subsequently the metal in the mint. As this metal was shamefully alloyed in France during the monarchy, mint-money (billon) came to signify base metal.

Bully. To overbear with words. A bully is a blustering menacer. (Saxon, bulgian, to bellow like a bull.)

It is often used, without any mixture of reproof, as a term of endearment, as, "O sweet bully Bottom."—"Midsummer Night's Dream," iv. 2.

Bully-rook. A blustering cheat. Like bully, it is sometimes used without any offensive meaning. Thus the Host, in "The Merry Wives of Windsor," addresses Sir John Falstaff, Ford, the page, &c., as bully-rook—"How now, my bully-rook!" equal to "my fine fellow."

Bum-bailiff. A corruption of bund or bound bailiff. A bailiff bound by sureties to the sheriff, who is responsible for all his official acts.—Blackstone.

Scout me for him at the corner of the orchard, like a bum-bailiff.—Shakespeare, "Twelfth Night," iii. 4.

Bum-boat. A small boat to carry provisions to vessels lying off shore.

Bumble. A beadle. So called from the officious, overbearing beadle in Dickens's "Oliver Twist."

Bumbledom. The dominion of an overbearing parish officer, the arrogance of parish authorities, the conceit of parish dignity.

Bummarees. A class of middlemen or fish-jobbers in Billingsgate market, who get a living by bummaréeing, i.e., buying parcels of fish from the salesmen, and then retailing them. A corruption of bonne marée, good fresh fish, or the seller thereof. According to the Dictionnaire de l'Académie, marée means "toute sorte de poisson de mer que n'est pas salé." Bonne marée, "marée fraîche."

Bumper. A full glass. Dr. Ash says a bumper is when the surface of the wine bumps up in the middle, so that the centre lies higher than the brim. While the wine is concave, the full glass is only a brimmer. A piece of cork will float to the edge in a brimmer, but in a bumper it will remain throned in the centre.

The notion that the word is au bon père, meaning "the pope," and refers to the bumpers taken by the monks to the toast, is wholly untenable, as the toast would be au saint père, and not au bon père. "Père" is applied to any friar in priest's orders, and "bon père" to the head of a monastery.

Bumpkin. A loutish person. (Dutch, boomken, a sprout, a fool.) This word very closely resembles the word "chit." (See CHITTY.)

Bumptious. Arrogant, botty, full of mighty airs and graces; apt to take offence at presumed slights. A corruption of presumptuous, first into "sumptious," then to bumptious.

Bun. The Good Friday hot cross bun, says Bryant, is derived from boun, the sacred cake offered at the Arkite temples every seventh day. Cecrops offered to Jupiter Olympus a sacred cake called bous (accusative boun). This consecrated bread, if we believe what is told us, will never grow mouldy, will ward off witches, cure diarrhoea, protect the house from fire, and work many other wonders.

Good Friday comes this month: the old woman

With one or two a penny "hot cross buns,"
Whose virtue is, if you believe what's said,
They'll not grow mouldy like the common bread.
Poor Robin, "Almanack," 1733.

Buncle, John. "A prodigious hand at matrimony, divinity, a song, and a peck." He marries seven wives, loses all in the flower of their age, is inconsolable for two or three days, then resigns himself to the decrees of Providence, and marries again.—The Life and Opinions of John Buncle, Esq., by Thomas Amory.

John is a kind of innocent Henry VIII. of private life.—Leigh Hunt.

Bunch of Fives. A slang term for the hand or fist.

Bundle. Bundle off. Get away. To bundle a person off, is to send him away unceremoniously. Similar to pack off. The allusion is obvious.

Bundle of Sticks. Æsop, in one of his fables, shows that sticks one by one may be readily broken; not so when several are bound together in a bundle. The lesson taught is, that "Union gives strength."

They now lay to heart the lesson of the bundle of sticks.—The Times.

Bundschuh (highlows). An insurrection of the peasants of Germany in the sixteenth century. So called from the highlows or clouted shoon of the insurgents.

Bung. A cant term for a toper. "Away . . . you filthy bung," says Doll to Pistol.—"2 Hen. IV.," ii. 4.

Brother bung. A cant term for a publican.

Bung up. Close up, as a bung closes a cask.

Bungay. Go to Bungay with you!—i.e., get away and don't bother me, or don't talk such stuff. Bungay, in Suffolk, used to be famous for the manufacture of leather breeches, once very fashionable. Persons who required new ones, or to have their old ones new-seated, went to Bungay for that purpose. Hence rose the cant saying, "Go to Bungay, and get your breeches mended," shortened into "Go to Bungay with you!"

Bung'alow (Indian). A house of a single floor. A dik-bungalow (thatched bungalow) is a caravansary or house built by the government for the use of travellers.

Bunkum. Claptrap. A representative at Washington being asked why he made such a flowery and angry speech, so wholly uncalled for, made answer, "I was not speaking to the house, but to Buncombe," which he represented (North Carolina). N.B.—Bunk means "chaff;" Danish, bynke (meal-tub); Swedish, bunch (milk-pan).

Bunsby, Jack. Captain Cuttle's friend; a Sir Oracle of his neighbours; profoundly mysterious, and keeping his eye always fixed upon invisible dream-land somewhere beyond the limits of infinite space.—Dickens, "Dombey and Son."

Burbon. A knight assailed by a rabble rout, who batter his shield to pieces, and compel him to cast it aside. Talus renders him assistance, and is informed by the rescued knight that Fourde'lis, his own true love, had been enticed away from him by Grantorto. When the rabble is dispersed, and Fourde'lis recovered, Burbon places her on his steed, and rides off as fast as possible. Burbon is Henri IV. of France; Fourde'lis, the kingdom of France; the rabble rout, the Roman Catholic party that tried to set him aside; the shield he is compelled to abandon is Protestantism; his carrying off Fourde'lis is his obtaining the kingdom by a coup after his renunciation of the Protestant cause.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," v. 11.

Burchell, Mr. A baronet who passes himself off as a poor man, his real name and title being Sir William Thornhill. His favourite cant word is "Fudge."—Goldsmith, "Vicar of Wakefield."

Burd, Helen. The Scotch female impersonation of the French preux or prud'homme, with this difference, that she is discreet, rather than brave and wise.

Burden of a Song. The words repeated in each verse, the chorus or refrain. It is the French bourdon, the big drone of a bagpipe, or double-diaxson of an organ, used in forte parts and choruses.

Burden of Isaiah. The "measure" of a prophecy announcing a calamity, or a denunciation of hardships on those against whom the burden is uttered—Isa. xiii. 1, &c.

Burdon's Hotel. Whitecross Street Prison. So called from Mr. Burdon, its governor. (Slang.)

Bure (2 syl.). The first woman, and sister of Borr, father of Odin. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Bureaucracy. A system of government in which the business is carried on in bureaux or departments. The French bureau means not only the office of a public functionary, but also the whole staff of officers attached to the department. As a word of reproach, bureaucracy has nearly the same meaning as Dickens's word, red-tapism (q.v.).

Burglar is the French-Latin burgi-larron (robber of a burg, castle, or house).

Burgundian. A Burgundian blow, i.e., decapitation. The duc de Biron, who was put to death for treason by Henri IV., was told in his youth, by a fortune-teller, "to beware of a Burgundian blow." When going to execution, he asked who was to be his executioner, and was told he was a man from Burgundy.

Burial of an Ass. No burial at all.

He shall be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem.—Jer. xxii. 19.

Bu'ridan's Ass. A man of indecision; like one "on double business bound, who stands in pause where he should first begin, and both neglects." Bu'ridan, the Greek sophist, said, "If a hungry ass were placed exactly between two hay-stacks in every respect equal, it would starve to death, because there would be no motive why it should go to one rather than to the other."

Burke. To murder by placing something over the mouth of the person attacked to prevent his giving alarm. So called from Burke, of Edinburgh, who, in 1832, used to clap a pitch plaister over his victims and murder them, for the sole purpose of selling the dead bodies to surgeons for dissection.

Burkers. Body-snatchers: those who kill by burking.

To burk a question: to strangle it in its birth. The publication was burked: suppressed before it was circulated.

Burl, Burler. In Cumberland a burler is the master of the revels at a hidden wedding, who is to see that the guests are well furnished with drink. To burl is to carouse or pour out liquor. (Anglo-Saxon, byrtian.)

Mr H. called for a quart of beer . . . He told me to burl out the beer, as he was in a hurry, and I burl'd out a glass, and gave it to him.

The Times, "Law Reports."

Burlaw or Byrlaw. A sort of Lynch-law in the rural districts of Scotland. The inhabitants of a district used to make certain laws for their own observance, and appoint one of their neighbours, called the Burlaw man, to carry out the pains and penalties. The word is compounded of the Dutch baur, a boor or rustic.

Burlesque. Father of burlesque poetry. Hippodax of Ephesus. (Sixth century B.C.)

Burlond. A giant whose legs Sir Tryamour cut off.—Romance of Sir Tryamour.

Burst. To inform against an accomplice. Slang variety of "split" (turn king's evidence, impeach). The person who does this splits or bursts the whole concern.

Bury the Hatchet. Let by-gones be by-gones. The "Great Spirit" commanded the North American Indians, when they smoked the calumet or peace-pipe, to bury their hatchets, scalping-knives, and war-clubs in the ground, that all thought of hostility might be buried out of sight.

It is much to be regretted that the American government, having brought the great war to a conclusion, did not bury the hatchet altogether.—The Times.

Buried was the bloody hatchet;
Buried was the dreadful war-club;
Buried were all warlike weapons,
And the war-cry was forgotten;
Then was peace among the nations.
Longfellow, "Hiawatha," xiii.

Bus. A contraction of Omnibus.

Bush. One beats the bush, but another has the hare, i.e., one does the work, but another reaps the profit. The Latins said, Sic vos non robis. The allusion is to beating the bush to start game. (See BEATING.)

Good wine needs no bush. A good article will make itself known without being puffed. The boothis in fairs used to be dressed with ivy, to indicate that wine was sold there, ivy being sacred to Bacchus. An ivy-bush half a century ago was the common sign of taverns, and especially of private houses where beer or wine could be obtained by travellers. In France, a peasant who sells his vineyard has to put a green bush over his door.

The proverb is Latin, and shows that the Romans introduced the custom into Europe. "Vino vendibili hedera non opus est" (Columella). It was also common to France. "Au vin qui se vend bien, il ne faut point de lierre."

Bushrangers. Australian, or, more strictly speaking, New South Wales highwaymen, who range the bushes, lying in wait for travellers, whom they strip of all they have about them. Gold finders are the great objects of their attack.

Business, Busy. Saxon, bysgian, the verb, bysig (busy); Dutch, bezigen; German, besorgen (care, management); sorge (care); Saxon, seogan (to see). From the German sorgen we get the French soigner (to look after something), soigne, and be-sogne (business, or that which is our care and concern), with be soin (something looked after but not found, hence "want"); the Italian besognio (a beggar).

Business To-morrow. When the Spartans seized upon Thebes, they placed Archias over the garrison. Pelopidas, with eleven others, banded together to put Archias to the sword. A letter containing full details of the plot was given to the Spartan polemarch at the banquet table; but Archias thrust the letter under his cushion, saying, "Business to-morrow." But long ere that sun arose he was numbered with the dead.

Bu'sirane (3 syl.). An enchanter bound by Britomart.—Spenser, "Faery Queen," bk. iii.

Busi'ris. A king of Egypt, who used to immolate to the gods all strangers who set foot on his shores. Hercules was seized by him, and would have fallen a victim; but he broke his chain, and slew the inhospitable king.

Busi'ris, according to Milton, is the Pharaoh who was drowned in the Red Sea.

Vex'd the Red-Sea coast, whose waves o'erthrew Busiris and his Memphian chivalry.

"Paradise Lost," bk. i.

Buskin. Tragedy. The Greek tragic actors used to wear a sandal some two or three inches thick, to elevate their stature. To this sole was attached a very elegant buskin, and the whole was called cotthur' nus. (See SOCK)

Or what (though rare) of later age
Ennobled hath the buskined stage.
Milton, "Il Penseroso."

Buss. To kiss. (Welsh, bus, the human lip; Gaelic, bus, the mouth; French, baiser, a kiss.)

You towers, whose wanton tops do buss the c'ou's,
Must kiss their own feet.

Shakespeare, "Troilus and Cressida," iv. 5.

Busterich. A German god. His idol may still be seen at Sondershusa, the castle of Schwartzemburg.

Butcher. The Butcher. Achmed Pasha was called djezzar (the butcher), and is said to have whipped off the heads of his seven wives all at once. He is famous for his defence of Acre against Napoleon I.

The Butcher. John, ninth lord Clifford, also called The Black, died 1461.

The Bloody Butcher. The duke of Cumberland, second son of George II. So called from his barbarities in suppressing the rebellion of the young Pretender.

The Royalist Butcher. Blaise de Montluc, distinguished for his cruelties to the Protestants in the reign of Charles IX. of France. (1502-1572.)

Butter. Soft soap, soft solder (pron. saw-der), "wiping down" with winning words. Punch expressively calls it "the milk of human kindness churned into butter." Soft words butter no parsnips. Saying "'Be thou fed,' will not feed a hungry man." Mere words will not find salt to our porridge, or butter to our parsnips.

Buttercups. So called because they were once supposed to increase the butter of milk. No doubt those cows give the best milk that pasture in fields where buttercups abound, not because these flowers produce butter, for cows never eat them, but because they grow only on sound, dry, old pastures, which afford the best food.

Butter-fingered. Said of a person who lets things fall out of his hand. His fingers are slippery, and things slip from them as if they were greased with butter.

Button. A decoy in an auction-room. So called because he buttons or ties the unwary to bargains offered for sale. The button fastens or fixes what else would slip away.

The button of the cap. The tip-top. Thus, in "Hamlet," Guildenstern says, "On fortune's cap we are not the very button" (Act ii., sc. 2), i.e., the most highly favoured. The button on the cap was a mark of honour. Thus, in China to the present hour the first grade of literary honour is the privilege of adding a gold button to the cap, a custom adopted in several collegiate schools of England. This gives the expression quoted a further force. Also, the several grades of mandarins are distinguished by a different coloured button on the top of their cap.

He has not all his buttons (Provincial), for he is half-silly.

Buttons. A page whose jacket in front is remarkable for a row of small round buttons, as close as they can be inserted, from chin to waist.

'Tis in his buttons. He is destined to obtain the prize; he is the accepted lover. It is still common to hear boys count their buttons, to know what trade they are to follow, whether they are to do a thing or not, and whether some favourite favours them. (See BACHELOR.)

'Tis in his buttons; he will carry't.
Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," iii. 2.

Butzen. An Indian god.

Buzfuz, Serjeant. A driving, chaffing, masculine bar orator, who twists "Chops and Tomato Sauce" into a declaration of love.—Dickens, "Pickwick Papers."

Buzz. Empty the bottle. A corruption of housé (to drink).

In housing a bout 'twas his gift to excel,
And of all jolly toppers he bore off the bell.

Buzzard, The, is meant for Dr. Bur-net, whose figure was lusty.

The noble Buzzard ever pleased me best.
Dryden, "Hind and Panther," pt. iii.

Buzzard called Hawk by courtesy. It is a euphemism—a brevet rank—a complimentary title.

Of small renown, 'tis true; for, not to lie,
We call [your buzzard] "hawk" by courtesy.
Dryden, "Hind and Panther," iii.

By. Meaning against. "I know nothing by myself, yet am I not thereby justified." (1 Cor. iv. 4.)

By-and-by now means a little time hence, but when the Bible was translated it meant instantly. "When persecution ariseth . . . by-and-by he is offended" (Matt. xiii. 21); rendered in Mark iv. 17 by the word "immediately." Our presently means in a little time hence, but in French (présentement) means now, directly. Thus, in France, we see These apartments to be let presently, meaning now—a phrase which would in English signify by-and-by.

By-laws. Local laws. From by, a borough. Properly, laws by a town council, and bearing only on the borough or company over which it has jurisdiction.

By-the-by. En passant, laterally connected with the main subject. "By-play" is side or secondary play; "By-lanes and streets" are those which branch out of the main thoroughfare. The first "by" means passing from one to another, as in the phrase "Day by day." Thus, "By-the-by" is passing from the main subject to a by or secondary one.

By the way is an incidental remark thrown in, and tending the same way as the discourse itself.

Byron. The Polish Byron. Adam Mickiewicz. (1798-1855.)

The Russian Byron. Alexander Sergeivitch Pushkin. (1799-1837.)

Byzantine Art. That symbolical system which was developed by the early Greek or Byzantine artists out of the Christian symbolism. Its chief features are the circle, dome, and round arch; and its chief symbols the lily, cross, vesica, and nimbus. St. Sophia, at Constantinople, and St. Mark, at Venice, are excellent examples.

Byzantine Historians. Certain Greek historians who lived under the Eastern empire between the sixth and fifteenth centuries. They may be divided into three groups:—(1) Those whose works form a continuous history of the Byzantine empire, from the fourth century to the conquest of Constantinople by the Turks; (2) general chroniclers who wrote histories of the world from the oldest period; and (3) writers on Roman antiquities, statistics, and customs.

Byzantines. Coins of the Byzantine empire, generally called Basants.

C

C. This letter is the outline of the hollow of the hand, and is called in Hebrew caph (the hollow of the hand).

C. The French c, when it is to be sounded like s, has a mark under it (ç); this mark is called a cedilla.

Ça Ira (it will go). Called emphatically Le Carillon National of the French Revolution (1790). It went to the tune of the Carillon National, which Marie Antoinette was for ever strumming on her harpsichord.

"Ça Ira" was the rallying cry borrowed by the Federalists from Dr. Franklin of America, who used to say, in reference to the American revolution, Ah! ah! ça ira, ça ira! ('twill be sure to do). The refrain of the carillon is—

Ha! ha! It will speed, it will speed, it will speed! Resistance is vain, we are sure to succeed.

Caa'ba (3 syl.). The shrine of Mecca, said by the Arabs to be built on the exact spot of the tabernacle let down from heaven at the prayer of repentant Adam. Adam had been a wanderer for 200 years, and here received pardon. The shrine was built, according to Arab tradition, by Ishmael, assisted by his father Abraham, who inserted in the walls a black stone "presented to him by the angel Gabriel."

Cab. A contraction of cabriolet (a little caperer), a small carriage that scampers along like a kid. As cabri means, in French, a "kid," a hackney coach is wittily called a cabri au lait (a kid cooked in milk), and a private brougham a cabri à la crème (a kid cooked in cream).

Cabal'. A junto or council of intriguers. One of the ministries of Charles II. was called a cabal (1670), because the initial letters of its members formed this acrostic: Clifford, Ashley, Buckingham, Arlington, and Launderdale. This accident may have popularised the word, but, without doubt, we borrowed it from the French cabale, "an intriguing faction," and Hebrew cab'ala, "secret knowledge." A junto is merely an assembly; Spanish, junta (a council). (See NOTARICA.)

In dark cabals and mighty juntos met.
Thomson.

Cabalistic. Mystic, word-juggling. (See CABBALIST.)

Caballero. A Spanish dance, grave and stately; so called from the ballad-music to which it was danced. The ballad begins—

Esta noche le mataron al caballero.

Cabbage. To file. The word is especially applied to the pieces of cloth kept back by tailors who “make up gentlemen’s own materials.” As the smoothing-iron is called a goose (q.v.), much wit is often squandered in bandying about the words goose and cabbage. (Dutch, kabassen; Swedish, grabba; Danish, griber, our grab.)

Cabbage is also a common schoolboy term for a literary crib, or other petty theft.

Your tailor, instead of shreds, cabbages whole yards of cloth.—Arbutnot’s “John Bull.”

Cab’ala. The oral law of the Jews delivered down from father to son by word of mouth. Some of the rabbins say that the angel Raziel instructed Adam in it, the angel Japhiel instructed Shem, and the angel Zedekiel instructed Abraham; but the more usual belief is that God instructed Moses, and Moses his brother Aaron, and so on from age to age.

Cab’balist. A Jewish doctor who professed the study of the Cab’ala, a mysterious science said to have been delivered to the Jews by revelation, and transmitted by oral tradition. This science consisted mainly in understanding the combination of certain letters, words, and numbers, said to be significant.

Cab’inlet Ministers. The chief officers of state in whom the administrative government is vested. It contains the first lord of the treasury (the premier), the lord high chancellor, lord president of the council, lord privy seal, chancellor of the exchequer, five secretaries of state, the first lord of the admiralty, president of the board of trade, postmaster-general, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, generally the president of the poor-law board, and the first commissioner of public works. The five secretaries of state are those of the home department, foreign affairs, colonies, war, and India. These ministers are privileged to consult the sovereign in the private cabinet of the palace.

Cab’inlet Pictures. Small pictures suited for a cabinet or very small room.

Cabi’ri. Mystic divinities worshipped in ancient Egypt, Phœnicia, Asia Minor, and Greece. They were inferior to the supreme gods. (Phœnician, kubir, powerful.)

Cable’s Length. 120 fathoms.

Cachecope Bell. A bell rung at funerals, when the pall was thrown over the coffin. (French, cache corps, cover over the body.)

Ca’chet. Lettres de cachet (letters sealed). Under the old French régime, carte-blanche warrants, sealed with the king’s seal, might be obtained for a consideration, and the person who held them might fill in any name. Sometimes the warrant was to set a prisoner at large, but it was more frequently for detention in the Bastille. During the administration of cardinal Fleury, 80,000 of these cachets were issued, the larger number being against the Jan’senists. In the reigns of Louis XV., XVI., fifty-nine were obtained against the one family of Mirabeau. This scandal was abolished Jan. 15, 1790.

Cac’odæ’môn. An evil spirit. (Greek, kakos daimon.)

He thee to hell for shame, and leave the world,
Thou cacodæmon.

Shakespeare, “Richard III.,” i. 3.

Cacoë’t’hës (Greek). A “bad habit.” as cacoëthës scribendi (a mania for authorship).

Cac’ouac’. An unbeliever.

Cac’ouac’curie. Infidelity. Words used by Voltaire, and probably coined from the name of some Indian tribe.

Ca’cus. A famous robber, represented as three-headed, and vomiting flames. He lived in Italy, and was strangled by Hercules. Sancho Panza says of the lord Rinaldo and his friends, “They are greater thieves than Cacus.” — Don Quixote.

Cad. A non-member of the university. (Latin, cadaver, a dead body.) Men in university slang are sorted under two groups—those who are members of the university, and those who are not. As the former are called men, the others must be no men; but as they bear the human form, they are human bodies (cads), though not human beings (men).

Cad. An omnibus conductor. Either another application of the preceding word, by grouping members of the road craft into whips and non-whips; or a contraction of cadger (a packman). The etymology of cad, a cadendo, is only a pun. N.B.—The Scotch cadie or caudie (a little servant or errand-boy), without the diminutive, becomes cawed, which offers a plausible suggestion.

Caddice or Cadblis. Worst-ed galloon; so called because it resembles the caddis-worm.

He hath ribands of all the colours i^t the rainbow;
... caddisses, cambrics, lawns.
Shakespeare, "Winter's Tale," iv. 3.

Caddice-garter. A servant, a man of mean rank. When garters were worn in sight, the gentry used very expensive ones, but the baser sort wore worst-ed galloon ones. Prince Henry calls Poina a "caddice-garter."—"I Henry I", ii. 4.

Dost hear,
My honest caddis-garter?
Glaphorne, "Wit in a Constable," 1639.

Cade. Jack Cade Legislation. Pressure from without. The allusion is to the insurrection of Jack Cade, an Irishman, who headed about 20,000 armed men, chiefly of Kent, "to procure redress of grievances" (1450). When Bright, in 1866, advised the favourers of reform to march in a body to the House to enforce their wishes, the pressure from without was justly stigmatised as "Jack Cade Legislation."

You that love the commons, follow me;
Now show yourselves men; 'tis of liberty.
We will not leave one lord, one gentleman;
Spare none but such as go in clouded shoon.
"2 Henry VI., iv. 2.

Cadet. Younger branches of noble families are so called, because their armorial shields are marked with a difference called a cadency.

Cadet is a student at the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, the Royal Military College at Sandhurst, or in one of her Majesty's training ships, the Excellent and the Britannia. From these places they are sent (after passing certain examinations) into the army as ensigns or second lieutenants, and into the navy as midshipmen. (French, cadette, junior member of a family.)

Cades'sia (Bottle of) gave the Arabs the monarchy of Persia. (A.D. 636.)

Cadger. One who carries butter, eggs, and poultry to market; a packman or huckster. From cadge (to carry). Hence the frame on which hawks were carried was called "a cadge."

Ca'di, among the Turks, is an inferior judge. "Cadi Lesker" is a superior cadi. The Spanish Alcaydé is the Moorish al cadi. (Arabic, a judge.)

Cadmus having slain the dragon which guarded the fountain of Dirce, in Bœotia, sowed the teeth of the monster, when a number of armed men sprang up and surrounded Cadmus with intent to kill him. By the counsel of Minerva, he threw a precious stone among the armed men, who, striving for it, killed one another. The foundation of the fable is this: Cadmus having slain a famous free-booter that infested Bœotia, his banditti set upon him to revenge their captain's death; but Cadmus sent a bribe, for which they quarrelled and slew each other.

Cadu'ceus (4 syl.). A white wand carried by Roman officers when they went to treat of peace. The Egyptians adorned the rod with a male and female serpent twisted about it, and kissing each other. From this use of the rod, it became the symbol of eloquence and also of office. In mythology, a caduceus with wings is placed in the hands of Mercury, the herald of the gods, and the poets feign that he could therewith give sleep to whomsoever he chose; wherefore Milton styles it "his opiate rod" in "Paradise Lost," xi. 133.

So with his dread caduceus Hermès led
From the dark regions of the imprisoned dead;
Or drove in silent shoals the lingering train
To Night's dull shore and Pluto's dreary reign.
Darwin, "Loves of the Plants," ii. 291.

Cadur'ci. The people of Aquitania. Cahors is the modern capital.

Cædmon. Cowherd of Whitby, the greatest poet of the Anglo-Saxons. In his wonderful romance we find the bold prototype of Milton's "Paradise Lost." The portions relating to the fall of the angels are most striking. The hero encounters, defeats, and finally slays Grindel, an evil being of supernatural powers.

Ca'erle'on, on the Usk, in Wales. The habitual residence of king Arthur, where he lived in splendid state, surrounded by hundreds of knights, twelve of whom he selected as Knights of the Round Table.

Cæsar was made by Hadrian a title, conferred on the heir presumptive to the throne (A.D. 135). Diocletian conferred the title on the two viceroys, calling the two emperors Augustus (sacred majesty). The emperor of Austria still assumes the title of kaiser (q.v.).

Thou art an emperor, Cæsar, keisar, and Pheczar.
Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," i. 3.

No bending knee shall call thee Cæsar now.
Shakespeare, "3 Henry VI.," iii. 1.

Cæsar, as a title, was pretty nearly equivalent to our prince of Wales and the French dauphin.

Cæsar won 320 triumphs.

Cæsar's wife must be above suspicion. The name of Pompeia having been mixed up with an accusation against P. Clodius, Cæsar divorced her; not because he believed her guilty, but because the wife of Cæsar must not even be suspected of crime. — Suetonius, "Julius Cæsar," 74.

Cæsar. (See AUT CÆSAR, &c.)
Julius Cæsar's sword. Crocca Mors (yellow death).

Cæsa'rian Operation. The extraction of a child from the womb by cutting. Julius Cæsar is said to have been thus brought into the world.

Caf, Mount. A fabulous mountain encircling the earth, as a hedge encloses a field. The earth, of course, was supposed to be a flat plain. (Mahometan mythology.)

Caftan (Persian). A Turkish vest.

Cag Mag. Tough old geese; food which none can relish. (Gaelic and Welsh, cag magu.)

Cagliostro. Conte de Cagliostro (or) Giuseppe Balsamo of Palermo, a charlatan who offered everlasting youth to all who would pay him for his secret. (1743-1795.)

Cagots. A sort of gipsy race in Gascony and Bearne, supposed to be descendants of the Visigoths, and shunned as something loathsome. (See CAQUEUX, COLIBERTS.)

Cahors. Usuriers de Cahors. In the thirteenth century there was a colony of Jewish money-lenders settled at Cahors, which was to France what Lombard Street was to London.

Cai'aphas. The country-house of Caiaphas, in which Judas concluded his bargain to betray his Master, stood on "The Hill of Evil Counsel."

Cain-coloured Beard. Yellow. In the ancient tapestries Cain and Judas are represented with yellow beards.

He hath but a little wee face, with a little yellow beard, a Cain-coloured beard. — Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," i. 4.

Cain'ites (2 syl.). Disciples of Cain, a pseudo-Gnostic sect of the second century. They renounced the New Testament, and received instead The Gospel of Judas, which justified the false disciple and the crucifixion of Jesus. This sect maintained that heaven and earth were created by the evil principle, and that Cain with his descendants were the persecuted party.

Caius, Dr. A French physician in Shakespeare's "Merry Wives."

The clipped English of Dr. Caius. — Macaway.

Caius College, Cambridge. Elevated by Dr. John Key (Caius), of Norwich, into a college, being previously only a hall called Gonville. (1557.)

Cake. A fool, a poor thing. In University slang a clever man is called a good man, and the opposite is a bad one or a cake. (Greek, kakos, bad.)

Cakes. Land of Cakes. Scotland, famous for its oatmeal cakes.

Cal'abash. A drinking cup or water-holder; so called from the calabash nut, of which it is made.

Calam'ity. The beating down of standing corn by wind or storm. The word is the Latin calamis (a stalk of corn). Hence Cicero calls a storm Calamito'sa tempestas (a corn-levelling tempest).

Calandri'no. A character in one of Boccaccio's stories, whose "misfortunes have made all Europe merry for four centuries." — Decameron.

Calay'a. The third paradise of the Hindus.

Calceola'ria. Little-shoe flowers; so called from their resemblance to fairy slippers. (Latin, cal'ceolus.)

Calculate is from the Latin calculi (pebbles), used by the Romans for counters. In the ab'acus, the round balls were called cal'culi, and it was by this instrument the Roman boys were taught to count and calculate. The Greeks voted by pebbles dropped into an urn, a method adopted both in ancient Egypt and Syria; counting these pebbles was "calculating" the number of voters. (See ABACUS.)

Calculators, The. Alfragan, the Arabian astronomer. Died 820.

Jedediah Buxton, of Elmeton, in Derbyshire. (1705-1775.)

George Bidder and Zerah Colburn, who exhibited publicly.

Cale. No man can make of ill acates good cale, i.e., good pottage of bad victu'als. Acates (2 syl.) are provisions bought (French, acheté); hence a buyer of food is an acater or caterer. Cale is pottage.

Caleb. The enchantress who carried off St. George in infancy.

Caleb, in Dryden's satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," is meant for lord Grey, one of the adherents of the duke of Monmouth.

Caleb Quo'tem. A parish clerk or jack-of-all-trades, in Colman's play called "The Review."

I resolved, like Caleb Quo'tem, to have a place at the review.—Washington Irving.

Calecue'gers. A tribe of giants in Indian mythology.

Caledo'nia. Scotland. A corruption of Celyddon, a Celtic word meaning "a dweller in woods and forests." The word Celt is itself a contraction of the same word (Celyd), and means the same thing.

Sees Caledonia in romantic view.

Thomson.

O Caledonia, stern and wild,
Meet nurse for a poetic child.—Scott,

Calembourg (French). A pun; a jest. From the "Jester of Kahlenberg," whose name was Wigand von Theben; a character introduced in "Tyll Eulenspiegel," a German tale. Eulenspiegel (a fool or jester) means Owl's looking-glass, and may probably have suggested the title of the famous periodical called the Owl, the witty but satirical "looking-glass" of the passing follies of the day. The jester of Calembourg visited Paris in the reign of Louis XV., and soon became noted for his blunders and puns.

Calendar. So called from calendis (q.v.).

The Three Calendars. Three royal princes, disguised as begging dervishes, the subject of three tales in the "Arabian Nights."

Cal'ends. The first of every month was so called by the Romans. Varro says the term originated in the practice of calling together or assembling the people on the first day of the month, when the pontifex informed them of the time of the new moon, the day of the non-s, with the festivals and sacred days to be observed. The custom continued till A.U.C. 450, when the fasti or calendar was posted in public places.

Caliban. New or unknown; as a Caliban style, a Caliban language. The allusion is to Shakespeare's Caliban ("The Tempest"), in which character lord Falkland, &c., said that Shakespeare had not only invented a new creation, but also a new language.

Satan had not the privilege, as Caliban, to use new phrases, and diction unknown.—Dr. Bentley.

Calibre. A mind of no calibre: of no capacity. A mind of great calibre: of large capacity. Calibre is the bore of a gun, and, figuratively, the bore or compass of our intelligence.

Caliburn. Same as Excalibar, king Arthur's well-known sword.

Onward Arthur paced, with hand

On Caliburn's resistless brand.

Scott, "Bridal of Triermain."

Cal'ico. So called from Calicut, in Malabar, once the chief port and emporium of Hindustan.

Cal'idore (3 syl.). Sir Cal'idore is the type of courtesy, and hero of the fourth book of Spenser's "Faery Queen." He is described as the most courteous of all knights, and is entitled the "all-beloved." The model of the poet was Sir Philip Sidney. His adventure is against the Blatant Beast, whom he muzzles, chains, and drags to Faery Land.

Sir Gawain was the Calidore of the Round Table.
—Southey.

Calig'orant. An Egyptian giant and cannibal who used to entrap strangers with a hidden net. This net was made by Vulcan to catch Mars and Venus; Mercury stole it for the purpose of catching Chloris, and left it in the temple of Anubis; Calig'orant stole it thence. At length Astolpho blew his magic horn, and the giant ran affrighted into his own net, which dragged him to the ground. Whereupon Astolpho made the giant his captive, and despoiled him of his net. This is an allegory. Caligorant was a great sophist and heretic in the days of Ariosto, who used to entangle people with his talk; but being converted by Astolpho to the true faith, was, as it were, caught in his own net, and both his sophistry and heresy were taken from him.—Ariosto, "Orlando Furioso."

Caligraph'ic Art. Writing very minutely and yet clearly. Peter Bale, in the sixteenth century, wrote in the compass of a silver penny the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, the Ten Commandments, two Latin prayers, his own name, the day of the month and date of the year, the year since the accession of queen Elizabeth, and a motto. With a glass this writing could be read. By photography a sheet of the Times newspaper has been reduced to a smaller compass. (Greek, kalos-grapho, I write beautifully.)

Calig'ula. A Roman emperor. So called because he wore a military sandal called a cal'iga, which had no upper leather, and was used only by the common soldiers. (12, 37-41.)

"The word caligæ, however," continued the Baron, "... means, in its primitive sense, sandals; and Cæsar . . . received the cognomen of Caligula, a caligis, sive caligis levioribus, quibus adolescentior non fuerat in exercitu Germanici patris sui. And the caligæ were also proper to the monastic bodies; for we read in the ancient Glossarium, upon the rule of St. Benedict . . . that caligæ were tied with latches."—Scott, "Waverley," xlviii.

Calig'ula's Horse. Incitatus. It was called a priest and consul, had a manger of ivory, and drank wine from a golden goblet.

Calipash, Calipsee. W. T. M., in "Notes and Queries," suggests, as the origin of these terms, the Greek words chalepos, chalepē (hard to deal with, i.e., to digest).

Caliph or Calif. A title given to the successors of Mahomet. Among the Saracens a caliph is one vested with supreme dignity. The caliphate of Bagdad reached its highest splendour under Haroun al Raseid, in the nineteenth century. For the last 200 years the appellation has been swallowed up in the titles of Shah, Sultan, Emir, and so on. (Arabic, calafa, to succeed.)

Calis'ta. The heroine of Rowe's "Fair Penitent."

Calis'to and Arcas. Calisto was an Arcadian nymph metamorphosed into a she-bear by Jupiter. Her son Arcas having met her in the chase, would have killed her, but Jupiter converted him into a he-bear, and placed them both in the heavens, where they are recognised as the Great and Little Bear.

Calix'tines (3 syl.). A religious sect of Bohemians in the fifteenth century; so called from Calix (the chalice), which they insisted should be given to the laity in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, as well as the bread or wafer.

Call of God. An invitation, exhortation, or warning, by the dispensations of Providence (Isa. xxii. 12); divine influence on the mind to do or avoid something (Heb. iii. 1).

Call of Abraham. The invitation or command of God to Abraham, to leave his idolatrous country, under the promise of being made a great nation.

Call to the Unconverted. An invitation, accompanied with promises and threats, to induce the unconverted to receive the gospel.

Effectual Calling. An invitation to believe in Jesus, rendered effectual by the immediate operation of the Holy Ghost.

Gospel Call. The invitation of the gospel to men to believe in Jesus, to the saving of their souls.

Call to the Pastorate. An invitation to a minister by the members of a church to preside over a certain congregation.

Call of the House. An imperative summons sent to every member of Parliament to attend. This is done when the sense of the whole house is required. At the muster, the names of the members are called over, and defaulters reported.

Call to the Bar. The admission of a law student to the privileges of a barrister. The names of those qualified are called over.

Calla'bre or Calaber. A Cala'brian fur. Ducange says, "At Chichester the 'priest vicars' and at St. Paul's the 'minor canons' wore a calabre amyce;" and Bale, in his "Image of Both Churches," alludes to the "fair rochets of Raines (Rennes), and costly grey amicës of calaber and cats' tails."

The lord mayor and those aldermen above the chair ought to have their coats furred with grey amis, and also with changeable taffeta; and those below the chair with calabre and with green taffeta.—Hutton, "New View of London."

Callim'achos. The Italian Callimachos. Filippo Buonaccorsi. (1437-1496.)

Calling. A vocation, trade, or profession. The allusion is to the calling of the apostles by Jesus Christ to follow him. In the legal profession persons must still be called to the bar before they can practise.

Calliope (beautiful-voiced). The muse of epic or heroic poetry. Her emblems are a stylus and wax tablets.

Callippic Period. The correction of the Metonic cycle by Callippos. In four cycles, or seventy-six years, the Metonic calculation was seven and a-half in excess. Callippos proposed to quadruple the period of Meton, and deduct a day at the end of it; at the expiration of which period Callippos imagined that the new and full moons returned to the same day of the solar year.

Callir'rhoë (4 syl.). The lady-love of Chæreas, in Chariton's Greek romance, entitled the "Loves of Chæreas and Callirrhoë," written in the eighth century.

Calottis'tes (4 syl.). (See REGIMENT.)

Cal'oyer. Monks in the Greek Church, who follow the rule of St. Basil. They are divided into cen'obites, who recite the offices from midnight to sunrise; an'chorites, who live in hermitages; and recluses, who shut themselves up in caverns and live on alms. (Greek, kalogeros.)

Calpe (2 syl.). Culpë and Ab'yla. The two pillars of Hercules. According to one account, these two were originally only one mountain, which Hercules tore asunder; but some say he piled up each mountain separately, and poured the sea between them.

Heaves up huge Abyla on Afric's sand,
Crowns with high Culpë Europe's salient strand,
Crests with opposing towers the splendid scene,
And pours from urns immense the sea between.
Darwin, "Economy of Vegetation."

Cal'umet (the peace-pipe). When the North American Indians make peace or form an alliance, the high contracting parties smoke together to ratify the arrangement.

The peace-pipe is about two and a-half feet long, the bowl is made of highly-polished red marble, and the stem of a reed, which is decorated with eagles' quills, women's hair, and so on.

"The Great Spirit, at an ancient period, called the Indian nations together, and standing on the precipice of the red pipe-stone rock, broke off a piece which he moulded into the bowl of a pipe, and fitting on it a long reed, filled the pipe with the bark of red willow, and smoked over them, turning to the four winds. He told them the red colour of the pipe represented their flesh, and when they smoked it they must bury their war-clubs and scalping-knives. At the last whiff the Great Spirit disappeared."

To present the calumet to a stranger is a mark of hospitality and good-will; to refuse the offer is an act of hostile defiance.

Wash the war-paint from your faces.
Wash the war-stains from your fingers.
Bury your war-clubs and your weapons; . . .
Smoke the calumet together,
And as brothers live henceforward.
Longfellow, "Hwëtha," i.

Cal'vary (bare skull), Gol'gotha (skull). The place of our Lord's crucifixion; so called from some fanciful resemblance which it bore to a human skull. The present church of "the Holy Sepulchre" has no claim to be considered the site thereof; it is far more likely that the "mosque of Omar," called the dome of the rock, occupies the real site.

Calvert's Entire. The 14th Foot. Called Calvert from their colonel, Sir Harry Calvert (1806-1826), and entire, because three entire battalions were kept up for the good of Sir Harry, when adjutant-general. The term is, of course, a play on Calvert's malt liquor.

Calves. The inhabitants of the Isle of Wight are so called from a legendary joke which states that a calf once got its head firmly wedged in a wooden pale, and, instead of breaking up the pale, the farm-man cut off the calf's head.

Calves' Head. There are many ways of dressing a calf's head. Many ways of saying or doing a foolish thing; a simpleton has many ways of showing his folly; or, generally, if one way won't do, we must try another. The allusion is to the great Calves' Head Club banquet, when the board was laden with calves' heads cooked in sundry ways and divers fashions.

Calves' Head Club. Instituted in ridicule of Charles I. The great annual banquet was held on the 30th January, and consisted of a cod's head, to represent the person of Charles Stuart, independent of his kingly office; a pike with little ones in its mouth, an emblem of tyranny; a boar's head with an apple in its mouth, to represent the king preying on his subjects; and calves' heads dressed in sundry ways, to represent Charles in his regal capacity. After the banquet, the king's book (Icon Basil'ikē) was burnt, and the parting cup was "To those worthy patriots who killed the tyrant."

Calvin is said to have caused the death of Serve'tus, a heretic, with whom he had a religious controversy. Servetus was seized, condemned, and burnt to death, solely for his heretical views. (1553.)

Calvinism. The five moot points are—

Predestination, or particular election.

Irresistible grace.

Original sin, or the total depravity of the natural man.

Particular redemption.

Final perseverance of the saints.

Cal'ydōn. A forest, supposed in the romances relating to king Arthur to occupy the northern portion of England.

Calyp'so, in Fénelon's "Télémaque," is meant to represent Madame de Montespan. In fairy mythology she was queen of the island Ogy'gia, on which Ulysses was wrecked, and where he was detained for seven years.

Calypso's Isle. Goza, near Malta. Called in classic mythology Ogy'gia.

Cam and Isis. The universities of Cambridge and Oxford. So called from the rivers on which they stand.

May you, my Cam and Isis, preach it long,
"The right & vine of kings to govern wrong,"
"Dunciad," iv. 187.

Cama. The god of love and marriage in Indian mythology.

Cama'cho, "richest of men," makes grand preparations for his wedding with Quite'ria, "fairest of women;" but as the bridal party were on their way, Basil'ius cheats him of his bride, by pretending to kill himself. As he is supposed to be dying, Quiteria is given 'o him in marriage as a mere matter of form; but as soon as this is done, up jumps Basil'ius, and shows that his wounds were a mere pretence.—Cervantes, "Don Quixote," p. ii. 3, 4.

Camal'dolites (4 syl.). A religious order of great rigidity of life, founded in the vale of Camal'doli, in the Tuscan Apennines, by St. Romuald, a Benedictine. (Eleventh century.)

Camaral'zaman (prince) fell in love with Badou'ra, princess of China, the moment he saw her.—"Arabian Nights," Prince Camaralzaman.

Camarilla (Spanish). A clique; the confidants or private advisers of the sovereign. It literally means a small private chamber, and is in Spain applied to the room in which boys are flogged.

Encircled with a dangerous camarilla.—The Times.

Cam'balo's Ring. Given him by his sister Can'acē. It had the virtue of healing wounds. (See CAMBEL.)—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. iv.

Cambel. Called by Chaucer, Cam'balo. Brother of Can'acē, a female paragon. He challenged every suitor to his sister's hand, and overthrew all except Tri'amond, who married the lady.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. iv.

Camber. Second son of king Brute, to whom Wales was left; whence its name of Cambria.—British Fable.

Cam'bria. The ancient name of Wales, or land of the Cimbri.

Cambria's fatal day.
Gry, "Bard."

Cam'brian. Pertaining to Wales; Welsh. (See above.)

The Cambrian mountains, like far clouds,
That skirt the blue horizon, dusky rise.
Thomson, "Spring."

Cam'brian Series (in geology). The earliest fossiliferous rocks in North Wales. So named by professor Sedgwick.

Cambric. From Cambray, in France, where it is still the chief manufacture.

Cambuscan. King of Sarra, in the land of Tartary; the model of all royal virtues. His wife was El'feta; his two sons, Algarsife and Cam'balo; and his daughter Can'acë. On her birthday (15th Oct.) the king of Arabia and India sent Cambuscan a "steed of brass, which, between sunrise and sunset, would carry its rider to any spot on the earth." All that was required was to whisper the name of the place in the horse's ear, mount upon his back, and turn a pin set in his ear. When the rider had arrived at the place required, he had to turn another pin, and the horse instantly descended, and, with another screw of the pin, vanished till it was again required. This story is told by Chaucer, in the "Squire's Tale," but was never finished. Probably the end of the tale would have been the victories of Cambuscan; Algarsife winning Theodora; and the marriage of Canacë to some knight who overmastered in single combat her two brothers. Spenser took up the same tale in his "Faery Queen," iv. Milton talks of calling up

Him that left half-told
The story of Cambuscan bold.

Camby'ses (3 syl.). A pompous, ranting character in Preston's lamentable tragedy of that name.

Give me a cup of sack, to make mine eyes look red; for I must speak in passion, and I will do it in king Camby'ses' vein.—1 Henry IV., ii. 4.

Camden Society, for the publication of early historic and literary remains, is named in honour of William Camden, the historian.

Cam'deo. God of love in Hindu mythology.

Camel. The name of Mahomet's favourite camel was Al Kaswa. The mosque at Koba covers the spot where it knelt when Mahomet fled from Mecca. Mahomet considered the kneeling of the camel as a sign sent by God, and remained at Koba in safety for four days. The swiftest of his camels was Al Adha.

Camel. The prophet Mahomet's camel performed the whole journey from Jerusalem to Mecca in four bounds, for which service he has a place in heaven with Borak (the prophet's horse), Balaam's ass, Tobit's dog, and Ketmir (the dog of the seven sleepers).—Curzon.

Camel. "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God" (Matt. xix. 24). In the Koran we find a similar expression: "The impious shall find the gates of heaven shut, nor shall he enter, till a camel shall pass through the eye of a needle." In the Rabbinical writings we have a slight variety which goes to prove that the word "camel" should not be changed into "cable," as Theophylact suggests: "Perhaps thou art one of the Pampe-dith'ians, who can make an elephant pass through the eye of a needle."

It is as hard to come, as for a camel
To thread the postern of a needle's eye.
Shakespeare, "Richard II.", v. 5.

Cameleon. You are a cameleon, i.e., very changeable—shifting according to the opinions of others, as the cameleon changes its hue to that of contiguous objects.

As the cameleon, who is known
To have no colours of its own,
But borrows from his neighbour's hue
His white or black, his green or blue.—Prior.

Camellia. A shrub, or rather genus of evergreen shrubs; so named in honour of G. J. Kamel (Latin, Camellius), a Spanish Jesuit.

Cam'lot (Somersetshire), where king Arthur held his court.

Camelote (2 syl.). Fustian, rubbish, trash. The cloth so called ought to be made of goats' hair, but is a mixture of wool and silk, wool and hair, or wool, silk, and hair, &c. (See CAMLET.)

Cam'eo. An anaglyph on a precious stone. The anaglyph is when the figure is raised in relief; an intaglio is when the figure is hollowed out. The word cameo means an onyx, and the most famous cameo in the world is the onyx containing the apoth'eosis of Augustus.

Cam'eron Highlanders. The 79th Regiment of Infantry, raised by Allan Cameron, of Errock, in 1793.

Cameronian Regiment. The 26th Infantry, which had its origin in a body of Cameronians (q.v.), in the Revolution of 1688.

Camero'nians. The strictest sect of Scotch Presbyterians, organised in 1688, by Archibald Cam'eron, who suffered death in 1680 for his religious views. He objected to the alliance of church and state.

Camilla. Virgin queen of the Volscians. Virgil says that she was so swift that she could run over a field of corn without bending a single blade, or make her way over the sea without even wetting her feet.

Not so when swift Camilla scours the plain,
Fries o'er the unbending corn and skims along the main. Pope.

Camillus, five times dictator of Rome, was falsely accused of embezzlement, and went into voluntary exile; but when the Gauls besieged Rome, he returned and delivered his country.

Camillus, only vengeful to his foes.
Thomson, "Winter."

Cam'isard or Camisado. A night attack. In French history the Camisards are the Protestant insurgents of the Cévennes, who resisted the violence of the dragonnades, after the revocation of the edict of Nantes. They were so called because they wore a camise or peasant's smock over their armour, both to conceal it, and that they might the better recognise each other in the dark. Their leader was Cavalier, afterwards governor of Jersey.

Camlan, Battle of (Cornwall), which put an end to the Knights of the Round Table. Here Arthur received his death wound from the hand of his nephew Modred. (A.D. 542.)

Cam'let is not connected with the word camel; it is a fine cloth made of goats' hair, called Turkish yarn, and is from the Arabic word chamal (fine).

Cam'mock. As crooked as a cammock. The cammock is a piece of timber bent for the knee of a ship. (Saxon.)

Though the cammock, the more it is bowed the better it is; yet the bow, the more it is bent the weaker it waxeth.—Lily.

Campa'nia. Properly the Terra di Lavoro of Italy, i.e., the plain country about Cap'ua.

Disdainful of Campania's gentle plains.
Thomson, "Summer."

Campeador (Cam-pa'-dor). The Cid (q.v.).

Can'acé (3 syl.). A paragon of women, the daughter of king Cambus'can, to whom the king of Arabia and India sent as a present a mirror and a ring. The mirror would tell the lady if any man on whom she set her heart would prove true or false, and the ring (which was to be worn on her thumb) would enable her to understand the language of birds and converse with them. It would also give the wearer perfect knowledge of the medicinal properties of all roots. Chaucer never finished the tale, but probably he meant to marry Can'acé to some knight who would be able to overthrow her two brothers, Can'balo and Al'garsife, in the tournament. (See below.)

Can'acé was courted by a crowd of suitors, but her brother Can'balo or Cambel gave out that any one who pretended to her hand must encounter him in single combat, and overthrow him. She ultimately married Tri'amond, son of the fairy Ag'apë.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. iv. 2.

Can'ache (3 syl.). One of Actæon's dogs. (Greek, "having a sharp, ringing voice.")

Can'ada Balsam. Made from the Pinus balsamea, a native of Canada.

Canaille (French, can-nay'-e). The rabble, the roughs. Its primary meaning is the coarse part of meal, dregs.

Canard. A hoax. Cornelissen, to try the gullibility of the public, reported in the papers that he had twenty ducks, one of which he cut up and threw to the nineteen, who devoured it greedily. He then cut up another, then a third, and so on till nineteen were cut up; and as the nineteenth was gobbled up by the surviving duck, it followed that this one duck actually ate nineteen ducks—a wonderful proof of duck voracity. This tale had the run of all the papers, and gave a new word to the language.—Quetelet.

Cancan. Dance the cancan. A licentious free-and-easy way of dancing quadrilles adopted in the public gardens, opéra comique, and casinos of Paris. (Cancan, tittle-tattle, familiarity.)

Cancel, to blot out, is merely "to make lattice-work." This is done by making a cross over the part to be omitted. (Latin, cancello, to make trellis.)

Cancer (the Crab) appears when the sun has reached his highest northern limit, and begins to go backward towards the south; but, like a crab, the return is sideways. (June 21 to July 23.)

Candaules (3 syl.). King of Lydia, who exposed the charms of his wife to Gy'güs; whereupon the queen compelled Gy'gos to assassinate her husband, after which she married the murderer, who became king, and reigned twenty-eight years. (716-678.)

Can'didate (3 syl.) means "clothed in white." Those who solicited the office of consul, quæstor, prætor, &c., among the Romans, arrayed themselves in a loose white robe. It was loose that they might show the people their scars, and white in sign of fidelity and humility.

Candide (2 syl.). The hero of Voltaire's novel so called. All sorts of misfortunes are heaped upon him, and he bears them all with cynical indifference.

Candle. What is the Latin for candle? — Tacë. Here is a play of words: to'ce means hold your tongue, don't bother me. (See GOOSE.)

To hold a candle to the devil. To aid or countenance that which is wrong. The allusion is to the practice of Roman Catholics, who burn candles before the image of a favourite saint, carry them in funeral processions, and place them on their altars.

What! must I hold a candle to my shame?
Shakespeare, "Merchant of Venice," ii. 6.

Candles used by Roman Catholics at funerals are the relic of an ancient Roman custom. In order to diminish the expenses of funerals, candles and tapers made of wax were carried in the procession.

The game is not worth the candle (Le jeu ne vaut par la chandelle). Not worth even the cost of the candle that lights the players.

Candlemas Day. The 2nd of February, when, in the Roman Catholic Church, there is a candle procession, to consecrate all the candles which will be needed in the church during the year. The candles symbolise Jesus Christ, called "the light of the world," and "a light to lighten the Gentiles." It was the old Roman custom of burning candles to the goddess Feb'rua, mother of Mars, to scare away evil spirits.

On Candlemas day
Candles and candlesticks throw all away.

Candour, Mrs. A type of female backbiters. In Sheridan's comedy of "The Rivals."

The name of "Mrs. Candour" has become one of those formidable hy-pho-ras, which have had more power in putting folly and ill-nature out of countenance than whole volumes of remonstrance.
T. Moore.

Caneph'oræ (in architecture). Figures of young persons of either sex bearing a basket on their head. (Greek, basket-bearers.)

Canic'ular Year. The ancient solar year of the Egyptians, which began and ended with the rising of the Dog-star, and corresponded with the overflow of the Nile.

Canid'ia. A sorceress, who could bring the moon from heaven; mentioned by Horace.

Your ancient conjurors were wont
To make her (the moon) from her sphere dismount,
And to their incantations stoop.
"Hulibras," pt. ii. 3.

Canker. The briar or dog-rose.

Put down Richard, that sweet lovely rose,
And plant this thorn, this canker, Bolingbroke.
Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV.," i. 3.

Cannæ. The place where Han'nibal was defeated by the Romans under Paulus Æmil'ius. Any fatal battle that is the turning point of a great general's prosperity is called his Cannæ. Thus, we say "Moscow was the Cannæ of Napoleon Buonaparte."

Cannel Coal. Either a corruption of candle coal, so called from the bright flame, unmixed with smoke, which it yields in combustion; or else Kendal coal, where it abounds.

Cannibal. An Indian word applied to those who eat flesh. (Hindustani, Chanewal or kha'newa'la', an eater of flesh). The usual derivation is Canibbee, corrupted into Caribbee, supposed to be man-eaters. Some of the tribes of these islands have no r. At the present day the Battas of Suma'tra, and the inhabitants of the Fiji' islands, devour human flesh.

The natives live in great fear of the canibals (i.e., Caribals, or people of Cariba). — Columbus.

Cannibals. Learners in the art of rowing; those under training. The word is a pun on Cannot pulls.

Canoba. The Indian Apollo, or god of inspiration.

Canoe'. A boat. (German, kahn, a boat; Old French, cane, a ship, and canot, a boat; Latin, canna, a hollow stem or reed; our cane, can, a jug; cannon, canal, &c.)

Canon. The canons used to be those persons who resided in the buildings contiguous to the cathedral, employed either in the daily service, or in the education of the choristers. The word is Greek, and means "weighed" or "choice men."

Canon. A divine or ecclesiastical law.

Or that the Everlasting had not fixed
His canon 'gainst self-slaughter.
Shakespeare, "Hamlet," i. 2.

Can'on Law. A collection of ecclesiastical laws which serve as the rule of church government. (See CANONICAL.)

Canon'ical. Canon is a Greek word, and means the index of a balance, hence a law.

The sacred canon means the accepted books of Holy Scripture, which contain the inspired laws of salvation and morality; also called The Canonical Books.

Canon'ical Hours. The times within which the sacred offices may be performed. In the Roman Catholic Church they are seven—viz., matins, prime, tierce, sext, nones, vespers, and compline. Prime, tierce, sext, and nones are the first, third, sixth, and ninth hours of the day, counting from six in the morning. Compline is a corruption of completorium (that which completes the services of the day). The reason why there are seven canonical hours is because David says, "Seven times a day do I praise thee" (Psalm cxix. 164).

Canon'ical Punishments are those which the church is authorised to inflict.

Canonicals.

The pouch on the gown of an M.D., designed for carrying drugs.

The coif of a serjeant-at-law, designed for concealing the tourse.

The lamb-skin on a B.A. hood, in imitation of the toga can'dida of the Romans.

The strings of an Oxford undergraduate, to show the wearer is still in leading strings.

The tippet on a barrister's gown, meant for a wallet to carry briefs in.

The proctors' and pro-proctors' tippet, for papers—a sort of sabretache.

Can'o'pic Vases. Used by the Egyptian priests for the viscera of bodies embalmed, four vases being provided for each body. So called from Can'o'pus, in Egypt, where they were first used.

Can'o'pus. The Egyptian god of water. The Chaldeans worshipped fire, and sent all the other gods a challenge, which was accepted by a priest of Can'o'pus. The Chaldeans lighted a vast fire round the god Canopus, when the Egyptian deity spouted out torrents of water and quenched the fire, thereby obtaining the triumph of water over fire.

Can'opy properly means a gnat curtain. Herodotus tells us (ii. 95) that the fishermen of the Nile used to lift their nets on a pole, and form thereby a rude sort of tent under which they slept securely, as gnats will not pass through the meshes of a net. Subsequently the tester of a bed was so called, and lastly the canopy borne over kings. (Greek, konops, a gnat.)

Cant. Mock humility. Alexander and Andrew Cant maintained that all those who refused the "Covenant" ought to be excommunicated, and that those were cursed who made use of the prayer-book. These same Cants, in their grace before meat, used to "pray for all those who suffered persecution for their religious opinions."—Mercurius Publicus, No. ix. (1661.)

Canteen' means properly a wine-cellar. Then a refreshment-house in a barrack for the use of the soldiers. Then a vessel, holding about three pints, for the use of soldiers on the march. (Latin, can'tina.)

Canterbury. Canterbury is the higher rank, but Winchester the better manger. Canterbury is the higher see in rank, but Winchester the one which produces the most money. This was the reply of William Edington, bishop of Winchester, when offered the archbishopric of Canterbury. (1366.)

Canterbury Tales. Chaucer supposed that he was in company with a party of pilgrims going to Canterbury to pay their devotions at the shrine of Thomas à Becket. The party assembled at an inn in Southwark, called the Tabard, and there agreed to tell one tale each, both in going and returning. He who told the best tale was to be treated with a supper on their homeward journey. The work is incomplete, and we have none of the tales told in the homeward route.

A Canterbury Tale. A cock-and-bull story; a romance. So called from Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales."

Canvas means cloth made of hemp. To canvas a subject is to strain it through a hemp strainer, to sift it; and to canvass a borough is to sift the votes. (Latin, can'nabis, hemp.)

Ca'ora. A river, on the banks of which are a people whose heads grow beneath their shoulders. Their eyes are in their shoulders, and their mouths are in the middle of their breasts.—Hackluyt, "Voyage," 1598. Raleigh, in his "Description of Guiana," gives a similar account of a race of men.

The Anthropophagi and men whose heads
Do grow beneath their shoulders.

Shakespeare, "Othello," i. 3.

Cap. Wearing the cap and bells. Said of a person who is the butt of the company, or one who excites laughter at his own expense. The reference is to licensed jesters formerly attached to noblemen's establishments. Their head-gear was a cap with bells.

I cap to that, i.e., assent to it. The allusion is to a custom observed in France amongst the judges in deliberation. Those who assent to the opinion stated by any of the bench signify it by lifting their toque from their heads.

Cap in hand. Submissively. To wait on a man cap in hand is to wait on him like a servant, ready to do his bidding.

Cap-à-pie is the Spanish capa y pazu (helmet and sword), meaning fully equipped. The general etymology is the French cap à pie, but the French phrase is de pied en cap.

Armed at all points exactly, cap-a-pe.

Shakespeare, "Hamlet," i. 2.

I am courtier, cap-a-pe.

Shakespeare, "Winter's Tale," iv. 3.

Cap of Liberty. When a slave was manumitted by the Romans, a small red cloth cap, called pil'vus, was placed on his head. As soon as this was done, he was termed liberti'nus (a freedman), and his name was registered in the city tribes. When Saturni'nus, in 263, possessed himself of the capitol, he hoisted a cap on the top of his spear, to indicate that all slaves who joined his standard should be free. When Marius incited the slaves to take up arms against Sylla, he employed the same symbol; and when Cæsar was murdered, the conspirators marched forth in a body, with a cap elevated on a spear, in token of liberty. (See LIBERTY.)

Cap of Maintenance. A cap of dignity anciently belonging to the rank of duke; the fur cap of the Lord Mayor of London, worn on days of state; a cap carried before the British sovereigns at their coronation. Maintenance here means defence.

Capfull of Wind. Olaus Magnus tells us that Eric, king of Sweden, was so familiar with evil spirits that what way soever he turned his cap, the wind would blow, and for this was he called Windy Cap. The Laplanders drove a profitable trade in selling winds; but even so late as 1814, Bessie Millic, of Pomo'na (Orkney Islands), helped out her living by selling favourable winds to mariners for the small sum of sixpence.

Cape. Spirit of the Cape. (See ADAMASTOR.)

Capel Court. A speculation in stocks of such magnitude as to affect the money market. Capel Court is the name of the place where transactions in the stocks are carried on.

Caper Merchant. A dancing-master, who cuts "capers."

Capet (Cap-pay). Hugues, the founder of the French monarchy, was surnamed Capetus (clothed with a capot or monk's hood), because he always wore a clerical costume, as abbot of St. Martin de Tours. This was considered the family name of the kings of France; hence Louis XVI. was arraigned before the National Convention under the name of Louis Capet.

Capital. Political capital is something employed to serve a political purpose. Thus, the Whigs make political capital out of the errors of the Tories, and vice versa.

He tried to make capital out of his rival's discomfiture.—The Times.

Capitè Censi. The lowest rank of Roman citizens. So called because they were counted simply, by the poll, as they had no taxable property.

Capit'ulares (4 syl.). The laws of the first two dynasties of France were so called, because they were divided into chapters. (French, capitulaire.)

Capon. A fish out of the coup. So called by those friars who wished to evade the Friday fast by eating chickens instead of fish. (See YARMOUTH.)

Cap'ricorn. Called by Thomson, in his "Winter," "the centaur archer." Anciently the winter solstice occurred on the entry of the sun into Capricorn; but the stars having advanced a whole sign to the east, the winter solstice now falls at the sun's entrance into Sagittarius (the centaur archer), so that the poet is strictly right, though we vulgarly retain the ancient classical manner of speaking. Capricornus is the tenth, or, strictly speaking, the eleventh sign of the Zodiac. (Dec. 21—Jan. 20.)

Captain. Capitano del Popolo, i.e., Garibaldi.

The Great Captain (el gran capitano). Gonzalvo di Cor'dova. (1453-1515.)

Mannel Comnenus of Trebizond. (1143-1180.)

Cap'tious. Fallacious, deceitful; now it means ill-tempered, carping. (Latin, captiosus.)

I know I love in vain, strive against hope;

Yet in this captious and intemperate sieve,

I still pour in the waters of my love.

Shakespeare, "All's Well that Ends Well," 1.3.

Cap'ua. Capua corrupted Hannibal. Luxury and self-indulgence will ruin any one. Hannibal was everywhere victorious over the Romans till he took up his winter quarters at Capua, the most luxurious city of Italy. When he left Capua his star began to wane, and ere long Carthage was in ruins, and himself an exile.

Capu'chin. A nickname given to a branch of Franciscans from the "cap'uce" or pointed cowl which they wore, in imitation of St. Francis.

Cap'ulet. A noble house in Vero'na, the rival of that of Montague (3 syl.); Juliet is of the former, and Romeo of the latter. Lady Capulet is the beau-ideal of a proud Italian matron of the fifteenth century. The expression so familiar, "the tomb of all the Capulets," is from Burke.—Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet."

Caput Mortuum. Latin for head of the dead, used by the old chemists to designate the residuum of chemicals, when all their volatile matters had escaped. Anything from which all that rendered it valuable has been taken away. Thus, a learned scholar paralysed is a mere caput mortuum of his former self. The French "Directory" towards its close was the mere caput mortuum of a governing body.

Caqueux. A sort of gipsy race in Brittany, similar to the Cagots of Gascony, and Coliberts of Poitou.

Car'abas. He is a marquis of Carabas. A fossil nobleman, of unbounded pretensions and vanity, who would fain restore the slavish foolery of the reign of Louis XIV.; one with Fortunatus's purse, which was never empty. The character is taken from Perrault's tale of "Puss in Boots."

Prêtres que nous vengeons

Lèvez la dime et partageons;

Et toi, peuple animal,

Porte encor le bât féodal. . . .

Chapeau bas! Chapeau bas!

Gloire au marquis de Carabas!

Béranger, 1816.

Caracalla. Aurelius Antoninus was so called because he adopted the Gaulish caracalla in preference to the Roman toga. It was a large, close-fitting, hooded mantle, reaching to the heels, and slit up before and behind to the waist. Aurelius was himself born in Gaul.

Carac'ci. Founder of the eclectic school in Italy. Luis and his two cousins, Augustin and Annibale, founded the school called Incaminati (progressive), which had for its chief principle the strict observance of nature. Luis (1554-1619), Augustin (1553-1601), Annibale (1560-1609).

The Caracci of France. Jean Jouvenet, who was paralysed on the right side, and painted with his left hand. (1647-1707.)

The Annibale Caracci of the Electic School. Bernardino Campi, the Italian, is so called by Lanzi. (1522-1590.)

Carack. A ship of great bulk, constructed to carry heavy freights. (Spanish, caraca.)

Car'adoc. A Knight of the Round Table, noted for being the husband of the only lady in the queen's train who could wear "the mantle of matrimonial fidelity."

Car'aïtes (3 syl.). A religious sect among the Jews, who rigidly adhered to the words and letters of Scripture, regardless of metaphor, &c. Of course, they rejected the rabbinical interpretations and the Cab'bala. The word is derived from Caraim, equivalent to scripturarii (textualist).

Carat of Gold. So called from the carat seed, or seed of the Abyssinian coral flower, formerly employed in weighing gold and precious stones. Hence the expressions "22 carats fine," "18 carats fine," &c., meaning that out of 24 parts, 22 or 18 are gold, and the rest alloy.

Here's the note

How much your chain weighs to the utmost carat.
Shakespeare, "Comedy of Errors," iv. 1.

Carbineer' or Carabineer. Properly a skirmisher or light horseman, from the Arabic carabine. A carbine is the light musket used by cavalry soldiers.

Carbona'do. A chop; mince-meat. Strictly speaking, a carbonado is a piece of meat cut crosswise for the gridiron. (Latin, carbo, a coal.)

If he do come in my way, so; if he do not.—if I come in his willingly, let him make a carbonado of me.
Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV," v. 3.

Carbona'ri means charcoal-burners, a name assumed by a secret political society in Italy, which rose in 1820. Their place of muster they called a "hut;" its inside, "the place for selling charcoal;" and the outside, the "forest." Their political opponents they called "wolves." (See CHARBONNERIE.)

Car'canet. A small chain of jewels for the neck. (French, caran, a chain.)

Around the white necks of the nymphs who danced Hung carcanets of orient pearls.

T. Moore, "Lalla Rookh," pt. i.

Carcase. The shell of a house before the floors are laid and walls plastered; the skeleton of a ship, a wreck, &c. The body of a dead animal, so called from the Latin caro-cassa (lifeless flesh).

The Goodwinn, I think they call the place; a very dangerous flat and fatal, where the carcasses of many a tall ship he buried.

Shakespeare, "Merchant of Venice," iii. 1.

Card. In Spain, spades used to be columbines; clubs, rabbits; diamonds, pinks; and hearts, roses. The present name for spades is espados (swords); of clubs, bastos (cudgels); of diamonds, dineros (square pieces of money used for paying wages); of hearts, copas (chalice).

The French for spades is pique (pike-men or soldiers); for clubs, trèfle (clover, or husbandmen); of diamonds, carreaux (building tiles, or artisans); of hearts, choeur (choir-men, or ecclesiastics).

The English spades is the French form of a pike, and the Spanish name; the clubs is the French trefoil, and the Spanish name; the hearts is a corruption of choeur into cœur.

He is the card of our house. The man of mark, the most distingué. Osric tells Hamlet that Laertès is "the card and calendar of gentry" (v. 2). The card is the card of a compass, containing all its points. Laertès is the card of gentry, in whom may be seen all its points. We also say, "a queer card," meaning an odd fish.

To speak by the card. To speak by the book; be as precise as a map or book. A merchant's expression. The card is the document in writing containing the agreements made between a merchant and the captain of a vessel. Sometimes the owner binds himself, ship, tackle, and furniture for due performance, and the captain is bound to deliver the cargo committed to him in good condition. To speak by the card is to speak according to the indentures or written instructions.

Law . . . is the card to guide the world by.
Hooker, "Ecc. Pol.," p. ii. sec. 5.

We must speak by the card, or equivocation will undo us.
Shakespeare, "Hamlet," v. 1.

That was my best trump card. My best chance. The allusion is to loo, whist, and other games played with cards.

Court cards. So called because of their heraldic devices. The king of clubs originally represented the arms of the pope; of spades, the king of France; of diamonds, the king of Spain; and of hearts, the king of England. The French kings in cards are called David (spades), Alexander (clubs), Caesar (diamonds), and Charles (hearts), representing the Jewish, Greek, Roman, and Frankish empires. The queens or dames are Argine—i.e., Juno (hearts), Judith (clubs), Rachel (piety), and Pallas (spades), representing royalty, fortitude, piety, and wisdom. They were likenesses of Marie d'Anjou, the queen of Charles VII.; Isabeau, the queen-mother; Agnes Sorel, the queen's mistress; and Joan d'Arc, the dame of spades, or war.

He felt that he held the cards in his own hands. That he had the whip-end of the stick; that he had the upper hand, and could do as he liked. The allusion is to games played with cards, such as whist.

He played his cards well. He acted judiciously and skilfully, like a whist-player who plays his hand with judgment.

Cards. Lookup, the great Bath player, died playing his favourite game of "Double Dummy."

Cardinal Points of the Compass. Due north, west, east, and south. So called because they are the points on which the intermediate ones, such as N.E., N.W., N.E.N., &c., hinge or hang. (Latin, cardo, a hinge.)

Cardinal Virtues. Justice, prudence, temperance, and fortitude, on which all other virtues hang or depend.

Cardinals. Hinges. (Latin, cardo.) The election of the pope "hinges" on the voice of the sacred college, and on the pope the doctrines of the Church depend; so that the cardinals are in fact the hinges on which the Christian Church turns.

Cardinal's Red Hat. Bayle says Sun-day is the day of the sun, Rome the city of Sun-days or the holy city, and cardinals the princes of the Roman Church, and therefore of the sun. Red is the colour of the sun. Others assert that Innocent IV. made the cardinals wear a red hat "in token of their being ready to lay down their life for the gospel."

Car'duel or Kartel. Carlisle. The place where Merlin prepared the Round Table.

Carême (2 syl.). Lent; a corruption of quadragesima (quadrage'me).

Caricatures mean "sketches over-drawn." (Italian caricatu'ra, from cari-cà'rè, to overcharge.)

Car'illons, in France, are chimes or tunes played on bells; but in England the suites of bells that play the tunes. Our word carol approaches the French meaning nearer than our own. The best chimes in the world are those in Les Halles, at Bruges.

Cari'næ. Women hired by the Romans to weep at funerals; so called from Caria, whence most of them came.

Carle or Carling Sunday (Pea Sunday) is the octave preceding Palm Sunday; so called because the special food of the day was carling—i.e., peas fried in butter. The custom is a continuation of the pagan bean-feast.

Carlovin'gian Dyn'asty. So called from Car'olus or Charles Martel.

Carludovi'ca. A Pan'ama hat, made of the Carludovica palmata; so called in compliment to Carlos IV. of Spain, whose second name was Ludovic.

Carmagnole. A red republican song and dance in the first French revolution; so called from Carmagn'ola, in Piedmont, the great nest of the Savoyards, noted for street music and dancing. The refrain of "Madame Veto," the Carmagnole song, is, "Dansous la Carmagnole—vive le son—du canon!" The word was subsequently applied to other revolutionary songs, such as "Ca ira," the "Marseillaise," the "Chant du Depart." Besides the songs, the word is applied to the dress worn by the Jacobins, consisting of a blouse, red cap, and tri-coloured girdle; to the wearer of this dress or any violent revolutionist; to the speeches in favour of the execution of Louis XVI., called by M. Barrière des Carmagnoles; and, lastly, to the dance performed by the mob round the guillotine.

Car'melites (3 syl.) The monks of Mount Carmel, the monastery of which is named Eli'as, from Elijah the prophet, who on Mount Carmel told Ahab that rain was at hand.

Car'milhan. The phantom ship on which the Kobold of the Baltic sits when he appears to doomed vessels.

Carmin'ative. A charm medicine. Magic and charms were at one time the chief "medicines," and the fact is perpetuated by the word carminative, among others. (Latin, carmen, a charm.)

Carmi'ne (2 syl.). The dye made from the carmès or kermès insect.

Carnation. "Flesh-colour." (Latin, caro carnis, flesh.)

Car'ney. To wheedle, to keep carressing, and calling another cara (dear).

Carnival means "Good-bye meat." This festival ends on Ash-Wednesday, when the Lent fast begins. (Latin, carnem-vale.)

Carotid Artery. An artery on each side of the neck, supposed by the ancients to be the seat of drowsiness, brought on by an increased flow of blood through it to the head. (Greek, caroticos, inducing sleep.)

Carouse (2 syl.). Mr. Gifford says the Danes called their large drinking cup a rouse, and to rouse is to drink from a rouse; ca-rouse is gar-rouse, to drink all up, or to drink all—i.e., in company.

The king doth wake to-night, and takes his rouse.
Shakespeare, "Hamlet," i. 3.

Carouse the Hunter's Hoop. Drinking cups were anciently marked with hoops, by which every drinker knew his stint. Shakespeare makes Jack Cade promise his friends that "seven halfpenny loaves shall be sold for a penny; and the three-hooped pot have ten hoops." Pegs or pins (q.v.) are other means of limiting the draught of individuals who drank out of the same tankard.

Carp is formed from the Latin carpio (that which snatches at the bait).

Carpathian Wizard. Proteus (2 syl.), who lived in the island of Carpathos, between Rhodes and Crete. He was a wizard and prophet, who could transform himself into any shape he pleased. He is represented as carrying a sort of crook in his hand.

By the Carpathian wizard's hook,
Milton, "Comus."

Carpet. Such and such a question is on the carpet. The French sur le tapis (on the table-cloth), i.e., before the house, under consideration. The question has been laid on the table-cloth of the house, and is now under debate.

Solomon's carpet. The Eastern writers say that Solomon had a green silk carpet, on which his throne was placed when he travelled. This carpet was large enough for all his forces to stand upon; the men and women stood on his right hand, and the spirits on his left. When all were arranged in order, Solomon told the wind where he wished to go, and the carpet with all its contents rose in the air, and alighted at the place indicated. In order to screen the party from the sun, the birds of the air with outspread wings formed a canopy over the whole party.—Sale, "Koran." (See below.)

The magic carpet of Tangu. A carpet to all appearances worthless, but if any one sat thereon, it would transport him instantaneously to the place he wished to go. So called because it came from Tangu, in Persia. It is sometimes termed Prince Housain's carpet, because it came into his hands, and he made use of it.—Arabian Nights, "Prince Ahmed." (See above.)

Carpet Knight. One dubbed at court by favour, not having won his spurs by military service in the field. Mayors, lawyers, and other civilians knighted as they kneel on a carpet before their sovereign.

Carpocra'tians. The Gnostic sect so called from Carpoc'ratēs, who flourished in the middle of the second century. They maintained that the world was made by angels, that only the soul of Christ ascended into heaven, and that the body will have no resurrection.

Carriages. Things carried, luggage.

And after those days we took up our carriages, and went up to Jerusalem.—Acts xxi. 15.

Car'rona'des (3 syl.). Short guns invented by Mr. Gascoigne, director of the Carron foundry in Scotland. (1779.)

Carry Coals. (See COALS.)

Carte Blanche (French). A blank sheet of paper signed by the giver, but left to be filled in by the receiver, with a sum of money drawn on the bank account of the giver. Power to act at discretion in an affair placed under your charge.

Carte de Visite (French). A visiting card, now generally applied to a photographic likeness on a card for the albums of friends, &c.

Carte'sian Philosophy. The philosophical system of René Descartes (Latin, Carte'sius), of La Haye, in Touraine. The basis of his system is cogito ergo sum, thought must proceed from soul, and therefore man is not wholly material; that soul must be from some Being not material, and that Being is God. As for physical phenomena, they must be the result of motion excited by God, and these motions he termed vortices. (1596-1650.)

Carthage'na. Capital of New Granada, in South America, unsuccessfully attacked in 1747 by admiral Vernon.

Wasteful, forth
Walks the dire power of pestilent disease . . .
Such as, of late, at Carthagea quenched
The British fire. You, gallant Vernon, saw
The miserable scene; you, pitying, saw
To infant-weakness sunk the warrior's arm.
Thomson, "Summer."

Carthaginem esse Delendam (censeo) were the words with which Cato the Elder concluded every speech in the Roman senate. They are now proverbial, and mean, "That which stands in the way of our greatness must be removed at all hazards."

Carthu'sians. Founded, in 1086, by St. Bruno, of Cologne, who, with six companions, retired to the solitude of La Chartreuse, near Grenoble, in Vienne.

Cartoons. Designs drawn on cartone (pasteboard), like those of Raffaele, formerly at Hampton Court, but now at Kensington Museum. They were bought by Charles I., and are seven in number: "The Miraculous Draught of Fishes," "Feed my Lambs," "The Beautiful Gate of the Temple," "Death of Anani'as," "El'ymas the Sorcerer," "Paul at Lystra," and "Paul on the Mars Hill."

Cartridge Paper was originally manufactured for soldiers' cartridges. The word is a corruption of cartouche, from carta (paper).

Carus. Slow Carus, in Garth's "Dispensary," is Dr. Tyson.

Caryatēs, Caryatidēs. Figures of women in Greek costume, used in architecture to support entablatures. Ca'rya, in Arca'dia, sided with the Persians after the battle of Thermop'ylæ, in consequence of which the victorious Greeks destroyed the city, slew the men, and made the women slaves. Praxitelēs, to perpetuate the disgrace, employed figures of Caryan women with Persian men, instead of columns.

A single figure is called a Caryat'id. (See ATLANTES.)

Caryat'ic Order. Architecture in which Caryat'idēs are introduced to support the entablature.

Cas'ca. A blunt-witted Roman, one of the conspirators against Julius Caesar. — Shakespeare, "Julius Caesar."

Case-hardened. Impenetrable to all sense of honour or shame. The allusion is to iron, which is case-hardened by putting it into an iron box, with a cement, and exposing it for several hours to a red heat.

Cashier' (2 syl.). To dismiss an officer from the army, to discard from society. (French, casser, to break; Italian, cassa'rè, to blot out.)

Casi'no. Originally, a little casa or room near a theatre, where persons might retire after the play was over, for dancing or music.

Casket Homer. Alexander the Great's edition, with Aristotle's corrections. After the battle of Arbē'la, a golden casket, studded with jewels, was found in the tent of Dari'us. Alexander being asked to what purpose it should be applied, made answer, "There is but one production in the world worthy of so costly a depository;" and placed therein his edition of Homer, which received from this circumstance the term of Casket Homer.

Caspar. A huntsman who sold himself to Za'miel, the Black Huntsman. The night before the expiration of his lease of life, he bargained for three years' respite on condition of bringing Max into the power of the evil one. Zamiel replied, "To-morrow either he or you." On the day appointed for the trial-shot, Caspar places himself in a tree. Max is told by the prince to aim at a dove. The dove flies to the tree where Caspar is concealed. Max shoots at the dove, but kills Caspar, and Zamiel comes to carry off his victim. — Weber's Opera of "Der Freischütz."

Cassan'dra. Daughter of Priam, gifted with the power of prophecy; but Apollo, whom she had offended, brought it to pass that no one believed her predictions. — Shakespeare, "Troilus and Cressida."

Those who foresee and predict the downfall, meet with the fate of Cassandra. — The Times.

Cassa'tion. The court of cassation, in France, is the court which can casser (or quash) the judgment of other courts.

Cassi. Inhabitants of Cassio hundred, Hertfordshire, retorted to by Caesar in his "Commentaries."

Cassib'elan. Great-uncle to Cymbeline. He granted Caesar a yearly tribute of 3,000 pounds. — Shakespeare, "Cymbeline."

Cassio (in Shakespeare's "Othello"). Michael Cassio was a Florentine, and Othello's lieutenant. Iago made him drunk, and then set on Roderigo to quarrel with him. Cassio wounded Roderigo, and a brawl ensued, which aroused Othello. Othello suspended Cassio, but Iago induced Desdemona to plead for his restoration. This interest in Cassio being regarded by the Moor as a confirmation of Desdemona's illicit love, hinted at broadly by Iago, provoked the jealousy of Othello. After the death of the Moor, Cassio was appointed governor of Cyprus.

Cassiopeia (the lady in the chair). The chief stars of this constellation form the outline of a chair. The lady referred to is the wife of Cepheus, king of Ethiopia; having had the audacity to compare her beauty with that of the Nereides, she was exposed to be devoured by a sea-monster, but was liberated by Perseus.

That starred Ethiop queen, that strove
To set her beauty's praise above
The sea-nymphs, and their powers offended.
Milton, "Il Penseroso."

Castagnette, Captain. A hero noted for having his stomach replaced by Desgenettes by a leather one. His career is ended by a bomb, which blows him into fragments. An extravaganza from the French of Manuel.

Cas'taly. The river of poetic inspiration. It is a fountain of Parnassos sacred to the Muses, and its waters had the power of inspiring those who drank of them.

The drooping Muses (Sir Industry)
Brought to another Castalie,
Where Isis many a famous nursing breeds,
Or where old Cam soft paces o'er the lea
In pensive mood.
Thomson, "Castle of Indolence," canto i.

"Isis" means the University of Oxford, and "Cam" the University of Cambridge, so called from the rivers on which they stand.

Caste (race). The Portuguese casta. In Sanskrit the word used for the same purpose is varna (colour). The four Hindu castes are Brahmins (the sacred order), Shatriya (soldiers and rulers), Vaisya (husbandmen and merchants), Sudra (agricultural labourers and mechanics). The first issued from the mouth of Brahma, the second from his arms, the third from his thighs, and the fourth from his feet. Below these come thirty-six inferior classes, to whom the Vedas are sealed, and who are held cursed in this world and without hope in the next. The Jews seem to have entertained the same notion respecting the common people, and hence the Sanhedrim say to the officers, "This people, who know not the law, are cursed." (John vii. 49.)

To lose caste. To lose position in society. To get degraded from one caste to an inferior one.

Castle. Castle in the air. A splendid edifice, but one which has no existence. In fairy tales we often have these castles built at a word, and vanishing as soon, like that built for Aladdin by the Genius of the Lamp. These air-castles are called by the French Châteaux d'Espagne, because Spain has no châteaux. We also find the expression Châteaux en Asie for a similar reason.

Castle of Indolence. In the land of Drowsiness, where every sense is steeped in enervating delights. The owner of the castle was an enchanter, who deprived all who entered his domains of their energy and free-will.—Thomson, "Castle of Indolence."

Castlewood (Beatrice). The heroine of "Esmond," by Thackeray.

Castor and Pollux, what we call comazants. Electric flames sometimes seen in stormy weather, playing about the masts of ships. If only one flame showed itself, the Romans called it Helen, and said that it portended that the worst of the storm was yet to come; but two or more luminous flames they called Castor and Pollux, and said that they boded the termination of the storm.

But when the sons of Leda shed
Their star-lamps on our vessel's head,
The storm-winds cease, the troubled spray
Falls from the rocks, clouds flee away,
And on the bosom of the deep
In peace the angry billows sleep.
Horace, "Odes," i. 12.

Castor's Horse. Cyll'aros. Virgil ascribes him to Pollux. (Geor. iii.)

Casuist (3 syl.). One who resolves casus conscientie (cases of conscience). M. le Fevre calls casuistry "the art of quibbling with God."

Casus Belli (Latin). A ground for war; a plea for going to war.

Cat. Superstitiously called a "familiar," from the mediæval superstition that Satan's favourite form was a black cat. Hence "witches" were said to have a cat as their familiar.

Cat. A symbol of liberty. The Roman goddess of Liberty was represented as holding a cup in one hand, a broken sceptre in the other, and with a cat lying at her feet. No animal is so great an enemy to all constraint as a cat.

Cat. Held in veneration by the Egyptians under the name of Ælu'rus. This deity is represented with a human body and a cat's head. Diodo'rus tells us that whoever killed a cat, even by accident, was by the Egyptians punished by death. According to Egyptian tradition, Diana assumed the form of a cat, and thus excited the fury of the giants.

The London Review says the Egyptians worshipped the cat as a symbol of the moon, not only because it is more active after sunset, but from the dilation and contraction of its orb, symbolical of the waxing and waning of the night-goddess. (See PUSS.)

Cat. A sort of tripod for holding a plate before the fire. It is so called because in whatever position it is placed, three of the spokes hold the plate, and three rest on the ground. As the cat always lights on its feet, so this plate-holder will stand in any direction.

Cat. The tackle of a ship is so called, being, probably, the abbreviation tac' inverted. We have several such inversions.

Cat-o'-nine-tails. A whip with three lashes, used for punishing offenders, and briefly called a cat. The punishment was first used on board ship, where ropes would be handy, and several ropes are called cats, as cat-harpings, for bracing the shrouds; cat-falls, which pass over the "cat-head," and communicate with the "cat-block," &c. The French for a "cat-o'-nine-tails" is martinet (q.v.).

The Kilkenny cats. The story is, that two cats fought in a sawpit so ferociously, that when the battle was over, only the tail of each was left. This is an allegory of the municipalities of Kilkenny and Irish-town, who contended so stoutly about boundaries and rights to the end of the seventeenth century, that they mutually impoverished each other—ate up each other, leaving only a tail behind.

The faction grows in intensity daily... and the Kilkenny cat-fight is rapidly approaching the vital parts.—The Times (Re Fenians).

Whittington and his cat. A cat is a ship formed on the Norwegian model, having a narrow stern, projecting quarters, and deep waist. It is strongly built, and used in the coal trade. Harrison speaks of it as a "cat" or "catch." According to tradition, Sir Richard Whittington made his money by trading in coals, which he conveyed in his "cat" from Newcastle to London. The black faces of his coal-heavers gave rise to the tale about the Moors. In confirmation of this suggestion, it may be added that Whittington was lord mayor in 1397, and coal was first made an article of trade from Newcastle to London in 1381.

A cat has nine lives. A cat is more tenacious of life than other animals, because it generally lights upon its feet without injury; the foot and toes being padded so as to break the fall. (See NINE.)

Tab. What wouldst thou have with me?

Mer. Good king of cats, nothing but one of your nine lives. "Romeo and Juliet," iii. 1.

Hang me in a bottle like a cat ("Much Ado About Nothing," i. 1). In olden times a cat was for sport enclosed in a bag or leather bottle, and hung to the branch of a tree, as a mark for bowmen to shoot at. Steevens tells us of another sport: "A cat was placed in a soot-bag, and hung on a line; the players had to beat out the bottom of the bag without getting besmudged with smoke, and he who succeeded in so doing was allowed to hunt the cat afterwards.

He grins like a Cheshire cat. Cheese was formerly sold in Cheshire moulded like a cat. The allusion is to the grinning cheese-cat, but is applied to persons who show their teeth and gums when they laugh.

Let the cat out of the bag. It was formerly a trick among countryfolk to substitute a cat for a sucking-pig, and bring it in a bag to market. If any greenhorn chose to buy a "pig in a poke" without examination, all very well; but if he opened the sack, "he let the cat out of the bag," and the trick was disclosed.

Sick as a cat. Cats are very subject to vomiting. Hence the vomit of a drunkard is called "a cat," and the act of discarding it is called "shooting the cat."

Some . . . are mad if they behold a cat ("Merchant of Venice," iv. 1). Henri III. of France swooned if he caught sight of a cat, and Napoleon I. showed a morbid horror of the same "harmless, necessary" creature. (See ANTIPATHY, FIG.)

To bell the cat. (See BELL.)

To turn cat-in-pan. To turn traitor, to be a turn-coat. The phrase seems to be the French tourner côte en peine (to turn sides in trouble). I do not think it refers to turning pancakes.

When George in pudding-time came o'er,

And moderate men looked big, sir,

I turned a cat-in-pan once more,

And so became a Whig, sir.

"Vicar of Bray."

Touch not a cat but a glove. Here "but" is used in its original meaning of "be-out" i.e., without. If you play with a cat you will get a scratch, unless you wear a glove. The words are the motto of Mackintosh, whose crest is "cat-a-mountain salient guardant proper;" supporters, two cats proper. The whole is a pun on the word Catti, the Teutonic settlers of Caithness, i.e., Catti-ness, and mean, "Touch not the clan Cattan or Mountain Cat without a glaive." The same words are the adopted motto of Grant of Ballindalloch, and are explained by the second motto, ensè et an'imo.

What can you have of a cat but her skin? The thing is useless for any purpose but one. In former times the cat's fur was used for trimming cloaks and coats, but the flesh is utterly useless.

Who ate the cat? A gentleman who had his larder frequently assailed by bargees, had a cat cooked and placed there as a decoy. It was taken like the other foods, and became a standing jest against these larder pilferers.

Cat and Dog. They live cat and dog. They are always snarling and quarrelling, as a cat and dog, whose aversion to each other is intense.

It is raining cats and dogs. A perversion of the word catadupe (a waterfall). It is raining catadupes or cataracts. Mr. Ford ingeniously, though not with much probability, suggests the Greek cata doxas (contrary to experience), i.e., in an unusual manner. Dean Swift, describing a fall of rain, says the kennels were overflowed, and that

Dead puppies, stinking sprats, all drenched in mud

Drowned cats, and turnip-tops, came tumbling down the flood.

"A City Shower."

Cat and Fiddle. a public-house sign, is a corruption either of the French Catherine la fidèle, wife of czar Peter the Great of Russia; or of Caton le fidèle, meaning Caton, governor of Calais.

Cat and Kittens. A public-house sign, alluding to the pewter-pots so called. Stealing these pots is termed "Cat and kitten sneaking." We still call a large kettle a kitchen, and speak of a soldier's kit. (Saxon, cytel, a pot, pan, or vessel generally.)

Cat and Tortoise, or Boar and Sow. Names given to the testudo.

Cat's Cradle. A child's play, with a piece of twine. Corrupt for cratch-cradle or manger cradle, in which the infant Saviour was laid. Cratch is the French crèche (a rack or manger), and to the present hour the racks which stand in fields for cattle to eat from are called cratches.

Cat's Paw. To be made a cat's paw of—i.e., the tool of another, the medium of doing another's dirty work. The allusion is to the fable of the monkey who wanted to get from the fire some roasted chestnuts, and took the paw of the cat to get them from the hot ashes.

I had no intention of becoming a cat's paw to draw European chestnuts out of the fire.

Com. Rodgers.

At sea, light air during a calm causing a ripple on the water, and indicating a storm, is called by sailors a cat's paw, and seamen affirm that the frolics of a cat indicate a gale. These are relics of a superstition that cats are witches or demons in disguise.

Cat's Sleep. A sham sleep, like that of a cat watching a mouse.

Cat Stane. Battle stone. A monolith in Scotland (sometimes falsely called a Druidical stone). The Norwegian term, bauta stein, means the same thing. (Celtic, cath, battle.)

Cat-call. A tin whistle. The ancients divided their dramas into four parts: the pro'tasis (introduction), epit'asis (continuation), catas'tasis (climax), and catas'trophë (conclusion or dénouement). The cat-call is the call for the cat' or catas'trophë.

Sound, sound ye viols, be the cat-call dumb.

"Dunciad," i. 302.

Catgut. A corruption of gut-cord.

Cat-kins. The inflorescence of hazel, birch, willow, and some other trees; so called from their resemblance to a cat's tail.

Cat-lap. Weak tea, only fit for the cat to lap.

Cat-water (Plymouth). This is a remarkable instance of mis-translation. The castle at the mouth of the Plym used to be called the Chateau; but some one, thinking it would be better to Anglicise the French, divided the word into two parts—chat (cat), eau (water).

Catacomb. A subterranean place for the burial of the dead. The Persians have a city they call Comb or Coom, full of mausoleums and the sepulchres of the Persian saints. The preposition cata is added to indicate that the Coom is underground. (See KOOM.)

Catai'an (3 syl.). A native of Cathay or China; outlandish, a foreigner generally, a liar.

I will not believe such a Cataian, though the priest of the town could end him for a true man.
Shakespeare, "Merry Wives," ii. 1.

Cataphrygians. Christian heretics, which arose in the second century; so called because the first came out of Phrygia. They followed the errors of Montanus.

Catarrah. A down-running; from the Greek katurreo (to flow down).

Catas'trophe (4 syl.). A turning upside down" (Greek, kata-strepho). A tragedy begins all sunshine, but at the close all the bright prospects are overthrown. A comedy begins overcast with troubles, but at the close all the troubles are surmounted, and every bad character is cast down.

Catch. To lie at the catch. To lie in wait to find one tripping. The allusion is to a fowler lying in wait to catch the bird that ventures into his net.

Catch a Tartar. The biter bit. Grose says, an Irish soldier in the imperial service, in a battle against the Turks, shouted to his comrade that he had caught a Tartar. "Bring him along, then," said his mate. "But he won't come," cried Paddy. "Then come along yourself," said his comrade. "Arrah!"

replied Paddy, "I wish I could, but he won't let me."

We are like the man who boasted of having caught a Tartar, when the fact was that the Tartar had caught him.—Cautions for the Times.

Catch-penny. A worthless article puffed off to catch the pennies of those who are foolish enough to buy them.

Catchpole. A constable; a law officer whose business it was to apprehend criminals. Pole or poll means head, person; and the word means one who catches persons by the poll or neck. This was done by means of an instrument something like a shepherd's crook.

Catchpoles, from catch and pole, because these officers lay hold of a man's neck.—Wicliffe's "New Testament" (Acts xvi., Glossary).

Catechu'men (kat'y-ku men). One taught by word of mouth (Greek, katechou'menos). Those about to be baptised in the early Church were first taught by word of mouth, and then catechised on their religious faith and duties.

Cater-cousin. An intimate friend; a remote kinsman. (French, quatre-cousin, a fourth cousin.)

His master and he (savin: your worship's reverence) are scarce cater-cousins.

Shakespeare, "Merchant of Venice," ii. 2.

Caterwauling. The wrawl of cats in rutting times; any hideous noise. Topsis gives caterwauling, to "wrawl" or "wrawl," to rail or quarrel with a loud voice: hence the Yorkshire expression, "raising a wrow," meaning a row or quarrel. There is also the archaic adjective wraw (angry). Cater-waul, therefore, is the wawl or wrawl of cats; the er being either a plural, similar to "childer" (children), or a corrupted genitive.

What a caterwauling do you keep here!

Shakespeare "Twelfth Night," ii. 3.

Cath'arists. The last surviving sect of the Gnostics, so called from their professed purity of faith. (Greek, kath'aros, pure). They maintained that matter is the source of all evil; that Christ had not a real body; that the human body is incapable of newness of life, and that the sacraments do not convey grace.

Cath'arine. To braid St. Catharine's tresses. To live a virgin.

Thou art too fair to be left to braid St. Catharine's tresses.

Longfellow, "Evangeline."

St. Catharine's Wheel. A wheel-window, sometimes called a rose-window, with radiating divisions; a sort of fire work. St. Catharine was a virgin of royal descent in Alexandria, who publicly confessed the Christian faith at a sacrificial feast appointed by the emperor Maximinus; for which confession she was put to death by torture by means of a wheel, like that of a chaff-cutter.

Cathay. China, or rather Tartary, the capital of which was Albracca, according to "Orlando Furioso." It was called Khitaï by the Tartars, and China was first entered by Europeans in the middle ages from the side of Tartary.

Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay.
Tennyson, "Locksley Hall."

Cathedræ Mollēs (Latin). Luxurious women. Properly, soft chairs. The cathedra was a chair for women, like our ottoman; and Juvenal applies the soft chair used by women of dainty habits to the women who use them.

Catholic. The Catholic.

Alfonso I., king of Asturias; so called, in 739, by Gregory I. (693, 739-757.)

Ferdinand II. of Aragon and V. of Castile, husband of Isabella. Called The Catholic, from his great zeal in combating the "Infidel." He was also called Rusé, or The Wily. (1452, 1474-1516.)

Isabella, queen of Castile, wife of Ferdinand II. of Aragon; so called for her zeal in establishing the Inquisition. (1450, 1474-1504.)

Catholicon. A panacea. (Greek, katholicon iama, a universal remedy.)

Meanwhile, permit me to recommend,
As the matter admits of no delay,
My wonderful catholicon.

Longfellow, "The Golden Legend," i.

Cato. He is a Cato. A man of simple life, severe morals, self-denying habits, strict justice, brusque manners, blunt of speech, and of undoubted patriotism, like the Roman censor of that name.

Cato-Street Conspiracy. A scheme entertained by Arthur Thistlewood and his fellow-conspirators to overthrow the government, by assassinating the Cabinet ministers. So called from Cato Street, where their meetings were held. (1820.)

Catsup or Ketchup. The Eastern kigab (soy sauce).

Cat'ual. Chief minister of the Zam'orin or ancient sovereign of India.

Regirt with high-plumed nobles, by the flood
The first great minister of India stood,
His name "the Catual" in India's tongue.
Camoens, "Lusiad," bk. vii.

Catūm, Al (the strong). A bow which fell into the hands of Mahomet when the property of the Jews of Medi'na was confiscated. In the first battle the prophet drew it with such force that it snapped in two.

Caucasians, according to Blumenbach's ethnological system, represent the European or highest type of the human race. So called from Caucasus, the mountainous range. Whilst the professor was studying ethnology, he was supplied with a skull from these regions, which he considered the standard of the human type.

Caucus. A meeting of citizens in America to agree upon what members they intend to support, and to concert measures for carrying out their political wishes. The word arose from the caulkers of Boston, who had a dispute with the British soldiers a little before the Revolution. Several citizens were killed, and meetings were held at the caulkers' house or caulk-house, to concert measures for redress of grievances.

The whole Fenian affair is merely a caucus in disguise.—The Times.

At a Republican Congressional caucus held on Saturday last, a hostile feeling was manifested towards President Johnson.—The Times.

Caudine Forks. A narrow pass in the mountains near Capua, now called the Valley of Arpaia. It was here that the Roman army, under the consuls V. Calvinus and S. Postumius fell into the hands of the Samnites, and were made to pass under the yoke.

Hard as it was to abandon an enterprise so very dear to him . . . he did not hesitate to take the more prudent course of passing under (sic) the Caudine Forks of the Monroe doctrine, and leave Maximilian and the French bondholders to their fate.—Standard, Nov. 17, 1866.

Caudle (Mrs.). A curtain lecturer. The term is derived from a series of papers by Douglas Jerrold, which were published in Punch. These papers represent Job Caudle as a patient sufferer of the curtain lectures of his nagging wife.

Caudle is any sloppy mess, especially that sweet mixture given by nurses to gossips who call to see the baby during the first month. The word simply means something warm. (Latin, calidus; French, chaudeau; Italian, caldio.)

Caul. The membrane on the heads of some new-born infants, supposed to be a charm against death by drowning.

Cauline, Sir (2 syl.). A knight who lived in the palace of the king of Ireland, and "used to serve the wine." He fell in love with Christabelle, the king's daughter, who plighted her troth to him secretly, for fear of the king. The king discovered the lovers in a bower, and banished Sir Cauline. After a time an eldridge came, and demanded the lady in marriage. Sir Cauline slew the "Soldain," but died of the wounds received in the combat; and the fair Christabelle died of grief, having "burst her gentle hearte in twayne."—Percy's "Reliques," iv.

Cau'rus or Co'rus. The west-north-west wind, which blew from Caurus (Argestës).

The ground by piercing Caurus seared.
Thomson, "Castle of Indolence," canto ii.

Cau'telous. Cautious, cunning, treacherous. (Latin, cau'tela; French, cauteleux.)

Caught with cautelous baits.
Shakespeare, "Coriolanus," iv. 1.

Swear priests, and cowards, and men cautelous.
Shakespeare, "Julius Cæsar," ii. 1.

Cau'ther (Al.). The lake of Paradise, the waters of which are sweet as honey, cold as snow, and clear as crystal. He who once tastes thereof will never thirst again.—The Koran.

Caution Money. A sum of £15 paid before entering college, by way of security. This money is deducted from the account of the last term, when only the balance has to be paid.

Caut'ser. (See CAUTHER.)

Cava. Cuva's traitor sire. Cava or Florinda was the daughter of St. Julian. It was the violation of Cava by Roderick that brought about the war between the Goths and the Moors. St. Julian, to avenge his daughter, turned traitor to Roderick, and induced the Moors to invade Spain. King Roderick was slain at Xerës on the third day. (A.D. 711.)

Cavalie'r (3 syl.). A horseman. Whence a knight, a gentleman. (Latin, caballus, a horse.)

The Cavalier.

Eon de Beaumont, the French soldier; Chevalier d'Eon. (1728-1810.)

Charles Breydel, the Flemish landscape painter. (1677-1744.)

Francis Cairo (Cavaliere del Cairo), historian. (1598-1674.)

Jean le Clerc, le chevalier. (1587-1633.)

J. Bapt. Marini, Italian poet; Il cavaliere. (1569-1625.)

Andrew Michael Ramsay. (1686-1743.)

Cavalier' or Cheval'ier de St. George. James Francis Edward Stuart, called "the Pretender," or "the Old Pretender." (1688-1765.)

The Young Cavalier or the Bonnie Chevalier' Charles-Edward, the "Young Pretender." (1720-1788.)

Cavalie'rs. Adherents of Charles I. Those of the opposing Parliament party were called Roundheads (q.v.).

Cavalier Serventë, called formerly in Italian civishë'o, and in Spanish cortë'jo. A gentleman that chaperones married ladies.

Coach, servants, gond'la, he goes to call,
And carries fan and tippet, gloves and shawl.
Byron, "Beppo."

Cavall'. "King Arthur's hound of deepest mouth."—Idylls of the King, "Enid."

Cave in. Shut up, have done. I'll cave in his head (break it). His fortune has caved in (has failed). The bunk has caved in (come to a smash). The affair caved in (fell through). Common American expressions.

In the lead diggings, after a shaft has been sunk, the earth round the sides falls or caves in, unless properly boarded; and if the mine does not answer, no care is taken to prevent a caving in.

Cave of Achadh Aldai. A cairn in Ireland, so called from Aldai, the ancestor of the Tuatha de Danaan kings.

Cave of Mammon. The abode of the god of wealth in Spenser's "Faëry Queen" (ii. 7).

Cave-dwellers. (See BOHEMIAN BRETHREN.)

Cav'eat. To enter a caveat. To object to. It is a law term, and means a notice to stay legal proceedings. (Latin, caveat, let him proceed at his peril.)

Cav'ell. A parcel or allotment of land, measured by a cord or cable. (German, kabel or kavel, whence kavel loten, "a caveil by lot.")

Cavi'are (3 syl.). Caviare to the general. Above the taste or comprehension of ordinary people. Caviare is a kind of pickle made from the roe of sturgeons, much esteemed in Muscovy. It is a dish for the great, but beyond the reach of the general public.—"Hamlet," ii. 2.

All popular talk about laenstrine villages and flint implements . . . is caviare to the multitude. —Pall Mall Gazette.

Ce'an. The Cean poet. Simonides, of Ce'os.

The Cean and the Teian muse.

Byron, "Don Juan."

Cecilia, St. A Roman lady, who underwent martyrdom in the third century; she is the patron saint of the blind, being herself blind; she is also patroness of musicians, and "inventor of the organ."

At length Divine Cecilia came,
Inventress of the vocal frame.

Dryden, "Alexander's Feast."

According to tradition, an angel fell in love with her for her musical skill, and used nightly to visit her. Her husband saw the heavenly visitant, who gave to both a crown of martyrdom which he brought from Paradise. Dryden and Pope have written odes in her honour, and both speak of her charming an angel by her musical powers—

He (Timotheus) raised a mortal to the skies,
She (Cecilia) brought an angel down.

Dryden, "Alexander's Feast."

Ced, Kéd, or Ceridwen. The Arkite goddess or Ceres of the Britons.

I was first modelled into the form of a pure man in the hall of Ceridwen, who subjected me to penance.—Talesin (Davies's Translation).

Ce'dar. Curzon says that Solomon cut down a cedar, and buried it on the spot where the pool of Bethesda used to stand. A few days before the crucifixion this cedar floated to the surface of the pool, and was employed as the upright of the Saviour's cross.—Monasteries of the Levant.

Ceëliet (St.) or St. Calixtus, whose day is the 14th of October, the day of the battle of Hastings.

Brown Willis tells us there was a tablet once in Battle parish church, with these words—

This place of war is Battle called, because in battle here
Quite conquered and o'erthrown the English nation were.
This slaughter happen'd to them upon St. Ceeliet's day, &c.

Celestial City. Heaven is so called by John Bunyan in his "Pilgrim's Progress."

Celes'tial Empire. China; so called because the first emperors were all celestial deities.

Celes'tians. Followers of Celes'tius, disciple of Pela'gius. St. Jerome calls him "a blockhead swollen with Scotch pottage"—Scotch being, in this case, what we now call Irish.

Celes'tines (3 syl.). A religious order founded, 1254, by Pietro Moro'nè, afterwards pope Celes'tine V. Suppressed 1778.

Celia (heavenliness). Mother of Faith, Hope, and Charity. She lived in the hospice called Holiness.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. i.

Celia or Calia. A common poetical name for a lady or lady-love. Thus, Swift has an ode in which Strehphon describes Celia's dressing-room.

Five hours, and who can do it less in,
By haughty Celia spent in dressing.

Celt. A piece of stone, ground artificially into a wedge-like shape; with a cutting edge. Used, before the employment of bronze and iron, for knives, hatchets, and chisels. (Latin, celtis, a chisel.)

Celtic Homer. Ossian.

Cem'etery properly means sleeping-places. The Jews used to speak of death as sleep. The Persians call their cemeteries "The Cities of the Silent." The Greeks thought it unlucky to pronounce the name of death. (Greek, koinimeterion.)

Cenimag'ni. The inhabitants of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridge; referred to by Cæsar in his "Commentaries."

Cen'obites (3 syl.). Monks. So called because they live in common. Hermits and anchorites are not cenobites, as they live alone. (Greek, koinobiotēs.)

Censo'rius et Sapi'ens. Cato Major was so called. (B.C. 234-149.)

Cent Nouvelles Nouvelles. French imitations of Granue'ci, Malespi'ni, and Campeg'gi, Italian tale-writers of the seventeenth century.

Cent'aur (2 syl.). A huntsman. The Thessalian centaurs were half-horses, half-men. They were invited to a marriage feast, and, being intoxicated, behaved with great rudeness to the women. The Lap'ithæ took the women's part, fell on the centaurs, and drove them out of the country.

Feasts that Thessalian centaurs never knew.
Thomson, "Autumn."

Cento. Poetry made up of lines borrowed from established authors. Auso'nus has a nuptial idyll composed from verses selected from Virgil. (Latin, cento, patchwork.)

Central Sun. That body or point about which our whole system revolves. Mädler believes that point to be eta in Taurus.

Cent're. In the Legislative Assembly The Centre were the friends of order. In the Fenian rebellion, 1866, the chief movers were called Head Centres, and their subordinates Centres.

Centum'viri. A court under whose jurisdiction the Romans placed all matters pertaining to testaments and inheritances. It consisted of three representatives from each of the thirty-five tribes; the full complement, therefore, was 105.

Centu'rión. A Roman officer who had the command of 100 men. His badge was a vine-rod. (Latin, centum, a hundred.)

Century White. John White, the nonconformist lawyer. So called from his chief publication, "The First Century of Scandalous, Malignant Priests, made and admitted into Benefices by the Prelates," &c. (1590-1645.)

Ce'pheus (2 syl.). One of the northern constellations, which takes its name from Cepheus, king of Ethiopia, husband of Cassiope'ia and father of Androm'eda.

Ce'quiel (3 syl.). A spirit who transported Torral'ba from Vall'adolid' to Rome and back again in an hour and a half. — Pellicer.

Cerau'nium. The opal. So called by the ancients from a notion that it was a thunder-stone. (Latin, ceranium; Greek, kerau'nios.)

Cer'berus. A grim, watchful keeper, governess, guardian, &c. Cerberus, according to Roman mythology, is the three-headed dog that keeps the entrance of the infernal regions. Hercules dragged the monster to earth, and then let him go again. (See Sop.)

Never suffered to stir beyond the watchful eyes of a grim Cerberus. — London Review.

Cer'don. The boldest of the rabble leaders in the encounter with Hudibras at the bear-baiting. The character is modelled from Hewson, the one-eyed cobbler, who was a colonel in the Rump army and a preacher. — "Hudibras," pt. i. 2.

Cerdo'nians. A sect of heretics, established by Cerdon of Syria, who lived in the time of pope Hygi'nus, and maintained most of the errors of the Manichees.

Ceremonious (The). Pierre IV. of Aragon. (1319, 1336-1387.)

Cer'emony. When the Romans fled before Brennus, one Albi'nus, who was carrying his wife and children in a cart to a place of safety, overtook at Janic'u-lum the Vestal virgins bending under their load, took them up, and conveyed them to Cærë, in Etru'ria. Here they remained, and continued to perform their sacred rites, which were consequently called "Cære-monia." — Livy, v.

Ce'res (2 syl.). Corn. Ceres was the Roman name of Mother-Earth, the protectress of agriculture and of all the fruits of the earth.

Dark frowning heaths grow bright with Ceres' store.
Thomson, "Autumn."

Cerin'thians. Disciples of Cerin'thus, a heresiarch of the first century. They denied the divinity of Christ, but held that a certain virtue descended into him at baptism, which filled him with the Holy Ghost.

Cess. Measure, as ex-cess, excess-ive. Out of all cess means excessively.

The poor jade is wrung in the withers out of all cess.
Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV.," ii. 1.

Ces'tus, in Homer, is the girdle of Venus, of magical power to move to ardent love. In "Jerusalem Delivered," Ar'nida wore a similar cestus made of potent spells to win to irresistible amorous love.

In this was every art, and every charm
To win the wisest, and the coldest warm;
Fond love, the gentle vow, the gay desire,
The kind deceit, the still reviving fire,
Persuasive speech, and more persuasive sighs,
Silence that spoke, and eloquence of eyes,
Pope, "Homer's Iliad," xiv.

Chabouk. A long whip, or the application of whips and rods; a Persian and Chinese punishment.—Dubois.

Drag forward that skir, and cut his robe into tatters on his back with your chabouks.—Scott, "The Surgeon's Daughter," c. xiv.

If that march did not give the chabuk to Peramor, there would be an end of all legitimate government in Buchana.—T. Moore, "Lalla Rookh."

The criticism of the chabuk. The application of whips or rods. (Persian).—Dubois.

Chad-pennies. Pennies paid at the cathedral of Lichfield, dedicated to St. Chad, on Whit Sunday, in aid of the repairs.

Chaff. An old bird is not to be caught with chaff. An experienced man, or one with his wits about him, is not to be deluded by humbug. The reference is to throwing chaff instead of bird-seed to allure birds.

You are chaffing me. Making fun of me. You are trying to roast me (French, échauffer, to cook, chaff, or vex). A singular custom used to exist in Notts and Leicestershire some half century ago. When a husband ill-treated his wife, the villagers emptied a sack of chaff at his door, to intimate that "thrashing was done within," which some think to be the origin of the word.

Chair. When members of the House of Commons and other debaters call out "Chair," they mean that the chairman is not properly supported, and his words not obeyed as they ought to be. Another form of the same expression is, "Pray support the chair."

Groaning chair. The chair in which a woman is confined or sits afterwards to receive congratulations. Similarly "groaning cake" and "groaning cheese" are the cake and cheese which used to be provided in "Goose month."

For a nurse, the child to dandle,
Sugar, soap, spiced pots, and candle.
A groaning chair, and eke a cradle.

Poor Robin's Almanack, 1676.

Chalced'ony (kalced'ony). A precious stone, consisting of half-transparent quartz, so called from Chalcedon, in Asia Minor, where it was first found. Its chief varieties are agate, carnelian, cat's-eye, chrysoprase, flint, hornstone, onyx, plasma, and sard.

Chaldee's (Kal-dees). The Land of the Chaldees. Babylo'nia.

Chalk. I'll chalk out your path for you—i.e., lay it down or plan it out as a carpenter or ship-builder plans out his work with a piece of chalk.

Chalk it up. Put it down to my credit. The allusion is to the old custom of keeping a tally on which what was not paid for was chalked down. This method of keeping scores especially prevailed with publicans and in weekly milk-bills.

I beat him by long chalks. Thoroughly. In allusion to the ancient custom of making the merit marks with chalk, before lead pencils were so common.

Walk your chalks. Get you gone. Lodgings wanted for the royal retinue used to be taken arbitrarily by the marshal and sergeant-chamberlain, the inhabitants were sent to the right about, and the houses selected were notified by a chalk mark. When Mary de Medicis, in 1638, came to England, Sienr de Labat was employed to mark "all sorts of houses commodious for her retinue in Colehester." The same custom is referred to in the "Life and Acts of Sir William Wallace," in Edinburgh. The phrase is "Walk, you're chalked," corrupted into Walk your chalks.

I can walk a chalk as well as you. I am no more drunk than you are. The allusion is to the ordeal on board ship of trying men suspected of drunkenness. They were required to walk along a line chalked on the deck, without deviating to the right or left.

Challenging a Jury. This may be to object to all the jurors from some informality in the way they have been "arrayed" or empannelled, or to one or more of the jurors, from some real or supposed disqualification or bias of judgment. The word "challenge" is Norman, and is exactly equivalent to "call out;" hence we say captain A challenged or called out captain B.

Cham (kam). The sovereign prince of Tartary, now written "khan."

Fetch you a hair off the great Cham's beard.—Shakespeare, "Much Ado About Nothing," ii. 1.

The great Cham of literature. Dr. Samuel Johnson. (1709-1784.)

Chambre Ardente (French), metaphorically, means a severe test; literally, a "fiery chamber." It was an inquisitorial court of France, so called because the general punishment awarded was death by fire. Devised by cardinal de Lorraine, 1559.

Champak'. A strong aromatic plant very offensive to bees, worn in the black hair of Indian women.

Cham'perty (Latin, campi partitio, division of the land) is a bargain with some person who undertakes at his own cost to recover property on condition of receiving a share thereof if he succeeds.

Cham'pion of England. A person whose office it is to ride up Westminster Hall on a coronation day, and challenge any one who disputes the right of succession. The office was established by William the Conqueror, and was given to Marmion and his male descendants, with the manor of "broad Scrivelsby." De Ludlow received the office and manor through the female line; and in the reign of Richard II. Sir John Dymoke succeeded through the female line also. Since then the office has continued in the Dymoke family.

These Lincoln lands the Conqueror gave,
That Eng. and's glove they might convey
To knight renowned amongst the brave—
The baron bold of Fonteney.

An Anglo-Norman Ballad modernised.

Champs de Mars. The March meetings held by Clovis and his immediate followers, sometimes as mere pageants, for the amusement of the freedmen who came to offer homage to their lord, and pay their annual gifts; sometimes for business purposes, especially when the king wished to consult his warriors about some expedition.

Champs de Mai. The same as the Champs de Mars (g.v.), transferred after 755 to the month of May. Napoleon I. revived these meetings during the "Hundred Days" (June 1, 1815).

Chan'cel means a lattice-screen. In the Roman law-courts the lawyers were cut off from the public by such a screen. (Latin, cancellus.)

Chan'cellor. The scribe who sat with the emperor in the chancel, cut off from the populace by the screen.

Chan'cery. The part of the court occupied by the lawyers.

To get a man's head into chancery is to get it under your arm, where you can pummel it as long as you like, and he cannot get it free without great difficulty. The allusion is to the long and exhausting nature of a chancery suit. If a man once gets his head there, the lawyers punish him to their heart's content.

Chan'dika. One of the three goddess daughters of Vishnu, representing his "destroying energy."

Change. Take your change out of that. When a person insults you, you give him a "quid pro quo," and tell him to take the change. It is in allusion to shopping transactions, where you settle the price of the article, and put the surplus or change in your pocket.

Changeling (2 syl.). A peevish, sickly child. The notion used to be that the fairies took a healthy child, and left in its place one of their starveling elves which never did kindly.

Oh, that it could be proved
That some night-tripping fairy had exchanged,
In cradle-clothes, our children as they lay;
And called mine Percy, his Plantagenet!
Then would I have his Harry, and he mine.

Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV.," i. 1.

Chant du Depart. After the Mar-seillaise, the most celebrated song of the first French Revolution. It was written by J. M. Chénier for a public festival, held June 11, 1794, to commemorate the taking of the Bastille. The music is by Me'hul. A mother, an old man, a child, a wife, a girl, and three warriors sing a verse in turn, and the sentiment of each is, "We give up our claims on the men of France for the good of the Republic." (See CARMAGNOLE.)

La république nous appelle,
Sachons vaner ou sachons périr;
Un Français doit vivre pour elle,
Pour elle un Français doit mourir!

J. M. Chénier.

The republic invites,
Let us conquer or fall;
In France Frenchmen live,
And can die at her call.

Chan'ticleer (3 syl.). The cock, in the tale of "Reynard the Fox," and in Chaucer's "Nonne Prestes Tale." The word means "shrill-singer."

My lungs began to crow like chanticleer.
Shakespeare, "As You Like It," ii. 7.

Cha'os (ka'os). Confusion; that confused mass of elemental substances supposed to have existed before God reduced creation into order. The poet Hesiod is the first extant writer that speaks of it.

Light, uncollected, through the chaos urged
Its infant way; nor order yet had drawn
His lovely train from out the dubious gloom.
Thomson, "Autumn."

Chap, as A clever chap, a good sort of chap, &c.; meaning a boy or young man, or a man with whom you are very familiar. (French, chape and chapeau, either "hat" or "man;" Latin, caput.)

Chapeau or Chapel de Roses. C'est un petit mariage, car quand on demande ce qu'un père donne à une fille, et qu'on veut répondre qu'il donne peu, on dit qu'il lui donne un chapeau de roses. Les roses sont consacrés à Venus, aux Grâces, et l'Amour.—Les Origines de quelques Coutumes Anciennes, 1672.

N.B.—Chapel is what we now call a chaplet or chaplet.

Chapel is the chest containing relics, or the shrine thereof. (Latin, capa.) Another etymology is capella (a hat or cope). The kings of France in war carried St. Martin's cope into the field, and kept it in a tent as a talisman. The place in which the cope was kept was called the chapelle, and the keeper thereof the chaplain.

Chapel. The "caucus" of journeyman printers assembled to decide any point of common interest. The chairman is called the "father of the chapel." This term is a relic of Caxton's establishment in Westminster Abbey. (See FRIARS, MONKS.)

Chap'eron. A lady's attendant and protector in public. So called from the Spanish hood worn by duennas. (English-French.)

Charbon'nerie Democrat'ique. A new Carbonari society, founded in Paris on the principles of Babeuf. The object of these republicans was to make Paris the centre of all political movements. (See CARBONARI.)

Charicle'ia. The lady-love of Theagenēs in the exquisite erotic Greek romance, called "The Loves of Theagenēs and Charicle'ia," by Heliodoros, bishop of Trikka, in the fourth century.

Charing Cross is the cross erected to the chère reine (dear queen) Eleanor, wife of Edward I., who died at Herdelio, near Lincoln, and was buried at Westminster. In every town where the corpse rested, the king caused a cross "of cunning workmanship" to be erected in remembrance of her. There were probably fourteen altogether; but only three remain—viz., Waltham, Northampton, and Geddington, in Northamptonshire. In front of the South-Eastern Railway station, Strand, is a model of Charing Cross of the original dimensions. The original one built of Caen stone by Edward I. was voted down by the Long Parliament in 1647. Cheapside Cross was demolished in 1643.

Chariot. According to Greek mythology, the chariot was invented by Erichth'nius to conceal his feet, which were those of a dragon.

Seated in car, by him constructed first
To hide his hideous feet

Rose, "Orlando Furioso," xxxvii, 27.

Chariot of the Gods. So the Greeks called Sierra Leone, a ridge of mountains of great height. The Portuguese Serra Lioa means "the Rock of Lions."

Her palmy forests, mingling with the skies,
Leona's rugged steep behind us lies.

Camoens, "Lusiad," bk. 6.

Charity begins at Home. "Let them learn first to show piety at home" (1 Tim. v. 4).

Chariva'ri. The clatter made with pots and pans, whistling, bawling, hissing, and so on. Our concert of "narrow-bones and cleavers;" the German Katzenmusick, got up to salute with ridicule unequal marriages. Punch is our national Charivari, and clatters weekly against political and social wrong-sidedness.

Charlatan means a babbler. (Italian, ciarla'rè, to babble; ciarlata'no, a quack; Spanish, charlar, to prate; Latin, garrulo.)

Charlemagne. His nine wives were Hamiltrude, a poor Frenchwoman, who bore him several children; Desidera'ta, who was divorced; Hildegard, Fastrade (daughter of count Rodolph, the Saxon), and Luitgarde the German, all three of whom died before him; Mattegarde; Gersuinde, the Saxon; Regi'na; and Adalinda.

Charlemagne's Peers. (See PALADINS.)

Charlemagne's Sword. La Joyeuse.

Charles and the Oak. When Charles II. fled from the Parliamentary army, he took refuge in Boscobel-house but when he deemed it no longer safe to remain there, he concealed himself in an oak. Dr. Stukeley says that this tree "stood just by a horse-track passing through the wood, and the king, with Colonel Carlos, climbed into it by means of the hen-roost ladder. The family reached them victuals with a nut-hook."—"Itinerarium Curio'sum," 1724, iii., p. 57.

Charles's Wain. The constellation called the Great Bear, which forms the outline of a wheelbarrow or rustic wagon. (German, Kerl's wagen, the countryman's wagon.)

Charlies. The old night watch, before the police force was organised in 1829. So called from Charles I., in whose reign the system was re-organised.

Charlotte Elizabeth. Mrs. Tonna. (1792-1846.)

Charm means a song. Incantation is singing on or against some one. Enchant is the same. Verses supposed to have a baleful effect on those against whom they are sung. (Latin, carmen.)

Charon's Toll (caré-un). A coin, about equal to a penny, placed in the mouth or hand of the dead to pay Charon for ferrying the spirit across the river Styx to the Elysian fields. The Greeks put a coin, called dan'aké, in the mouth of the deceased for a similar purpose. The Danes, and, indeed, all the Scandinavians, observed the same custom.

Chartism. The political system of the Chartists, who, in 1838, demanded the People's Charter, consisting of five principles: universal suffrage, annual parliaments, stipendiary members, vote by ballot, and electoral districts.

Charyb'dis (Karib'dis). A whirlpool on the coast of Sicily. Scylla and Charybdis are employed to signify two equal dangers. Thus Horace says an author trying to avoid Scylla, drifts into Charybdis—i.e., seeking to avoid one fault, falls into another.

Thus when I shun Scylla your father, I fall into Charybdis your mother.—Shakespeare, "Merchant of Venice," iii. 5.

Chas'ca. The name under which the Peruvians used to adore the planet Venus.

Chase. An iron frame used by printers for holding sufficient type for one side of a sheet. The type is first set up letter by letter in the "composing stick," and is then transferred to the "galley," where it appears in columns. It is next divided into pages, and then transferred to the chase, where it is held tight by quoins, or small blocks of wood. The word is French, chasse (a frame); our case-ment. (See STICK.)

Chas'idim and Zad'ikim. After the Babylonish captivity the Jews were divided into two groups—those who accepted and those who rejected the Persian innovation. The former were called pietists (chasidim), and the latter uprights (zadikim).

Chasseurs de Vincennes (French). The duke of Orleans' rifle corps; so called because they were garrisoned at Vincennes. (1835.)

Chaste (The). Alfonso II., king of Asturias and Leon. (Born 758, crowned 791, abdicated 835, died 842.)

Chat. Nid d'une souris dans l'oreille d'un chat. A mare's nest. This French phrase is the translation of a line in Wynkin de Worde's "Amusing Questions," printed in English in 1511. "Demand: What is that that never was and never will be? Response: A mouse's nest in a cat's ear." (See MARE'S NEST.)

Chateaux en Espagne. A castle in the air, something that exists only in the imagination. In Spain there are no châteaux. (See CASTLE.)

Chat'telin's. A fashionable coffee-house in the reign of Charles II.

Chatter-box. A talkative person. The Germans have plunder tasche (chatter-bag). Shakespeare speaks of the clack-dish. "His use was to put a ducat in her clack-dish" ("Measure for Measure," iii. 2)—i.e., the box or dish used by beggars for collecting alms, which the holder clatters to attract attention. We find also chatter-basket in old writers, referring to the child's rattle.

Chatter Pie. Same as chatter-box. The pie means the magpie.

Chauvin. A blind idolater of Napoleon the Great. The character is taken from Scribe's "Soldat Laboureur."

Chawed up. Done for, gone to the bad, good for nothing. Like a quid of tobacco, which has been "chawed" till all the goodness is extracted from it.

Cheap Jack. Not cheap, meaning low-priced, but cheap meaning sale, as in "chap-man," "Cheap-side," &c. Jack is a term applied to inferior persons, &c. (Saxon, chepe, a market.) (See JACK.)

Cheater (2 syl.) originally meant an Escheator or officer of the king's exchequer appointed to receive dues and taxes. The present use of the word shows how these officers were wont to fleece the people. (See CATCHPOLE.)

Cheatly. A rascal who, by reason of debt, does not stir out of Whitefriars, but there inveigles young heirs of entail, helps them to money upon great disadvantage, and is bound for them. A lewd, impudent debauchee about town. — Shadwell, "Squire of Alsatia."

Chech, called also stone chest, kistvaen (a sepulchral monument or cromlech).

We find a rude chech or flat stone of an oval form, about three yards in length, five feet over where broadest, and ten or twelve inches thick. — Camden.

Check Mate (King dead). Sheik means king, and mattar in Spanish means to kill. Hence, Sheik mate; Spanish, zague de mate; German, schach matt; Italian, scacco matto. (See CHESS.)

Chediætros (Ked'ia'tros). One of Actæon's dogs. (See CANACHE.)

Cheek by Jowl. In intimate confabulation; tête-à-tête. Jowl is the Saxon ceole (cheek), Irish gial.

I'll go with thee, cheek by jowl. — Shakespeare, "Midsummer Night's Dream," iii. 2.

Cheek. None of your cheek. None of your insolence. Cheek, jowl, and jaw are only varieties of the same word; so that "none of your cheek" and "none of your jaw" were at one time interchangeable; but now the former implies more impudence and insolence of demeanour, and the latter more scolding or word irritation.

Thus, we say a man is very cheeky, meaning that he is vain-glorious and presumptuous, depreciating others by words and demeanour.

Cheese. It is not the cheese. Not the right thing; not what I should choose. (Anglo-Saxon, ceosan, to choose; German, kiesen; French, choisir; Persian, chiz; Hindu, cheez, thing.) Chaucer says, "To cheese whether she wold him marry or no."

Now thou might cheese
How thou conist to cal me, now thou knowst all mi names. P. Ploughman, "Vision."

He is quite the cheese (or) just the cheese

—i.e., quite the thing. By a double refinement we get the slang varieties, That's prime Stilton, or double Gloucester—i.e., slap bang up. (See above.)

Cheesewring (Cornwall). A mass of eight stones, towering to the height of thirty-two feet: so called because it looks like a gigantic cheese-press. This is probably a natural work, the effect of some convulsion. The Kilmarth Rocks, and part of Hugh Lloyd's Pulpit, present somewhat similar piles of stone.

Chef d'Œuvre. A master-piece. (French.)

Cheleule. A god of the Patagonians, but inferior to Set'ebos, the supreme devil.

Chem'istry (ken'istry) is from the Arabic kimia, whence al-kimia (the occult art), from kamai (to conceal). Chemia occurs in the Lexicon of Suidas. To spell the word with a y is an error, arising from the notion that it is derived from the Greco-Latin chyro (to fuse).

Ché'mos or Ché'mosh (Kee'mosh). The war-god of the Moabites; god of lust.

Next, Chemos, the obscene dread of Moab's sons,
From Ar'oor to Nebo, and the wild
Of southmost Ab'arim.

Milton, "Paradise Lost," bk. i.

Chennap'pa. The city of Chennappa. So Madras is called by the natives.

Chequers. A public-house sign in honour of the Stuarts, whose shield is chequy, like a Scotch plaid. I do not think it is meant to announce that "chess and draughts are played within." (See LATTICE.)

Cherone'an or Cheronean Sage (Kerone'an). Plutarch, who was born at Cherone'a, in Bœotia. (46-120.)

This praise, O Cheronean sage, is thine.
Beattie, "Minstrel."

Cher'ubims. The 11th Hussars are so called, by a bad pun, because their trousers are of a cherry colour.

Chery and Fair-Star. Chery was the son of a king's brother and Brunetta; Fair-star was the daughter of the king and Blond'ina, the two fathers being brothers, and the two mothers sisters. They were cast on the sea adrift, but were found and brought up by a corsair and his wife. Ultimately they are told of their birth by a green bird, and marry each other. This tale is imitated from "The Sisters who Envied their Younger Sister," in the "Arabian Nights." N.B.—The name is from the French cher (dear), and is about equal to "deary" or "dear one." It is quite wrong to spell it with a double r.—Comtesse d'Aulnoy, "Fairytale."

Cheshire is the Latin castra-shire, called by the Romans Devāna castru (the camp town of Deva, or Dee-mouth).

Chess, called by the Hindus chatur-anga (the four angas)—i.e., the four members of the army—viz., elephants, horses, chariots, and foot-soldiers; called by the ancient Persians chetrang. The Arabs, who have neither c nor g, called it shetranj, which modern Persians corrupted into sacchi, whence the Italian scacchi, German schach, French échec, our chess. (See CHECK MATE.)

Chesterfield, lauded by Thomson in his "Winter," is the fourth earl, author of "Chesterfield's Letters to his Son." (1694-1773.)

Chesterfield House (London) was built by Isaac Ware for Philip, fourth earl of Chesterfield. (See above.)

Chet'owaik (North-American Indian). The plover.

All the wild fowls sang them to him,
In the moorlands and the fenlands,
In the melancholy marshes:
Chetowaik, the plover, sang them.
Longfellow, "Hiawatha" (Introduction).

À Cheval (French). On each side, so as to command the space between.

The Western powers will assuredly never permit Russia to place herself again à cheval between the Ottoman empire and Persia.—The Times.

In military language, troops are arranged à cheval when they command two roads, as Wellington's army at Waterloo, which, being at the apex of two roads, commanded that between Charleroy and Brussels, as well as that to Mons.

Chevalier. (See CAVALIER.)

Chevaux de Frise (French). Horses of Friesland. A beam filled with spikes to keep off horses; so called from its use in the siege of Groningen, Friesland, in 1594. A somewhat similar engine had been used before, but was not called by the same name. In German it is "A Spanish horseman" (ein Spanischer Reiter).

Chev'eril. He has a chev'eril conscience. One that will easily stretch like chev'eril or kid leather.

Oh, here's a wit of chev'eril, that stretches from an inch narrow to an ell broad.—Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet," ii. 4.

Your soft chev'eril conscience would receive,
If you might please to stretch it.

Shakespeare, "Henry VIII.," ii. 3.

Chevy Chase. There had long been a rivalry between the families of Percy and Douglas, which showed itself by incessant raids into each other's territory. Percy of Northumberland one day vowed he would hunt for three days in the Scottish border, without condescending to ask leave of earl Douglas. The Scotch warden said in his anger, "Tell this vaunter he shall find one day more than sufficient." The ballad called "Chevy Chase" mixes up this hunt with the battle of Otterburn, which, Dr. Percy justly observes, was "a very different event." Chevy Chase means the chase or hunt among the "Chyviat hyls."

To louder strains he raised his voice, to tell
What woful wars in "Chevy Chase" befell.
When Percy drove the deer with hound and horn,
Wars to be wept by children yet unborn.

Gay, "Pastoral VI."

Chiabreres'co (Italian). Poetry formed on the Greek model; so called from Gabriel Chiabre'ra, surnamed the "Pindar of Italy" (1552-1637).

Chia'ro-oscu'ro (ke-ar'-ro). Light and shadow judiciously distributed in a picture. The word is compounded of two Italian words meaning light (and) shadow.

Chib'ia'bos. The musician; the harmony of nature personified. He teaches the birds to sing and the brooks to warble as they flow. "All the many sounds of nature borrow sweetness from his singing."

Very dear to Hiawatha
Was the gentle Chibiabos,
For his gentleness he loved him,
And the magic of his singing.

Longfellow, "Hiawatha," vi.

Chich'i-vache (3 syl.). French for the "sorry cow," a monster that lived only on good women—all skin and bone, because its food was so extremely scarce. The old English romancers invented another monster, which they called Bycorn, as fat as the other was lean; but, luckily, he had for food "good and enduring husbands," of which there is no lack.

O noble wyvës, ful of heigh pruden'ce,
Let noon humilitee your tongës naye;
Ne lat no clerk have cause or diligen'ce
To write of you a story of such mervayle
As of Griseliës, pucient and kynde.

Least Chich'i-vache you sallowe in hir entraile.
Chaucer, "Marchandes Tale," 9039.

Chicken. She's no chicken. Not young. The young child as well as the young fowl is called a chicken or chick.

To count your chickens ere they are hatched (Hudibras). To anticipate profits before they come. One of Æsop's fables describes a market-woman saying she would get so much for her eggs, with the money she would buy a goose; the goose in time would bring her so much, with which she would buy a cow, and so on; but in her excitement she kicked over her basket, and all her eggs were broken. The Latins said, "Don't sing your song of triumph before you have won the victory" (ante victoriam can'ere triumphum). "Don't crow till you are out of the wood" has a similar meaning.

Chicken-hearted. Cowardly. Young fowls are remarkably timid, and run to the wing of the hen upon the slightest cause of alarm.

Childe, as childe Harold, childe of Ellice, childe Waters, childe Roland, childe Tristram, childe Arthur, &c.; also Childeric (Child-erie), Childebert (childe-bert), Chilperic (child-p'-erie). In all these cases the word "childe" is a title of honour, like the infante and infanta of Spain. In the times of chivalry, the noble youths who were candidates for knighthood were, during their time of probation, called infans, valets, damoyseles, and bacheliers. Childe or infant was the term given only to the most noble. The Saxon cnihz means both child and knight.

Childe Harold. A man sated of the world, who roams from place to place to flee from himself. The "childe" is, in fact, Lord Byron himself, who was only twenty-one when he began, and twenty-eight when he finished the poem. In canto i. (1809), he visited Portugal and Spain; in canto ii. (1810), Turkey in Europe; in canto iii. (1816), Belgium and Switzerland; and in canto iv. (1817), Venice, Rome, and Florence.

Children. The children in the wood. A Norfolk gentleman on his deathbed left a little son, three years old, and a still younger daughter, named Jane, to the care of his wife's brother. The boy was to have £300 a year when he came of age, and the girl £500 as a wedding portion; but if the children died previously, the uncle was to inherit. After twelve months had elapsed, the uncle hired two ruffians to murder the two babes. As they went along one of the ruffians relented, and killed his fellow; then putting down the children in a wood, left them. The poor babes gathered blackberries to allay their hunger, but died during the night, and "Robin Redbreast" covered them over with strawberry leaves. All things went ill with the cruel uncle; his sons died, his barns were fired, his cattle died, and he himself perished in gaol. After the lapse of seven years, the ruffian was taken up for highway robbery, and confessed the whole affair.

Then said he sung "The Children in the Wood."
(Ah! barbarous uncle, stained with infant blood!)
How blackberries they plucked in deserts wild,
And fear-les at the shivering falch'on smiled;
Their little corpse the robin-redbreast found,
And strewn with pious bill the leaves around
Gay, "Pastoral VI."

Children. Three hundred and sixty-five at a birth. It is said that the countess of Hennesberg accused a beggar of adultery because she carried twins, whereupon the beggar prayed that the countess might carry as many children as there are days in the year. According to the legend, this happened on Good Friday, 1276. All the males were named John, and all the females Elizabeth. The countess was forty-two at the time.

Chile'nōs. People of Chili.

Chil'ian. A native of Chili, pertaining to Chili, &c.

Chil'iasts (ki'l'iasts). Another word for Millen'arians; those who believe that Christ will come again to this earth, and reign a thousand years in the midst of his saints. (Greek, chilias, a thousand.)

Chillon. Prisoner of Chillon. Francesco di Bonnavard, of Lunas. Lord Byron makes him one of six brothers, all of whom suffered as martyrs. The father and two sons died on the battle-field; one was burnt at the stake; three were incarcerated in the dungeon of Chillon, near the lake of Geneva—of these, two died, and Francesco was set at liberty by "the Bearnais." Byron says that Bonnavard has left traces of his footsteps in the pavement of the dungeon. He was put in prison for "republican principles" by the duke-bishop of Savoy. (1496-1570.)

Chilminar' and Balbec. Two cities built by the Genii, acting under the orders of Jan ben Jan, who governed the world long before the time of Adam. Chilminar, or the "Forty Pillars," is Persep'olis. These two cities were built as lurking places for the Genii to hide in.

Chiltern Hundreds. To accept the Chiltern Hundreds is to resign one's seat in Parliament. The steward of the Chiltern Hundreds is an officer of the crown, appointed to protect the people of Bucks from the robbers of the Chiltern hills. This office is now a sinecure, but as a member can only resign his seat by accepting office, he accepts this sinecure, which he immediately vacates for the benefit of others. The stewardship of the manors of East Hendred, Northstead, and Hempholme, are other sinecure offices made use of for the same purpose.

Chimæra (kime'ra). An illusory fancy, a wild, incongruous scheme, a castle in the air. Homer describes the chimæra as a monster with a goat's body, a lion's head, and a dragon's tail.

Chin. (Greek, gen-us; Latin, gen-a; Persian, jain; German, kinn; Dutch, kin; Saxon, cinne.)

Chine'se (2 syl.). A native of China; the language of China; pertaining or special to China.

Chingachcook. The Indian chief in Fenimore Cooper's "Last of the Mohicans," "Pathfinder," "Deerslayer," and "Pioneer." Called in French Le Gros Serpent.

Chink or Jink. Money; so called because it chinks or jingles in the purse. Thus, if a person is asked if he has money, he rattles that which he has in his purse or pocket.

Have chinks in thy purse.—Tusser.

Chintz means spotted. The cotton goods originally manufactured in the East. (Persian, chinz, spotted, stained.)

Chios (Ki'os). The man of Chios. Homer, who lived at Chios, near the Ege'an Sea. Seven cities claim to be his place of birth—

Smyrna, Rhodes, Colophon, Samis, Chios, Argos, Athene.—Varro

Chip. Chip of the old block. A son or child of the same stuff as his father. The chip is the same wood as the block from which it was cut.

Brother chip. Properly a brother carpenter, but in its extended meaning applied to any one of the same vocation as ourselves.

Chir'achee'. Chariot. (Chaucer.)

Cicle'nus (Mercury) riding in his chirachee.
"Compt. of Mars and Venus."

Chi'ron (Ki'ron). The centaur who taught Achilles music, medicine, and hunting. Jupiter placed him in heaven among the stars, where he is called Sagitta'rius (the Archer).

Chi'ron, according to Dantë, has watch over the lake of boiling blood, in the seventh circle of hell.

Chisel. I chiselled him means, I cheated him, or did him out of something. As the chisel cuts pieces out of wood very neatly and cleverly, so the skilful cheat cuts a "chip" from the person chiselled.

Chitty-faced. Baby-faced, lean. A chit is a child or sprout. Both chit and chitty-faced are terms of contempt. (Saxon, cith, a twig, &c.)

Chivalry.

The paladins of Charlemagne were all scattered by the battle of Roncesvallès.

The champions of Did'erick were all assassinated at the instigation of Chriemhil'da, the bride of Ezzel, king of the Huns.

The Knights of the Round Table were all extirpated by the fatal battle of Camlan.

Chivalry. The six following clauses may be considered almost as axioms of the Arthurian romances:—

(1) There was no braver or more noble king than Arthur.

(2) No fairer or more faithless wife than Guin'iver.

(3) No truer pair of lovers than Tristan and Isault.

(4) No knight more faithful than Sir Kaye.

(5) None so brave and amorous as Sir Laun'celot.

(6) None so virtuous as Sir Gal'ahad.

The flower of Chivalry. William Douglas, lord of Liddesdale. (14th century.)

Chiv'y. A chase in the school game of "Prisoners' Base" or "Prison Bars." So called from Chevy Chase (q.v.). One boy sets a chivy, by leaving his bar, when one of the opposite side chases him, and if he succeeds in touching him before he reaches "home," he becomes a prisoner.

Chlo'e (Kl'oe). The shepherdess beloved by Daphnis in the pastoral romance of Longus, entitled "Daphnis and Chloë." St. Pierre's tale of "Paul and Virginia" is founded on the exquisite romance of Longus.

Chœ'reas (K'reas). The lover of Callirhoë, in Ch'ariton's Greek romance, called the "Loves of Chœreas and Callirhoë." (Eighth century.)

Choke. May this piece of bread choke me, if what I say is not true. In ancient times a person accused of robbery had a piece of barley bread, on which the mass had been said, given him to swallow. He put it in his mouth uttering the words given above, and if he could swallow it without being choked, he was pronounced innocent. Tradition ascribes the death of the earl Godwin to choking with a piece of bread, after this solemn appeal.

Choke-pear. An argument to which there is no answer. Robbers in Holland at one time made use of a piece of iron in the shape of a pear, which they forced into the mouth of their victim. On turning a key, a number of springs thrust forth points of iron in all directions, so that the instrument of torture could never be taken out except by means of the key.

Chon. The Egyptian Hercules.

Chondar'ava'li. The daughter of Vishnu. (Hindu mythology.)

Chop'ine (2 syl.). A high-heeled shoe. The Venetian ladies used to wear "high-heeled shoes like stilts." Hamlet says of the actress, "Your ladyship is nearer to heaven, than when I saw you last, by the altitude of a chopine" (act ii. s. 2). (Spanish, chopin, a high cork shoe.)

Chop Logic. To bandy words; to altercation. Lord Bacon says, "Let not the council chop with the judge."

How now, how now, chop logic! What is this?
"Proud," and "I thank you," and "I thank you not,"
And yet "not proud."
Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet," iii. 5.

Chops. Down in the chops—i.e., down in the mouth; in a melancholy state; with the mouth drawn down. Chop or chap is Saxon for mouth; we still say a pig's chap.

Choreu'tæ (Koru'tee). A sect of heretics, who, among other errors, persisted in keeping the Sunday a fast.

Chouans (2 syl.). French insurgents of the Royalist party during the Revolution. Jean Cottereau was their leader, nick-named chouan (owl), because he was accustomed to warn his companions of danger by imitating the screech of an owl. Cottereau was followed by George Cadoudal.

Chouse (1 syl.). To cheat out of something. Gifford says the interpreter of the Turkish embassy in England is called chiaus, and in 1609 this chiaus contrived to defraud his government of £4,000, an enormous sum at that period. From the notoriety of the swindle the word chiaus or to chouse was adopted.

What do you think of me—
That I am a chiaus?

Ben Jonson, "Alchymist," (1610.)

Chriem-hil'da or Chriem-hild. A woman of unrivalled beauty, sister of Gunther, and beloved by Siegfried, the two chief heroes of the Niebelung (q.v.). Siegfried gives her a talisman taken from Gunther's lady-love, and Gunther, in a fit of jealousy, induces Hagen to murder his brother-in-law. Chriemhild in revenge marries Ezzel, king of the Huns; invites the Niebelungs to the wedding feast; and there they are all put to the sword, except Hagen and Gunther, who are taken prisoners, and put to death by the bride.

Chrisome (kris'um) signifies properly "the white cloth set by the minister at baptism on the head of the newly anointed with chrism (i.e., a composition of oil and balm). In the Form of Private Baptism is this direction: "Then the minister shall put the white vesture, commonly called the chrisome, upon the child." The child thus baptised is called a chrisom or chrisom child. If it dies within the month, it is shrouded in the vesture; and hence, in the bills of mortality, even to the year 1726, infants that died within the month were termed chrisoms.

A' made a fine end, and went away an it had been any chrisom child.—Shakespeare, "Henry V.," ii. 3.

Christabel (Kris'tabel). The heroine of Coleridge's fragmentary poem of that name.

Christabelle (Kris'tabel). Daughter of a "bonnie king" in Ireland. She fell in love with Sir Cauline (q.v.).

Christendom (Kris'-en-dum) generally means all Christian countries; but Shakespeare uses it for baptism, or "Christian citizenship." Thus, in "King John," the young prince says—

By my christendom!
So were I out of prison, and kept sheep,
I should be merry as the day is long.
Act iv. s. 1.

Christian (Kris'tian). The hero of John Bunyan's allegory called "The Pilgrim's Progress." He flees from the "City of Destruction," and journeys on to the "Celestial City." He starts with a heavy burden on his back, but it falls off when he stands at the foot of the cross.

Christian. A follower of Christ. So called first at Antioch (Acts xi. 26).

Most Christian Doctor. John Charlier de Gerson. (1363-1429.)

Most Christian King. The style of the king of France.

Pepin le Bret was so styled by pope Stephen III. (714-768.)

Charles le Chauve was so styled by the council of Savonnières. (823-877.)

Louis XI. was so styled by pope Paul II. (1423-1483.)

Since which time it has been universally adopted in France. (1469.)

And thou, O Gaul, with gaudy trophies plumed,
"Most Christian king." Alas! in ruin assumed.
Camœns, "Lusiad," bk. vii.

Founder of Christian Eloquence. Louis Bourdaloue, the French preacher. (1632-1704.)

Christian'a (Kristian'a). The wife of Christian, who started with her children and Mercy from the "City of Destruction" long after her husband. She was placed under the guidance of Mr. Great-Heart, and went, therefore, in "silver slippers" along the thorny road.—Bunyan, "The Pilgrim's Progress," pt. ii.

Christmas (Krist'mas). "Christmas comes but once a year."—Thomas Tusser.

Christmas Box. A small gratuity given to servants, &c., on Boxing day (the day after Christmas day). In the early days of Christianity boxes were placed in churches for promiscuous charities, and opened on Christmas Day. The contents were distributed next day by the priests, and called the "dole of the Christmas box," or the "box money." It was customary for heads of houses to give small sums of money to their subordinates "to put into the box," before mass on Christmas Day.

Somewhat later, apprentices carried a box round to their master's customers for small gratuities. The custom since 1836 has been gradually dying out.

Gladly the boy, with Christmas box in hand,
Throughout the town his devious route pursues,
And of his master's customers implores
The yearly mite.

Christmas.

Christmas Carols are in commemoration of the song of the angels to the shepherds at the nativity. Durand tells us that the bishops with the clergy used to sing carols and play games on Christmas day. (Latin, canto, I sing; rola, an interjection of joy.)

Christmas Day. Transferred from the 6th of January to the 25th of December by Julius I. (337-352.)

Christmas Decorations. The great feast of Saturn was held in December, when the people decorated the temples with such green things as they could find. The Christian custom is the same transferred to Him who was born in Bethlehem on the 25th of the same month. The holly or holy-tree is called Christ's-thorn in Germany and Scandinavia, from its use in church decorations and its putting forth its berries at Christmas time. The early Christians gave an emblematic turn to the custom, referring to the "righteous branch," and justifying the custom from Isa. lx. 13—"The glory of Lebanon shall come unto thee; the fir-tree, the pine-tree, and the box together, to beautify the place of my sanctuary."

Christolytes (Kris'-to-lites). A sect of Christians that appeared in the sixth century. They maintained that when Christ descended into hell, he left his soul and body there, and rose only with his heavenly nature.

Christopher (St.). The giant carried a child over a brook, and said, "Chylde, thou hast put me in grete peryll. I might bere no greater burden." To which the child answered, "Marvel thou nothing, for thou hast borne all the world upon thee, and its sins likewise." This is an allegory: Christopher means cross-bearer—i.e., Jesus Christ; the child is the offspring of Adam; the river is death. The saint is called a giant because the Redeemer was equal to so great a burden.

Chron'icon ex Chron'icis is by Florence, a monk of Worcester, the earliest of our English chronicles. It begins from Creation, and goes down to 1119, in which year the author died; but it was continued by another hand to 1141. Printed in 4to at London, 1592. Its chief value consists in its serving as a key to the Saxon chronicle.

Chrōnon-hoton-thol'ogōs (Chronon, &c.). A burlesque pomposo in Henry Carey's farce, so called. Any one who delivers an inflated address.

Aldiboronotophoscophornio, where left you Chronhotonthologos?—H. Carey.

Chrysa'or (krisa'or). Sir Artegall's sword, "that all other swords excelled."—Spenser, "Faëry Queen."

Chrys'alīs (krys'alīs). The form which caterpillars assume before they are converted into butterflies. The chrysalis is also called an aure'lia, from the Latin aurum, gold. The external covering of some species has a metallic, golden hue, but others are green, red, black, &c. (Greek, chrysos, gold.)

Chubb (Thomas). A deistical writer, who wrote upon miracles in the first half of the eighteenth century.

He heard of Blount, of Maudeville, and Chubb.
Crabb, "Borough."

Chum. A crony, a familiar companion, properly a bedfellow. (Armoric, chom; French, chômer, to rest, our chamber.)

Church. The etymology of this word is generally assumed to be from the Greek Kuriou oikos (house of God); but this is most improbable, as the word existed in all the Celtic dialects long before the introduction of Greek. No doubt the word means "a circle." The places of worship among the German and Celtic nations were always circular: witness the cromlechs of Stonehenge, Avebury, Silbury Hill, Stanton Drew, &c., the dolmens of Brittany, and the relic shrines of India. (Welsh, cyrch; French, église; Scotch, kirk; Greek, kirk-os, &c.)
High, Low, and Broad Church. Dr. South says, "The High Church are those who think highly of the church and lowly of themselves; the Low Church those who think lowly of the church and highly of themselves." The Broad Church are those who think the church is broad enough for all religious parties, and their own views of religion are chiefly of a moral nature, their doctrinal views being so rounded and elastic, that they can come into collision with no one.

Church Militant and Church Triumphant. The church on earth means the whole body of believers, who are said to be "waging the war of faith" against "the world, the flesh, and the devil." It is therefore militant, or in warfare; but some have gone to their rest, and have entered into glory, having fought the fight and triumphed—these belong to the "church triumphant" in heaven.

Church Porch (The) was used in ancient times for settling money transactions, paying dowries, rents, and purchases of estates. Consequently it was furnished with benches on both sides. Hence, lord Stourton sent to invite the Hartgills to meet him in the porch of Kilminster church to receive the £2,000 awarded them by the Star Chamber.—Lord de Ros, "Tower of London."

Churching of Women. In imitation of the Jewish custom of purification. The Virgin Mary went up to be purified and to make her offering (Luke ii. 22, &c.).

Chuzzlewit (Martin). The hero of Dickens's novel so called. Jonas Chuzzlewit is a type of mean tyranny, delighting in petty cruelty.

Chyndo'nax. A chief Druid, whose tomb, with a Greek inscription, was discovered near Dijon, in 1593.

Cic'ero. So called from the Latin cicer (a wart or vetch). Plutarch says, "a flat excrescence, on the tip of his nose, gave him this name." His real name was Tully.

The British Cicero. William Pitt, earl of Chatham. (1703-1778.)

The Cicero of the British Senate. George Canning (1770-1827.)

The Christian Cicero. Lucius Cœlius Lactantius, a Christian father, who died 330.

The Cicero of France. Jean Baptiste Massillon. (1663-1742.)

La Bouche de Ciceron. Philippe Pot, prime minister of Louis XI. (1428-1494.)

The Cicero of Germany. Johann III., elector of Brandenburg. (1455-1499.)

The German Cicero. Johann Sturm, printer and scholar. (1507-1589.)

Cicero'ne (4 syl.). A guide to point out objects of interest to strangers. So called in the same way as Paul was called by the men of Lystra "Mercurius, because he was the chief speaker" (Acts xiv. 12). Cicero was the speaker of speakers at Rome; and certainly, in a party of sight-seers, the guide is "the chief speaker." It is no compliment to the great orator to call the glib patterer of a show-place a Cicero; but we must not throw stones at our Italian neighbours, as we have conferred similar honour on our great epic poet in changing "Grub Street" into "Milton Street."

Cicis'beo (che-chiz-beo). A dangler about women; the professed gallant of a married woman. Also the knot of silk or ribbon which is attached to fans, walking-sticks, umbrellas, &c. Cicis-beism, the practice of dangling about women.

Cicle'nus or Cylle'nus. Mercury. So called from mount Cylle'nē, in Peloponnese, where he was born.

Ciclenius riding in his chitachee.
Chaucer, "Compl. of Mars and Venus."

Cid. Arabic for lord. Don Roderi'go Laynez, Ruy Diaz (son of Diaz), count of Bivar'. He was called "mio cid el campador," my lord the champion. (1040-1099.)

The Portuguese Cid. Nunez Alva'rez Perei'ra, general and diplomatist. (1360-1431.)

The Cid's horse. Bavi'e'a.

The Cid's sword. Cola'da. The sword taken by the cid Roderi'go from king Bucar was called Tizo'na.

Ci-devant (French). Former; of times gone by. As Ci-devant governor—i.e., once a governor, but no longer so. Ci-devant philosophers means philosophers of former days.

Cillaros. The name of Castor's horse. (See HORSE.)

Cimmer'ian Bos'phorus. The strait of Kaffa.

Cimmer'ian Darkness. Homer supposes the Cimmerians to dwell in a land "beyond the ocean-stream," where the sun never shone.—"Odys.," xi. 14.

In dark Cimmerian desert ever dwell.
Milton, "L'Allegro."

Cincho'na or Quinine. So named from the countess del Cinchon, wife of the condé del Cinchon, viceroy of Peru, whence the bark was first sent to Europe. (See PERUVIAN BARK.)

Cincinna'tus, the Roman, was ploughing his field, when he was saluted as Dictator. After he had conquered the Volsci and delivered his country from danger, he laid down his office and returned to his plough.

And Cincinnatus, awful from the plough.
Thomson, "Winter."

The Cincinnatus of the Americans.
George Washington. (1732-1799.)

Cinderella (little cinder girl), heroine of a fairy tale. She is the drudge of the house, dirty with housework, while her elder sisters go to fine balls. At length a fairy enables her to go to the prince's ball; the prince falls in love with her, and she is discovered by means of a glass slipper which she drops, and which will fit no foot but her own.

The glass slipper is a strange mistranslation of pantoufle en vair (a fur slipper), as if pantoufle en ver.

Cinque Cento. Inferior or degraded art. The words are Italian for 500. In 1500 the great schools of art had closed, and the artists that followed them were very inferior.

Cin'yphus. A river of Africa.—Orlando Furioso.

Cir'ee (2 syl.). A sorceress. She lived in the island of Æica. When Ulysses landed there, Circe turned his companions into swine, but Ulysses resisted this metamorphose by virtue of a herb called moly, given him by Mercury.

Who knows not Circe,
The daughter of the Sun, whose charmed cup
Whoever tasted lost his upright shape,
And downward fell into a grovelling swine?
Milton, "Comus."

Circle of Uiloa. A white rainbow or luminous ring sometimes seen in Alpine regions opposite the sun in foggy weather.

Circuit. The journey made through the counties of Great Britain by the judges twice a year. There are six circuits in England, two in Wales, and three in Scotland. Those in England are called the Home, Norfolk, Midland, Oxford, Western, and Northern; those of Wales, the North and South circuits; and those of Scotland, the Southern, Western, and Northern.

Circumcell'ians. A sect of the African Donatists in the fourth century; so called because they rambled from town to town to redress grievances, forgive debts, manumit slaves, and set themselves up as the oracles of right and wrong. (Latin, circum-cello, to beat about.)

Circumcised Brethren (in "Hudibras"). They were Prynne, Bertie or Burton, and Bastwick, who lost their ears and had their noses slit for lampooning Henrietta Maria and the bishops.

Circumlocution Office. A term applied in ridicule to our public offices, because each person tries to shuffle off every act to someone else, and before anything is done it has to pass through so many departments, that every fly is crushed on a wheel. The term was invented by Charles Dickens, and appears in "Little Dorrit."

Ciric-Sceat or Church-Scot. An ecclesiastical due, paid chiefly in corn, in the reign of Canute, &c., on St. Martin's Day.

Cisse'ta. One of the dogs of Actæon.

Cist or Cyst. Properly a bladder (Greek, cystis), but generally used for a stone chest containing the remains of those who are buried in barrows.

Cister'cians. A religious order, so called from the monastery of Cister'cium, near Dijon, in France. The abbey of Cistercium or Citeaux was founded by Robert, abbot of Moleme, in Burgundy, at the close of the eleventh century.

Cities. The Cities of the Plain. Sodom and Gomorrah.

Abram dwelled in the land of Canaan, and Lot dwelled in the cities of the plain, and pitched his tent toward Sodom.—Gen. xiii. 12.

The Seven Cities. Egypt, Jerusalem, Babylon, Athens, Rome, Constantinople, and either London for commerce or Paris for beauty.

Citizen King. Louis Philippe of France. So called because he was elected king by the citizens of Paris. (Born 1773, reigned 1830-1848, died 1850.)

City of David. Jerusalem. So called in compliment to King David. (2 Sam. v. 7, 9.)

City of Destruction. This world, or rather, the world of the unconverted. Bunyan makes Christian flee from the "City of Destruction" and journey to the "Celestial City," by which he allegorises the "walk of a Christian" from conversion to death.

City of God. The church or whole body of believers; the kingdom of Jesus Christ, in contradistinction to the city of the World, called by John Bunyan the City of Destruction. The phrase is that of St. Augustine.

City of Lanterns. A supposititious city in Lucian's "Vere Historiæ," situate somewhere beyond the zodiac.

City of Palaces. Agrippa, in the reign of Augustus, converted Rome from "a city of brick huts to one of marble palaces."

Calcutta is called the "City of Palaces." Modern Paris well deserves the compliment of being so called.

City of Refuge. Medi'na, in Arabia, where Mahomet took refuge when driven by conspirators from Mecca. He entered the city, not as a fugitive, but in triumph, A.D. 622.

Cities of Refuge. Moses, at the command of God, set apart three cities on the east of Jordan, and Joshua added three others on the west, whither any person might flee for refuge who had killed a human creature inadvertently. The three on the east of Jordan were Bezer, Ramoth, and Golan; the three on the west were Hebron, Shechem, and Kedesh. (Deut. iv. 43; Josh. xx. 7, 8.)

City of the Great King—i.e., Jerusalem. (Ps. xlviii. 2; Matt. v. 35.)

City of the Sun. A romance by Campanella, similar to the "Republic" of Plato, the "Utopia" of Sir Thomas More, and the "Atlantis" of Lord Bacon. (1568-1639.)

Civil List. Now applied to expenses proper for the maintenance of the sovereign's household; but before the reign of William III. it embraced all the heads of public expenditure, except those of the army and navy.

Civil Service Estimates (C.S.E.) include the national expenses for—Public works.

Salaries.
Law expenses.
Education, science, and art.
Colonial and consular expenses.
Pensions.
Miscellaneous.

Civila'tion. Intoxication. A Cork orator at a debating society was speaking on the state of Ireland before it was added to England, and said, "Sir, the Irish had no civilation—civilation, I mean—no civilization," and sat down, too far gone to pronounce the word civilisation.

Clabber Napper's Hole. Near Gravesend; said to be so called from a freebooter; but more likely the Celtic Caer-ber l'arber (water-town lower camp).

Clack Dish. Some two or three centuries ago, beggars used to proclaim their want by clacking the lid of a wooden dish.

"Can you think I get my living by a bell and clack-dish?"

"How's that?"

"Why, begging, sir." "Family of Love." (1608.)

Claire (St.). A religious order of women, the second that St. Francis instituted. It was founded in 1213, and took its name from its first abbess, Claire of Assise.

Clak-ho-haryah. At Fort Vancouver, the medium of intercourse is a mixture of Canadian French, English, Indian, and Chinese. An Englishman goes by the name of Kint-shosh, a corruption of king George; an American is called Boston; and the ordinary salutation is clak-ho-haryah. This is explained by the fact that the Indians, frequently hearing a trader named Clark addressed by his companions, "Clark, how are you?" imagined this to be the correct English form of salutation.—Taylor, "Words and Places."

Clam. Better clam than go to the union. Better be pinched or half-starved.

(Clam is the German klemmen, to pinch; Danish, klemmer; our clammy, sticky.)

I could not let him clam, I was clamming myself, ma'am.—Shadow of Ashlydell.

Clap-trap. Something introduced to win applause; something really worthless, but sure to take with the groundlings. It is a trap to catch a round of applause.

Clapper. A plank bridge over a stream; a ferry-gate.

Clapper Claw. To jangle and claw each other about. (Dutch and German, klappen, to strike, clatter.)

Now they are clapper-clawing one another; I'll go look on.—"Troilus and Cressida," v. 4.

Clapper-dudgeons. Abram-men (q.v.). The clapper is the tongue of a bell, and in cant language the human "tongue." Dudgeon (Welsh, dygen) means resentment, and in slang language one who resents, a madman. A clapper-dudgeon is a madman, patterer, or beggar.

Clapping the prayer-books, or stamping the feet, in the Roman Catholic church, on Good Friday, is designed to signify the abandonment of our Saviour by his disciples. This is done when twelve of the thirteen burning candles are put out. The noise comes from within the choir.

Claque; Claqueurs. Applause by clapping the hands; persons paid for doing so. M. Sauton, in 1820, established in Paris an office to ensure the success of dramatic pieces. He was the first to organise the Parisian claque. The manager sends an order to his office for any number of claqueurs, sometimes for 500, or even more. The class is divided into commissars, those who commit the pieces to memory, and are noisy in pointing out its merits; rieurs, who laugh at the puns and jokes; pleureurs, chiefly women, who are to hold their pocket-handkerchiefs to their eyes at the moving parts; châtonilleurs, who are to keep the audience in good humour; and bisseurs, who are to cry (his) encore. The Romans had their Laudicœni (q.v.). note p. 86 Suc

Clarencieux (3 syl.). The first of the two provincial king-at-arms, the other is Norroy (north king). So named from the duke of Clarence, third son of Edward III., who first bore the office.

Clarendon. The constitutions of Clarendon. Laws made by a general council of nobles and prelates, held at Clarendon, in Wiltshire, in 1164, to check the power of the church, and restrain the prerogatives of ecclesiastics. These famous ordinances, sixteen in number, define the limits of the patronage and jurisdiction of the pope in these realms.

Claret. The wine so called does not receive its name from its colour, but the colour so called receives its name from the wine. The word means clarified wine (vinum claratum). What we called hippocras was called claratum, which was a liquor made of wine and honey clarified.

Classics. The best authors. The Romans were divided by Servius into six classes. Any citizen who belonged to the highest class was called classicus, all the rest were said to be infra classem. From this the best authors were termed classici auctores (classic authors)—i.e., authors of the best or first class. The high esteem in which Greek and Latin were held at the revival of letters obtained for these authors the name of classic, emphatically; and when other first-rate works are intended some distinctive name is added, as the English, French, Spanish, &c., classics.

Claude Lorraine. Claude Gelee, the French landscape painter, who was born at the Château-de-Chamagne, in Lorraine. (1600-1682.)

Claus (Santa). The Kriss Kringle of the Dutch, and the St. Nicholas of the Germans (q. c.).

Clause. Letter-clause, a close letter, sealed with the royal signet or privy-seal; in opposition to letters-patent, which are left open, the seal being attached simply as a legal form. ("Clause," Latin clausus, shut, closed. "Patent," Latin patens, spread, open.)

Clavile'no. The wooden horse on which Don Quixote got astride, in order to disenchanted the infanta Antonoma'sia and her husband, who were shut up in the tomb of queen Magun'cia, of Candaya. It was the very horse on which Peter of Provence carried off the fair Magalo'na; it was constructed by Merlin, and was governed by a wooden pin in the forehead. (The word means Wooden Peg).—"Don Quixote," pt. ii. bk. 3, c. 4, 5.

Claw means the foot of an animal armed with claws; a hand. To claw is to lay one's hands upon things. It also means to tickle with the hand; hence to please or flatter, puff or praise. Claw me and I will claw thee, means, "praise me, and I will praise you."

Laugh when I am merry, and claw no man in his humour. Shakespeare, "Much Ado," &c., i. 3.

Claw-backs. Flatterers. Bishop Jewel speaks of "the pope's claw-backs."

Clay'more or Glay'more (2 syl.) is the Celtic glai (a bent sword) and mawr (large). (See MORGLAY.)

Clean Bill. To exhibit a clean bill of health. (See BILL OF HEALTH.)

Cleaned. Cleaned out. Impoverished of everything. De Quincey says that Richard Bentley, after his lawsuit with Dr. Colbatch, "must have been pretty well cleaned out."

Clearing House. A building in Lombard Street, set apart, since 1775, for interchanging bankers' cheques and bills. Each bank sends to it daily all the bills and cheques not drawn on its own firm; these are sorted and distributed to their respective houses, and the balance is settled by transfer tickets. The origin of this establishment was a post at the corner of Birchin Lane and Lombard Street, where banking clerks met and exchanged memoranda.

Railway lines have also their "Clearing Houses," for settling the "tickets" of the different lines.

Clelia. A vain, frivolous female butterfly, with a smattering of everything. In youth she coquetted; and, when youth was passed, tried sundry ways of earning a living, but always without success. It is a character in Crabbe's "Borough."

Clelie. A character in Madame Scudery's romance so called. This novel is a type of the buckram formality of Louis XIV. It is full of high-flown compliments, theatrical poses, and cut and dry sentiments.

Clement (St.). Patron saint of tanners, being himself a tanner. His symbol is a pot, because the 23rd of November, St. Clement's Day, is the day on which the early Danes used to go about begging for ale.

Clementina (The Lady). In love with Sir Charles Grandison, who marries Harriet Byron.—Richardson, "Sir Charles Grandison."

Clen'cher. I have given him a clencher. (See CLINCH.)

Cleom'brotos (4 syl.). A philosopher who so admired Plato's "Phædon" that he jumped into the sea in order to exchange this life for a better. He was called Ambraci'ota of Ambra'cia, from the place of his birth.

He who to enjoy
Plato's elysium, leaped into the sea,
Cleombrotus.

"Paradise Lost," iii.

Cleon. The personification of glory in Spenser's "Faëry Queen."

Cleopa'tra and her Pearl. It is said that Cleopatra made a banquet for Antony, the costliness of which excited his astonishment; and when Antony expressed his surprise, Cleopatra took a pearl ear-drop, which she dissolved in a strong acid, and drank to the health of the Roman triumvirate, saying, "My draught to Anthony shall far exceed it." There are two difficulties in this anecdote—the first is, that vinegar would not dissolve a pearl; and the next is, that any stronger acid would be wholly unfit to drink. Probably the solution is this: the pearl was sold to some merchant whose name was synonymous with a strong acid, and the money given to Antony as a present by the fond queen. The pearl melted, and Cleopatra drank to the health of Antony as she handed him the money.

Clergy. The men of God's lot or inheritance. In St. Peter's first epistle, v. 3, the church is called "God's heritage" or lot. In the Old Testament the tribe of Levi is called the "lot or heritage of the Lord." (Greek, cleros; Latin, clerus and clericus, whence Norman clerex and clerkus; French, clergé.)

Benefit of Clergy. (See BENEFIT.)

Cler'gymen. The dislike of sailors to clergymen on board ship arises from an association with the history of Jonah. Sailors call them a kittle cargo, or kitchish cargo, meaning dangerous. Probably the disastrous voyage of St. Paul confirms the prejudice.

Clerical Titles.

(1) PARSON. The person who in parish suits represents the parish. (Latin, pers'ona.)

A good man was ther of religioun,
And was a pore' person of a toun.
Chaucer, "Int. of Canterbury Tales."

(2) CLERK. As in ancient times the clergyman was about the only person who could write and read, the word clerical, as "clerical error," came to signify an error in spelling. As the respondent in church was able to read, he received the name of clerk; and the assistants in writing, &c., are so termed in business. (Latin, clericus, a clergyman.)

(3) CURATE. One who has the cure of souls. As the cure of the parish used to be virtually entrusted to the clerical stipendiary, the word curate was appropriated to this assistant.

(4) RECTOR. One who has the parsonage and the tithes. The man who rules or guides the parish. (Latin, "a ruler.")

(5) VICAR. One who does the "duty" of a parish for the person who receives the tithes—generally a layman, and therefore not qualified to officiate. (Latin, vicarius, a deputy.)

(6) INCUMBENT. Applied to a clergyman who both resides on his benefice and takes at least a share in the clerical duties. (Latin, "one wholly devoted to his office.")

Clerical Vestments.

(1) White. Emblem of purity, worn on all feasts, saints' days, and sacramental occasions.

(2) Red. The colour of blood and of fire, worn on the days of martyrs, and on Whit-Sunday, when the Holy Ghost came down like tongues of fire.

(3) Green. Worn only on days which are neither feasts nor fasts.

(4) Purple. The colour of mourning, worn on Advent Sundays, in Lent, and on Ember days.

(5) Black. Worn on Good Friday, and when masses are said for the dead.

Oakeley, "On the Mass."

Cler'imond. Nieco of the Green Knight (q.v.), bride of Valentine the brave, and sister of Fer'ragus the giant.—Valentine and Orson.

Clerk. A scholar. Hence beau-clerc.
(See CLERICAL TITLES.)

All the clerks,
I mean the learned ones, in Christian kingdoms
Have their free voices.
Shakespeare, "Henry VIII.," ii. 2.

St. Nicholas's Clerks. Thieves. An equivoque on the word Nick.

I think there come prancing down the hill a couple of St. Nicholas's clerks.

Rowley, "Match at Midnight," 1633.

Clerk-ale and Church-ale. Mr.
Douce says the word "ale" is used in such composite words as bride-ale, clerk-ale, church-ale, lamb-ale, Midsummer-ale, Scot-ale, Whitsun-ale, &c.; for revel or feast, ale being the chief liquor given.

The multitude call (Church-ale Sunday) their reveling day, which day is spent in bulbeatings, bearbeating, . . . dicing, . . . and drunkenness.—W. Keble, 1570.

Clerkly. Cleverly; like a scholar.

I thank you, gentle servant: 'tis very clerkly done.
Shakespeare, "Two Gentlemen of Verona," ii. 1.

Clifford (Paul). A highwayman, reformed by the power of love, in Sir L.
Bulwer Lytton's novel so called.

Climac'teric. It was once believed that 7 and 9, with their multiples, were critical points in life; and 63, which is produced by multiplying 7 and 9 together, was termed the Grand Climacteric, which few persons succeeded in outliving.

There are two years, the seventh and the ninth, that commonly bring great changes in a man's life, and great dangers; wherefore 63, that contains both these numbers multiplied together, comes not without heaps of dangers.—Levinus Lemnius.

Climacteric Years are 7th and 9th, with their multiples by the odd numbers 3, 5, 7, 9—viz., 7, 9, 21, 27, 35, 45, 63, and 81, over which astrologers supposed Saturn, the malevolent planet, presided. (See NINE.)

Climax means a stair (Greek), applied to the last of a gradation of arguments, each of which is stronger than the preceding. The last of a gradation of words of a similar character is also called a climax.

Clinch. To bend the point of a nail after it is driven home. The word is sometimes written clench, from the French clenche, the lift of a latch. (Dutch, klinken, to rivet.)

That was a clencher. That argument was not to be gainsaid; that remark drove the matter home, and fixed it "as a nail in a sure place."

A lie is called a clencher or clinch from the tale about two swaggerers, one of whom said, "He drove a nail right through the moon." "Yes," said the other, "I remember it well, for I went the other side and clenched it." The French say, Je lui ai bien rivé son clou (I have clinched his nail for him).

Clin'ker (Humphrey). Hero of Smol-lett's novel so called. The general scheme of "Oliver Twist" resembles it. Humphrey is a workhouse boy, put out apprentice; but, being afterwards reduced to great want, he attracts the notice of Mr. Bramble, who takes him into his service, and in due time the parish apprentice marries the daughter of his patron.

Clio was one of the nine Muses, the inventress of historical and heroic poetry.

Clio. Addison is so called because his papers in the "Spectator" are signed by one of the four letters in this word, probably the initial letters of Chelsea, London, Islington, Office. (See NOTA-RICA.)

Cli'quot (of Punch celebrity). A nickname of Frederick William IV. of Prussia; so called from his fondness of champagne. (1795, 1840-1861.)

Cloaci'na. Goddess of sewers. (Latin, clod'ca, a sewer.)

Then Cloacina, goddess of the tide,
Whose sable streams beneath the city glide,
Indulged the modish flame; the town she roved,
A mortal scavenger she saw, she loved.
Gay, "Trivia," ii.

Clock. So church bells were once called. (German, clocke; French, cloche; Medieval Latin, cloca.)

Clock. The tale about St. Paul's clock striking thirteen is given in Walcott's "Memorials of Westminster," and refers to John Hatfield, who died 1770, aged 102. He was a soldier in the reign of William III., and was brought before a court-martial for falling asleep on duty upon Windsor terrace. In proof of his innocence he asserted that he heard St.
Paul's clock strike thirteen, which statement was confirmed by several witnesses.

Clod-hopper. A farmer, who hops or walks amongst the clods. The cavalry call the infantry clodhoppers, because they have to walk instead of riding horseback.

Clog Almanac. A primitive almanac or calendar, called in Scandinavia a Runic staff, from the Runic characters used in its numerical notation.

Cloister. He retired into a cloister, a monastery. Almost all monasteries used to have a cloister or covered walk, which generally occupied the four sides of a quadrangle.

Clootie. Auld Clootie. Old Nick. The Scotch call a cloven hoof a cloot, so that Auld Clootie is Old Cloven-foot.

Clorida'no (in "Orlando Furioso"). A humble Moorish youth, who joins Medo'ro in seeking the body of king Dardinello to bury it. Medo'ro being wounded, Cloridano rushed madly into the ranks of the enemy and was slain.

Clorin'da (in "Jerusalem Delivered"). A female knight who came from Persia to oppose the Crusaders, and was appointed by Al'adine leader of all the Pagan forces. Tancred fell in love with her; but not knowing her in a night attack, slew her after a most dreadful combat. Before she died she received Christian baptism at the hands of Tancred, who mourned her death with great sorrow of heart.—Bk. xii.

Sena'pus of Ethiopia (a Christian) was her father, but her being born white alarmed her mother, who changed her babe for a black child. Arsetës, the eunuch, was entrusted with the infant Clorinda, and as he was going through a forest he saw a tiger, dropped the child, and sought safety in a tree. The tiger took the babe and suckled it, after which Arsetës left Ethiopia with the child for Egypt.

Clo'ten. A vindictive lout who wore his dagger in his mouth. He fell in love with Im'ogen, but his love was not reciprocated.—Shakespeare, "Cymbeline."

Cloth (The). The clergy; thus we talk of "having respect for the cloth." Formerly the clergy used to wear a distinguishing costume, made of grey or black cloth, by which they might be recognised.

Clotha'rius or Clothaire (in "Jerusalem Delivered"). At the death of Hugo he takes the lead of the Franks, but is shot by Clorinda with an arrow (bk. xi). After his death, his troops sneak away and leave the Christian army (bk. xiii.).

Cloud (St.). Patron saint of nail-smiths, by a play upon the French word clou, a nail.

He is under a cloud. Under suspicion, in disrepute.

To blow a cloud is to smoke a cigar or pipe.

Cloven Foot. To show the cloven foot—i.e., to show a knavish intention; a base motive. The allusion is to Satan, represented with the legs and feet of a goat; and, however he might disguise himself, he could never conceal his cloven feet. (See BAG O' NAILS, GOAT.)

Real grief little influenced its composition, and the cloven foot peeps out in some letters written by him at the period.—St. James's Magazine.

Clover. He's in clover. In luck, in prosperous circumstances, in a good situation. The allusion is to cattle sent to feed in clover fields.

Clowns. The three most celebrated are Joseph Grimaldi (1779-1837), the French Carlin (1713-1783), and Richard Tarlton, in the days of queen Elizabeth, who acted at the galleried inn called the "Belle Sauvage."

To sit with Tarlton on an alehouse signe,
Bishop Hall, "Satires."

Club. A society of persons who club together, or form themselves into a knot or lump. (Welsh, clopa and clob; German, klöppel; Danish, klubbe, &c.)

Club-bearer (The). Periphe'tës, the robber of Ar'golus, so called because he murdered his victims with an iron club.

Club-law. The law of might or compulsion through fear of chastisement.

Clue. I have not yet got the clue; to give a clue—i.e., a hint. A clue is a ball of thread (Saxon, cleow). The only mode of finding the way out of the Cretan labyrinth was by a skein of thread, which, being laid along the proper route, indicated the right path.

Clu'ricaune (3 syl.). An elf of evil disposition who usually appears as a wrinkled old man, and has knowledge of hid treasures. (Irish mythology.)

Clym of the Clough with Adam Bell and William of Cloudesly were noted outlaws, whoso skill in archery rendered them as famous in the north of England as Robin Hood and Little John in the midland counties. Their place of resort was in Englewood Forest, near Carlisle. N.B.—Englewood means firewood. Clym of the Clough means Clement of the Cliff.

Clytie (3 syl.). A water-nymph, in love with Apollo. Meeting with no return, she was changed into a sunflower, which still turns to the sun, following him through his daily course.

Cneph. The name under which the Egyptians adore the Creator of the world.

Co. A contraction of company; as Smith and Co.

Coach (A). A private tutor. To be coached up: to be taught by a private tutor for examination. The term is a pun on getting on fast. To get on fast you take a coach; you cannot get on fast without a private tutor—ergo, a private tutor is the coach you take in order that you may get on quickly. (University slang.)

To dine in the coach. In the captain's private room. The coach or couch of a ship is a small apartment near the stern, the floor being formed of the aft-most part of the quarter-deck, and the roof by the poop.

Coach Away. Get on. Properly, drive your coach off.

Coal. Hot as a coal. A corruption of the French "caile" (Chaud comme un caile, hot as a quail). The quail is remarkable for its hot temperament and its amorous tendencies. The expression has now a more obvious allusion, but was in use before the employment of coals for domestic purposes.

Coals. To haul over the coals. To bring to task for short-comings; to scold. At one time the Jews were "bled" whenever the kings or barons wanted money; and one very common torture, if they resisted, was to haul them over the coals of a slow fire, to give them a "roasting." (See "Ivanhoe," where Front-de-Bœuf threatens to haul Isaac over the coals.)

Coals. "Gregory, o' my word, we'll not carry coals"—i.e., submit to be "put upon" ("Roméo and Juliet," i. 1). So in "Every Man out of his Humour,"

"Here comes one that will carry coals, ergo, will hold my dog." The allusion is to the dirty, laborious occupation of coal-carriers. Gifford, in his edition of Ben Jonson, says, "Of these (i.e., scullions, &c.), the most forlorn wretches were selected to carry coals to the kitchen, halls, &c." (See BLACKGUARD.)

To carry coals to Newcastle. To do what is superfluous. As Newcastle is the great coal-field, it would be quite superfluous to carry coals thither. The French say, Porter de l'eau à la rivière (to carry water to the river). The Latin equivalent is "To carry wood to the forests."

Coal Brandy. Burnt brandy. The ancient way to set brandy on fire was to drop in it a live or red-hot coal.

Coalition Government. A government formed by various parties, by a mutual surrender of principles. The administration of lord North and Charles Fox, 1783, was a coalition, but it fell to pieces in a few months.

Coast Men of Attica. The merchant class who lived along the coast-lands (Parali).

Coat. Turning one's coat for luck. It was an ancient superstition that this was a charm against evil spirits. (See TURN-COAT.)

William found
A means for our deliverance: "Turn your cloaks," Quoth hee, "for Pucke is busy in these oakes."
Bishop Corbett, "Iter Boreale."

Coat of Arms. A surcoat worn by knights over their armour, decorated with devices by which heralds described the wearer. Hence the heraldic device of a family. Coat-armour was invented in the Crusading expeditions, to distinguish the various noble warriors when wrapped in complete steel, and it was introduced into England by Richard Lion-heart.

Cobalt. From the German Kobold (a gnome). The demon of mines. This metal was so called by miners, because it was long thought to be useless and troublesome. It was consequently attributed to the ill offices of the mine demon.

Cobbler. Let not the cobbler overstep his last (Ne sutor supra crepidam). Let no one presume to interfere in matters of which he is ignorant. The tale goes that a cobbler detected a fault in the shoe-latchet of one of Apelles' paintings, and the artist rectified the fault. The cobbler, thinking himself very wise, next ventured to criticise the legs; but Apelles answered, "Keep to your trade"—you understand about shoes, but not about anatomy.

Cob'ham, referred to by Thomson in his "Autumn," was Sir Richard Temple, created lord Cobham in 1714.

Cob-nut. A nut with a tuft. (Welsh, cob or cop, a tuft; German, kopf, the head.)

Cob'web. Cob, Teutonic for "spider." Dutch, spinnekop; Saxon, atter-cop (poisoned spider); Chaldee, kopi (spider's web).

Cock. Mahomet found in the first heaven a cock of such enormous size, that its crest touched the second heaven. The crowing of this celestial bird arouses every living creature from sleep except man. The Moslem doctors say that Allah lends a willing ear to him who reads the Koran, to him who prays for pardon, and to the cock whose chant is divine melody. When this cock ceases to crow, the day of judgment will be at hand.

Cock. Dedicated to Apollo, the sun-god, because it gives notice of the rising of the sun. It was dedicated to Mercury, because it summons men to business by its crowing.

A cock on church spires is to remind men not to deny their Lord, as Peter did, but when the cock crew he "went out and wept bitterly." Peter Le Neve affirms that a cock was the warlike ensign of the Goths, and therefore used in Gothic churches for ornament.

By cock and pie, sir, you shall not away to-night ("2 Henry IV.," v. 1). We meet with cock's bones, cock's wounds, cock's mother, cock's body, cock's passion, &c., where we can have no doubt that the word is a minced oath, and stands for the sacred name which should never be taken in vain. The Pie is the table or rule in the old Roman offices, showing how to find out the service for each day, called by the Greeks pinax (an index). The latter part of the oath is equivalent to "the Mass book."

Cock of the North. The duke of Gordon. So called on a monument erected to his honour at Fochabers, in Aberdeenshire. (Died 1836.)

Cocks. The French are so called from a pun made in the reign of Nero, against whom the Gauls, under Julius Vindex, conspired. It was wittily said that the emperor would be disturbed by the crowing of a Gallus (Gaul or cock). The pleasantry took, and, as there were certain marks of resemblance between the two, the nickname became perpetuated.

Cock of the Walk. The dominant bully or master spirit. The place where barn-door fowls are fed is called the walk, and if there is more than one cock they will fight for the supremacy of this domain.

Cock and Bottle. A public-house sign, meaning draught and bottled ale may be had on the premises. The "cock" here means the tap. It does not mean "The Cork and Bottle."

Cock and Bull Story. A corruption of a concocted and bully story. The catch-pennies hawked about the streets are still called cocks—i.e., concocted things. Bully is the Danish bullen (exaggerated), our bull-rush (an exaggerated rush), bull-frog, &c.

Another etymology may be suggested: The idol Nergal was the most common idol of the ancient Phœnicians, Indians, and Persians, and Nergal means a dunghill cock. The Egyptian bull is equally notorious under the name of Osiris. A cock-and-bull story may therefore mean a myth, in reference to the mythological fables of Nergal and Osiris. A third suggestion refers to fables, where dumb animals are made to speak and act like human beings. The French equivalents are faire un coq et l'âne and un conte de ma mère l'oie (a mother goose tale.)

Cock a-hoop or Cock a-houp. To sit cock a-houp. Boastful, defiant, like a game-cock with his houpe or crest erect. (French, coq à huppe.)

And having routed a whole troop,

With victory was cock-a-hoop.

Butler, "Hudibras," i. 3.

Cock Boat or Cockle Boat. A small boat made of a wicker frame, and covered with leather or oil-cloth. The Welsh fishers used to carry them on their backs. (Welsh, curregle, a coracle; French, coche, a passage boat; Irish, coca; Italian, cocca; Latin, cockleu; Greek, cocklos, a cockle.)

Cock-crow. The Hebrews divided the night into four watches: 1, The "beginning of the watches" or "even" (Lam. ii. 19); 2, "The middle watch" or "midnight" (Judg. vii. 19); 3, "The cock-crowing;" 4, "The morning watch" or "dawning" (Exod. xiv. 24).

Ye know not when the master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning.—Mark xiii. 35.

Apparitions vanish at cock-crow. This is a Christian superstition, the cock being the watch-bird placed on church spires, and therefore sacred.

The morning cock crew loud,
And at the sound it (the Ghost) shrunk in haste away,
And vanished from our sight.

Shakespeare, "Hamlet," i. 2.

Cock-fighting was introduced into Britain by the Romans. It was a favourite sport both with the Greeks and Romans.

Cock Lane Ghost. A tale of terror without truth; an imaginary tale of horrors. In Cock Lane, Stockwell (1762), certain knockings were heard, which Mr. Parsons, the owner, declared proceeded from the ghost of Mrs. Kent, who (he wished people to suppose) had been murdered by her husband. All London was agog with this story; but it was found out that the knockings were produced by a girl employed by Parsons, and were made by rapping on a board which she took into her bed. Parsons was condemned to stand in the pillory. (See STOCKWELL GHOST.)

Cock-pit. The judicial committee of the privy council is so called, because the council-room is built on the old cock-pit of Whitehall palace.

Great consultations at the cockpit about battles, duels, victories, and what not.—Poor Robin's Almanack, 1730.

Cock Sure is cocky sure—pertly confident. We call a self-confident, overbearing prig a cocky fellow, from the barnyard despot; but Shakespeare employs the phrase in the sense of "sure as the cock of a firelock."

We steal as in a castle, cock-sure.
Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV," ii. 1.

Cockade. The men-servants of the military wear a small black cockade on their hat, the Hanoverian badge. The Stuart cockade was white. At the battle of Sherra-Muir, in the reign of George I., the English soldiers wore a black rosette in their hats. In the song of Sherra-

Muir, the English soldiers are called "the red-coat lads wi' black cockades."

The word cockade is the "aid of the cock," the thing that helps to cock the military hat. Subsequently, loops, laces, and ribbons were used for the purpose as well as rosettes.

Black enters into all the German cockades: thus the Austrian is black and yellow; the Prussian black and white; the Hanoverian all black; the Belgian black, yellow, and red. The French before the revolution was white.

To mount the cockade. To become a soldier. From time immemorial the partisans of different leaders have adopted some emblem to show their party; in 1767 an authoritative regulation determined that every French soldier should wear a white cockade, and in 1782 the badge was restricted to the military. The phrase given above is common both to England and France.

Cockaigne (Land of). An imaginary land of idleness and luxury. The subject of a burlesque, probably "the earliest specimen of English poetry which we possess." London is generally so called, but Boileau applies the phrase to Paris. (See COCKNEY.)

Cockatrice (3 syl.). A monster with the wings of a fowl, tail of a dragon, and head of a cock. So called because it was said to be produced from a cock's egg hatched by a serpent. According to legend, the very look of this monster would cause instant death. In consequence of the crest with which the head is crowned, the creature is called a basilisk, from the Greek basiliskos (king of animals). Isaiah says, "The weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice' den" (xi. 8), to signify that the most noxious animal should not hurt the most feeble of God's creatures.

Figuratively, it means an insidious, treacherous person, bent on mischief.

They will kill one another by the look, like cockatrices.
Shakespeare, "Twelfth Night," iii. 4.

Cock'er. According to Cocker. All right according to Cocker. Cocker published an arithmetic in the reign of Charles II., which was very popular. The phrase was popularised by Murphy in his farce called "The Apprentice."

Cockles. To cry cockles. To be hanged; from the gurgling noise made in strangulation.

Cockle Hat. A pilgrim's hat. Warburton says, as the chief places of devotion were beyond sea, or on the coasts, pilgrims used to put cockle-shells upon their hats, to indicate that they were pilgrims. Cockles are symbols of St. James, patron saint of Spain.

And how shall I your true love know
From many another one?
Oh, by his cockle hat and staff,
And by his sandal shoon.

Beaumont and Fletcher, "The Friar of Orders Grey."

Cockle Shells. Favourite tokens worn by pilgrims in their hats. The polished side of the shell was scratched with some rude drawing of the "blessed Virgin," the crucifixion, or some other subject connected with the pilgrimage. Being blessed by the priest, they were considered amulets against spiritual foes.

Cockney. A Londoner. Camden says the Thames was once called the Cockney, and therefore a Cockney means simply one who lives on the banks of the Thames. (Saxon, coc, "anything that shoots out," a "spout," and ea or ey, "running water.")

Wedgwood suggests cocker (to fondle), and says a cockerney or cockney is one pampered by city indulgence, in contradistinction to rustics hardened by outdoor work. (Dutch, kokeln, to pamper; French, coquetiner, to dangle.)

Chambers, in his "Journal," derives the word from a French poem of the thirteenth century, called "The Land of Cockaigne," where the houses were made of barley-sugar and cakes, the streets paved with pastry, and the shops supplied goods without requiring money in payment. The French, at a very early period, called the English cockaigne men—i.e., bons-vivants (beef and pudding men).

Cry to it, nuncle, as the cockney said to the eels, when she put them into the paste alive.
Shakespeare, "Lear," ii. 4.

Cockney School. Leigh Hunt, Hazlitt, Shelley, and Keats; so called by Lockhart, 1817.

If I may be permitted to have the honour of christening it, it may henceforth be referred to by the designation of the "Cockney School."—Z., "Blackwood's Magazine," Oct., 1817.

Cockswain. The swain or servant of the cock or boat, together with its crew. (Saxon, swan or swein, a youth or servant, and cock, a boat. (See COCK-BOAT.)

Cocytus (Ko-ky'-tus). One of the five rivers of hell. The word means the "river of lamentation. (Greek, kōku'ō, to weep.)

Cocytus, named of lamentation loud
Heard on the rueful stream.
Milton, "Paradise Lost," ii.

Codds. Codgers. Thackeray says, "The Cistercian lads call the poor brethren of the Charter-house codds," adding, "but I know not wherefore." They are cotiers or codgers, who live in alms-cots. We still have the words cotes and dove-cotes. "Cotter" is the Norman cotier, a word which occurs hundreds of times in Domesday Book, but is spelt in three or four different ways.

Coe'horns. Small howitzers of about $4\frac{3}{4}$ inches calibre; so called from baron van Coe'horn, of Holland.

Cœ'nobites (3 syl.). Monks who live in common, in contradistinction to the hermits or anchorites. (Greek, koinos-bios.)

Cœur de Lion.

Richard I. of England; so called from the prodigies of personal valour performed by him in the Holy Land. (1157, 1189-1199.)

Louis VIII. of France, more frequently called le Lion. (1187, 1223-1226.)

Bolaslas I. of Poland, also called "The Intrepid." (992-1025.)

Coffee. The Turkish word is Kauhi.

Coffee. In Ardennes ten cups of coffee are taken after dinner, and each cup has its special name. (1) Café, (2) Gloria, (3) Pousse Café, (4) Goutte, (5) Re-goutte, (6) Sur-goutte, (7) Rincette, (8) Re-rincette, (9) Sur-rincette, and (10) Cory de l'étrier.

Gloria is coffee with a small glass of brandy in lieu of milk; all the following have more and more l'eau de vie; and the last is the "stirrup-cup."

Coffin. A raised crust, like the lid of a basket. Hence Shakespeare speaks of a "custard coffin" ("Taming of the Shrew," iv. 3). (Greek, koph'inos, a basket.) (See MAHOMET'S COFFIN.)

Of the paste a coffin will I rear.
Shakespeare, "Titus Andronicus," v. 2.

Cog'geshall. A Coggeshall job. The saying is, that the Coggeshall folk wanted to divert the current of a stream, and fixed hurdles in the bed of it for the purpose. Another tale is that a mad dog bit a wheelbarrow, and the people, fearing it would go mad, chained it up in a shed. (See GOTHAM.)

Cogno'scente (4 syl.). Plural, cognoscenti (Italian). A knowing one, a walking cyclopædia.

Coif (1 syl.). The coif of the serjeant-at-law is a relic of his ecclesiastical character. The original serjeants-at-law were clerical lawyers, and the coif is the representation of the tonsure.

Serjeants of the Coif. Serjeants-at-law. (See above.)

Coiffe. Il est né coiffé. He is born with a silver spoon in his mouth; born to fortune.

Quelques enfans viennent au monde avec une pellicule que l'on appelle du nom de coiffe; et que l'on croit estre une marque de bonheur. Ce qui a donné lieu au proverbe François. Il est né coiffé. — Traité des Superst., 1679.

Coins (Anglo-Saxon).

The most ancient is the little silver scatta; next the penny, also of silver, the chief coin of the Heptarchy, with its half and quarter (halfpenny and farthing). Those of Offa, king of Mercia, are the best.

Coke. To cry coke. To cry pecca'vi: to ask for mercy. Ruddiman says "coke" is the sound which cocks utter when they are beaten.

Col'bronde or Colbrand. The Danish giant slain by Sir Guy of Warwick. By the death of this giant the land was delivered from Danish tribute.

I am not Samson, nor Sir Guy, nor Colbrand, to mow 'em down before me.

Shakespeare, "Henry VIII.," v. 4.

Cold Blood. A cold-blooded murder is one committed without provocation, or after ill-temper has had time to subside. In rage the blood is said to boil, and the roused blood gives a red tinge to the head, hands, &c.

As a rule, all invertebrate animals, and all fishes and reptiles, are called cold-blooded, because the temperature of their blood never exceeds 90° Fah.

We also call insensible persons cold-blooded, because their passions cannot be excited.

Cold Drawn Oil. Castor oil, obtained by pressure in the cold.

Cold Shoulder. To show (or) give one the cold shoulder, is to assume a distant manner towards a person, to indicate that you wish to cut his acquaintance. The reference is to a cold shoulder of mutton served to a stranger at dinner; there is not much of it, and even what is left is but moderate fare.

Cold Steel. The persuasion of cold steel is persuasion enforced at the point of the sword or bayonet.

Cold Water Ordeal. An ancient method of testing the guilt or innocence of the common sort of people. The accused, being tied under the arms, was thrown into a river. If he sank to the bottom, he was held to be guiltless, and drawn up by the cord; but if he floated, the water rejected him, because of his guilt.

Cold Without. An elliptical expression, meaning spirits mixed with cold water without sugar.

Coldbrand. (See COLBRONDE.)

Coldstream Guards. So called because the regiment was first raised at Coldstream, in Berwickshire, by General Monk, in 1660, with the object of bringing back Charles II. to the throne.

Cole (King). A legendary British king, described as "a merry old soul," fond of his pipe, fond of his glass, and fond of his "fiddlers three."

Colem'ra (3 syl.). A poetical name for a cook; being, of course, compounded of coal and mire.

"Could I," he cried, "express how bright a grace Adorns thy morning hands and well-washed face, Thou wouldst, Colem'ra, grant what I implore, And yield me love, or wash thy face no more."
Shenstone, "Colem'ra, an Eclogue."

Colin Clout. A name which Spenser assumes in "The Shepherd's Calendar," and in the pastoral entitled "Colin Clout's come Home again," which represents his return from a visit to Sir Walter Raleigh, "the Shepherd of the Ocean."

Colin Tampon. The nickname of a Swiss, as John Bull is of an Englishman, Brother Jonathan of a North American, and Monsieur Crapaud of a Frenchman.

College Port. The worst species of red wine that can be manufactured, and palmed off upon young men at college. It is chiefly made from potatoes, sloes, and logwood. (See WIDOWS' PORT.)

We all know what college port is like. — The Times.

Collapse. The scheme collapsed. Came to nothing. An inflated balloon is said to collapse when the gas has escaped and the sides fall together, or pucker into wrinkles. As a collapsed balloon will not mount, a collapsed scheme will not go off.

Collar. To collar one is to seize one by the collar.

Out of collar. Out of work, out of place. The allusion is to a horse, which has a collar on when put to work.

Col'liberts. A sort of gipsy race in Poitou, Maine, and Anjou, similar to the Cagots of Gascony and the Caqueux of Brittany.

Collu'thians. A religious sect which rose in the fourth century; so called from Collu'thos of Alexandria, their founder.

Colly my Cow. A corruption of Calainos, the most ancient of Spanish ballads. Calainos the Moor asked a damsel to wife, who said the price of winning her should be the heads of the three paladins of Charlemagne, named Rinaldo, Roland, and Olivier. Calainos went to Paris, and challenged the paladins. First Sir Baldwin, the youngest knight, accepted the challenge, and was overthrown; then his uncle Roland went against the Moor, and smote him.

Collyrid'ians. A sect of Arabian Christians, chiefly women, which first appeared in 373. They worshipped the Virgin Mary, and made offerings to her in a twisted cake, called a collyris. (Greek, kollura, a little cake.)

Cologne. The three kings of Cologne. The three magi, called Gaspar, Melchior, and Balthazar. They are called by other names, but those given are the most generally accepted.

Colon. One of the rabble leaders in "Hudibras" was Noel Perryan or Ned Perry, an ostler, who loved bear-baiting, but was a very strait-laced Puritan, of low morals.

Col'ophon. The end of a book. Col'ophon was a city of Io'nia, the inhabitants of which were such excellent horsemen, that they would turn the scale of battle to the side on which they fought; hence the Greek phrase, To add a colopho'nian, means "to put a finishing stroke to any matter." In the early times of printing, the statement containing the date, place, printer, and edition was given at the end of the book, and was called the colophon.

The volume was uninjured . . . from title-page to colophon.—Scott, "The Antiquary."

Coloquin'tida. Bitter-apple or colocynth. (Greek, kolokunthis.)

The food that to him now is luscious as locusts, shall be to him shortly as bitter as coloquintida. Shakespeare, "Othello," i. 3.

Colossal. Gigantic. As a colossal scheme. (See below.)

Colossos (Latin, colossus). A giant. The Rhodian Colossos was a gigantic statue of brass, 126 feet high, executed by Charès. It is said that ships could pass full sail under the legs of this statue, but the notion of a striding statue rose in the sixteenth century, and is due to Blaise de Vigenère, who was the first to give the chef d'œuvre of Charès this impossible position. The comte de Caylus has demonstrated that the Apollo of Rhodes was never planted at the mouth of the Rhodian port, that it was not a striding statue, and that ships never passed under it. Neither Strabo nor Pliny makes mention of any of these things, though both describe the gigantic statue minutely. Philo (the architect of Byzantium, third century) has a treatise on the seven wonders of the world, and says that the Colossos stood on a block of white marble, and Lucius Ampellius, in a similar treatise, says it stood in a car. Tickell outherods Herod in the following lines:—

So, near proud Rhodes, across the raging flood,
Stupendous form! the vast Colossus stood,
While at one foot the thronging galleys ride,
A whole hour's sail scarce reached the further side;
Betwixt his brazen thighs, in loose array,
Ten thousand streamers on the billows play.
On the Prospect of Peace.

He doth bestride the narrow world like a Colossus.
Shakespeare, "Julius Cæsar," i. 2.

Colour. The symbolism of colour—

Black and brown, death and sorrow.
Green, fickleness.
Blue, constancy.
White, purity.
Yellow, jealousy.
Purple, royalty.

In railway symbols, red signifies danger or stop, green caution, and white clear or safe.

Colours. National colours—

Great Britain	Red and blue.
American, U.S.	Stars on blue, white with red stripes.
Austria	Red and white.
Bavaria	White, bordered with blue.
Denmark	Red.
France	Blue, white, and red.
Netherlands ..	Red, white, and blue.
Portugal	White, bordered with red.
Prussia	White, bordered with red.
Russia	Yellow.
Spain	Red and white.
Sweden	Blue, bordered with yellow.
Switzerland ..	Red.

Colporteur'. A hawker or pedlar; so called because he carries his basket or pack round his neck. The term is more especially applied to hawkers of books. (Latin, collum, the neck; porto, to carry.)

Colt (To). To befool, to gull. (Italian, colto, from the verb coglie'rè, to catch; our cog, to cheat.)

Colt's Foot (Tussilago far'fara) is "calt's futter" or "cold's food"—i.e., food for colds and coughs. The Latin word tussilago is tussis, a cough; and lag'anum, a sort of lozenge.

Colt's Revolver. A rifle to which a revolving chamber pierced with five or more barrels is attached, each of which is brought in rotation to the orifice of the rifle by the motion of the trigger. This instrument was patented by colonel Samuel Colt, U.S., in 1835.

Colts-tooth. The love of youthful pleasure. A corruption of Chaucer's word "coltish" (skittishness).

Her merry dancing-days are done;
She has a colt's-tooth still, I warrant.
King, "Orpheus and Eurydice."

Well said, Lord Sands;
Your colt's-tooth is not cast yet.
Shakespeare, "Henry VIII.," 1. 3.

Col'umbine (3 syl.). The wife of Harlequin, and, like him, supposed to be invisible to mortal eyes. Columbi'na in Italian is a pet name for a lady-love, and means a little dove, a young coquette.

Columbus. His signature was—

S.	i.e.	Servidor
S. A. S.		Sus Altezas Sacras
X. M. Y.		Jesus Maria Isabel
Xpo. FERENS		Christo-pher
El Almirante		El Almirante.

In English, "Servant—of their Sacred Highnesses—Jesus Mary and Isabella—Christopher—the Admiral."—Capt. Becker.

Co'ma Bereni'ces (4 syl.). Bereni'cū, daughter of Magas, king of Cyre'nū, and wife of Ptolemy IV. She dedicated her beautiful hair for her husband's safe return from his Syrian expedition. This hair was made one of the constellations. (See BELINDA.)

Com'azants, called St. Elmo fires by the French, Castor and Pollux by the Romans. A celestial light seen occasionally to play round mast-heads, &c. (Latin, co'ma, hair.)

Comb. Reynard's wonderful comb. This comb existed only in the brain of Master Fox. He said it was made of the Pan'thera's bone, the perfume of which was so fragrant that no one could resist following it; and the wearer of the comb was always cheerful and merry.—"Reynard the Fox," ch. xii.

To comb your noddle with a three-legged stool ("Taming of the Shrew," i. 1), is to beat you about the head with a stool. Many stools, such as those used by milkmaids, are still made with three legs; and these handy weapons seem to have been used at one time pretty freely, especially by angry women.

Come and take them. The reply of Leon'idas, king of Sparta, to the messengers sent by Xerxes to Thermop'ylæ. Xerxes said, "Go, and tell those madmen to deliver up their arms." Leonidas replied, "Go, and tell Xerxes to come and take them."

Come Ather (pron. ar-ther) means, when addressed to horses, "come hither"—i.e., to the left, the side on which the teamsman walks. (See WOO'ISH.)

Come it Strong. Lay it on thick; exaggerate as much as you like. It is a musical expression: the leader tells the violin-players to come it strong—i.e., to play loud or fortè; to exaggerate the notes as much as possible. (See DRAW IT MILD.)

Comedy means a village-song (Greek, komē-ōdē), referring to the village merry-makings, in which comic songs still take a conspicuous place. The Greeks had certain festal processions of great licentiousness, held in honour of Dionu'sos, in the suburbs of their cities, and termed ko'moi or village-revels. On these occasions an ode was generally sung, and this ode was the foundation of Greek comedy. (See TRAGEDY.)

The Father of Comedy. Aristoph'anes the Athenian. (B.C. 444-380.)

Comet Wine. A term of praise to signify wine of superior quality. A notion prevails that the grapes in comet years are better in flavour than in other years, either because the weather is warmer and ripens them better, or because the comets themselves exercise some chemical influence on them. Thus, wine of the years 1811, 1826, 1839, 1845, 1852, 1858, 1861, &c., have a repute.

The old gentleman yet nurses some few bottles of the famous comet year (i.e., 1811), emphatically called comet wine.—The Times.

Coming Round. He is coming round. Recovering from sickness, recovering from a fit of the sulks, returning to friendship. Death is the end of life, and therefore recovering from "sickness nigh unto death" is coming back to health, or coming round the corner.

Commen'dam. A living in commendam is a living held by a bishop till an incumbent is appointed. When a clergyman accepts a bishopric, he loses all his previous preferment; but in order that these livings may not be uncared for, they are commended by the crown to the care of the new bishop, till they can be properly transferred.

Commendation Ninepence. A bent silver ninepence, supposed to be lucky, and commonly used in the seventeenth century as love-tokens, the giver or sender using these words, "From my love, to my love." Sometimes the coin was broken, and each kept a part.

Like commendation ninepence, crooked.

With "To and from my love," it looked.

Butler, "Hudibras," i. l.

Pöbert. As this divides, thus are we torn in twain.

Kitty. And as this meets, thus may we meet again.

Gay, "What d'ye Call It?"

Committee. A committee of the whole house, in parliamentary language, is when the speaker leaves the chair, and all the members form a committee, where any one may speak once or more than once. In such cases the chair is occupied by the chairman of committees, elected with each new parliament.

A standing committee, in parliamentary language, is a committee which continues to the end of the current session. To this committee are referred all questions which fall within the scope of their appointment.

Common. To put one on short commons. To stint him, to give him scanty meals. In the University of Cambridge the food provided for each student at breakfast is called his commons; hence food in general or meals.

Common Sense does not mean that good sense which is common, or commonly needed in the ordinary affairs of life, but the sense which is common to all the five, or the point where the five senses meet, supposed to be the seat of the soul, where it judges what is presented by the senses, and decides the mode of action. (See SEVEN SENSES.)

Companion Ladder. The ladder leading from the "companion" to the cabin. The "companion" is the lid of the staircase, or the porch or penthouse which accompanies it.

Companions of Jehu. The Chouans were so called, from a fanciful analogy between their self-imposed task and that appointed to Jehu, on being set over the kingdom of Israel. Jehu was to cut off Ahab and Jez'ebel, with all their house, and all the priests of Baal. The Chouans were to cut off all who assassinated Louis XVI., and see that his brother (Jehu) was placed on the throne.

Comparisons are Odorous. So says Dogberry.—Much Ado about Nothing, iii. 4.

We own your verses are melodious,

But then comparisons are odious.

Swift, "Answer to Sheridan's 'Simile,'"

Complexion literally means "what embraces or contains," and the idea implies that the colour of the skin corresponds to the habit of body, and the habit of body answers to the element which predominates. If fire predominates, the person is bilious or full of bile; if air, he is sanguine or full of blood; if earth, the body is melancholic or full of black bile; if water, it is phlegmatic or full of phlegm. The first is hot and dry, the second hot and cold, the third cold and dry, and the last moist and cold like water.

'Tis ill, tho' different your complexions are (i.e., dispositions).

Dryden.

Cretans, thro' mere complexion lie.

Pitt, "Hymn of Callimachus,"

Com'pline (2 syl.). The last service of the day in the Roman Catholic Church. First appointed by the abbot Benedict in the sixth century. The word is a corruption of completeorium.

Com'rade (2 syl.). The name of Fortunio's fairy horse. It ate, but once a week; knew the past, present, and future; and spake with the voice of a man.—Grimm's Goblins, "Fortunio."

Comrades (2 syl.). Those who sleep in the same bed-chamber. It is a Spanish military term derived from the custom of dividing soldiers into chambers. The proper spelling is camerades, men of the same cam'era (chamber).

Comus. God of revelry. Milton represents him as a male Circe.

This nymph (Circe), that gazed upon his (Bacchus) clustering locks, . . .
Had by him, ere he parted thence, a son,
Much like his father, but his mother more.
Whom therefore she brought up, and Comus calleth.
Milton, "Comus."

Comus. The elder brother in this domestic drama is meant for lord viscount Brackley, eldest son of John, earl of Bridgewater, president of Wales. The younger brother is Mr. Thomas Egerton. The lady is lady Alice Egerton.—Milton.

Con Amore (Italian). With heart and soul; as, "He did it con amore," i.e., lovingly, with delight, and therefore in good earnest.

Con'an. The Thersy'tes of "Fingal;" brave even to rashness. He made a vow never to take a blow without returning it; and when he descended into the infernal regions, the arch-fiend gave him a cuff, which Conan instantly returned, saying, "Claw for claw."

"Blow for blow," as Conan said to the devil.—Scott, "Waverley," c. xxii.

Concert Pitch. The degree of sharpness or flatness adopted by a number of musicians acting in concert, that all the instruments may be in accord. Generally, a particular note is selected for the standard, as A or C; this note is put into the proper pitch, and all other notes are regulated by it.

Con'cierge (3 syl.). A door-porter. When Hugh Capet took up his abode in Paris, he added two large buildings to the palace—a prison and a stable. Over the former he placed a keeper, called the comte des Cierges; over the latter, an officer called the comte de l'Etable. Now, conciierge means a "door-porter," and conciergerie a "prison." The title comte de l'Etable became in time con'etable, and gave us our word "constable."

Conclave (2 syl.). A set of rooms, all of which are entered by one common key (Latin, con cla'vis). The word is applied to the little deal cells erected in some large apartment for the cardinals who meet to choose a new pope, because the long gallery of the Vatican between the cells and the windows of the palace is common ground to all the conclavists. The assembly itself is, by a figure of speech, also called a conclave.

Conclama'tio, amongst the ancient Romans, was similar to the Irish howl over the dead; and, as in Ireland, women led the funeral cortège, weeping ostentatiously and gesticulating. "One not howled over" (corpus nondum conclamatum) meant one at the point of death; and "one howled for" was one given up for dead or really deceased. Virgil tells us that the ululation was a Phœnician custom; and therefore he makes the palace ring with howls when Dido burnt herself to death.

Lamentis, gemituque, et femineo ululato.
Tecta fremunt. "Æneid," iv. 667.

Concord is Strength. The wise saw of Periander, "tyrant" of Corinth. (B.C. 665-585.)

Concor'dat. An agreement made between a ruler and the pope relative to the collation of benefices. As the Concordat of 1801 between Napoleon Bonaparte and pope Pius VII.; the Concordat of 1516 between François I. and pope Leo X. to abolish the "pragmatic sanction;" and the Germanic Concordat of 1448 between Frederick III. and pope Nicholas V.

Con'dign. Latin, condignus (well-worthy); as condign punishment—i.e., punishment well deserved.

In thy con'dign praise,
Shakespeare, "Love's Labour's Lost," i. 2.

Condottie'ri. Leaders of military adventurers in the fifteenth century. The most noted of these brigand leaders in Italy were Guarnie'ri, Lando, Frances'co of Carmagnola, and Francesco Sforza.

Giac'omo Sforza, son of Francesco, married the daughter of the duke of Milan, and succeeded his father-in-law.

Confed'erate States. The eleven states which revolted from the Union in the late American Civil War (1861-1866)—viz., Georgia, North and South Carolina, Virginia, Tennessee, Alabama, Louisiana, Arkansas, Mississippi, Florida, and Texas.

Confederation of the Rhine. Sixteen German provinces in 1806 dissolved their connection with Germany, and allied themselves to France. At the downfall of Napoleon in 1814 this confederation melted away of itself.

Confession. John of Nepomuc, canon of Prague, suffered death rather than violate the seal of confession. The emperor Wenceslas ordered him to be thrown off a bridge into the Muldaw, because he refused to reveal the confession of the empress. He was canonised as St. John Nepomucen.

Confiscate (3 syl.). To forfeit to the public treasury. (Latin, con fiscus, with the tribute money.)

If thou dost shed one drop of Christian blood,
Thy lands and goods are, by the laws of Venice,
Confiscate to the state of Venice.

Shakespeare, "Merchant of Venice," iv. 1.

Congé d'Élire (Norman-French, leave to elect). A royal warrant given to the dean and chapter of a diocese to elect the person nominated by the crown to their vacant see.

Con'gleton' Bears. The men of Congleton. It is said that the Congleton parish clerk sold the church bible to buy a bear.

Congregationalists. Those Protestant Dissenters who maintain that each congregation is an independent community, and has a right to make its own laws and choose its own minister. They rose in the time of queen Elizabeth.

Con'greve Rockets. So called from Sir William Congreve, eldest son of lieutenant-colonel Sir William Congreve. (1772-1828.)

Con'jugal. What pertains to conjuges (yoke-fellows). In ancient times a yoke (jugum) was put on a man and woman by way of marriage ceremony, and the two were said to be yoked together by marriage.

Conjuring Cap. I must put on my conjuring cap—i.e., your question requires deliberate thought, and I must reflect on it. Eric XIV., king of Sweden, was a great admirer of magic, and had an "enchanted cap" made, either to keep his head warm or for mystification. He pretended to have power over the elements; and when a storm arose, his subjects used to say, "The king has got on his conjuring cap."

Conqueror. The Conqueror. Alexander the Great. The conqueror of the world. (B.C. 356, 336-323.) Alfonso of Portugal. (1094, 1137-1185.)

Aurangzebe the Great. Alemgir. The most powerful of the Great Moguls. (1618, 1659-1707.)

Jayme I. of Aragon. (1206, 1213-1276.) Othman or Osman I. Founder of the Turkish power. (1259, 1299-1326.)

Francisco Pizarro. Conquistador. So called because he conquered Peru. (1475-1541.)

William, duke of Normandy. So called because he obtained England by conquest. (1027, 1066-1087.)

Conquest (The). The accession of William I. to the crown of England. So called because his right depended on his conquest of Harold, the reigning king. (1066.)

Con'rad (Lord). Afterwards called Lara, the corsair. A proud, ascetic, but successful captain. Hearing that the sultan Seyd was about to attack the pirates, Conrad assumed the disguise of a dervise and entered the palace, while his crew set fire to the sultan's fleet. The trick being discovered, Conrad was taken prisoner, but was released by Gulnare, the sultan's favourite concubine, whom he had rescued from the flaming palace. Gulnare escaped with the corsair to the Pirates' Isle, and when Conrad found Medora dead, he left the island, and no one knew whither he went. The rest of his adventures are recorded under his new name of Lara.—Byron, "The Corsair."

Conscience (Court of). Established for the recovery of small debts in London and other trading places. They were superseded by county courts.

Why should not Conscience have vacation,
As well as other courts o' the nation?

Butler, "Hudibras," ii. 2.

Conscript Fathers. The Roman senate. So called because their names were written in the senate's register. (Latin, con scriptus, written together.)

Consen'tēs Dii. The twelve chief Roman deities—

Jupiter, Apollo, Mars, Neptune, Mercury, and Vulcan.

Juno, Vesta, Minerva, Cor'is, Diana, and Venus.

Conser'vative (4 syl.). A medium Tory—one who wishes to preserve the union of Church and State, and not radically to alter the constitution. The word was first used in this sense in 1830, in the January number of the Quarterly Review—"We have always been conscientiously attached to what is called the Tory, and which might with more propriety be called the Conservative party."

Consolidated Fund. A repository of public money, pledged for the payment of Government expenses. Till 1816 the exchequers of Great Britain and Ireland were kept separately, but they were formed that year into a common fund, out of which is paid the interest of the national debt, the civil list, and the salaries. If any surplus remains, it is applied to the mutual benefit of the united kingdoms.

Consols (a contraction of Consolidated Annuities). In 1751 an Act was passed for consolidating several stocks bearing an interest of 3 per cent. Those who supply the funds receive interest for their money (about 3 per cent.), but if they want the principal, they must get some one to take their place. This new man hands over the value of the stock, and has his name substituted in the books for the previous holder.

Con'sort is, properly, one whose lot is cast in with another. As the queen does not lose by marriage her separate existence, like other women, her husband is called a consort, because he consorts with the queen.

Wilt thou be our consort?
Shakespeare, "Two Gentlemen of Verona," iv. 1.

Con'stable (Latin, comēs-stabuli) means "Master of the Horse." The constable of England and France was at one time a military officer of state, next in rank to the crown. (See CONCIERGE.)

To overrun or outrun the constable. To get into debt; spend more than one's income; to talk about what you do not understand. (See below.)

Quoth Hudibras, Friend Ralph, thou hast
Outrun the constable at last;
For thou hast fallen on a new Dispute, as senseless as untrue.
Butler, "Hudibras," i. 3.

Who's to pay the constable? Who is to pay the score?

The constable arrests debtors, and, of course, represents the creditor; wherefore, to overrun the constable is to overrun your credit account. To pay the constable is to give him the money due, to prevent an arrest.

Constable de Bourbon. Charles, duc de Bourbon, a powerful enemy of François I. He was killed while heading the assault on Rome. (1527.)

Constantine's Cross. In Latin, vincēs in hoc; in English, By this conquer. It is said that Constantine, on his march to Rome, saw a luminous cross in the sky, in the shape and with the motto here given. In the night before the battle of Saxa Rubra, a vision appeared to him in his sleep, commanding him to inscribe them on the shields of his soldiers. He obeyed the voice of the vision, and prevailed. The monogram is $\text{XP} \overline{\text{I}} \sigma \tau \overline{\text{O}} \varsigma$ (Christ).

This may be called a standing miracle in legendary history; for, besides Andrew's cross, and the Dannebrog or red cross of Denmark (q.v.), we have the cross which appeared to don Alonzo before the battle of Ourique in 1139, when the Moors were totally routed with incredible slaughter. As Alonzo was drawing up his men, the figure of a cross appeared in the eastern sky, and Christ, suspended on the cross, promised the Christian king a complete victory. This legend is commemorated by the device assumed by Alonzo, in a field argent five escutcheons azure, in the form of a cross, each escutcheon being charged with five bezants, in memory of the five wounds of Christ.

Constantine Tolman (Cornwall). A vast egg-like stone, thirty-three feet in length, eighteen in width, and fourteen in thickness, placed on the points of two natural rocks, so that a man may creep under it. The stone upheld weighs 750 tons.

Constituent Assembly. The first of the national assemblies of the French Revolution. So called because it took an oath never to separate till it had given to France a constitution. (1788-1791.)

Constituents. Those who constitute or elect members of Parliament. (Latin, constituo, to place or elect, &c.)

Constitution. The fundamental laws of a state. It may be either despotic, aristocratic, democratic, or mixed. The British constitution is a mixture of the first three, the queen representing the despotic principle, the House of Lords the aristocratic element, and the House of Commons the democratic.

Constitutions of Clarendon. (See CLARENDON.)

Con'strue. To translate. It means to set in order, one with another—i.e., to set an English word in the place of a foreign word, and to lay the whole sentence in good grammatical order.

Consue'lo (4 syl.). The impersonation of moral purity in the midst of temptations. The heroine of George Sand's (Madame Dunderant) novel of the same name.

Con'template (3 syl.). To inspect or watch the temple. The augur among the Romans having taken his stand on the Capitoline Hill, marked out with his wand the space in the heavens he intended to consult. This space he called the templum. Having divided his templum into two parts from top to bottom, he watched to see what would occur; the watching of the templum was called contemplating.

Contempt' of Court. Refusing to conform to the rules of the law courts. Direct contempt is an open insult or resistance to the judge or others officially employed in the court. Consequential contempt is that which tends to obstruct the business or lower the dignity of the court by indirection.

Contentement. A word used in Magua Charta, expressive of chattels necessary to each man's station, as the arms of a gentleman, the merchandise of a trader, or the ploughs and wagons of a peasant.—Hallam.

Contentment is True Riches. The wise saw of Democ'ritos, the laughing philosopher. (B.C. 509-400.)

Content is wealth, the riches of the mind;
And happy he who can such riches find.
Dryden, "Wife of Bath's Tale."

Continence of a Scip'io. It is said that a beautiful princess fell into the hands of Scipio Africa'nus, and he refused to see her, "lest he should be tempted to forget his principles."

Continental System. A name given to Napoleon's plan for shutting out Great Britain from all commerce with the continent of Europe. He forbade under pain of war any nation of Europe to receive British exports, or to send imports to any of the British dominions. It began Nov. 21, 1806.

Contin'gent (A). The quota of troops furnished by each of several contracting powers, according to agreement. The word properly means the number which falls to the lot of each; hence we call a fortuitous event a contingency.

Contre Temps (French). A mischance, something inopportune. Literally, "out of time."

Conven'ticle means a "little convent," and was originally applied to a cabal of monks against the election of a proposed abbot. The application of chapel and conventicle to the places of worship used by dissenters is certainly very unsuitable. (See CHAPEL.)

Conversation Sharp. Richard Sharp, the critic. (1759-1835.)

Con'nyger or Con'nygry. A warren for conies, a cony-burrow.

Convey. A polite term for steal. Thieves are, by a similar euphemism, called conveyers.

Convey, the wise it call. Steal! foh! a fioo for the phrase.—Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," i. 3.

Cooing and Billing. like Philip and Mary on a shilling. The reference is to coins struck in the year 1555, in which Mary and her consort are placed face to face, and not cheek by jowl, the usual way.

Still amorous, and fond, and billing,
Like Philip and Mary on a shilling.
"Hudibras," pt. iii. l.

Cook is from the Norse coge, to boil; what has been boiled is cogt, whence our "cooked" is pronounced cookt.

Cooks. Athenæus affirms that cooks were the first kings of the earth.

Esau, the heroes of the Greek siege, and the old Roman magnates, all cooked "savoury messes."

In the luxurious ages of ancient Greece,

Sicilian cooks were most esteemed, and received very high wages. Among them Trimalcio was very celebrated. It is said that he could cook the most common fish, and give it the flavour and look of the most highly esteemed.

In the palmy days of Rome, a chief cook had £800 a year. Antony gave the cook who arranged his banquet for Cleopatra the present of a city.

Vatel, who killed himself 1671, during a banquet given by the prince de Condé to the king at Chantilly, because the lobsters for the turbot sauce did not arrive in time.

Carême was a very celebrated French cook, called the Regenerator of Cookery. (1784-1833.)

Ude and Soyer are names of considerable celebrity as cooks.

Cooked. The books have been cooked. The ledger and other trade books have been tampered with, in order to show a balance in favour of the bankrupt. The term was first used in reference to George Hudson, the railway king, under whose chairmanship the Eastern Counties Railway accounts were falsified. The allusion is to preparing meat for table.

Coon. A gone coon. One who has no hope, one completely done for. Colonel Crockett was out racoon-shooting in North America, when he levelled his gun at a tree where an "old coon" was concealed. Knowing the colonel's prowess, it cried out, in the voice of a man, "Hallo, there! air you colonel Crockett? for if you air, I'll jist come down, or I know I am a gone 'coon."

Cooper. Half stout and half porter. The term arises from the practice at breweries of allowing the coopers a daily portion of stout and porter. As they do not like to drink porter after stout, they mix the two together.

Cooper's Hill. Near Runnymede and Egham. Both Denham and Pope have written in praise of this hill.

If I can be to thee

A poet, thou Parnassus art to me.—Denham.

Coot. A silly old coot. Stupid as a coot. Common American expressions. The coot is a small water-fowl, which buries its head in mud when it is pursued, thinking no one can see it, as it cannot itself see.

Bald as a coot. The coot, or water hen, has a bald forehead.

Cop. To throw, as cop it here. The word properly means to beat or strike, as to cop a shuttlecock or ball with a bat (Greek, copto, to beat); but in Norfolk it means to "hull" or throw.

Coper'nican System is that which represents the sun at rest in the centre, and all the planets revolving round it. So called after Nicolas Coper'nicus, the Prussian astronomer (1473-1543).

Copes'mate (2 syl.). A companion. "Copesmate of ugly night" ("Rape of Lucrece"), a mate who copes with you.

Cophet'ua. An imaginary king of Africa, of great wealth, who "disdained all womankind." One day he saw a beggar-girl from his window, and fell in love with her. He asked her name; it was Penel'ophon, called by Shakespeare Zenc'ophon ("Love's Labour's Lost," iv. 1). They lived together long and happily, and at death were universally lamented.—Percy's "Reliques," bk. ii. 6.

King Cophetua loved the beggar-maid.

Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet," ii. 1.

Copper. Give me a copper—i.e., a piece of copper money. I have no coppers—no halfpence.

Copper Captain. One who calls himself a captain, but has no right to the title, a counterfeit captain. Michael Perez is so called in "Rule a Wife and have a Wife," by Beaumont and Fletcher.

To this copper-captain was confided the command of the troops.—W. Irving.

Copperheads. Secret foes. Copperheads are poisonous serpents of America that give no warning, like rattlesnakes, of their attack. In the great civil war of the United States the term was applied by the Federals to the peace party, supposed to be the covert friends of the Confederates.

Cop'ple. The hen killed by Reynard, in the tale of "Reynard the Fox."

Cops. Copperheads (q.v.).

Copts. The Jacobite Christians of Egypt, who have for eleven centuries been in possession of the patriarchal chair of Alexandria. The word is probably derived from Coptos, the metropolis of the Theba'id. These Christians conduct their worship in a dead language called "Coptic" (the language of the Copts).

Co'pus. A drink made of beer, wine, and spice heated together, and served in a "loving-cup." Dog-Latin for cupellon Hippoc'rutis (a cup of hippocras).

Copy. That's a mere copy of your countenance. Not your real wish or meaning, but merely one you choose to present to me. You do not show me the real draft, but a doctored copy. Perhaps the word "copy" is the Spanish capa (disguise), as la capa de religion (the disguise of religion); so in Portuguese, com capa de . . . (under pretence of . . .).

Copyhold Estate. Part of a manor, held for a term at the lord's will, and the terms copied into the court-roll or document kept in the manor-house for these purposes. As all copyholds derive their force from custom only, no new ones can be created now. Indeed, none have been created since the reign of Richard II.

Copyright. The right of an author to his works for the term of his natural life, or for forty-two years from publication. For the benefit of survivors, the heirs may claim the right either for the residue of the forty-two years, or for seven years from his decease.

The five copies of a copyright work are thus disposed of:—A copy is sent to the British Museum, the Bodleian of Oxford, the University library of Cambridge, the Advocates' library of Scotland, and the library of Trinity, Dublin.

Co'rah, in Dryden's satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," is meant for Dr. Titus [Oates (Numbers xvi.). North describes him as a short man, extremely ugly: if his mouth is taken for the centre, his chin, forehead, and cheek-bones would fall in the circumference.

Sunk were his eyes, his voice was harsh and loud;
Sunk signs he neither choleric was, nor proud;
His long chin proved his wit; his saint-like grace
A church vermilion, and a Moses' face.
His memory, miraculously great,
Could plots, exceeding man's belief, repeat.

Dryden, "Absalom and Achitophel."

Coral Beads. The Romans used to hang beads of red coral on the cradles and round the neck of infants, to "preserve and fasten their teeth," and save them from "the falling sickness." It was considered by soothsayers as a charm against lightning, whirlwind, shipwreck, and fire. Paracelsus says it should be worn round the neck of children as a preservative "against fits, sorcery, charms, and poison." The coral bells are a Roman Catholic addition, the object being to frighten away evil spirits by their jingle.

Coral is good to be hanged about the neck of children . . . to preserve them from the falling sickness. It hath also some special sympathy with nature, for the best coral . . . will turn pale and wan if the party that wears it be sick, and it comes to its former colour again as they recover.—Plat., "Jewel-House of Art and Nature."

Cor'al Master. A juggler. So called by the Spaniards. In ancient times the juggler, when he threw off his mantle, appeared in a tight scarlet or coral dress.

Co'ran (cropped). One of the dogs of Actæon. (See CISSETA.)

Cor'anach. Lamentation for the dead, as anciently practised in Ireland and Celtic Scotland. (Gaelic, cornh rànaich, crying together.)

Cor'bant. The rook, in the tale of "Reynard the Fox." (Latin, corvus; French, corbeau.)

Corbett. This name is from their armorial device—two corbeaux or ravens.

Corcœ'ca (Blind-heart). Superstition is so named in Spenser's "Faëry Queen." Abessa tried to make her understand that danger was at hand; but, being blind, she was dull of comprehension. At length she was induced to shut her door, and when Una knocked would give no answer. Then the lion broke down the door, and both entered. The meaning is that England, the lion, broke down the door of Superstition at the Reformation. Corcœca means Romanism in England.—Bk. i.

Corde'lia. The youngest of Lear's three daughters, and the only one that loved him.—Shakespeare, "King Lear."

Cordeliers means "cord-wearers." Certain Franciscan friars are so called because they wear round their waist a thong of knotted cord instead of a girdle. In the reign of St. Louis, these Minorite monks repulsed an army of infidels, and the king asked who those gens de cordelies (corded people) were. From this they received their appellation.

During the Revolution, one of the most conspicuous of the movement party was so called, because they held their meetings in the chapel of a Franciscan monastery. Danton, Hébert, Chaumette, Camille Desmoulins, and Marat were members of this club, which was opposed to the Jacobins.

Cordon Bleu (French). A knight of the ancient order of the St. Esprit (Holy Ghost). So called because the decoration is suspended on a blue ribbon. It was at one time the highest order in the kingdom.

Cordon Bleu. A first-rate cook. The commandeur du Souvé, comte d'Olonne, and some others, who were cordons bleus (i.e., knights of St. Esprit), met together as a sort of club, and were noted for their well-appointed dinners. Hence, when any one had dined well he said, "Bien, c'est un vrai repas de cordon-bleu;" and a superior cook was one of the cordon bleu type, or, briefly, a "cordon bleu." (See above.)

Cordon Rouge (French). A chevalier of the order of St. Louis, the decoration being suspended on a red ribbon.

Grand Cordon. A member of the Legion d'honneur, whose cross is attached to a grand or broad ribbon.

Cord'uroy'. A corded fabric, originally made of silk, and worn by the kings of France in the chase. (French, cord du roy.)

Corduoy Road. A term applied to roads in the backwoods and swampy districts of the United States of America, formed of the halves of trees sawn in two longitudinally, and laid transversely across the track. A road thus made presents a ribbed appearance, like the cloth called corduroy.

Cord'wainer. Not a twister of cord, but a worker in leather. Our word is the French cordouannier (a maker or worker of cordouan); the former a corruption of Cordovanier (a worker in Cor'dovan leather).

Corflam'bo. The impersonation of sensual passion in Spenser's "Faëry Queen."

Co'ri. Cape Com'orin.

Corin'ëus (3 syl.). A mythical hero in the suite of Brute, who conquered the giant Goëm'agot, for which achievement the whole western horn of England was allotted him. He called it Corin'ëa, and the people Corine'ans, from his own name.

In meed of these great conquests by them got,
Corineus had that province utmost west
To him assigned for his worthy lot,
Which of his name and memorable gest,
He called Cornwall.

Spenser, "Faëry Queen," ii. 10.

Corinth. Not every one can go to Corinth—i.e., not every one can afford such extravagance. The reference is to Laïs, a courtesan of Corinth, who made those who visited her pay most extravagantly for her favours. Horace says, "It does not fall to the lot of every man to go to Corinth," meaning, not every man is fleeced of his money by women of low character.

Corinth's Pedagogue. Dionysios the younger, on being banished a second time from Syracuse, went to Corinth and became schoolmaster. He is called Dionysios the tyrant. Hence lord Byron says of Napoleon—

Corinth's pedagogue hath now
Transferred his by-word to thy brow.
Ode to Napoleon.

Corin'thian (A). A licentious libertine. The immorality of Corinth was proverbial both in Greece and Rome. To Corin'thianise is to indulge in licentious conduct.

Corinthian Tom. The sporting rake in Pierce Egan's "Life in London." A "Corinthian" was the "fast man" of Shakespeare's period.

I am no proud Jack, like Falstaff: but a Corinthian, a lad of mettle, a good boy.—Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV," ii. 4.

Corin'thian Order. The most richly decorated of the five orders of Greek architecture. The shaft is fluted, and the capital adorned with acanthus leaves. (See ACANTHUS.)

Coriola'nus. The chief character of Shakespeare's play so called.

Corked. This wine is corked—i.e., tastes of the cork.

Cor'moran'. The Cornish giant who fell into a pit twenty feet deep, dug by Jack the Giant-killer, and flamed over with grass and gravel. The name means cormorant or great eater. For this doughty achievement Jack received a belt from king Arthur, with this inscription—

This is the valiant Cornish man
That slew the giant Cormoran.
Jack the Giant-killer.

Corn-Law Rhymers. Ebenezer Elliott, who wrote philippics against the corn laws. (1781-1849.)

Is not the corn-law rhymers already a king?—Curlye.

Corner (The). Tattersall's horse-stores and betting-rooms, which were at one time at the corner of Hyde Park, are now removed to Knightsbridge Green.

Cornette. Porter la cornette. To be domineered over by the woman of the house; to be a Jerry Sneak. The cornette is the mob-cap anciently worn by the women of France. Porter les culottes (to wear the breeches) is the same idea; only it shows who has the mastery, and not who is mastered. In the latter case it means the woman wears the dress of the man, and assumes his position in the house. Probably our expression about "wearing the horns" may be referred to the "cornette" rather than to the stag or deer.

Corn'grate (2 syl.). A term given in Wiltshire to the soil in the north-western border, consisting of an irregular mass of loose gravel, sand, and limestone.

Cornish Hug. A hug to overthrow you. The Cornish men were famous wrestlers, and tried to throttle their antagonist with a particular lock, called the Cornish hug.

Cornish Language was virtually extinct 150 years ago. Doll Pentreath, the last person who could speak it, died at the age of 64, in 1778.—Once a Week.

Cornish Wonder (The). John Opie, of Cornwall, the painter. (1761-1807.)

Cornu-co'pia. (See AMALTHEA's HORN.)

Cornwall. (See BARRY, CORINEUS.)

Coronation Chair consists of a stone so enclosed as to form a chair. It is a talisman, and the notion is, wherever this stone is, royalty will be upheld; but with the removal of the stone will be the fall of royalty in that nation.

It was probably the stone on which the kings of Ireland were inaugurated on the hill of Tara. It was removed by Fergus, son of Eric, to Argyleshire, and thence by king Kenneth (in the ninth century) to Scone, where it was enclosed in a wooden chair. Edward I. transferred it to Westminster.

The monkish legend says that it was the very stone which formed "Jacob's pillow."

The tradition is, "Wherever this stone is found, there will reign some of the Scotch race of kings."

Cor'onach. The funeral howl of the Highlanders, called by the Irish ululoo.

Cor'oner means properly the crown-officer; in Saxon times it was his duty to collect the crown revenues; next to take charge of crown pleas; but at present to uphold the paternal solicitude of the crown by searching into all cases of sudden or suspicious death. (Vulgo, crowner. Latin, coro'na, the crown.)

But is this law?

Ay, marry, is't; crowner's quest law.

Shakespeare, "Hamlet," v. 1.

Cor'onet. A crown inferior to the royal crown. A duke's coronet is adorned with strawberry leaves above the band; that of a marquis with strawberry leaves alternating with pearls; that of an earl has pearls elevated on stalks, alternating with leaves above the band; that of a viscount has a string of pearls above the band, but no leaves; that of a baron has only four pearls.

Coro'nis. Daughter of a king of Pho'cis, changed by Athe'na into a crow. There was another Coro'nis, loved by Apollo, and killed by him for infidelity.

Corps Legislatif (French). The lower house of the present French legislature. The first assembly so called was when Napoleon I. substituted a corps legislatif and a tribunal for the two councils of the Directory, Dec. 24, 1799. The next was the corps legislatif and conseil d'état of 1807. The third was the corps legislatif of 750 deputies of 1849. The present legislative power is vested in the emperor, the senate, and the corps legislatif. (1852.)

Corpse Candle. The ignis fatuus is so called by the Welsh, because it was supposed to forbode death, and to show the road that the corpse would take. Also a large candle used at lake or liche wakes—i.e., watching a corpse before interment.

Corpus Christi (body of Christ). A festival of the Church, kept on the first Thursday after Trinity Sunday, in honour of the eucharist. There is a college both at Cambridge and Oxford so named.

Corpus'cular Theory is, that matter is only divisible to its elemental point called an atom, and that atoms are the corpuscles of which everything is made. The system was anciently taught in Greece by Leucippus and Democ'ritos. (See ATOMIC.)

Corrector. (See ALEXANDER.)

Corré'gio. The Corré'gio of Sculptors. Jean Goujon, who was slain in the massacre of St. Bartholomew. (1510-1572.)

Corrouge. The sword of Sir Otuel, in mediæval romance.

Corrugated Iron. Sheet iron coated with zinc. It is called corrugated or wrinkled because the sheet is made wavy by the rollers between which it has to pass.

Corruptic'olæ. A sect of heretics of the sixth century, who maintained that Jesus Christ was corruptible.

Corruption of Blood. Loss of title and entailed estates in consequence of treason, by which a man's blood is attainted, and his issue suffers.

Corsair' means properly "one who gives chase." Applied to the pirates of the northern coast of Africa. (Italian, corso, a chase.)

Cors'ned means the "cursed mouthful." It was a piece of bread "consecrated for exorcism," and given to a person to swallow as a test of his guilt. The words of "consecration" were, "May this morsel cause convulsions and find no passage if the accused is guilty, but turn to wholesome nourishment if he is innocent." (Saxon, corse, curse; snead, mouthful.)

Cor'tes (2 syl.). The Spanish or Portuguese parliament. The word means "court officers."

Cort'ina. The skin of the serpent Pytho, which covered the tripod of the Pythoness when she delivered her oracles.

Corv'ius (raven). Ja'nos Hun'yady, governor of Hungary, is so called from the raven in his shield.

There were two Romans so called—viz., Vale'rius Max'imus Corv'ius Messa'la, and Vale'rius Messa'la Corv'ius.

Marcus Vale'rius was called "Corvus" (raven) because, in a single combat with a gigantic Gaul, during the Gallic war, a raven flew into the Gaul's face, and so harassed him that he could neither defend himself nor attack his adversary.

Cor'ydon. A swain; a brainless, love-sick spooney. It is one of the shepherds in Virgil's eclogues.

Coryphæ'us. The Coryphæus of Grammarians. Aristarchos of Sam'othrace. A coryphæus was the leader of the Greek chorus; hence the chief of a department in any of the sciences or fine arts. Aristarchos, in the second century B.C., was the chief or prince of grammarians. (Greek, koryphaïos, chorus-leader.)

Coryphee. A ballet-dancer. (See above.)

Cos'miel (3 syl.). The genius of the world. He gave to Theodidac'tus a boat of asbestos in which he sailed to the sun and planets.—Kercher, "Ecstatic Journey to Heaven."

Cosmop'olite (4 syl.). A citizen of the world. One who has no partiality to any one country as his abiding-place; one who looks on the whole world with "an equal eye." (Greek, cosmos-poli'tēs.)

Cos'set. A house pet. Applied to a pet lamb brought up in the house; any pet. (Saxon, col-seut, cottage-dweller; German, kossat.)

Cost'ard. A clown in "Love's Labour's Lost" (Shakespeare), who apes the court wit of queen Elizabeth's time, but misapplies and miscalls like Mrs. Malaprop or Master Dogberry.

Cos'termonger. A seller of eatables about the streets, properly an appleseller (from costard, a sort of apple, and monger, "a trader;" Saxon, mangian, "to trade"). The word is still retained in iron-monger, cheese-monger, fish-monger, news-monger, fell-monger, &c.

Cote-hardi. A tight-fitting tunic buttoned down the front.

He was clothed in a cote-hardi upon the gyse of Almayne (Germany).—Geoffroi de la Tour, "Landry."

Cotereaux (French). The king of England, irritated at the rising in Brittany in the twelfth century, sent the Brabançons (q.v.) to ravage the lands of Raoul de Fougères. These cut-throats carried knives (couteaux) with them, whence their name.

Co'terie' (3 syl.). A French word, originally tantamount to our "guild," a society where each paid his quota—i.e., his quote-part or gild (share). The French word has departed from its original meaning, and is now applied to an exclusive set, more especially of ladies.

Cotillon (co-til'-yon) means properly the "under-petticoat." The word was applied to a brisk dance by eight persons, in which the ladies held up their gowns and showed their under-petticoats.

Cotset. The lowest of bondsmen. So called from cot-seat (a cottage dweller). These slaves were bound to work for their feudal lord. The word occurs frequently in "Domesday Book."

Cotswold Lion. A sheep, for which Cotswold hills are famous. Fierce as a Cotswold lion (ironical).

Cottage Orné (French). A cottage residence belonging to persons in good circumstances.

Cotton. To cotton to a person. To cling to one or take a fancy to a person. To stick to a person as cotton sticks to our clothes.

Cotton Lord. A great cotton lord. A rich Manchester cotton-manufacturer, a real lord in wealth, style of living, equipage, and tenantry.

Cotto'nian Library, in the British Museum. Collected by Sir R. Cotton, and added to by his son and grandson, after which it was invested in trustees for the use of the public.

Coty'to. The Thracian goddess of immodesty, worshipped at Athens with nocturnal rites.

Hail! goddess of nocturnal sport,
Dark-veiled Cotytto.

Milton, "Comus."

Cou'beren. God of wealth in Hindu mythology.

Couleur de Rose (French). Highly coloured; too favourably considered; overdrawn with romantic embellishments, like objects viewed through glass tinted with rose pink.

Coulin. A British giant, pursued by Debon (one of the companions of Brute) till he came to a chasm 132 feet across, which he leaped; but slipping on the opposite side, he fell back into the chasm and was killed.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen."

Councils. Œcumenical Councils. There are twenty recognised: nine Eastern and eleven Western.

THE NINE EASTERN: (1) Jerusalem; (2 and 8) Nice, 325, 787; (3, 6, 7; 9)

Constantinople, 381, 553, 681, 869; (4) Ephesus, 431; (5) Chalcedon, 451.

THE TEN WESTERN: (10, 11, 12, 13, 19) Lat'cran, 1123, 1139, 1179, 1215, 1517; (14 and 15) Synod of Lyon, 1245, 1274; (16) Synod of Vienne, in Dauphiné, 1311; (17) Constance, 1414; (18) Basil, 1431-1443; (20) Trent, 1545-1563.

Counter-caster. One who keeps accounts, or casts up accounts by counters. Thus, in "The Winter's Tale," the Clown says, "Fifteen hundred shorn; what comes the wool to? I cannot do't without counters" (Act iv., s. 3).

And what was he?
Forsooth, a great arithmetician . . .
And I . . . must be beleed and calmed
By debtor and creditor, this counter-caster.
Shakespeare, "Othello," i. 1.

Counter-jumper. A draper's assistant, who jumps over the counter to go from one part of the shop to another.

Counterpane. A corruption of counterpoint, from the Latin cul'cita (a wadded wrapper, a quilt). When the stitches were arranged in patterns it was called cul'cita puncta, which in French became conte-pointe, corrupted into contre-pointe, counter-point, where point is pronounced "poyn," corrupted into "pane."

Country. Father of his country. (See FATHER.)

Country-dance. A corruption of the French contre danse (a dance where the partners face each other).

Coup (coo). He made a good coup. A good hit or haul. (French.)

Coup de pied de l'âne (kick from the ass's foot). A blow given to a vanquished or fallen man; a cowardly blow; an insult offered to one who has not the power of returning or revenging it. The allusion is to the fable of the sick lion kicked by the ass. (French.)

Coup d'État (French) means a state stroke, and the term is applied to one of those bold measures taken by government to prevent a supposed or actual danger; as when a large body of men are arrested suddenly for fear they should overturn the government.

The famous coup d'état, by which Louis Napoleon became possessed of absolute power, took place on the 2nd of December, 1851.

Coup de Grâce. Finishing stroke. In boxing, the victor gives a blow, called the grace-stroke, which is not returned. All the other blows were given in battle, but the grace-stroke is given in sign that the battle is over. (French.)

The Turks dealt the coup de grâce to the Eastern empire.—Times.
Earl Russell's last escapade has given the coup de grâce to his reputation.—Full Mail Gazette.

Coup de Main (French). A sudden stroke; a stratagem whereby something is effected suddenly. Sometimes called a coup only, as "The coup [the scheme] did not answer."

London is not to be taken by a coup de main.—Public Opinion.

Coup d'Œil (French). A view; glance; prospect; effect of things in the mass.

These principles are presented at a single coup d'œil.

The coup d'œil was grand in the extreme.

Coup de Soleil (French). A sun-stroke, any malady produced by exposure to the sun.

Courage. Anglo-Norman, corage. (Latin, cor, heart; ago, to do.)

But screw your courage to the sticking-place,
And we'll not fail.

Shakespeare, "Macbeth," i. 7.

Court originally meant a coop or sheep-fold. It was on the Latium hills that the ancient Latins raised their cors or cohors, small enclosures with hurdles for sheep, &c. Subsequently, as many men as could be cooped or folded together were called a corps or cohort. The "cors" or cattle-yard, being the nucleus of the farm, became the centre of a lot of farm cottages, then of a hamlet, town, fortified place, and lastly of a royal residence.

Court. A short cut, alloy, or paved way between two main streets. (French, court, "short," as prendre un chemin court, "to take a short cut.")

Court-cupboard. The buffet to hold flagons, cans, cups, and beakers. There are two in Stationers' Hall. (See "Romeo and Juliet," i. 5.)

Court Fools. (See FOOLS.)

Court Plaster. The plaster of which the court ladies made their patches. Those patches, worn on the face, were cut into the shape of crescents, stars, circles, diamonds, hearts, crosses; and some even went so far as to patch their face with a coach and four, a ship in full sail, a château, &c. This ridiculous fashion was in vogue in the reign of Charles I., and in the reign of Anne was employed as the badge of political partisanship. (See PATCHES.)

Black patches, that she wears,
Cut into suns, and moons, and stars.
Butler, "Hudibras," pt. II. l.

Court of Love. A judicial court for deciding affairs of the heart, established in Provence during the palmy days of the Troubadours. The following is a case submitted to their judgment: A lady listened to one admirer, squeezed the hand of another, and touched with her toe the foot of a third. Query, Which of these three was the favoured suitor?

Courtesy. Civility, politeness. It was at the courts of princes and great feudatories that minstrels and pages practised the refinements of the age in which they lived. The word originally meant the manners of the court.

Cousin. Blackstone says that Henry IV., being related or allied to every earl in the kingdom, artfully and constantly acknowledged the connection in all public acts. The usage has descended to his successors, though the reason has long ago failed.—"Commentarius," i. 398.

Cousin-german. The children of brothers and sisters, first cousins; kinsfolk. (Latin, germanus, a brother, one of the same stock.)

There is three cousin-germans, that has cozened all the hosts of Reading, of Maidenhead, of Colebrook, of horses and money.—Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," iv. 5.

Cousin Michael (or) Michel. The Germans are so called, as the Americans are called brother Jonathan, and the English John Bull. Michel, in Old German, means "gross;" Saxon, micel; Scotch, mickle. Cousin Michel means cousin gourmand, or gross feeder, and is meant to indicate a slow, heavy, simple, unrefined, coarse-feeding people.

Coûte que Coûte (French). Cost what it may, at any price, be the consequences what they may.

His object is to serve his party coûte que coûte.—Standard.

Cove (1 syl.). An individual; as a flash cove (aswell), a rum cove (a man whose position and character is not quite palpable), a gentry cove (a gentleman), a doiny cove (a very knowing individual), &c. Cove is the German kopf (an individual).

Covenanters. A term applied, during the civil wars, to the Scotch presbyterians, who united by "solemn league and covenant" to resist the encroachments of Charles I. on religious liberty.

Coventry. To send one to Coventry. To take no notice of him; to let him live and move and have his being with you, but pay no more heed to him than to the idle winds which you regard not. This is a military term, according to Messrs. Chambers ("Cyclopædia"): The citizens of Coventry had at one time so great a dislike to soldiers, that a woman seen speaking to one was instantly tabooed. No intercourse was ever allowed between the garrison and the town; hence, when a soldier was sent to Coventry, he was cut off from all social intercourse.

Hutton, in his "History of Birmingham," gives a different version. He says that Coventry was a stronghold of the parliamentary party in the civil wars, and that all troublesome and refractory royalists were sent there for safe custody.

The former explanation meets the general scope of the phrase the better.

Cover. To break cover. To start from the covert or temporary lair. The usual earth-holes of a fox being covered up the night before a hunt, the creature makes some gorse-bush or other cover its temporary resting-place, and as soon as it quits it the hunt begins.

Coverley. Sir Roger de Coverley. A member of an hypothetical club in the "Spectator," "who lived in Soho Square, when he was in town." Sir Roger is the type of an English squire in the reign of queen Anne. He figures in thirty papers of the "Spectator."

Who can be insensible to his unpretending virtues and amiable weaknesses; his modesty, generosity, hospitality, and eccentric whims; the respect for his neighbours, and the affection of his domestics?—Hazlitt.

Cov'etous Man. A Tantalus (q.v.).

In the full flood stands Tan'talus, his skin
Washed o'er in vain, for ever dry within.
He catches at the stream with greedy lips—
From his touched mouth the wanton torrent slips...
Change but the name, this fable is thy story:
Thou in a flood of useless wealth dost glory,
Which thou canst only touch, but never taste.
Cowley, "Horace," satire i.

Cow. The cow that nourished Ymir with four streams of milk was called Audhumla. This cow, by licking the frost-covered stones, produced, the first day, a man's hair; the second day, a man's head; and the third day, a complete human being, named Buri. (Scandinavian mythology.)

The cow knows not the worth of her tail till she loses it, and is troubled with flies, which her tail brushed off.

What we have we prize not to the worth
Whiles we enjoy it; but being lack'd and lost,
Why, then we rack the value.
Shakespeare, "Much Ado About Nothing," iv. 1.

Curst cows have short horns. (See CURST.)

Coward (anciently written culward) is either from the French coward, originally written culvert, from culver (a pigeon), pigeon-livered being still a common expression for a coward; or else from the Latin culum verterē, to turn tail (Spanish, cobardē; Portuguese, covardē; Italian, codardo, "a coward;" Latin, cauda, "a tail"). A beast cowarded, in heraldry, is one drawn with its coue or tail between its legs. The allusion is to the practice of beasts, who sneak off in this manner when they are cowed.

The etymology from the Italian cuo'rē tardo (slow or faint-hearted) is not tenable.

Cowper. Called "Author of 'The Task,'" from his principal poem. (1731-1800.)

Cowper Law, a corruption of Cupar, &c., is trying a man after execution. Similar expressions are Jedwood, Jeddart, and Jedburgh justice. Cowper justice had its rise from a baron-baile in Coupar-Angus, before heritable jurisdictions were abolished. (See LYDFORD LAW.)

Cowper Law, as we say in Scotland—hang a man first, and then judge him.—Lord de Ros, "Tower of London."

Coxcomb. An empty-headed, vain person. The ancient licensed jesters were so called because they wore a cock's comb in their caps.

Coxcombs, all ever empty race,
Are trumpets of their own disgrace.

Gay, "Fables," xix.

Let me hire him too; here's my coxcomb.

Shakespeare, "King Lear," i. 4.

The Prince of Coxcombs. Charles Joseph, prince de Ligne. (1535-1614.)

Richard II. of England is sometimes called the Coxcomb. (1366-1400.)

Henri III. of France was called le Mignon, which means pretty well the same thing. (1551-1589.)

Coys'tril, Coystrel, or Kestrel. A degenerate hawk; hence, a paltry fellow. Holinshed says, "costerels or bearers of the arms of barons or knights" (vol. i., p. 162); and again, "women, lackeys, and costerels are considered as the unwelcome attendants on an army" (vol. iii. 272). Each of the life-guards of Henry VIII. had an attendant, called a coystrel or coystril. Some think the word is a corruption of costerel, which they derive from the Latin coterellus (a peasant); but if not a corruption of kestrel, I should derive it from costrel (a small wooden bottle used by labourers in harvest time). "Vasa quedam quæ costrelli vocantur." —Matthew Paris.

He's a coward and a coystril that will not drink to my niece.—Shakespeare, "Twelfth Night," l. 3.

Cozen. To cheat. (Armoric, cozgein; Russian, kosnodei; Arabic, gusa; Ethiopic, chusawa; our chouse.)

I think it no sin
To cozen him that would unjustly win.
Shakespeare, "All's Well that Ends Well," iv. 2.

Crab (A). An ill-tempered fellow. "You old crab" ("The Poor Gentleman," by Colman). Crabbéd is ill-tempered, as "Crabbéd age and youth ne'er can dwell together." The word is from the wild apple or crab, which is exceedingly sour.

Crab-cart. The main shell or carapace of a crab. So called because it is used very commonly by children for a toy-cart, a piece of string being tied to it to drag it about.

Crabshaw (Timothy). The servant of Sir Launcelot Greaves's squire.—Smollett, "Adventures."

Crack, as a crack man, a first-rate fellow; a crack hand at cards, a first-rate player; a crack article, an excellent one. This is University slang, being a translation of the Latin crepo (to boast of, to crack up, or crack), as genus crepat Lucretius (he cracks or boasts of his ancestry).

Indeed, la! 'tis a noble child; a crack, madam.
Shakespeare, "Coriolanus," l. 3.

To crack up a person. To praise him highly. (See above.)

In a crack, instantly. In a snap of the fingers, crepitu digitorum (in a crack of the fingers).

Crack a Bottle—i.e., drink one. The allusion is to the mischievous pranks of the drunken frolics of times gone by, when the bottles and glasses were broken during the bout. Miss Oldbuck says, in reference to the same custom, "We never were glass-breakers in this house, Mr. Lovel" ("Antiquary"); meaning they were not bottle-crackers, or given to drunken orgies. (See CRUSH.)

Dear Tom, this brown jug that now foams with mild ale,
From which I now drink to sweet Nan of the Vale,
Was once Toby Filpot's, a thirsty old soul
As e'er cracked a bottle, or futhomed a bowl.
O'keefe, "Poor Soldier."

Cracker. A corruption of Greek Fire. French, feu Grecque; Middle Age perversion, cregkê. (See GREEK FIRE.)

Cracknells (from the French craqueline). A hard, brittle cake.

Craigmillar Castle. So called from Henry de Craigmillar, who built the castle in the twelfth century.

Cra'kys of War. Cannons were so called in the reign of Edward III.

Cram. To tell what is not true. A crummer, an untruth. The allusion is to stuffing a person with useless rubbish.

Crambo. Repetition. So called from a game which consists in some one setting a line, which another is to rhyme to, but no one word of the first line must occur in the second.

Crane means long-shanks. (Welsh, gar, "the shanks," whence our gaiter and garter.) Garan is the long-shanked bird, contracted into g'ran, crane; heron is another form of the same word.

Cranke (1 syl.). An Abram man (q.v.). So called from the German krank (sickly), whence cranky, "idiotic, foolish, full of whims," and cranke (simulated sickness). These beggars were called crankes because they pretended madness and sickness to excite compassion.

Cran'nock. An Irish measure which, in the days of Edward II., contained either eight or sixteen pecks.

Crannocus continebit xxi pecks. Crannoco continente octo pecks.—Exchequer of Ireland (Rec).

Cra'paul or Johnny Crapaud. A Frenchman; as John Bull is an Englishman. So called from the device of the ancient kings of France, "three toads erect, saltant" (Givillim's "Display of of Heraldrie," 1611). Nostrada'mus, in the sixteenth century, called the French "crapauds." (See FROGS.)

Les anciens crapauds prendront Sara (Nostrada'mus). Sara is the word Aras reversed, and when the French under Louis XIV. took Aras from the Spaniards, this verse was quoted as a prophecy.

Crape, Lawn. A saint in crape is twice a saint in lawn. Crape (a sort of bombazine or alpaca) is the stuff of which cheap clerical gowns are made; the better sort are of silk. Pope means, a poor person who can only afford a stuff gown, would be looked at with thrice as much veneration if he became a bishop, and wore episcopal lawn.

Cravat'. A corruption of Crabat or Croät. It was introduced into France by some French officers on their return from Germany in 1636. The Croäts, who guarded the Turkish frontiers of Austria, and acted as scouts on the flanks of the army, wore linen round their necks, tied in front, and the officers wore muslin or silk. When France organised a regiment on the model of the Croäts, these linen neckcloths were imitated, and the regiment was called "The Royal Cravat."

Cra'ven means "your mercy is craved." It was usual in former times to decide controversies by an appeal to battle. The combatants fought with batons, and if the accused could either kill his adversary or maintain the fight till sundown, he was acquitted. If he wished to call off, he cried out "Craven!" and was held infamous, while the defendant was advanced to honour.—Blackstone.

Crawley. Crooked as Crawley (or) Crawley brook, a river in Bedfordshire. That part called the brook, which runs into the Ouse, is so crooked that a boat would have to go eighty miles in order to make a progress direct of eighteen.—Fuller, "Worthies."

Cray'on (Geoffrey). The nom de plume under which Washington Irving published "The Sketch Book."

Crazy Crow. Porter to the Dublin theatre in the reign of George II., noted for his stentorian voice, which "frightful as great Etna roared."

Crazy Sally of Epsom. A drunken impostor, who was so petted and sought after that she soon rode in her carriage.

Cre'dence-table. The table near the altar on which the bread and wine are deposited before they are consecrated. In former times food was placed on a credence-table to be tasted previously to its being set before the guests. This was done to assure the guests that the meat was not poisoned. The Italian credenza're means to taste meats placed on the creden'za. (Italian, la credenza, a shelf or buffet; Greek, crear, food.)

Crédit Foncier (French). A company licensed to borrow money for city and other improvements connected with estates. A board of guardians may form such a company, and their security would be the parish rates. The money borrowed is repaid by instalments with interest. The word foncier means "landed," as impôt foncier (land tax), bien foncier (landed property), and so on.

Crédit Mobilier (French). A company licensed to take in hand all sorts of trading enterprises, such as railways, and to carry on the business of stock-jobbers. The word mobilier means personal property, general stock, as bien mobilier (personal chattels), mobilier viv et mort (live and dead stock).

Cre'kenpit. A fictitious river near Husterloe, according to the invention of Master Reynard, who calls on the Hare to attest its existence.—Reynard the Fox.

Cremo'na. An organ stop, a corruption of the Italian cormornè, which the German krummhorn, an organ stop, of eight feet pitch; so called from a wind-instrument made of wood, and bent outwards in a circular arc (krumm horn, crooked horn).

Cremo'nas. Violins of the greatest excellence. So called from Cremo'na, where for many years lived some makers of them who have gained a world-wide notoriety, such as An'drea Ana'ti and Antonio his son, Aortin'ius Stradiva'rius his pupil, and Giuseppe Guarce'rius the pupil of Stradiva'rius. Cremona has long since lost its reputation for this manufacture.

In silvis viva silni; cano'ra jam mor'tua cano.
(A motto on a Cremona.)
Speechless, alive, I heard the feathered throng;
Now, being dead, I emulate their song.

Cre'ole (2 syl.). The descendants of white people born in Mexico, South America, and the West Indies. As these people are of a very mixed race, the word signifies, one between a white and a negro.

Creole dialects. The various jargons spoken by the West India slaves.

Crep'idam. Supra crep'idam. Meddling with what does not concern one; putting one's spoke into another man's wheel; minding business which does not concern you. (See COBBLER.)

Cres'cent. Tradition says that Philip, the father of Alexander, meeting with great difficulties in the siege of Byzantium, set the workmen to undermine the walls, but a crescent moon discovered the design, which miscarried; consequently the Byzantines erected a statue to Diana, and the crescent became the symbol of the state."

Another legend is that Othman, the sultan, saw in a vision a crescent moon, which kept increasing till its horns extended from east to west, and he adopted the crescent of his dream for his standard, adding the motto, Donec rep'leat orbem.

Cres'cit. Crescit sub pondere Virtus (Virtue thrives best in adversity). The allusion is to the palm-tree, which grows better when pressed by an incumbent weight.

Cressell'e (2 syl.). A wooden instrument used in the Romish Church during the passion week instead of bells, to give notice of Divine worship. The mystery of the Cresselle represents Christ praying on the cross.

Cres'set. A beacon light: properly "a little cross." So called because originally they were surmounted by a little cross. (French, croisette.)

Cress'ida, daughter of Calchas the Grecian priest, was beloved by Troilus, one of the sons of Priam. They vowed eternal fidelity to each other, and as pledges of their vow Troilus gave the maiden a sleeve, and Cressid gave the Trojan prince a glove. Scarcely had the vow been made when an exchange of prisoners was agreed to. Diomed gave up three Trojan princes, and was to receive Cressid in lieu thereof. Cressid vowed to remain constant, and Troilus swore to rescue her. She was led off to the Grecian's tent, and soon gave all her affections to Diomed, nay, even bade him wear the sleeve that Troilus had given her in token of her love.

As false
As air, as water, wind, or sandy earth,
As fox to lamb, as wolf to heifer's calf,
Pard to the hind, or step-dame to her son;
"Yea," let them say, to stick the heart of falsehood,
"As false as Cressid."
Shakespeare, "Troilus and Cressida," iii. 2.

Cresswell (Madame). A woman of infamous character who bequeathed £10 for a funeral sermon, in which nothing ill should be said of her. The duke of Buckingham wrote the sermon, which was as follows: "All I shall say of her is this—she was born well, she married well, lived well, and died well; for she was born at Shad-well, married to Cresswell, lived at Clerken-well, and died in Bride-well."

Cressy (Battle of). Won by Edward III. and the Black Prince over Philippe VI. of France, August 26, 1346.

Cressy was lost by kickshaws and soup meagre.
Fenton, "Prot. to Southern's Spartan Dame."

Crestfallen. Dispirited. The allusion is to fighting cocks, whose crest falls in defeat and rises rigid and of a deep red colour in victory.

Shall I seem crest-fallen in my father's sight?
Shakespeare, "Richard II.," l. 1.

Cre'ticus. Metellus, the Roman general, was so called because he conquered Crete (Candia).

Cre'tinism. Prevalence of goitre; idiotcy. So called from the Crétins of the Alps. The word is a corruption of Christian (Chrétien), because, being baptised, and only idiots, they were "washed from original sin," and incapable of actual sin. Similarly, idiots are called innocents.

Crex. White bullace. (Dutch, kriecke, cherry; Latin, cer'asum.)

Crib. To steal small articles. (Saxon, cryb; Irish, grib; our grab, grapple, grip, gripe, &c.)

A literal translation of a classic author used surreptitiously by a student is called a crib. The allusion in this case to the stupidity rather than to the dishonesty of the act may punningly refer to some such quotation as Imbrem in cribrum gerere (pouring water into a sieve).

Cricket. A game with bat and ball. (Saxon, crice, a stick or club.)

Crikey. A profane oath; a perverted form of the word Christ.

Crillon. Where wert thou, Crillon? Crillon, surnamed the Brave, in his old age went to church, and listened intensely to the story of the Crucifixion. In the middle of the narrative he grew excited, and, unable to contain himself, cried out, "Où étais tu, Crillon?" (What were you doing, Crillon, to allow of such things as these?)

N.B.—Louis de Berton des Balbes de Crillon was one of the greatest captains of the sixteenth century. Born in Provence, 1541; died 1615.

Crimp. A decoy; a man or woman that is on the look-out to decoy the unwary. It is more properly applied to an agent for supplying ship-stores, but these agents are generally in league with public-houses and private lodging-houses of low character, into which they decoy the sailors and clear them out under one pretence or another. (Welsh, crimpiau, to squeeze or pinch.)

Crip'ple. A battered or bent six-pence; so called because it is hard to make it go.

Crip'plegate. St. Giles is the patron saint of cripples and beggars, and was himself a cripple. Churches dedicated to this saint are, therefore, in the suburbs of large towns, as St. Giles of London, Norwich, Cambridge, Salisbury, &c. Cripplegate, London, was so called before the Conquest, from the number of cripples who resorted thither to beg.—Stowe.

Cris'-cross Row (Christ-cross row). The A B C horn-book, containing the alphabet and nine digits. The most ancient of these infant-school books had the letters arranged in the form of a Latin cross, with A at the top and Z at the bottom; but afterwards the letters were arranged in lines, and a + was placed at the beginning to remind the learner that "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom."

Mortals ne'er shall know
More than contained of old the Cris'-cross row.
Tickell, "The Horn Book."

Crish'na. An incarnate deity of perfect beauty. King Canza being informed that a child of the family of Devaci would overturn his throne, gave orders to destroy all the male infants that were born. When Crishna was born, his nurse attempted to poison him, but failed, and the mother and child fled, and were taken care of by a shepherd.

As he grew up, his beauty was so divine that all the princesses of Hindustan fell in love with him, and even to the present hour he is the Apollo of India and the "idol of women." His images are always painted a deep azure colour.—Sir W. Jones. (See RAMA.)

Cris'is properly means the "ability to judge." Hippoc'ratēs said that all diseases had their periods, when the humours of the body ebbed and flowed like the tide of the sea. These tidal days he called critical days, and the tide itself a crisis, because it was on these days the physician could determine whether the disorder was taking a good or a bad turn. The seventh and all its multiples were critical days of a favourable character. (Greek, crino, to judge or determine.)

Cris'pin. A shoemaker. St. Crispin was a shoemaker, and was therefore chosen for the patron saint of the craft. It is said that two brothers, Crispin and Crispian, born in Rome, went to Soissons, in France (A.D. 303), to propagate the Christian religion, and maintained themselves wholly by making and mending shoes. Probably the tale is fabulous, for crepis is Greek for a shoe, Latin crepid-a, and St. Crepis or Crepid became Crepin and Crespin.

St. Crispin's Day. The 25th of October, the day of the battle of Agincourt. Shakespeare makes Crispin Crispian one person, and not two brothers. Hence Henry V. says to his soldiers—

And Crispin Crispian shall ne'er go by...
But we in it shall be remembered.

Act iv. s. 3.

St. Crispin's Holiday. Every Monday, with those who begin the working week on Tuesday; a no-work day with shoemakers. (See CRISPIN.)

Crite'rión. A standard to judge by. (Greek, krino, to judge.)

Critic. A judge; an arbiter. (Greek, crino, to judge.)

Critic. A captious, malignant critic is called a Zoilus (g.e.).

A Bossu Critic.

"And what of this new book the whole world makes such a rout about?" "Oh, 'tis out of all plumb, my lord; quite an irregular thing! not one of the angles at the four corners is a right angle. I had my rule and compasses in my pocket." "Excellent critic!" "And for the epic poem your lordship bide me look at, upon taking the length, breadth, height, and depth of it, and trying them at home upon an exact scale of Bossu's. 'tis out, my lord, in every one of its dimensions." "Admirable connoisseur!"—Sterne.

Prince of Critics. Aristarchos, of Byzantium, who compiled the rhapsodies of Homer. (Second century B.C.)

Stop-watch Critics.

"And how did Garrick speak the scilicet last night?" "Oh, against all rule, my lord, most ungrammatically. Betwixt the substantive and the adjective, which should agree together in number, case, and gender, he made a breath, thus—stopping as if the point wanted settling; and betwixt the nominative case, which your lordship knows should govern the verb, he suspended his voice in the epizoe a dozen times, three seconds and three-fifths by a stop-watch, my lord, each time." "But in suspending his voice, was the sense suspended also? Did no expression or attitude or countenance fill up the chasm? Was the eye silent? Did you narrowly look?" "I looked only at the stop-watch, my lord." "Excellent observer!"—Sterne.

Croak'er (2 syl.). A raven, so called from its croak; one who takes a desponding view of things. Goldsmith, in his "Good-natured Man," has a character so named.

Crocodile (3 syl.). A symbol of deity among the Egyptians, because it is the only aquatic animal, says Plutarch, which has its eyes covered with a thin transparent membrane, by reason of which it sees and is not seen; so God sees all, himself not being seen. To this he subsequently adds another reason, saying: "The Egyptians worship God symbolically in the crocodile, that being the only animal without a tongue, like the Divine Logos, which standeth not in need of speech."—De Iside et Osiride, vol. ii., p. 381.

Crocodile. The marsh crocodile is afraid of man, and hides its snout in mud when alarmed, thinking itself perfectly secure. (See BOOBY, OSTRICH.)

Crocodile. The humming bird and lapwing enter fearlessly into the stretched mouth of the crocodile, and the creature never injures them. Paul Lucas says he has seen this, and that the birds pick the crocodile's teeth.—Voyage fait en 1714. (See FONDA.)

Crocodile's Eye. Hieroglyphic for the morning.

Crocodile's Tears. Hypocritical tears. The tale is, that crocodiles moan and sigh like a person in deep distress, to allure travellers to the spot, and even shed tears over their prey while in the act of devouring it.

As the mournful crocodile
With sorrow shines relenting passengers.
Shakespeare, "2 Henry VI.", iii. 1.

Cræsus. Rich as Cræsus. Cræsus king of Lydia was so rich and powerful, that all the wise men of Greece were drawn to his court, and his name became proverbial for wealth. (B.C. 560-546.) (See GYGES.)

Crom'eruach'. Chief idol of the Irish before the preaching of St. Patrick. It was a gold or silver image surrounded by twelve little brazen ones.

Cromlech. A large stone resting on two or more others, like a table. (Welsh, crom, "bent;" hec, "a flat stone.")

Weyland Smith's cave (Berkshire), Tre-veyth stone (Cornwall), Kit's Coty House (Kent). Irby and Mangles saw twenty-seven structures just like these on the banks of the Jordan; at Plas Newydd (Anglesey) are two cromlechs; in Cornwall they are numerous; so are they in Wales; some few are found in Ireland, as the "killing stone" in Louth. In Britany, Denmark, Germany, and some other parts of Europe, cromlechs are to be found.

Cro'nian Sea. The north polar sea. Pliny says, "A Thulé unius diei navigatio'nē marē concretam, a nonnullis cronium appellatur."—"Natural History," iv. 16.

As when two polar winds, blowing adverse
Upon the Cronian sea.
Milton, "Paradise Lost," x. 290.

Cro'ny. A familiar friend. An old crony is an intimate of times gone by. Probably crone with the diminutive ie for endearment, and equivalent to "dear old fellow," "dear old boy."

Crook in the Lot. There is a crook in the lot of every one. There is vexation bound up in every person's lot of life, a skeleton in the cupboard of every house. A crook in a stick is a bend, a part where the stick does not run straight, hence a "shepherd's crook." When lots were drawn by bits of stick, it was desirable to get sticks which were smooth and straight; but it is very hard to find one without a crook, knot, or some other defect. Boston has a book entitled "The Crook in the Lot."

Crooked as Crawley. (See CRAWLEY.)

Crop up (or) out. To rise out of, to appear at the surface. A mining term. Strata which rise to the surface are said to crop out. We also say, such and such a subject crops up from time to time—i.e., risings to the surface; such and such a thing crops out of what you were saying—i.e., is apropos thereof.

Croquemitaine (croak-mit-tain), the bogie raised by fear. The romance so called, in three parts. The first relates the bloody tournament at Fransa', between the champions of the Moorish king Marsillus and the paladins of Charlemagne. The second is the siege of Saragossa by Charlemagne. The third is the allegory of Fear-Fortress. The epilogue is the disaster at Roncesvallés. The author is M. l'Épine. There is an English version by Tom Hood, illustrated by Gustave Doré (1867). (See FEAR-FORTRESS, MITAINE, &c.)

Cross. The cross is said to have been made of four sorts of wood (palm, cedar, olive, and cypress) to signify the four quarters of the globe.

Ligna crucis palma, cedrus, cupressus, oli'va.

We are accustomed to consider the sign of the cross as wholly a Christian symbol, originating with the crucifixion of our Redeemer: this is quite erroneous. The ancient Egyptians employed the same as a sacred symbol, and we see on Greek sculptures, &c., a cake with a cross; two such buns were discovered at Herculanéum.

The judgment of the Cross. An ordeal instituted in the reign of Charlemagne. The plaintiff and defendant were required to cross their arms upon their breast, and he who could hold out the longest gained the suit.

Every one must bear his own cross. His own burden or troubles. The allusion is to the Jewish law that the person condemned to be crucified was to carry his cross to the place of execution.

Cross, ill-tempered, is the Anglo-Saxon cross.

Azeyn (against) hem was he kene and cross.
Cursor Mundi.

Cross and Ball, so universally marked on Egyptian figures, is a circle and the letter τ. The circle signifies the eternal preserver of the world, and the τ is the monogram of Thoth, the Egyptian Mercury, meaning wisdom.

The coronation orb is a sphere or ball surmounted by a cross, an emblem of empire introduced in representations of our Saviour. In this case the cross stands above the ball, to signify that the spiritual power is above the temporal.

Cross and Pile. Money; pitch and toss. Hilaire le Gai tells us that some of the ancient French coins had a cross, and others a column, on the reverse; the column was called a pile, from which comes our word "pillar," and the phrase "pile-driving." Scaliger says that some of the old French coins had a ship on the reverse, the arms of Paris, and that pile means "a ship," whence our word "pilot."

A man may now justifiably throw up cross and pile for his opinions.—Locke, "Human Understanding."

Cross or Pile, heads or tails. The French say pile ou face. The "face" or cross was the obverse of the coin, the "pile" was the reverse; but at a later period the cross was transferred to the reverse, as in our florins, and the obverse bore a "head" or "poll."

Marriage is worse than cross I win, pile you lose,
Shadwell, "Epsom Wells."

Cross nor Pile. I have neither cross nor pile. Not a penny in the world. The French phrase is, N'avoir ni croix ni pile (to have neither one sort of coin nor another).

Whacum had neither cross nor pile.
Butler, "Hudibras," pt. ii. 3.

Cross Buns. (See BUNS.)

Cross-grained. Patchy, ill-tempered, self-willed. Wood must be worked with the grain; where the grain crosses we get a knot or curling, which would be very hard to work uniform with the rest.

Cross-patch. A peevish, cross-grained child. A patch is a paltry fellow; a patchy person is one who is uncertain in temper: he is like a garment in which the pattern runs one way and the patch another, or like a patch of new cloth in an old garment, which destroys the drape and greatly disfigures the garment.

Cross-roads. The practice of burying in cross-roads is due to the ancient practice of erecting a cross at such places. Those who were excluded from holy rites were piously buried at the foot of the cross erected on the public road, as the place next in sanctity to consecrated ground.

Crotalum. A sort of castanet, rattled in dancing. Aristophanès calls a great talker krot'alon (a clack).

Crot'chet. A whim; a fancy; a twist of the mind, like the crotch or crome of a stick. (See CROOK)

The duke hath crotchets in him.
Shakespeare, "Measure for Measure," iii. 2.

Croto'na's Sage. Pytha'goras. So called because at Crotona he established his first and chief school of philosophy. Such success followed his teaching, that the whole aspect of the town became more moral and decorous in a marvellously short time.

Crow. As the crow flies. The shortest route between two given places. The crow flies straight to its point of destination.

To crow over one is to exult over a vanquished or abased person. The allusion is to cocks, who always crow when they have vanquished an adversary.

I must pluck a crow with you; I have a crow to pick with you. I am displeased with you, and must call you to account. I have a small complaint to make against you. In Howell's proverbs (1659) we find the following, "I have a goose to pluck with you," used in the same sense; and Chaucer has the phrase "Pull a finch," but means thereby, to cheat or flech. Children of distinction among the Greeks and Romans had birds for their amusement, and in their boyish quarrels used to pluck or pull the feathers out of each other's pets. Tyn'darus, in his "Captives," alludes to this, but instances it with a lapring. In hieroglyphics, a crow symbolises contention, discord, strife.

If a crow help us in, sirrah, we'll pluck a crow together.—Shakespeare, "Comedy of Errors," iii. 1.

If not, resolve before we go
That you and I must pull a crow.
Bulwer, "Hudibras," pt. ii. 2.

Crow. Why black. (See RAVEN.)

Crowbar. A bar with a crook, used for leverage. (Saxon, krok; Welsh, crwg; Gothic, Krugg; our crook.)

Crowd. A fiddle. (Welsh, crwth.)

O sweet consent, between a crowd and a Jew's harp!

Crowdero. One of the rabble leaders encountered by Hudibras at a bear-baiting. The original of this character was one Jackson or Jephson, a milliner, who lived in the New Exchange, Strand. He lost a leg in the service of the Roundheads, and was reduced to the necessity of fiddling from alehouse to alehouse for his daily bread. The word means fiddler. (See CROWD.)

Crowns. In heraldry nine crowns are recognised: The oriental, the triumphal or imperial, the diadem, the obdisional crown, the civic, the crown vallery, the mural crown, the naval, and the crown celestial.

The Blockade Crown (coro'na obsidionalis), presented by the Romans to the general who liberated a beleaguered army. This was made of grass and wild flowers gathered from the spot.

A Camp Crown was given by the Romans to him who first forced his way into the enemy's camp. It was made of gold, and decorated with palisades.

A Civil Crown was presented to him who preserved the life of a civis or Roman citizen in battle. This crown was made of oak leaves, and bore the inscription, H.O.C.S. — i.e., hostem oc'cidit, ci veni serva'vit (the foe he slew, the citizen saved).

A Mural Crown was given by the Romans to that man who first scaled the wall of a besieged town. It was made of gold, and decorated with battlements.

A Naval Crown was by the Romans given to him who won a naval victory. It was made of gold, and decorated with the beaks of ships.

An Olive Crown was by the Romans given to those who distinguished themselves in battle in some way not specially mentioned in other clauses.

An Oedion Crown (coro'na ovalis) was by the Romans given to the general who vanquished pirates or any despised enemy. It was made of myrtle.

A Triumphal Crown was by the Romans given to the general who obtained a triumph. It was made of laurel or bay leaves. Sometimes a massive gold crown was given to a victorious general. (See LAUREL.)

Crown of the East—i.e., Antioch, capital of Syria, which consisted of four walled cities, encompassed by a common rampart, which "enrounded them like a coronet." It was also surnamed "the beautiful."

Crowner. Coroner.

The crowner hath set on her, and finds it Christian burial.—Shakespeare, "Hamlet," v. 1.

Crowquill (Alfred) is Alfred H. Forrester. (Born 1805.)

Croysa'do. The Great Croysado. General lord Fairfax.—Hudibras.

Cro'zier (or) Cro'sier. An archbishop's staff terminates in a floriated cross, while a bishop's crook has a curved, bracken-like head. A bishop turns his crook outwards, to denote his wider authority; an abbot (whose crook is the same as a bishop's) carries it turned inwards, to show that his jurisdiction is limited to his own inmates. When walking with a bishop, an abbot covers his crook with a veil hanging from the knob, to show that his authority is veiled in the presence of his superior.

Cru'cial. A crucial test. A very severe and undeniable one. The allusion is to a fancy of lord Bacon's, who said that two different diseases or sciences might run parallel for a time, but would ultimately cross each other: thus, the plague might for a time resemble other diseases, but when the bubo or boil appeared, it would assume its specific character. Hence the phrases instantia crucis (a crucial or unmistakable symptom), a crucial experiment, a crucial example, a crucial question, &c.

Crude Forms in grammar; the roots or essential letters of words. The words are crude or unfinished.

Cruel (The). Pedro, king of Castile. (1334, 1350-1369.)

Pedro I. of Portugal; also called le Justicier. (1320, 1357-1367.)

Cruel Garters. Garters made of worsted or yarn.

Ha! ha! look, he wears cruel garters.
Shakespeare, "King Lear," ii. 4.

Wearing of silk, why art thou so cruel?
"Woman's a Weathercock," (1612.)

Crump. Don't you wish you may get it, Mrs. Crump? Grose says Mrs. Crump, a farmer's wife, was invited to dune with lady Coventry, who was very deaf. Mrs. Crump wanted some beer, but awed by the purple and plush, said, in a half whisper, "I wish I had some beer, now." Mr. Flunkey, conscious that his mistress could not hear, replied in the same aside, "Don't you wish you may get it?" At this the farmer's wife rose from table, and helped herself. Lady Coventry, of course, demanded the reason, and the anecdote soon became a standing joke.

Crusades (2 syl.). Holy wars in which the warriors wore a cross, and fought, nominally at least, for the honour of the cross. Each nation had its special colour: thus, the cross of England was yellow or gold; of France, white or silver; of Italy, blue or azure; of Spain, red or gules; of Scotland, a St. Andrew's cross; and of the Knights Templars, red on white.

The seven Crusades.

1. (1096-1100.) Preached up by Peter the Hermit. Led by Godfrey of Bouillon, who took Jerusalem.

2. (1147-1149.) At the instigation of St. Bernard. Led by Louis VII. and the emperor Conrad. To secure the union of Europe.

3. (1189-1193.) Led by Richard Lion-heart. For knightly distinction. This was against Saladin or Salah-Eddin.

4. (1202-1204.) Led by Baldwin of Flanders and the doge. To glorify the Venetians.

5. (1217.) Led by John of Brienne, titular king of Jerusalem. To suit his own purpose.

6. (1228-1229.) Led by Frederick II. To suit the purposes of the pope.

7. (1248-1254) and 8 (1268-1270.) To satisfy the religious scruples of Louis IX.

Crush. To crush a bottle—i.e., drink one. From the Italian crosciare (to decant). Shakespeare has also burst a bottle in the same sense (Induction of "Taming the Shrew"). (See CRACK.)

Come and crush a cup of wine.
Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet," i. 2.

To crush a fly on a wheel. To crack a nut with a steam-hammer; to employ power far too valuable for the purpose to be accomplished. The wheel referred to is the rack.

Cru'soe (4). A solitary man; the only inhabitant of a place. The tale of Defoe is well known, which describes Robinson Crusoe as cast on a desert island, where he employs the most admirable ingenuity in providing for his daily wants.

Whence creeping forth, to Duty's call he yields,
And strolls the Crusoe of the lonely fields.
Bloomfield, "Farmer's Boy."

Crusted Port. When port is first bottled its fermentation is not complete; in time it precipitates alcohol on the sides of the bottle, where it forms a crust. Crusted port, therefore, is port which has completed its fermentation.

Crusty. Ill-tempered, apt to take offence; from crus (wrathful); our cross.

Azevn (against) hem was he kene and crous,
Aud said, "Goth out of my Fader hous."
Cursor Mundi.

Crutched Friars is the Latin cruciati (crossed)—i.e., having a cross embroidered on their dress. They were of the Trinitarian order.

Cry. Great cry and little wool. This is derived from the ancient mystery of "David and Abigail," in which Nabal is represented as shearing his sheep, and the Devil, who is made to attend the churl, imitates the act by "shearing a hog." Originally the proverb ran thus, "Great cry and little wool, as the devil said when he sheared the hogs." N.B.—Hudibras alters the proverb into "All cry and no wool."

Crystal Hills. On the coast of the Caspian, near Badku, is a mountain which sparkles like diamonds, from the sea-glass and crystals with which it abounds.

Crystalline (3 syl.). The Crystalline sphere. According to Ptolemy, beyond the firmament or sphere of the fixed stars comes the crystalline sphere, which oscillates or has a shimmering motion which interferes with the regular motion of the stars.

They pass the planets seven, and pass the "fixed,"
And that crystal line sphere, whose balance weighs
The trepidation talked of.

Milton, "Paradise Lost," lili.

Cub. An ill-mannered lout. The cub of a bear is said to have no shape until its dam has licked it into form.

A bear's a savage beast, of all
Most ugly and unnatural;
Whelped without form until the dam
Has licked it into shape and frame.

Butler, "Hudibras," i. 3.

Cubittop'olis. The Warwick and Eccleston Square districts of London; so called from Cubitt the builder.

Cucking-stool or Choking-stool, for ducking scolds, is not connected with choke (to stifle), but the French choquer; hence the archaic verb cuck (to throw), and one still in use, chuck (chuck-farthing). The cucking-stool is therefore the chucking-stool, the stool which is chucked or thrown into the water.

Now, if one cucking-stool was for each scold,
Some towns, I fear, would not their numbers hold.
"Poor Robin." (1746).

Cuckold. (See ACTÆON.)

Cuckold King (The). Mark of Cornwall, whose wife Yseult intrigued with Sir Tristram, one of the Knights of the Round Table.

Cuckold's Point. A spot on the river-side near Deptford. So called from a tradition that king John made there successful love to a labourer's wife.

Cuckoo. Cuckoo oats and woodcock hay makes the farmer run away. If the spring is so backward that the cuckoo is heard when oats are sown; and the autumn so wet that woodcocks come over before the eddish hay is cut, the farmer must suffer great loss.

Cuckoo. A cuckold. The cuckoo occupies the nest and eats the eggs of other birds; and Dr. Johnson says, "It was usual to alarm a husband at the approach of an adulterer by calling out 'Cuckoo,' which by mistake was applied in time to the person warned." Green calls the cuckoo "the cuckold's quirister" ("Quip for an Upstart Courtier," 1620). This is an instance of how words get in time perverted from their original meaning. The Romans used to call an adulterer a "cuckoo," as "Te euculum uxor ex lustris rapit" (Plautus, "Asin.," v. 3), and the allusion was simple and correct; but Dr. Johnson's explanation will hardly satisfy any one except himself for the modern perversion of the word.

The cuckoo then, on every tree,
Mocks married men; for thus sings he,
Cuckoo!

Cuckoo! cuckoo! O word of fear,
Unpleasing to a married ear!

Shakespeare, "Love's Labour's Lost," v. 2.

Cuckoo Spit. A spume found on lavender bushes, rosemary, fly-catch, and some other plants. It proceeds from a small insect, which, like the cochineal, exudes a foam for its own warmth and protection during its state of transition. The term "cuckoo" is synonymous with spring or cuckoo-time.

Cu'cumber Time. The dull season in the tailoring trade. The Germans call it Die saure Gurken Zeit (pickled gherkin time). Hence the expression Tailors are vegetarians, because they live on "cucumber" when without work, and on "cabbage" when in full employ.—Notes and Queries.

Cuddy. An ass; a dolt. A gipsy term, from the Persian gudda and the Hindustanee ghudda (an ass).

Haet got thy breakfast, brother cuddy?
D. Wingate.

Cue (1 syl.). The tail of a sentence (French, queue), the catch-word which indicates when another actor is to speak; a hint; the state of a person's temper, as, "So-and-so is in a good cue (or) bad cue."

When my cue comes, call me, and I will answer.—Shakespeare, "Midsummer-Night's Dream," iv. 1.

Cuffey. A negro. A generic name for the race. Cuffen and Cudden are different forms of the same word, also written Cuddy (a dolt, ass), applied to slaves, who are used like asses.

Sambo and Cuffey expand under every sky.—H. Beecher Stowe.

Cui Bono? What practical use is it? what would be gained thereby? Literally, to what or whom is it a gain? (Est with two datives.)

Cuirass. Sir Arthur's cuirass was "carved of one emerald, centred in a sun of silver rays, that lightened as he breathed."—Tennyson, "Elaine."

Cuish'es or Cuisses (2 syl.). Armour for the thighs. (French, cuisse, the thigh.)

Soon o'er his thighs he plac'd the cuishes bright.
"Jerusalem Delivered," bk. xi.

His cuisses on his thighs, gallantly armed.
Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV.," iv. 1.

Cul de Sac (French). A blind alley, or alley blocked up at one end like a sack. Figuratively, an argument, &c., that leads to nothing.

Culdees. A religious order of Ireland and Scotland, said to have been founded in the sixth century by St. Columba. So called from the Gaelic cylle-dee (a house of cells) or Gille De (servants of God). Giraldus Cambrensis, going to the Latin for its etymology, according to a custom unhappily not yet extinct, derives it from colo-deus (to worship God).

Culminate (3 syl.). Come to a crisis. The passage of a celestial body over the meridian at the upper transit is called its culmination. (Latin, culmen, the top.)

Cul'prit. Anciently, when a person pleaded "not guilty," the clerk pronounced these words, Qu'il paroit (may it appear so!). It is an outrage to derive it from the Latin culpa and French prit; a horse and an ass are never yoked together in philology.

Culross Girdles. The thin plate of iron used in Scotland for the manufacture of oaten cakes is called a "girle," for which Culross was long celebrated.

Locks and bars, plough-graith and harrow-teeth! and why not grates and firebricks, and Culross girdles?—Scott, "Fair Maid of Perth," c. ii.

Cul'ver. Pigeon. (Old English, col-ver; Latin, columba; hence, culver-house, a dove-cote.)

On liquid wing
The sounding culver shoots.
Thomson, "Spring."

Cul'verin properly means a serpent (Latin, colubri'neus, the col'uber), but is applied to a long, slender piece of artillery employed in the sixteenth century to carry balls to a great distance. Queen Elizabeth's "Pocket Pistol" in Dover castle is a culverin.

Cul'verkeys. The keys or flowers of the culver or columba—i.e., columbine.

Cumberland Poet (The). William Wordsworth, born at Cockermouth. (1770-1850.)

Cuncta'tor (the delayer). Quintus Fabius Maximus, the Roman general who baffled Hannibal by avoiding direct engagements, and wearing him out by marches, countermarches, and skirmishes from a distance. This was the policy by which Duguesclin forced the English to abandon their possessions in France in the reign of Charles V. (le Sage).

Cu'neiform Letters. Letters like wedges (Latin, cu'neus, a wedge). These sort of letters occur in old Persian and Babylonian inscriptions. They are sometimes called Arrow-headed characters, and those found at Babylon are called nail-headed. This species of writing is the most ancient of which we have any knowledge.

Cu'no. The ranger, father of Agatha, in Weber's opera of "Der Freischütz."

Cu'nobelin's Gold Mines. Caverns in the chalk beds of Little Throck, Essex. So called from the tradition that king Cu'nobelin hid in them his gold. They are sometimes called Dane-holes, because they were used as lurking-places by the Norsen.en.

Cunstance. A model of Resignation, daughter of the emperor of Rome. The sultan of Syria, in order to have her for his wife, renounced his religion and turned Christian; but the sultan's mother murdered him, and turned Cunstance adrift on a raft. After a time the raft stranded on a rock near Northumberland, and the constable rescued Cunstance, and took her home, where she converted his wife, Hermegild. A young lord fell in love with her; but his suit being rejected, he murdered Hermegild, and laid the charge of murder against Cunstance. King Ella adjudged the cause, and Cunstance being proved innocent, he married her. While Ella was in Scotland, Cunstance was confined with a boy, named Maurice; and Ella's mother, angry with Cunstance for the introduction of the Christian religion, put her on a raft adrift with her baby boy. They were accidentally found by a senator, and taken to Rome. Ella having discovered that his mother had turned his wife and child adrift, put her to death, and went to Rome in pilgrimage to atone for his crime. Here he fell in with his wife and son. Maurice succeeded his grandfather as emperor of Rome, and at the death of Ella, Cunstance returned to her native land.—Chaucer, "The Man of Lawes Tale."

Cuntur. A bird worshipped by the ancient Peruvians. It is generally called the "condor," and by the Arabians the "roc."

Cup. We must drink the cup. We must bear the burden awarded to us, the sorrow which falls to our lot. The allusion is to the words of our Lord in the garden of Gethsemane (Matt. xxvi. 39; also xx. 22). One way of putting criminals to death in ancient times was by poison; Socrates had hemlock to drink. In allusion to this it is said that Jesus Christ tasted death for every man (Heb. ii. 9).

Many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip.
(See ANCEUS.)

Cup Tosser. A juggler (French, joueur de gobelet). The old symbol for a juggler was a goblet. The phrase and symbol are derived from the practice of jugglers who toss in the air, twist on a stick, and play all sorts of tricks with goblets or cups.

Cupar. He that will to Cupar man to Cupar. He that will have his own way, must have it even to his injury. The reference is to the Cistercian monastery, founded here by Malcolm IV.

Cupboard Love. Love from interested motives. The allusion is to the love of children to some indulgent person who gives them something nice from her cupboard.

Cupboard love is seldom true.—Poor Robin.

Cupid and Psyché. An exquisite episode in the "Golden Ass" of Apuleius. It is an allegory representing the progress of the soul to perfection. Mrs. Tighe has a poem on the same subject; and Molière a drama entitled "Psyche."

Cur. A fawning, mean-spirited fellow; a crop-tailed dog (Latin, curtus, crop-tailed; French, court; our cart). According to forest laws, a man who had no right to the privilege of the chase was obliged to cut off the tail of his dog, for if a dog has no ruddler-tail he cannot hunt game. Hence a degenerate dog or man is called a cur.

What would you have, you curs,
That like nor peace nor war?
Shakespeare, "Coriolanus," i. 1.

Curate. (See CLERICAL TITLES.)

Curchus. A divinity worshipped by the ancient Prussians. It presided over food and drink.

Curé de Meudon—i.e., Rabelais, who was first a monk, then a leech, then prebend of St. Maur, and lastly euré of Meudon. (1483-1553.)

Curfew Bell. The bell rung in the reigns of William I. and II. at sunset, to give notice to their subjects that they were to put out their fires and candles (French, courre feu, cover-fire). Prior to the Conquest, the "Evensong Bell" rang for vespers.

The curfew tolls the knell of parting day.
Gray, "Elegy."

This battell begane in Chyviat
An owar befor the none.
And when the even-song bell was rang
The battell was not half done.
Chevy Chase.

Curmudgeon (3 syl.) is Saxon ceol-modigun (churlish-minded). Dr. Johnson gives the derivation of this word thus, "cœur méchant, unknown correspondent." Dr. Ash, in his dictionary, says, "cœur, unknown; méchant, correspondent," a blunder only paralleled by the schoolboy translation of the Greek me genolito by me (God) geonito (forbid) (Luke xx. 6).

Currant. A corruption of Corinth, hence called by Juvenal Corinthiææ uœe; unless, indeed, it is a vitiated form of the Greek korumb (a bunch of grapes, a cluster).

Current. The drift of the current is the rate per hour at which the current runs.

The setting of the current is that point of the compass towards which the waters of the current run.

Currer Bell. The nom de plume of Charlotte Brontë, authoress of "Jane Eyre." (1816-1855.)

Curric'ulum. The whole course of study adopted in a school, college, or university. Properly, a race for a prize. The Romans used the expression curriculum vite (the curriculum of life).

Curse. Not worth a curse. Worth nothing, not worth a fig. Curse means a wild cherry (kerse); German, kirsch.

Wisdom and witt now is not worthe a kerse.—Robert Langland, "Piers Ploughman."

Curse of Scotland. The nine of diamonds. The two most plausible suggestions are these:—1. The nine of diamonds in the game of pope Joan is called the pope, the antichrist of the Scotch reformers. 2. In the game of comette, introduced by queen Mary, it is the great winning card, and the game was the curse of Scotland, because it was the ruin of so many families.

Other suggestions are these. 3. The word "curse" is a corruption of cross, and the nine of diamonds is so arranged as to form a St. Andrew's Cross; but as the nine of hearts would do as well, this explanation must be abandoned. 4. Some say it was the card on which the "Butcher Duke" wrote his cruel order after the battle of Collo'den; but the term must have been in vogue at the period, as the ladies nicknamed Justice-Clerk Ormiston "The Nine of Diamonds" (1715). 5. Similarly we must reject the suggestion that it refers to the arms of Dalrymple, earl of Stair—viz., or, on a saltire azure, nine lozenges of the first. The earl was justly held in abhorrence for the massacre of Glencoe; so also was Colonel Packer, who attended Charles I. on the scaffold, and had for his arms "gules a cross lozengy or."

Cursing by Bell, Book, and Candle is reading the anathema in the church, and at the close casting the Bible on the ground, tolling the bell, and extinguishing all the candles, saying, "Fiat, fiat! Do-to the Book; quench the candles; ring the bell. Amen, amen."

Curst. Curst cours have curt horns. Angry men cannot do all the mischief they wish. Curst means "angry" or "fierce," from the Dutch korsel, and curt is "short," as in curt-mantle, curthouse. The Latin proverb is "Dat Deus immi'ti cor'ua curta bovi."

You are called plain Kate,
And bonny Kate, and sometimes Kate the curst.
Shakespeare, "Taming of the Shrew," ii. 1.

Curtail. To cut short. (French, court tailler, short cut.)

Curtain Lecture. The nagging of a wife after her husband is in bed. The lectures of Mrs. Caudle in Punch are first-rate caricatures of these "small cattle."

Curta'na. The sword of Edward the Confessor, which having no point, was the emblem of mercy. The royal sword of England was so called to the reign of Henry III.

But when Curtana will not do the deed
You lay the pointless clergy-weapon by,
And to the laws, your sword of justice, fly.
Dryden, "Hind and Panther," pt. ii.

Curthose (2 syl.). Robert II., duc de Normandie. (1087-1134.)

Curtis'e (2 syl.). The little hound, in the tale of "Reynard the Fox." (High German, kurz; French, courte, short or small.)

Curtmantle. The surname of Henry II. He introduced the Anjou mantle, which was shorter than the robe worn by his predecessors. (1133, 1154-1189.)

Curule Chair. Properly, a chariot chair, an ornamental stool placed by the Romans in a chariot for the chief magistrate when he went to attend the council. As dictators, consuls, prætors, censors, and the chief ediles occupied such a chair, they were termed curule magistrates or curul'es.

Curzon Street (London). Named after the ground landlord, George Augustus Curzon, third viscount Howe.

Custard. A slap on the hand with a ferula. The word should be custid, unless a play is meant. (Latin, cutis, a club or stick.)

Custard Coffin. (See COFFIN.)

Cus'tomer. A man or acquaintance.

A rum customer is one better left alone, as he is likely to show fight if interfered with. A shop term.

Here be many of her old customers.
Shakespeare, "Measure for Measure," iv. 3.

Custos Rotulo'rum (keeper of the rolls). The chief civil officer of a county, to whose custody are committed the records or rolls of the sessions.

Cut. To renounce acquaintance. There are four sorts of cut—

(1.) The cut direct, which is to start direct across the road when the obnoxious person draws near.

(2.) The cut indirect, to look another way, and pretend not to see him.

(3.) The cut sublime, to admire the top of some tall edifice or the clouds of heaven till the person cut has passed by.

(4.) The cut infernal, to stoop and adjust your boots till the party has gone past.

There is a very remarkable Scripture illustration of the word cut, meaning to renounce: "Jehovah took a staff and cut it asunder, in token that he would break his covenant with his people; and he cut another staff asunder, in token that he would break the brotherhood of Judah and Israel. (Zech. xi. 7—14.)

He has cut his eye-teeth. He is wide awake, he is a knowing one. The eye-teeth are the canine teeth, just under the eyes, and the phrase means he can bite as well as bark. Of course, the play is on the word "eye," and those who have cut their eye-teeth are wide awake.

Cut your wisdom teeth. Wisdom teeth are those at the extreme end of the jaws, which do not make their appearance till persons have come to years of discretion. When persons say or do silly things, the remark is made to them that "they have not yet cut their wisdom teeth," or reached the years of discretion.

Cut the knot. Break through an obstacle. The reference is to the Gordian knot (q.c.) shown to Alexander, with the assurance that whoever loosed it would be made ruler of all Asia; whereupon the Macedonian cut it in two with his sword, and claimed to have fulfilled the prophecy.

I must cut my stick—i.e., leave. The Irish usually cut a shillelah before they start on an expedition. Punch gives the following witty derivation:—"Pilgrims on leaving the Holy Land used to cut a palm stick, to prove that they had really been to the Holy Sepulchre. So brother Francis would say to brother Paul, 'Where is brother Benedict?' 'Oh (says Paul), he has cut his stick!'—i.e., he is on his way home." (See CUT.)

I'll cut your comb for you. Take your conceit down. The allusion is to the practice of cutting the combs of capons.

He'll cut up well. He is rich, and his property will cut into good slices.

Cut a Dash. Make a show. Cut is the French couper, better seen in the noun coup, as a grand coup, a coup de maître (a masterly stroke), so "to cut" means to make a masterly coup, to do something to be looked at and talked about. Dashing means striking—i.e., showy, as a "dashing fellow," a "dashing equipage." To cut a dash, is to get one's-self looked at and talked about for a showy or striking appearance.

Cut and Dry. Already prepared. "He had a speech all cut and dry." The allusion is to timber cut, dry, and fit for use.

Cut Away. Be off at once. This is a French phrase, couper (cut away)—i.e., to break through the enemy's ranks by cutting them down with your swords.

Cut it Short. (See AUDLEY.)

Cut of his Jib. The contour or expression of his face. This is a sailor's phrase. The cut of a jib or foresail of a ship indicates her character. Thus, a sailor says of a suspicious vessel, he "does not like the cut of her jib."

Cut Out. He is cut out for a sailor. Has natural propensities suited for the vocation. The allusion is to cutting out cloth, &c., for specific purposes.

I mean to cut him out. To excel him, to carry off the prize he is aiming at. A sea-phrase, taken from cutting out a ship from the enemy's port.

Cut Short is to shorten. "Cut short all intermission" ("Macbeth," iv. 3). To cut it short means to bring to an end what you are doing or saying.

His life was cut short. He died prematurely. The allusion is to At'ropos, one of the three Parce, cutting the thread of life spun by her sister Clotho.

Cutpurse. Now called "pickpocket." The two words are of historical value. When purses were worn suspended from a girdle, thieves cut the string by which the purse was attached; but when pockets were adopted, and purses were no longer hung on the girdle, the thief was no longer a cut-purse, but became a pickpocket.

To have an open ear, a quick eye, and a nimble hand, is necessary for a cut-purse. — Shakespeare, "Winter's Tale," iv. 3.

Moll Cutpurse. Mary Frith, the heroine of Middleton's comedy called "The Roaring Girl." (See MOLL.)

Cuthbert. St. Cuthbert's beads. Joints of the articulated stems of enerinites, used for rosaries. St. Cuthbert was a Scotch monk of the sixth century, and may be termed the St. Patrick of Great Britain. He is said to sit at night on a rock in Holy Island, and to use the opposite rock as his anvil while he forges the en'trochites (en'-tro-kites). (See BEAD.)

On a rock of Lindisfarne
St. Cuthbert sits, and toils to frame
The sea-born beads that bear his name.
Scott, "Marmion."

St. Cuthbert's Stane. A granite rock in Cumberland.

St. Cuthbert's Well. A spring of water close by St. Cuthbert's stane.

Cuthbert Bede. A nom de plume of the Rev. Edward Bradley, author of "Verdant Green."

Cutler's Poetry. Mere jingles or rhymes. Knives had, at one time, a distich inscribed on the blade by means of aqua fortis.

Whose posy was,
For all the world, like cutler's poetry
Upon a knife.
Shakespeare, "Merchant of Venice," v. 1.

Cutting off with a Shilling. The Romans used to set aside testaments if they passed over natural offspring without mention; but if any legacy was left, it was proof that the testator did what was done purposely. From this arose the notion that it is necessary, for a testament to be valid, to leave the heir a shilling at least.

Cuttle. Captain Cuttle. An eccentric, kind-hearted sailor, simple as a child, credulous of every tale, and generous as the sun. He is immortalised by the motto selected by "Notes and Queries," "When found make a note of." — Dickens, "Dombey and Son."

Unfortunately, I neglected Captain Cuttle's advice, and am now unable to find it. — W. H. Husk, "Notes and Queries."

Cutty Pipe. A short clay pipe. Scotch, cutty (short), as cutty spoons, cutty sark, a cutty (little girl), &c., a cutty gun.

Cuve'ra (3 syl.). The Indian Plutus.

Cwt. is C wt.—i.e., C. centum, wt. weight, meaning hundred-weight.

Cycle. A period or series of events or numbers which recur everlastingly in precisely the same order.

Cycle of the moon. called "Meton's Cycle," from Meton, who discovered it, is a period of nineteen years, at the expiration of which period the phases of the moon repeat themselves on the same identical days as they did nineteen years previously.

Cycle of the sun. A period of twenty-eight years, at the expiration of which time the Sunday letters recur and proceed in the same order as they did twenty-eight years previously.

The Plutonic cycle or great year is that space of time which elapses before all the stars and constellations return to any given state. Tycho Brahe calculated this period at 25,816 years, and Riccioli at 25,920.

Cyclic Poets. Inferior epic poets. On the death of Homer a host of minstrels caught the contagion of his poems, and wrote continuations, illustrations, or additions thereto. These poets were called cyclic because they confined themselves to the cycle of the Trojan war. The chief were Strasi'nos, Areti'nos, Les'chēs, (Les-keys), Ag'ias, and Eu'gamon.

Cyclo'pean. Huge, massive, like the cyclops of classic mythology.

Cyclopæ'dia. The living cyclopædia. Longi'nus, so called for his extensive information. (213-273.)

Cyclo'pean Masonry. Generally applied to the old Pelasgic ruins of Greece, such as the Gallery of Tiryns, the Gate of Lions, the Treasury of Athens, and the Tombs of Phoro'neus and Dan'ao. They are said to have been the work of the cyclops (q. v.).

Cyclops. Giants with only one eye, and that in the centre of their forehead, whose business it was to forge iron for Vulcan. They were probably Pelasgians, who worked in quarries, and attached a lantern to their forehead to give them light underground. The lantern was their one eye as big as the full moon. (Greek, "circular-eye.") (See ARIMAS-PIANS.)

Roused with the sound, the mighty family
Of one-eyed brothers hasten to the shore,
And gather round the bellowing Polypheme.
Addison, "Milton Imitated."

Cyll'aros, according to Virgil, was the celebrated horse of Pollux ("Geor.," iii. 90), but according to Ovid it was Castor's steed ("Met.," xii. 408).

He, O Castor, was a courser worthy thee . . .
Coal-black his colour, but like jet it shone;
His legs and flowing tail were white alone.
Dryden, "Ovid's Metamorphose," xii.

Cyllo. One of the dogs of Actæon. It means "halt" or "lame." (See CORAN.)

Cylop'otes (4 syl.). One of Actæon's dogs. It means "lame in flight."

Cymochlēs. A man of prodigious might, brother of Pyrochlēs, son of Malice (Acratēs) and Despite, and husband of Acrasia, the enchantress. He sets out to encounter Sir Guyon, but is ferried over the Idle Lake by Wantonness (Phœdria), and forgets himself in self-indulgence; he is slain by king Arthur (canto viii.). The word is compounded of the Greek kumaklos, and means, "one who seeks glory in troubles."—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," ii. 5.

Cynægeros. It is said that when the Persians were pushing off from shore after the battle of Mar'athon, Cynægeros, the brother of Æschylos, the poet, seized one of their ships with his right hand, which was instantly lopped off; he then grasped it with his left, which was cut off also; lastly, he seized hold of it with his teeth, and lost his head.

Cynic. A snarling, churlish person, like a cynic. The cynics were so called because Antis'thenēs held his school in the gymnasium called Cynosar'gēs, set apart for those who were not of pure Athenian blood. Cynosar'gēs means white dog, and was so called because a white dog once carried away part of a victim which Diome'os was offering to Herclulēs. The sect was often called the Dog-sect; and the effigy over Diogēnēs' pillar was a dog, with this inscription:—

"Say dog, I pray, what guard you in that tomb?"
"A dog."—"His name?"—"Diogenēs."—"From far?"
"Siao'pē."—"What! who made a tub his home?"
"The same; now dead, amongst the stars a star."

Cynics. The chief were Antis'thenēs of Athens (the founder), Diogēnēs, Onesie'ritos, Mon'imos, Cratēs and his wife Hipparchia, Metroclēs, Menip'pos, and Menedēmos the madman.

Cynosure (3 syl.). The polar star, the observed of all observers. Greek for dog's tail, and applied to the constellation called Ursa Minor. As seamen guide their ships by the north star, and observe it well, the word "cynosure" is used for whatever attracts attention, as "The cynosure of neighbouring eyes" (Milton), especially for guidance in some doubtful matter, as—

Richmond was the cynosure on which all northern eyes were fixed (in the American war).—The Times.

Cynthia. The moon; a surname of Ar'temis or Diana. The Roman Diana, who represented the moon, was called Cynthia from mount Cynthus, where she was born.

And from embat'led clouds emerging slow
Cynthia came riding on her silver car.
Beattie, "Minstrel."

Cynthia. Pope, speaking of the inconstant character of woman, "matter too soft a lasting mark to bear," says—

Come then, the colours and the ground prepare!
Dip in the rainbow, trick her off in air;
Choose a firm cloud, before it fall, and in it
Catch, ere she change, the Cynthia of the minute.
Epistle ii. 17—20.

Cypress (The) is a funeral tree, and was dedicated by the Romans to Pluto, because when once cut it never grows again.

Cypresse garlands are of great account at funerals amongst the gentler sort, but rosemary and bayes are used by the commons both at funerals and weddings. They are plants which fade not a good while after they are gathered . . . and intimate that the remembrance of the present solemnity might not dye presently.—Coles, "Introduction to the Knowledge of Plants."

The magic cypress branch. In the opera of "Roberto il Diav'olo," after the "dance of love," in which Hel'ena seduces the duke, he removes the cypress branch, which has the power of imparting to him whatever he wishes. With this he enters the palace of Isabella, princess of Sicily, and transfixes the princess and her attendants in a magic sleep, but afterwards repenting, breaks the branch, and is dragged away by the guards.

Cyp'rian. A woman of loose morals. So called from the island Cyprus, one of the chief seats of the worship of Venus, hence called Cyp'ria.

Cyp'rios. One of Actæon's dogs. It means the dog from Cyprus. (See CYLOPOTES.)

Cyp'riotes (3 syl.). Natives of the isle of Cyprus.

Cyrena'ic School. Founded by Aristippos of Cyrenë, in Africa. The chief dogma of this philosopher was that pleasure and pain are the criterions of what is good and bad.

Cyre'nians. Philosophers of a school founded by Aristippos at Cyrenë, a Grecian colony on the northern coast of Africa. They were an offshoot of the Epicure'ans.

Cyrus is no proper name, but a title. His name was Kobad, but when he ascended the Persian throne he assumed the royal title of kai (mighty), and was called Kai-Kobad. His son who succeeded him was Kai-Käus, and his grandson Kai-Khosru (Cyrus the Great).

Cyze'nis. The infamous daughter of Diomed, who killed every one that fell into her clutches, and made fathers eat their own children.

D

D. This letter is the outline of a rude archway or door. It is called in Hebrew daleth (a door).

D or d, indicating a penny or pence, is the initial letter of the Latin denarius, a silver coin equal to 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. during the commonwealth of Rome, but in the Middle Ages about equivalent to our penny. The word was used by the Romans for money in general.

D stands for 500, which is half ∞ , a form of m or M , which stands for mille.

D̄ stands for 5,000.

D.O.M. Datur om'nibus mori (It is allotted to all to die).

D.T. Delirium tremens. So called by the "India-giving people."

They get a look, after a touch of D.T., which nothing else, that I know of, can give them,—Indian Tale.

Da Capo (pron. car-po) or D.C. From the beginning, that is, finish with a repetition of the first strain. A term in music. (Italian.)

Dab. Clever, skilled; as "a dab hand at it; a corrupt contraction of the Latin adeptus (an adept). Apt is another form.

An Eton stripling, training for the law,
A dunce at learning, but a dab at law (marbles).
Anon., "Logic; or, the Biter Bit."

Daba'ira. An idol of the savages of Pan'ama', to whose honour slaves are burnt to death. (American mythology.)

Dab'bat (the Beast). The Beast of the Apocalypse, which the Mahometans say will appear with Antichrist, called by them daj'gial. (Rev. xix. 19; xx. 10.)

Dabble. To dabble in the funds; to dabble in politics—i.e., to do something in them in a small way. (Dutch, dabbelen, our dip and tap.)

Dab'chick. A small water-fowl. Dab is a corruption of dap, the old participle of dip, and chick (any young or small fowl), literally the dipping or diving chick.

Dab'is. A colossal idol of brass worshipped in Japan.

Dad or Daddy. Father. The person who acts as father at a wedding; a stage-manager. The superintendent of a casual ward is termed by the inmates "Old Daddy."—A Night in a Work-house, by an Amateur Casual (J. Greenwood).

In the "Fortunes of Nigel" by Sir W. Scott, Steenie, duke of Buckingham, calls king James "My dear dad and gossip." (Welsh, tad; Irish, taid, ancient; Sanskrit, tadu; Hindu, dadu.)

Dæ'dalos. A Greek who formed the Cretan labyrinth, and made for himself wings, by means of which he flew from Crete across the Archipel'ago. He is said to have invented the saw, the axe, the gimlet, and other carpenter's tools.

Daffodil. A corruption of asphodel (French, d'aspodèle). It was once called affadil.

And the roses, and the posies, and the daffy-down-a-dillies.—Groves of Blarney.

Flour of daffodil is a cure for madness.—Med. MS. Lincoln Cathedral, f. 282.

Dag (day). Son of Natt or night. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Dagger or Long Cross (+), used for reference to a note after the asterisk (*), is a Roman Catholic character, originally employed in church books, prayers of exorcism, at benedictions, and so on, to remind the priest where to make the sign of the cross. This sign is sometimes called an obelisk, that is, "a spit." (Greek, obelos, a spit.)

Dagger, in the city arms of London, commemorates Sir William Walworth's dagger, with which he slew Wat Tyler in 1381. Before this time the cognizance of the city was the sword of St. Paul.

Brave Walworth, knight, lord mayor, that slew
Rebellious Tyler in his alarms;
The king, therefore, did give him in lieu
The dagger to the city arms.
Fourth year of Richard II. (1381), Fishmongers' Hall.

Dagger-ale is the ale of the "Dagger," a celebrated ordinary in Holborn.

My lawyer's clerk I lighted on last night
In Holborn, at the "Dagger."
Ben Jonson, "The Alchemist."

Daggle-tail or Draggle-tail. A slovenly woman, the bottom of whose dress trails in the dirt. Dag (Saxon) means loose ends, mire or dirt; whence dag-locks, the soiled locks of a sheep's fleece, and dag-wool, refuse wool.

Dagobert. King Dagobert and St. Gloi. There is a French song very popular with this title. St. Gloi tells the king his coat has a hole in it, and the king replies, "C'est vrai, le tien est bon; prête-le moi." Next the saint complains of the king's stockings, and Dagobert makes the same answer. Then of his wig and cloak; to which the same answer is returned. After seventeen complaints, St. Gloi said, "My king, death is at hand, and it is time to confess," when the king replied, "Why can't you confess, and die instead of me?"

Da'gon (fish-god; Hebrew, dag, a fish). The idol of the Philistines; half woman and half fish. (See ATERGATA.)

Dagon his name; sea-monster, upward man
And downward fish; yet had his temple high
Reared in Azotus, dreaded through the coast
Of Palestine, in Gath and Ascalon.
And Accaron and Gaza's frontier bounds.

Milton, "Paradise Lost," bk. 1. 462.

Dag'onet (Nir). In the romance "La Mort d'Arthur" he is called the fool of king Arthur, but in Mallory's "Morte d'Arthur" he is termed his squire.

I remember at Mile-End Green, when I lay 't
Clement's Inn. I was then Sir Dagonet in Arthur's show (Justice Shallow).—"2 Henry IV." iii. 2

Daguerreotype (4 syl.). A photographic process. So named from M. Daguerre, who greatly improved it in 1839.

Da'gun. A god worshipped in Pegu. When Kiak'iak destroyed the world, Dagon reconstructed it. (Indian mythology.)

Dahak. The Satan of Persia. According to Persian mythology, the ages of the world are divided into periods of 1,000 years. When the cycle of "chilisms" (1,000 year periods) is complete, the reign of Ormuzd will begin, and men will be all good and all happy; but this event will be preceded by the loosing of Dahak, who will break his chain and fall upon the world, and bring on man the most dreadful calamities. Two prophets will appear to cheer the oppressed, and announce the advent of Ormuzd.

Dahlia. A flower. So called from Andrew Dahl, the Swedish botanist.

Daïboth (3 syl.). A Japanese idol of colossal size. Each of her hands is full of hands. (Japanese mythology.)

Daïkoku (4 syl.). The god invoked specially by the artisans of Japan. He sits on a ball of rice, holding a hammer in his hand, with which he beats a sack; and every time he does so the sack becomes full of silver, rice, cloth, and other useful articles. (Japanese mythology.)

Daïmio. The 264 feudal lords of Japan, eighteen of which are independent in their own dominions. The temporary sovereign is called the Tycoon.

Daimonogi'ni (6 syl.). A deity greatly venerated in Japan.

Daï'niz-no-Raï. The Japanese sun-god.

Dainty, strictly speaking, means a venison pasty, from the French, dain (a deer), whence the Old French, dain (delicate, nice). I do not think it means something toothsome, as if from dens; Welsh, dant; French, dent.

Daï'ri (3 syl.). Chief pontiff of the Japanese, also called Ten-Sin (son of heaven.)

Dairy. The ry, ric, or dominion of a dey—i.e., a farm-woman.

The dey or farm-woman entered with her pitchers, to deliver the milk for the family.—Scott, "Fair Maid of Perth," c. xxxii.

Dais. The raised floor at the head of a dining-room, designed for guests of distinction (French, dais, a canopy). So called because it used to be decorated with a canopy. The proverb "Sous le dais" means "in the midst of grandeur."

Daisy. Ophelia gives the queen a daisy to signify "that her light and fickle love ought not to expect constancy in her husband." So the daisy is explained by Greene to mean a Quip for an upstart courtier.

The word is Daisy's eye, and the flower is so called because it closes its pinky lashes and goes to sleep when the sun sets, but in the morning it expands its petals to the light. (See VIOLET.)

Daisy-roots, like dwarf-elderberries, are said to stunt the growth; hence the fairy Milkah fed her royal foster-child on this food, that his standard might not exceed that of a pigmy. This superstition arose from the notion that everything had the property of bestowing its own speciality on others. (See FERN SEED.)

She robbed dwarf-elders of their fragrant fruit,
And fed him early with the daisy root,
Whence through his veins the powerful juices ran,
And formed the beauteous miniature of man.
Tickell, "Kensington Gardens."

Dai'tyas. The demons of Hindu mythology.

Dak'sha, in Hindu mythology, is a priest to whom Siva gave a ram's head, out of revenge, because he did not invite the god to his grand sacrifice.

Dala'i-Lama (grand lama). Chief of the Tartar priests—a sort of living deity.

Dal'dah. Mahomet's favourite white mule.

Dalgar'no (Lord). A heartless profligate in Scott's "Fortunes of Nigel."

Dalget'ty (Du, ald). Jeffrey calls him "a compound of captain Fluellen and Bob'adil," but this is scarcely just. Without doubt, he has all the pedantry and conceit of the former, and all the vulgar assurance of the latter; but, unlike Bobadil, he is a man of real courage, and wholly trustworthy to those who pay him for the service of his sword, which, like a thrifty mercenary, he lets out to the highest bidder.—Scott, "Legend of Montrose."

Neither Schiller, Strada, Thuanus, Monroe, nor Dugald Dalgetty makes any mention of it.—Carlyle.

Dalmatica or Dalmatic. A white robe, open in front, reaching to the knees; worn at one time by deacons over the alb or stole, when the Eucharist was administered. It is in imitation of the regal vest of Dalmatia, and was imported into Rome by the emperor Commodus. A similar robe was worn by kings, in the Middle Ages, at coronations and other great solemnities, to remind them of their duty of beneficence to the poor. The right sleeve was plain and full, but the left was fringed and tasselled. Deacons had broader sleeves than sub-deacons, to indicate their duty to larger generosity; for a similar reason, the sleeves of a bishop are larger than those of a priest. The two stripes before and behind were to show that the wearer should exercise his charity to all.

Dam'age. What's the damage? What have I to pay? how much is the bill? The allusion is to the law assessing damages in remuneration to the plaintiff.

Dam'ask Linen. So called from Damascus, where it was originally manufactured.

Damaskeen'ing. Producing upon steel a blue tinge and ornamental figures, sometimes inlaid with gold and silver, as in Damascus blades. So called from Damascus, which was celebrated in the Middle Ages for this class of ornamental art.

Dambe'a or Demb'a. A lake in Gojam, Abyssinia, the source of the Blue Nile. Captain Speke traced the White Nile to lake Victoria N'Yanza, which, no doubt, is fed by the Mountains of the Moon.

He (the Nile) thro' the lucid lake
Of fair Dambea rolls his infant stream
Thomson, "Summer."

Dame du Lac. A fay, named Vivienne, who plunged with the infant Lancelot into a lake. This lake was a kind of mirage, concealing the demesnes of the lady "en la marche de la petite Bretagne." (See VIVIENNE.)

En ce lieu . . . avoit la dame moult de belles maisons et moult riches; et au plain dessous avoit une gente petite riviere.

In the romance called "Perceforest" there is another dame du Lac, named Seville (2 syl.) (q.v.).

Damoclès's Sword. Evil foreboded or dreaded. Damoclès, the sycophant of Dionysius the elder, of Syracuse, was invited by the tyrant to try the felicity he so much envied. Accordingly, he was set down to a sumptuous banquet, but overhead was a sword suspended by a hair. Damoclès was afraid to stir, and the banquet was a tantalising torment to him.—Cicero.

These fears hang like Damocles' sword over every feast, and make enjoyment impossible.—Chambers, "Cyclopædia."

Dametas. A poetical term for a herdsman. Theocritus and Virgil use the name for a herdsman in their pastorals.

And old Dametas loved to hear our song.
Milton, "Lycidas."

Damón and Musidora. Two lovers in Thomson's "Summer." The tale is that Musidora loved Damon, but was coy, and Damon feared her coyness was disdain: but one day he caught her bathing, and his delicacy upon the occasion so won upon the damsel, that she at once accepted his proffered love.

Damón and Pythias. Inseparable friends. They were two Syracusan youths. Damon being condemned to death by Dionysius the tyrant, begged leave to go home to arrange his affairs, and Pythias became his security. Damon being delayed, Pythias was led to execution, but his friend arrived in time to save him. Dionysius was so struck with this honourable friendship, that he pardoned both of them.

Dam'sel. (See DOMISELLUS.)

Dam'son. A corruption of Damascus, a fruit from Damascus.

Dam'yan (3 syl.). A "silke squyer," whose illicit love was accepted by May, the youthful bride of January, a Lombard knight, sixty years old.—Chaucer, "The Marchaundes Tale."

Dan. A title of honour, common with the old poets, as Dan Phœbus, Dan Cupid, Dan Neptune, Dan Chaucer, &c. (Spanish, don; Armenian, danna.)

From Dan to Beersheba. From one end of the kingdom to the other; all over the world; everywhere. The phrase is scriptural, Dan being the most northern and Beersheba the most southern city of the Holy Land. We have a similar expression, "From John o' Groats to the Land's End."

Dan Tucker. Out o' de way, old Dan Tucker. The first governor of Bermuda was Mr. Moore, who was succeeded by captain Daniel Tucker. These islands were colonised from Virginia.

Dan'ace (3 syl.). The coin placed by the Greeks in the mouth of the dead to pay their passage across the ferry of the Lower World.

Dan'aë. An Argive princess whom Zeus (Jupiter) seduced under the form of a shower of gold, while she was confined in an inaccessible tower.

Danaïdes (4 syl.). Daughters of Dan'aos (king of Argos). They were fifty in number, and married the fifty sons of Ægyptos. They all but one murdered their husbands on their wedding-night, and were punished in the infernal regions by having to draw water everlastingly in sieves from a deep well.

This is an allegory. The followers of Dan'aos taught the Argives to dig wells and irrigate their fields in the Egyptian manner. As the soil of Argos was very dry and porous, it was like a sieve.

The names of the fifty Danaïdēs and their respective husbands are as follows:

Actæa ..	..	wife of Periphas.
Adiauta ..	..	Daph'ron.
Adyta ..	..	Menal'cæa.
Agavê ..	..	Lycos.
Amymonê ..	..	Eucel'ados.
Anaxibia ..	..	Archela'os.
Antod'ia ..	..	Clytos.

Pire'në	Agapole'mos.
Polar'ca	C'e'neus.
Rhoda	Hippolytos.
Rho'dia	Chalce'don.
Sthen'ela	Sthen'e'los.
Sty'na	Polyct'or.
Thien'oo.. ..	Phanthë's.

Dan'aos. According to the "Roman de Rose," Denmark means the country of Dan'aos, who settled here with a colony after the siege of Troy, as Brutus is said by the same sort of Name-legend to have settled in Britain. Saxo-German'icus, with equal absurdity, makes Dan the son of Humble, the first king, to account for the name of the country.

Danaw. The Danube. (German.)

To pass

Rhene or the Danaw.

Milton, "Paradise Lost," bk. i.

Dance. The Spanish danza was a grave and stately court dance. Those of the seventeenth century were called the Turdion, Paba'na, Madama Orleans, Piedolgi'bo'o, El Rey Don Alonso, and El Caball'ero. Most of the names are taken from the ballad-music to which they were danced.

The light dances were called Baylë (q.v.).

The best known national dances are the tarant'ella of the Neapolitans; the boléro and fandango of the Spaniards; the mazourek and krakovieck of Poland; the cosack of Russia; the red'v'ac of Bohemia; the quadrille, cotillon, and contre danse of the French; the waltz and gallopade of Germany; and the reel of Scotland.

Dance. When Handel was asked to point out the peculiar taste of the different nations of Europe in dancing, he ascribed the minuet to the French, the saraband to the Spaniard, the arietta to the Italian, and the hornpipe and the morris-dance to the English.

What do you dance?—i.e., What tribe do you belong to? A South African phrase, where each tribe has its peculiar dance.—Livingstone.

Dance of Death. A series of woodcuts, said to be by Hans Holbein (1538), representing Death dancing after all sorts of persons, beginning with Adam and Eve. He is beside the judge on his bench, the priest in the pulpit, the nun in her cell, the doctor in his study, the bride and the beggar, the king and the infant; but is "swallowed up at last."

This is often called the Dance Macab're, probably from St. Macarius, though some have suggested as the etymon the Arabic word maga'bir (a churchyard).

On the north side of Old St. Paul's was a cloister, on the walls of which was painted, at the cost of John Carpenter, town clerk of London (early in the fifteenth century), a "Dance of Death," or, to use Stowe's descriptive title, "Death leading all the estate, with speeches of Death, and answers, by John Lydgate." Probably Holbein was familiar with this picture.

I'll lead you a pretty dance—i.e., I'll bother or put you to trouble. The French say, Donner le bal à quelqu'un. The reference is to the complicated dances of former times, when all followed the leader.

To dance attendance. To wait obsequiously, to be at the beck and call of another. The allusion is to the ancient custom of weddings, where the bride on the wedding night had to dance with every guest, and play the amiable, though greatly annoyed. In 1857, I "assisted" at a wedding in Paris, where this custom was most strictly observed.

Then must the poore bryde kepe f ote with a danciers, and refuse none, how scabbed, foule, droneken, rude, and shameless soever he be.—Christen, "State of Matrimony," 1543.

I had thought
They had parted so much honesty among them
(At least, good manners), as not thus to suffer
A man of his place, and so near our favour
To dance attendance on their lordships' pleasures.
Shakespeare, "Henry VIII.," v. 2

Dancing-water (The), which beautifies ladies, makes them young again, and enriches them. It fell in a cascade in the Burning Forest, and could only be reached by an underground passage. Prince Chery fetched a bottle of this water for his beloved Fair-star, but was aided by a dove.—"Fairy Tales," by the Comtesse d'Aulnoy. (See YELLOW WATER.)

Dandelion. A flower. The word is a corruption of the French dent de lion (lion's tooth). Also called Leon'todon (lion-tooth, Greek), from a supposed resemblance between its petals and the teeth of lions.

Dander. Is your dander up or riz? Is your angry passion up? The word "dander" is a corruption of d—anger, the d— being, of course, an oath. This is generally considered to be an Americanism; but Halliwell gives, in his Archaic Dictionary, both dander (anger) and dandy (distracted), the former common to several counties, and the latter peculiar to Somersetshire.

Dandie Dinmont. A jovial, true-hearted store-farmer, in Sir Walter Scott's "Guy Mannering."

Dandin (George). A French cit, who marries a sprig of nobility, and lives with his wife's parents. Madame appeals on all occasions to her father and mother, who, of course, take her part against her husband. Poor George is in a sad plight, and is for ever lamenting his fate with the expression, Tu l'as voulu, George Dandin ('Tis your own fault, George Dandin). George Dandin stands for any one who marries above his sphere, and is pecked by his wife and mother-in-law. The word means "a ninny."—Molière's comedy so called.

Perrin Dandin. A sort of Lynch judge in Rabelais, who seated himself on the trunk of the first tree he came to, and there decided the causes submitted to him.

Dan'diprat or Dandéprat, according to Camden, is a small coin issued in the reign of Henry VII. Applied to a little fellow, it is about equal to our modern expression, a little "twopenny ha'penny" fellow.

Dandy. A coxcomb; a fop. The feminine of dandy is either dandilly or dandizette.

Dandigism. The manners, &c., of a dandy; like a dandy. (French, dandin, a ninny, a vain, conceited fellow.)

Dangle. A theatrical amateur in Sheridan's "Critic." It was designed for Thomas Vaughan, a playwright.

Dan'nebrog. The red cross of Denmark. The tradition is that Waldemar II. of Denmark saw in the heavens a fiery cross which betokened his victory over the Esthonian (1219). This story is very similar to that of Constantine (q.v.), and of St. Andrew's cross, which appeared to Hungus. (See ANDREW, St.)

The order of Dannebrog. The second of the Danish orders. Brog means "cloth" or banner.

Dan'nocks. Hedging-gloves. A corruption of Tournay, where they were Dans'ker. A Dane. Denmark used to be called Danské. Hence Polo'nus says to Reynaldo, "Inquire me first what Danskers are in Paris."—"Hamlet," ii. 1.

Dantè and Bea'tri'cè—i.e., Beatrice Portina'ci, who was only eight years old when the poet first saw her. His abiding love for her was chaste as snow and pure as it was tender. Beatrice married a nobleman named Simo'né de Bardi, and died young, in 1290. Dantè married Gemma, of the powerful house of Dona'ti. In the "Divi'na Comme'dia," the poet is conducted first by Virgil (the representative of human reason) through hell and purgatory; then by the spirit of Be'a'tri'cè (the representative of revelation); and finally by St. Bernard, through the several heavens.

Dantes'que (2 syl.). Dantè-like; that is, a minute life-like representation of the infernal horrors, whether by words as in the poet, or in visible form as in Doré's illustrations of the "Inferno."

Daphnè. Daughter of a river-god, loved by Apollo. She fled from the amorous god, and escaped by being changed into a laurel, thenceforth the favourite tree of the sun-god.

Nav. lady, sit. If I but wave this wand,
Your nerves are all chain'd up in alabaster,
And you a statue, or, as Daphnè was,
Root-bound, that fled Apollo.

Milton, "Comus."

Daph'nis. A Sicilian shepherd, who invented pastoral poetry.

Daph'nis. The lover of Chloë in the exquisite Greek pastoral romance of Longos, in the fourth century. Daphnis was the model of Allan Ramsay's "Gentle Shepherd," and the tale is the basis of St. Pierre's "Paul and Virginia."

Dapper. A little, nimble, spruce young clerk in Ben Jonson's "Alchemist."

Dap'ple. The name of Sancho Panza's donkey in Cervantes' romance of "Don Quixote." Bailey derives dapple from the Teutonic dapper (streaked or spotted like a pippin). A dapple-grey horse is one of a light grey shaded with a deeper hue; a dapple bay is a light bay spotted with bay of a deeper colour.

Dar'bies (2 syl.). Handcuffs. A contraction of Johnny Darbies, which is a corruption of the French gens-d'armes (policemen).

I sipped my darbies one morninz in May.
Harrison Ainsworth.

Darby and Joan. A loving, old-fashioned, virtuous couple. The names belong to a ballad written by Henry Woodfall, and the characters are those of John Darby of Bartholomew Close, who died 1730, and his wife, "As chaste as a picture cut in alabaster. You might sooner move a Scythian rock than shoot fire into her bosom." Woodfall served his apprenticeship to John Darby.

Perhaps some day or other we may be Darby and Joan.—Lord Bulwer Lytton.

Darbyites (3 syl.). The Plymouth Brethren are so called on the continent from Mr. Darby, a barrister, who abandoned himself to the work, and was for years the "organ" of the sect.

Darics (or) State's Dar'ici. Celebrated Persian coins. So called from Darius. They bear on one side the head of the king and on the other a chariot drawn by mules. Their value is about twenty-five shillings.

Darius. A classic way of spelling Darawesh (king), a Persian title of royalty. Gushtasp or Kishtasp assumed the title of darawesh on ascending the throne, and is the person generally called Darius the Great.

Darius. Seven princes of Persia agreed that he should be king whose horse neighed first; as the horse of Darius was the first to neigh, Darius was proclaimed king.

Darius, conquered by Alexander, was Dara, surnamed kuchek (the younger). When Alexander succeeded to the throne, Dara sent to him for the tribute of golden eggs, but the Macedonian returned for answer, "The bird which laid them is flown to the other world, where Dara must seek them." The Persian king then sent him a bat and ball, in ridicule of his youth; but Alexander told the messengers, with the bat he would beat the ball of power from their master's hand. Lastly, Dara sent him a bitter melon, as emblem of the grief in store for him; but the Macedonian declared that he would make the shah eat his own fruit.

Dark Ages. The era between the death of Charlemagne and the close of the Carolingian dynasty was certainly the most barren of learned men of any age in history.

Darley Arabians. A breed of English racers, from an Arab stallion introduced by Mr. Darley. This stallion was the sire of the "Flying Childers," and great-grandsire of "Eclipse."

Darmade'Ve (4 syl.). God of virtue; represented by the Indians as an ox. (Indian mythology.)

Dart. (See ABARIS.)

Darwinian Theory. Charles Darwin, grandson of the poet, published in 1859 a work entitled "Origin of Species," to prove that the numerous species now existing on the earth sprang originally from one or at most a few primal forms; and that the present diversity is due to special development and natural selection. Those plants and creatures which are best suited to the conditions of their existence survive and become fruitful; certain organs called into play by peculiar conditions of life grow with their growth and strengthen with their strength till they become so much a part and parcel of their frames as to be transmitted to their offspring. The conditions of life being very diverse, cause a great diversity of organic development, and, of course, every such diversity which has become radical is the parent of a new species.

Daughter. Greek, thugater, contracted into thug'ter; Dutch, dogter; German, tochter; Persian, dochtar; Saxon, dohter, &c.

Dauphin. The heir of the French crown under the Valois and Bourbon dynasties. Guy VIII., count of Vienne, was the first so styled, because he wore a dolphin as his cognisance. The title descended in the family till 1349, when Humbert II., de la Tour de Pisan, sold his seigneurie called the Dauphiné, to king Philippe VI. (de Valois), on condition that the heir of France assumed the title of le dauphin. The first French prince so called was Jean, who succeeded Philippe; and the last was the duc d'Angoulême, son of Charles IX., who renounced the title in 1830.

Grand Dauphin. Louis, duc de Bourgogne, eldest son of Louis XIV., for whose use was published the Latin classics, entitled "Ad usum Delphi'ni." (1661-1711.)

Second or Little Dauphin. Louis, son of the Grand Dauphin. (1682-1712.)

Davenport (The Brothers) from America. Two impostors, who professed that spirits would untie them when bound with cords, and even that spirits played all sorts of instruments in a dark cabinet. The imposition was exposed in 1865.

David, in Dryden's satire called "Absalom and Achitophel," represents Charles II.; Absalom, his beautiful but rebellious son, represents the duke of Monmouth; Achitophel, the traitorous counsellor, is the earl of Shaftesbury; Barzillai, the faithful old man who provided the king sustenance, was the duke of Ormond; Hushai, who defeated the counsel of Achitophel, was Hyde, duke of Rochester; Zadok the priest was Sancroft, archbishop of Canterbury; Shinei, who cursed the king in his flight, was Bethel, the lord-mayor, &c. &c. (2 Sam. xvii.—xix.).—Dryden, "Absalom and Achitophel."

David (St.) or David, was son of Xantus, prince of Cardiganshire; he was brought up a priest, became an ascetic in the Isle of Wight, preached to the Britons, confuted Pelagius, and was preferred to the see of Caerleon, since called St. David's. He died 541. (See TAPPY.)

St. David's (Wales) was originally called Mene'via (i.e., main aw, narrow water or frith). Here St. David received his early education, and when Dyrrig, archbishop of Caerleon, resigned to him his see, St. David removed the archiepiscopal residence to Mene'via, which was henceforth called by his name.

Da'vus. Davus sum, non Edipus (I am a plain, simple fellow, and no solver of riddles, like (Edipus). The words are from Terence's "Andria," i. 1.

Davy. I'll take my duty of it. I'll take my "affidavit" it is true.

Davy Jones's Locker. He's gone to Davy Jones's Locker—i.e., he is dead. Jones is a corruption of Jonah the prophet, who was thrown into the sea. Locker, in seaman's phrase, means any receptacle for private stores; and duffy is a ghost or spirit among the West Indian negroes. So the whole phrase is, "He is gone to the place of safe keeping, where duffy J nah was sent to."

This name Davy Jones, according to the mythology of sailors, is the fiend that presides over all the evil spirits of the deep, and is seen in various shapes warning the devoted wretch of death and woe. Smollett, "Peregrine Pickle," xiii.

Da'vy's Sow. Drunk as Davy's sow. Grose says:—One David Lloyd, a Welshman, who kept an ale-house at Hereford, had a sow with six legs, which was an object of great curiosity. One day David's wife, having indulged too freely, lay down in the sty to sleep, and a company coming to see the sow, David led them to the sty, saying, as usual, "There is a sow for you! Did you ever see the like?" One of the visitors replied, "Well, it is the drunkenest sow I ever beheld." Whence the woman was ever after called "Davy's sow."—Classical Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue.

Dawson (Bully). A noted London sharper, who swaggered and led a most abandoned life about Blackfriars, in the reign of Charles II.

Bully Dawson kicked by half the town, and half the town kicked by Bully Dawson.—Charles Lamb.

Day. When it begins. (1.) With sun-set: The Jews in their "sacred year," and the Church—hence the eve of feast-days; the ancient Britons "non die'rum numerum, ut nos, sed noctium computant," says Tacitus—hence "se'nnight" and "fort'night;" the Athenians, Chinese, Mahometans, &c., Italians, Austrians, and Bohemians. (2.) With sun-rise: The Babylonians, Syrians, Persians, and modern Greeks. (3.) With noon: The ancient Egyptians and modern astronomers. (4.) With midnight: The English, French, Dutch, Germans, Spanish, Portuguese, Americans, &c.

I have lost a day (Per'didi diem) was the exclamation of Titus, the Roman emperor, when on one occasion he could call to mind nothing done during the past day for the benefit of his subjects.

Day of the Barricades. (See BARRICADES.)

Day of the Dupes, in French history, was November 11th, 1630, when Marie de Me'dicis and Gaston duc d'Orléans extorted from Louis XIII. a promise that he would dismiss his minister, the cardinal Richelieu. The cardinal went in all speed to Versailles, the king repented, and Richelieu became more powerful than ever. Marie de Me'dicis and Gaston were the dupes who had to pay dearly for their short triumph.

Day-dream. A dream of the imagination when the eyes are awake.

Daylights. The eyes, which let day-light into the sensorium.

Dayspring. The dawn; the commencement of the Messiah's reign.

The dayspring from on high hath visited us.—Luke i. 78.

Daysman. An umpire, judge, or intercessor. The word is daïs-man (a man who sits on the daïs); a sort of lit de justice. Hence Piers Ploughman—

And at the day of doom
At the height Deys sit.

De Facto. Actually, in reality; in opposition to de jure, lawfully or rightfully. Thus John was de facto king, but Arthur was de jure.

De Profundis (Out of the depths). The 130th Psalm is so called from the first two words in the Latin version. It is sung by Roman Catholics when the dead are committed to the grave.

Dead. Dead as a door-nail. The door-nail is the plate or knob on which the knocker or hammer strikes. As this nail is knocked on the head several times a day, it cannot be supposed to have much life left in it.

Edstaff. What! is the old king dead?

Pistol. As nail in door.

Shakespeare, "2 Henry IV.," v. 3.

Dead as a herring. (See HERRING.)

Dead Heat. A race to be run again between two horses that have "tied." A heat is that part of a race run without stopping. Two or more heats make a race. A dead heat is a heat which goes for nothing; it is dead, as if it had never taken place.

Dead Languages. Languages no longer spoken. They belong to the dead, and not to the living.

Dead Letter. A written document of no value; a law no longer acted upon. Also a letter which lies buried in the post-office because the address is incorrect, or the person addressed cannot be found. Such letters are all the same as if they existed not.

Dead Lift. I am at a dead lift. In a strait or difficulty where I greatly need help; a hopeless exigency. A dead lift is the lifting of a dead or inactive body, which must be done by sheer force.

Dead Lights. Strong wooden shutters to close the cabin windows of a ship, so called because they deaden or kill the daylight.

Dead Lock. A lock which has no spring catch.

Things are at a dead-lock.—The Times.

Dead Men. Empty bottles. Down among the dead men let me lie. Let me get so intoxicated as to slip from my chair, and lie under the table with the empty bottles. The expression is a witicism on the word spirit. Spirit means life, and also alcohol (the spirit of full bottles); when the spirit is out the man is dead, and when the bottle is empty its spirit is departed.

Dead Men's Shoes. Waiting for dead men's shoes. Looking out for legacies; looking to stand in the place of some moneyed man, when he is dead and buried.

Dead Ropes. Those which are fixed, or do not run on blocks; so called because they have no activity or life in them.

Dead Sea. So the Romans called the "Salt Sea." Josephus says that the vale of Siddim was changed into the Dead Sea at the destruction of Sodom ("Antiq.," i. 8, 3, &c.). The water is very salt, and of a dull green colour. Few fish are found therein, but it is not true that birds which venture near its vapours fall down dead. The shores are almost barren, but hyenas and other wild beasts lurk there.

Dead Set. He made a dead set at her. A pointed or decided determination to bring matters to a crisis. The allusion is to a setter dog that has discovered game, and makes a dead set at it.

To be at a dead set is to be set fast, or locked in, so as not to be able to move. The allusion is to machinery.

To make a dead set upon some one is to attack him resolutely, to set upon him; the allusion being to dogs, bulls, &c., set on each other to fight.

Dead Weight. The weight of something without life; a burden that does nothing towards easing its own weight; a person who encumbers us and renders no assistance. (See DEAD LIFT.)

Deaf. Deaf as a white cat. It is said that white cats are deaf and stupid.

Deaf Adder. "The deaf adder stoppeth her ears, and will not hearken to the voice of the charmer, charm he never so wisely" (Ps. lviii. 4, 5). Captain Bruce says, "If a viper enters the house, the charmer is sent for, who entices the serpent, and puts it into a bag. I have seen poisonous vipers twist round the bodies of these psylli in all directions, without having their fangs extracted." According to tradition, the asp stops its ears when the charmer utters his incantation, by applying one ear to the ground and twisting its tail into the other.

Deal. A portion. "A tenth deal of flour."—Exod. xxix. 40. (German, theil; Saxon, dal; Irish, dail; English, dole.)
To deal the cards is to give each his dole or portion.

Deal-fish. So called because the dorsal fin resembles a deal board.

Dean (the Latin decanus). The chief over ten prebends or canons.

The Dean (Il Piovano). Ariotto, the Italian humorist. (1395-1483.)

Jonathan Swift, dean of St. Patrick. (1667-1745.)

Deans (Effie). In Scott's "Heart of Midlothian." She is abandoned by her lover, Georgie Robertson, and condemned for child-murder.

Jeanie Deans. Sister of Effie Deans, who walks all the way to London to plead for her sister. She is a model of good sense, strong affection, and disinterested heroism.

We follow Pilgrim through his progress with an interest not inferior to that with which we follow Elizabeth from Siberia to Moscow, and Jeanie Deans from Edinburgh to London.—Lord Macaulay.

Dear. Oh, dear me! A corruption of Oh, Deus meus! Equivalent to the French Oh, mon Dieu! and the Italian O, mio Dio! &c.

Dearest. Most hateful, as dearest foe. The word dear, meaning "beloved," is the Saxon deor (dear, rare); but dear, "hateful," is the Saxon derian (to hurt), Scotch dere (to annoy).

Would I had met my dearest foe in heaven,
 Or ever I had seen that dave, Horatio.
 Shakespeare, "Hamlet," i. 2

Death, according to Milton, is twin-keeper, with Sin, of Hell-gate.

The other shape.
 If shape it might be called that shape had none
 Distinguishable in member, joint, or limb;
 Or substance might be called that shadow seemed:
 The likeness of a kingly crown had on.
 Milton, "Paradise Lost," ii.

Death. (See BLACK.)

Death stands, like Mercuries, in every way. (See MERCURY.)

Till death us do part. (See DEPART.)

Angel of Death. (See ABOU-JAHIA, AZRAEL.)

Death in the Pot. During a dearth in Gilgal, there was made for the sons of the prophets a pottage of wild herbs, some of which were poisonous. When the sons of the prophets tasted the pottage, they cried out, "There is death in the pot." Then Elisha put into it some meal, and its poisonous qualities were counteracted. (2 Kings iv. 40.)

Death-bell. A tinkling in the ears, supposed by the Scotch peasantry to announce the death of a friend.

O lady, 'tis dark, an' I heard the death-bell,
 An' I darena gie yonder lor gowd nor tee.
 James Hogg, "Mountain Bard."

Deaths-man. An executioner; a person who kills another brutally but lawfully.

Great Hector's deaths-man.
 Heywood, "Iron Age."

Debateable Land. A tract of land between the Esk and Sark, claimed by both England and Scotland, and for a long time the subject of dispute. This tract of land was the hotbed of thieves and vagabonds.

De'bon. One of the heroes who accompanied Brute to Britain. According to British fable, Devonshire is the county of Debon. (See DEVONSHIRE.)

Debonair (Le Débonnaire). Louis I. of France, sometimes called in English The Meek, son and successor of Charlemagne; a man of courteous manners, cheerful temper, but effeminate and deficient in moral energy. (778, 814-840.)

Débris. The débris of an army. The remnants of a routed army. Débris means the fragments of a worn-down rock. It is a geological term (debriser, to break down).

Decam'eron. A volume of tales related in ten days (Greek, deka, hem'era), as the "Decameron of Boccaccio," which contains 100 tales related in ten days.

Decamp'. He decamped in the middle of the night. Left without paying his debts. A military term from the Latin de-campus (from the field); French, dé-camper, to march.

December. (Latin, the tenth month.) So it was when the year began in March with the vernal equinox; but since January and February have been inserted before it, the term is quite incorrect.

Deception.

Don'tless the pleasure is as great
Of being cheated as to cheat;
As lookers-on feel most delight
That least perceive a juggler's sleight,
And still the less they understand
The more they admire his sleight of hand.
Luttrell, "Hudibras," pt. ii. 2.

Decide (2 syl.) means "to knock out." Several things being set before a person, he knocks out all but one, which he selects as the object of his choice. A decided man is one who quickly knocks out every idea but the one he intends to adhere to.

Decimo. A man in decimo—i.e., a hobby-de-hoy. Johnson uses the phrase in decimo-sexto.

Deck. To sweep the deck. To clear off all the stakes. A pack of cards piled in order is called a deck.

To deck is to decorate or adorn.

I thought thy bride-bed to have decked, sweet maid,
And not have strewed thy grave.

Shakespeare, "Hamlet," v. 1.

Clear the decks—i.e., get out of the way; your room is better than your company; I am going to be very busy. A sea-term. Decks are cleared before action.

Décolleté (da-coal-ta). Nothing even décolleté should be uttered in the presence of ladies—i.e., bearing the least semblance to a double entendre. Décolleté is the French for a "dress cut low about the bosom."

Decoy Duck. A bait or lure; a duck taught to allure others into a net, and employed for this purpose.

Decrepit. Unable to make a noise. It refers rather to the mute voice and silent footstep of old age than to its broken strength. (Latin, de-crepo.)

Decuman Gate. A gate through which ten men could march abreast. There are the remains of one in the Roman ruins of Richborough (Kent).

Dedalian. Intricate; variegated. So called from Dedalos, who made the Cretan labyrinth.

Dedlock (Sir Leicester). An honourable and truthful gentleman, but of such fossilised ideas that no "tongue of man" could shake his prejudices. — "Bleak House," by Charles Dickens.

Dee (Dr. John). A man of vast knowledge, whose library, museum, and mathematical instruments were valued at £2,000. On one occasion the populace broke into his house and destroyed the greater part of his valuable collection, under the notion that Dee held intercourse with the devil. He ultimately died a pauper, at the advanced age of eighty-one, and was buried at Mortlake. He professed to be able to raise the dead, and had a magic crystal, afterwards in Horace Walpole's collection at Strawberry Hill. (1527-1608.)

Dee Mills. If you had the rent of Dee Mills, you would spend it all. Dee Mills, in Cheshire, used to yield a very large annual rent. (Cheshire proverb.)

There was a jolly miller
Lived on the river Dee;
He danced and sang from morn to night —
No lark so blithe as he;
And this the burden of his song
For ever used to be —
"I care for nobody, no, not I,
If nobody cares for me."
Bickerstaff, "Love in a Village," (1762.)

Deer. Supposed by poets to shed tears. The drops, however, which fall from their eyes are not tears from the lachrymal glands, but an oily secretion from the inner angle of the eye, close to the nose.

A poor sequestered stag . . .
Did come to languish . . . and the big round tears
Coursed one another down his innocent nose
In piteous chase.

Shakespeare, "As You Like It," ii. 2.

Deerslayer. The hero of a novel so called, by F. Cooper. He is the beau-ideal of a man without cultivation—honourable in sentiment, truthful, and brave as a lion; pure of heart, and without reproach in conduct. The character appears, under different names, in five novels—"The Deerslayer," "The Pathfinder," "The Last of the Mohicans," "The Pioneers," and "The Prairie." (See NATTY BUMPO.)

Deev-Binder. Tahmuras, king of Persia, who defeated the Deev king and the fierce Demrush, but was slain by Houndkonz, another powerful Deev.

Default. Judgment by default is when the defendant does not appear in court on the day appointed. The judge gives sentence in favour of the plaintiff, not because the plaintiff is right, but from the default of the defendant.

Defeat. "What though the field be lost, all is not lost."—Paradise Lost.

"All is lost but honour" (Tout est perdu, madame, fors l'honneur) is what François I. wrote to the queen regent, his mother, after the battle of Pavi'a in 1525.

Defen'der of the Faith. A title given by pope Leo X. to Henry VIII. of England, in 1521, for a Latin treatise "On the Seven Sacraments." Many previous kings, and even subjects, had been termed "defenders of the Catholic faith," "defenders of the church," and so on, but no one had borne it as a title. The sovereign of Spain is entitled Catholic, and of France Most Christian.

God bless the king! God bless the "faith's defen'er!"

God bless—No harm in blessing the Pretender. Who that Pretender is, and who that king—God bless us all!—is quite another thing.

"Rejected Addresses," but ascribed by Sir Walter Scott to Byron.

Degen'erate (4 syl.) is to be worse than the parent stock. (Latin, de genus.)

De'iani'ra. Wife of Herculess, and the inadvertent cause of his death. Nessos told her that any one to whom she gave a shirt steeped in his blood, would love her with undying love; she gave it to her husband, and it burnt him to death. De-i-a-ni'-ra killed herself for grief.

Deiph'obus (4 syl.). One of the sons of Priam, and, next to Hector, the bravest and boldest of all the Trojans. On the death of his brother Paris, he married Helen; but Helen betrayed him to her first husband, Menela'os, who slew him.—Homer's "Iliad" and Virgil's "Æneid."

Déjeûner à la Fourchette (French). Breakfast with forks; a cold collation; a breakfast in the middle of the day, with meat and wine; a lunch.

Delectable Mountains (The), in Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," are a range of mountains from which the "Celestial City" may be seen. They are in Immanuel's land, and are covered with sheep, for which Immanuel had died.

Delf, or more correctly Delft, a common sort of pottery made at Delft in Holland.

Delia, of Pope's line, "Slander or poison dread from Delia's rage," was Lady Deloraine, who married W. Windham of Carsham, and died 1744. The person said to have been poisoned was Miss Mackenzie.

Delia is not better known to our yard-dog—i.e., the person is so intimate and well known that the yard-dog will not bark at his approach. It is from Virgil, who makes his shepherd Menalcas boast "That his sweetheart is as well known to his dog as Delia the shepherdess."—Ecl. iii.

Delib'erate (4 syl.) is to weigh thoroughly in the mind. (Latin, de libro.)

Delight is "to make light." Hence Shakespeare speaks of the disembodied soul as "the delighted spirit . . . blown with restless violence round about the pendant world" ("Measure for Measure," iii. 1). So again he says of gifts, "the more delayed, delighted" ("Cymbeline," v. 5), meaning the more light or worthless the longer they are delayed. Delighted, in the sense of "pleased," means light-hearted, with buoyant spirits.

The delight of mankind. So Titus, the Roman emperor, was entitled. (79-81).

Delir'ium. From the Latin lira (the ridge left by the plough), hence the verb de-lira'rë, to make an irregular ridge or balk in ploughing. Delirius is one whose mind is not properly tilled or cultivated, a person of irregular intellect; and delirium is the state of a person whose mental faculties are like a field full of balks or irregularities. (See PREVARIATION.)

Della Crus'eans or Della Crus'ean School. So called from Crusca, the Florentine academy. The name is applied to a school of poetry started by some young Englishmen at Florence in the latter part of the eighteenth century. These silly, sentimental affectations, which appeared in "The World" and "The Oracle," created for a time quite a furor. The whole affair was mercilessly gibbeted in the "Baviad" and "Mæviad" of Mr. Gifford.

Delos. A floating island ultimately made fast to the bottom of the sea by Posi'don (Neptune). Apollo having become possessor of it by exchange, made it his favourite retreat.

Delphi or Delphos. A town of Pho'cis, famous for its oracle. So called from its twin peaks, which the Greeks called brothers (a-delphoi).

Delphine Classics. A set of Latin classics edited in France by thirty-nine scholars, under the superintendence of Montausier, Bossuet, and Huet, for the use of the son of Louis XIV., called the Grand Dauphin. They are of no value except for their indexes.

Del'ta. The island formed at the mouth of a river, which usually assumes a triangular form, like the Greek letter called delta; as, the delta of the Nile, the delta of the Danube, Rhine, Ganges, Indus, Niger, Mississippi, Po, and so on.

Del'uge. After me the Deluge ("Après moi le Deluge"). When I am dead the deluge may come for aught I care. Generally ascribed to Prince Metternich, but the prince borrowed it from M^{de} Pompadour, who laughed off all the remonstrances of ministers at her extravagance by saying, "Après nous le deluge" (Ruin if you like when we are dead and gone).

Del'uges (3 syl.). The chief, besides that recorded in the Bible, are the following:—The deluge of Fohi, the Chinese; the Satyavata of the Indians; the Yisuthrus of the Assyrians; the Mexican deluge; and the Greek deluges of Deucalion and Og'ygës.

De'marus. The Jupiter of the Phœnicians.

Demi-monde. Lorettes, courtezans. Le beau monde means "fashionable society," and demi-monde the society only half acknowledged.

Demi-monde implies not only recognition and a status, but a certain social standing. — Saturday Review.

Demi-rep. A woman whose character has been blown upon. Contraction of demi-reputation.

Demiur'gus (Greek), in the language of Platonists, means that mysterious agent which made the world, and all that it contains. The Logos or Word spoken of by St. John, in the first chapter of his gospel, is the Demiurgus of Platonising Christians.

Demobilisa'tion of troops. The disorganisation of them, the disarming of them. This is a French military term. To "mobilise" troops is to render them liable to be moved on service out of their quarters; to "demobilise" them is to send them home, so that they cannot be moved from their quarters against any one.

Democ'racy. A republican form of government, a commonwealth. (Greek, demos-crateo, the-people possess-the-power.)

Democ'ritos. The laughing philosopher of Ab'dera. He should rather be termed the deriding philosopher, because he derided or laughed at people for their folly or vanity. It is said that he put out his eyes, that he might think more deeply.

Democritus, dear droll, revisit earth,
And with our follies glut thy heightened mirth.
Prior.

Democ'ritos Junior. Robert Barton, author of "The Anatomy of Melancholy." (1576-1640.)

Demod'ocos. A minstrel who, according to Homer, sang the amours of Mars and Venus in the court of Alcino'üs, while Ulysses was a guest there.

Demogorgon. A terrible deity, whose very name was capable of producing the most horrible effects. Hence Milton speaks of "the dreaded name of Demogorgon" ("Paradise Lost," ii.). This tyrant king of the elves and fays lived on the Himalayas, and once in five years summoned all his subjects before him to give an account of their stewardship. He was the great power in incarnations. The word means demon of the earth.

Must I call your master to my aid,
At whose dread name the trembling furies quake,
Hell stands abashed, and earth's foundations shake?
Rome, "Lucan's Pharsalia VI."
When the moon arises,
(Then) cruel Demogorgon walks his round,
And if he finds a fairy lag in light,
He drives the wretch before, and lashes into night.
Dryden, "The Flower and the Leaf."

Demon of Matrimonial Unhappiness. Asmode'us, who slew the seven husbands of Sara. — Tobit.

Prince of Demons. Asmode'us. — Tal-mud.

Demos'thenēs' Lantern. A choric monument erected to Lysicratēs, in Athens. A "tripod" was awarded to every one in Athens who produced the best drama or choral piece of his tribe. The street in which Demosthenēs' Lantern stood was full of these tripods.

Demy'. A size of paper between royal and crown. Its size is 20 in. by 15 in. It is from the French word demi (half), and means demi-royal (a small royal), royal being 24 in. by 19 in. The old water-mark is a fleur-de-lis.

Den. Evening. God ye good den!—i.e., God (give) ye good evening.

Dena'rius. A Roman silver coin, equal in value to ten ases (demi-ases). The word was used in France and England for the inferior coins, whether silver or copper, and for ready money generally.

Denarius Dei (God's penny). An earnest of a bargain, which was given to the church or poor.

Denarii St. Petri (Peter's pence). One penny from each family, given to the pope.

Denarius tertius comitatus. One-third of the pence of the county, which was paid to the earl. The other two-thirds belonged to the crown. (See D.)

Denich'i or Dénix. A Japanese idol, with three heads and forty hands. The heads symbolise the sun, moon, and elements, and the forty hands the bounty of nature.

Dennis Bulgruddery and Mrs. Bulgruddery, in Colman's comedy of "John Bull."

Den'izen. A made citizen—i.e., an alien who has been naturalised by letters patent. (Old French, donaison, free gift.)

De'nouement (French). The untying of a plot, the winding up of a novel or play. (Denouer, to unknot.)

Denys (St.), according to tradition, carried his head, after martyrdom, for six miles, and then deliberately laid it down on the spot where stands the present cathedral bearing his name. This absurd tale took its rise from an ancient painting, in which the artist, to represent the martyrdom of the bishop, drew a headless body; but, in order that the trunk might be recognised, placed the head in front, between the martyr's hands.

Sir Denys Brand, in Crabbe's "Borough," is a country magnate who apes humility. He rides on a sorry brown pony "not worth £5," but mounts his lackey on a race-horse, "twice victor for a plate." Sir Denys Brand is the type of a character by no means uncommon.

De'odand means something "given to God" (deo-dandum). This was the case when a man met with his death through injuries inflicted by some chattel, as by the fall of a ladder, the toss of a bull, or the kick of a horse. In such cases the cause of death was sold, and the proceeds given to the church. The custom was based on the doctrine of purgatory. As the person was sent to his account without the sacrament of extreme unction, the money thus raised served to pay for masses for his repose. Deodands were abolished September 1, 1846.

Depart. To part thoroughly; to separate effectually. The marriage service in the ancient prayer-books had, "till death us depart," or, "till alimony or death us departs," a sentence which has been corrupted into "till death us do part."

Before they settle hands and hearts,
Till alimony or death departs.
Butler, "Hudibras," iii. 3.

Department. France is divided into departments, as Great Britain and Ireland are divided into counties or shires. From 1768 it was divided into governments, of which thirty-two were grand and eight petit. In 1790, by a decree of the Constituent Assembly, it was mapped out de novo into eighty-three departments. In 1804 the number of departments was increased to 107, and in 1812 to 130. In 1815 the territory was reduced to eighty-six departments, and continued so till 1860, when Savoy and Nice were added. The present number is eighty-nine.

Dep'inges (2 syl.) or Decplings. A breadth of netting to be sewed on a hoddie (net) to make it sufficiently large. Sometimes the breadth is called a depth, and the act of sewing one depth on another is called deepening the net. In 1574 the Dutch settlers at Yarmouth were required "to provide themselves with twine and depinges in foreign places."

Deputations. The year of the deputations. The eighth of the Hed'rah, after Mahomet's victory over the Arabs near Taïf, when deputations from all parts flocked to do him homage.

Deputé (2 syl.). To depute means to prune or cut off a part; deputation is the part cut off. A deputation is a slip cut off to represent the whole. (Latin, deputo.)

Der Freischütz. The most German and best of Weber's operas. (See FREISCHUTZ.)

Derbend (iron gates). A narrow pass in the mountains of Bulgaria, and a town in the province of Schirvan'.

Beyond the Caspian's Iron Gates.
Moore, "Fire Worshippers."

Derby Stakes. Started by Edward Smith Stanley, the twelfth earl of Derby, in 1780, the year after his establishment of the Oaks stakes (q. v.).

The Derby Day is the day when the Derby stakes are run for; it is the second Wednesday of the great Epsom Spring Meeting, in May.

Derive (2 syl.) means "back to its channel or source" (Latin, de rivo). The Latin rivus (a river) does not mean the stream or current, but the source whence it flows, or the channel through which it runs. As Ulpian says, "Fons sive locus per longitu'dinem depressus, quo aqua decurrat."

Der'rick. A hangman; a temporary crane to remove goods from the hold of a vessel. So called from Derrick, the Tyburn hangman early in the seventeenth century, who for more than a hundred years gave his name to gibbets. (See HANGMAN.)

He rides circuit with the devil, and Derrick must be his host, and Tyborne the inn at which he will light.—"Bellman of London," (1616.)

Derry Down. This chorus, says Sir Walter Scott, is not only as old as the heptarchy, but even as the Druidical times. It was the chorus to the hymns sung by the Druids when they went in grand procession to gather mistletoe.—"Lochnoe," c. xvii.

Der'wentwa'ter. Lord Derwent-water's Lights. The Aurora borealis; so called from James, earl of Derwent-water, beheaded for rebellion 24th Feb.,

1716. It is said that the northern lights were unusually brilliant on that night.

Desdemo'na (in Shakespeare's "Othello"). Daughter of Brabantio. She fell in love with Othello, and eloped with him. Iago, acting on the jealous temper of the Moor, made him believe that his wife had an intrigue with Cassio, and in confirmation of this statement told the Moor that she had given Cassio a pocket-handkerchief, the fact being that Iago's wife had purloined it. Othello asked his bride for it, but she was unable to find it; whereupon the Moor murdered her and then stabbed himself.

She . . . was ready to listen and weep, like Desdemona, at the stories of his dangers and campaigns.—Thackeray.

Desmas, Dismas, or Dimas (St.). The penitent thief is so called in the ancient mysteries.

Despair. The Giant Despair, in Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," lived in "Doubting Castle." Finding Christian and Hopeful asleep, he locked them up in his dungeon; but Christian had a key which opened the door, and they made their escape.

Dessert' means simply the cloth removed (French, desservir, to clear the cloth); and dessert is that which comes after the cloth is removed.

Destruction. Prince of Destruction. Tamerlane or Timour the Tartar. (1335, 1360-1405.)

Desultory. Those who rode two or more horses in the circus of Rome, and used to leap from one to the other, were called desultores; hence desultor came in Latin to mean one inconstant, or who went from one thing to another; and desultory means after the manner of a desultor.—Adam, "Roman Antiquities."

Detest' is simply to witness against. (Latin, de-testor.)

Deuca'lion. (See BONES.)
Deucalion's Flood. According to Greek mythology, Deucalion was a king of Thessaly, in whose reign the whole world was covered with a deluge in consequence of the great iniquity of man. (See DELUGES.)

Old Ocean, too, sucked thro' the porous globe,
Had long ere now forsook his horrid bed,
And croug't Deucalion's watery times again.
Thomson, "Autumn."

Deuce and In'cubus. The nightmare. In'cubus is the Latin in'cubo (to lie on), and deuce is the Greek duso (to sit on). Nightmares were by the Celts supposed to be caused by demons called Dusiens sitting on the chest of a sleeper. St. Austin, in his "De civitate Dei," mentions them—"Quosdam dæmones, quos du'sios Galli nun'eupant" (xv. 23). Dr. Whitaker says Deuce was a goddess nymph of the Brigantès; but Sharon Turner says it appeared to men as a female, and to women as a male dæmon.

Deuce. The Deuce is in you; Deuce take you; What the Deuce is the matter? These all refer to the dæmon Deuce, mentioned above. (See PLAY THE DEUCE.)

Deuce. The two of cards or dice (French, deux). The three is called "Tray" (French, trois; Latin, tres).

A gentleman being punched by a butcher's tray, exclaimed, "Deuce take the tray." "Well," said the boy, "I don't know how the deuce is to take the tray."—Jest Book.

Deus (2 syl.). Deus ex ma'china. The intervention of a god or some unlikely event in order to extricate the difficulties into which a clumsy author has involved himself; any forced incident, such as the arrival of a rich uncle from the Indies to help a young couple in their pecuniary embarrassments. To prove that the stars are inhabited because God is omnipotent is to bring in a deus ex ma'china. Literally, it means "a god (let down upon the stage or flying in the air) by machinery."

Deutas. The good genii of Indian mythology. They dwell at Sorgon, the paradise of the demi-gods.

De'va's Vale. The valley of the river Dee or Deva, in Cheshire, celebrated for its pastures and dairy produce.

He chose a farm in Deva's vale,
Where his long alleys peeped upon the main.
Thomson, "Castle of Indolence," canto ii.

Deven'dren, king of the demigods, who lived in Sorgon (paradise), where he presided over 330,000 divinities. He is represented full of eyes, and with four hands, and sits on an elephant. (Indian mythology.)

Devil. The Irish is diabhail, which, according to O'Brien, is dia-bhal (god of the air); Welsh, diawl, said by Owen to be di-awl (not light)—i.e., the god of darkness, and dawoli (to deify); Saxon, diabol; Dutch, duvel; Swedish, diefwal; Danish, diavel; Russian, diavol; Tartar, diol. The gipsy Petulengro being asked what he called God, answered duvel, and godly he called duvelskoe. The evil spirit the gipsies call Beng. Mr. Barrow says the Hungarian gipsies call God Deelis. In this list the Latin and Greek diabol has been purposely omitted. (See AULD HORNIE.)

Devil is always represented with a cloven foot, because by the Rabbinical writers the devil is often called scirissin (a goat); and the type of Satan was a hairy goat. As the goat is a type of uncleanness, the prince of unclean spirits is aptly represented under this emblem.

A Printer's Devil. Formerly the boy who took the printed sheets from the tympan of the press. Old Moxon says, "They do commonly so black and bedaub themselves, that the workmen do jocosely call them devils." The errand-boy is now so called, because he is the servus servorum of the establishment; and the word was at one time used to signify a wretched, poor, persecuted, or ill-used creature.

Robert the Devil, of Normandy. So called because his father was said to have been a Nightmare, or rather an In'cubus. (See ROBERT LE DIABLE.)

The French Devil. Jean Bart, an intrepid French sailor, born at Dunkirk. (1650-1702.)

The White Devil of Walla'chia. George Castriot'a was so called by the Turks. (1404-1407.)

Cheating the Devil. Mincing an oath: doing evil for gain, and giving part of the profits to the church, &c. It is by no means unusual in monkish traditions. Thus the "Devil's Bridge" is a single arch over a cataract. It is said that his Satanic majesty had knocked down several bridges, but promised the abbot Giraldus of Einsiedel to let this one stand, provided the abbot would consign to him the first living thing that crossed it. When the bridge was finished, the abbot threw across it a loaf of bread, which a hungry dog ran after, and "the rocks re-echoed with peals of laughter to see the devil thus defeated."—Long-fellow, "Golden Legend," v.

Rabelais says that a farmer once bargained with the devil for each to have on alternate years what grew under and over the soil. The cannie farmer sowed carrots and turnips when it was his turn to have the under-soil share, and wheat and barley the year following.

Gone to the Devil. To ruin. The Devil and St. Dunstan was the sign of a public-house near Temple Bar, much frequented by lawyers. When they went to dinner, they placed a notice on their door, "Gone to the Devil," and as those who neglected their work were constantly absent from their rooms, the expression came to signify "Gone to the bad."

Dined to-day with Dr. Garth and Mr. Addison at the Devil Tavern, near Temple Bar, and Garth treated.—Swift, "Letter to Stella."

Son of the Devil. Ezzelino, chief of the Gibelins, and governor of Vicenza, was so called for his infamous cruelties. 1215-1259.)

Fierce Ezelin, that most inhuman lord,
Who shall be deemed by men the child of hell.
Rose, "Orlando Furioso," iii. 32.

Talk of the devil and he's sure to come. Said of a person who has been the subject of conversation, and who unexpectedly makes his appearance. An older proverb still is, "Talk of the dule, an he'll put out his horns;" but the modern euphemism is, "Talk of an angel, and you'll see its wings." If "from the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh," their heart must be full of the evil-one who talk about him, and if the heart is full of him he cannot be far off.

Since therefore 'tis to combat evil,
'Tis lawful to employ the Devil.
Forthwith the Devil did appear,
For name him and he's always near.
Prior, "Hans Carvel,"

The Devil and his Dam. The devil and his demons. This expression occurs six times in Shakespeare. (See fourth article further on.)

The Devil and Dr. Faustus. Faust was the first printer of Bibles, and issued a large number in imitation of those sold as manuscripts. These he passed off in Paris as genuine, and sold for sixty crowns apiece, the usual price being 500 crowns. The uniformity of the books, their rapid supply, and their unusual cheapness, excited astonishment. Information was laid against him for magic, and in searching his lodgings the brilliant red ink with which his copies were adorned was declared to be his blood. He was charged with dealings with the devil, and condemned to be burnt alive. To save himself, he revealed his secret to the Paris Parliament, and his invention became the admiration of the world. N.B.—This tradition is not to be accepted as history.

The Devil and Tom Walker. An American proverb, used as a caution to usurers. Tom Walker was a poor miserly man, born at Massachusetts in 1727, and it is said that he sold himself to the devil for wealth. Be this as it may, Tom suddenly became very rich, and opened a counting-house at Boston, during the money panic which prevailed in the time of governor Belcher. By usury he grew richer and richer; but one day, as he was foreclosing a mortgage with a poor land-jobber, a black man on a black horse knocked at the office door. Tom went to open it, and was never seen again. Of course the good people of Boston searched his office, but all his coffers were found empty; and during the night his house caught fire, and was burnt to the ground.—Washington Irving, "Tales of a Traveller."

The Devil catch the hindmost. In Scotland it is said when a class of students have made a certain progress in their mystic studies, they are obliged to run through a subterranean hall, and the last man is seized by the devil, and becomes his imp.

The Devil is beating his mother (German). Said when rain and sunshine quickly alternate. The old German and Norse mythologies speak of male and female demons, the latter mild and gentle, and Ulfilas translates daimon by unkultho (she-devils). The Germans say, "Where the devil cannot come, there he sends his grandmother"—meaning, where a malignant tempter will not succeed, a mild and insinuating temptation will.

The devil must be striking (German). Said when it thunders. The old Norse Donar means Thor, equal to Jupiter, the god of thunder, and donner is the German for thunder or devil, as may be seen in the expression, "The run-away goose is gone to the devil (donner)."

The devil to pay. The entire sentence is, The devil to pay, and no pitch hot. To "pay" the seams of a ship is to pitch them with hot pitch. (French, payer, from paix, poix, pitch; Latin, pix.) Devil is any dirty slab; hence, "The devil to pay, and no pitch hot," means, the slab is come to pitch the seams of the ship, and there is no pitch hot—i.e., there is nothing ready, our money is all thrown away. Hence, "Here's the very devil to pay" means, here's a shocking waste of money. "The Devil to Pay" is the name of a farce by Jobson and Nelly.

To kindle a fire for the devil is to offer sacrifice, to do what is really sinful, under the delusion that you are doing God service.

To hold a candle to the devil is to abet an evildoer out of fawning fear. The allusion is to the story of an old woman who set one wax taper before the image of St. Michael, and another before the devil whom he was trampling under foot. Being reproved for paying such honour to Satan, she naively replied: "Ye see, your honour, it is quite uncertain which place I shall go to at last, and sure you will not blame a poor woman for securing a friend in each."

Devil's Arrows (Yorkshire). Three remarkable "Druid" stones, near Boroughbridge, similar to Harold's Stones, and probably marking some boundary.

Devil's Bones. Dice, which are made of bones and lead to ruin.

Devil's Books. Playing cards. A Presbyterian phrase used in reproof of the term King's Books, applied to a pack of cards from the French livre des quatre rois (the book of the four kings).

Devil's Bridge. (See CHEATING THE DEVIL.)

Devil's Candle. So the Arabs call the mandrake, from its shining appearance at night.—Richardson.

Those hellish fires that light
The mandrake's charnel leaves at night.
T. Moore, "Fire Worshipers."

Devil's Den. A cromlech in Preschute, near Marlborough. It now consists of two large uprights and an impost. The third upright has fallen. Some of the farm labourers a few years ago fastened a team of horses to the impost and tried, but without effect, to drag it down.

In the valley are a vast number of huge sandstones called Sarsens (Sarsdens), or when unbroken, Grey Wethers.

Devil's Dust. The dust and sweepings of cloth, made into a fabric by gum and pressure. Mr. Ferrand introduced the subject to the attention of Parliament, March 4, 1842. It is so called from the dishonesty and falsehood which it covers.

Devil's Own. The 88th Foot. So called by General Picton from their great bravery in battle and great disorder in camp.

Applied also to the Inns of Court Volunteers, the members of which are lawyers.

Devil's Throat (The). Cromer bay. So called from its danger to navigation.

Devon. Saxon defn-afon (deep water), contracted into def'on or dev'on.

Devonshire, according to English mythology, is a corruption of Devon's-share. This Devon was one of the heroes who came with Brute from Troy. One of the giants that he slew in the south coasts of England was Coulin, whom he chased to a vast pit, eight leagues across. The monster trying to leap this pit, fell backwards, and lost his life in the chasm. When Brutus allotted out the island, this portion became Devon's-share.

And eke that ample pit, yet far renowned
For the great leap which Debon did compell
Coulin to make, being eighti uss of grownd,
Into the which retourning bak he fell...

In meale of these great conquests by them got
Corineus had that province utmost west...
And Debon's share was that is Devonshire.
Spenser, "Faery Queen," ii. 10.

Devonshire Poet. O. Jones, a journeyman wool-comber, who lived at the close of the last century.

Dew-beaters. The feet; shoes to resist the wet.

Hold out your dew-beaters till I take off the darbies (iron shoes or fetters).—Feveril of the Peak.

Dew-drink. A draught before breakfast. In harvest the men are allowed, in some counties, a drink of beer before they begin work. Dew-bit is a snack before breakfast.

Dgellabæ'an. The Persian era. Dgella Eddin, son of Togrul Beg, appointed eight astronomers to reform the calendar. The era began A.D. 1075, and is followed to this day.

Dhul'dul. The famous horse of Ali, son-in-law of Mahomet.

Diable (Le). Olivier Ledain, the tool of Louis XI., and once the king's barber. So called because he was as much feared as his Satanic majesty, and even more disliked. (Hung 1484.)

Diabla. "Robert le Diable," Meyerbeer's grand opera. (See ROBERT.)

Di'adem meant, originally, a fillet wound round the head. The diadem of Bacchus was a broad band, which might be unfolded so as to make a veil. Constantine the Great was the first of the Roman emperors who wore a diadem. After his time it was set with rows of pearls and precious stones. (Greek, deo, to bind.)

Dialec'tics. Metaphysics; the art of disputation; that strictly logical discussion which leads to reliable results. The product or result is ideas, which, being classified, produce knowledge; but all knowledge being of the divine types, must conduce more or less to practical results and good morals. (Greek, dialogo, to speak thoroughly.)

The following questions from John of Salisbury are fair specimens of the Middle-age subjects of discussion:—

(1) When a person buys a whole cloak, does the coat belong to his purchase?

(2) When a hog is driven to market with a rope round its neck, does the man or the rope take him?

Di'amond. A corruption of adamant. So called because the diamond, which cuts other substances, can be cut or polished with no substance but itself. (Greek, a damuo, what cannot be subdued.)

Di'amond (3 syl.). Son of Az'apë, a fairy. He was very strong, and fought either on foot or horse with a battle-axe. He was slain in single combat by Cam'balo. (See TRIAMOND.)—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. iv.

Diamond cut diamond. Cunning outwitting cunning; a hard bargain overreached. A diamond is so hard that it can only be ground by diamond dust, or by rubbing one against another.

A diamond of the first water. A man of the highest merit. The colour or lustre of a pearl or diamond is called its "water." One of the "first water" is one of the best colour and most brilliant lustre. We say also, "A man of the first water."

The Diamond Jousts. Jousts instituted by king Arthur, "who by that name had named them, since a diamond was the prize." Ere he was king, he came, by accident, to a glen in Lyonesse, where two brothers had met in combat. Each was slain; but one had worn a crown of diamonds, which Arthur picked up, and when he became king offered the nine diamonds as the prize of nine several jousts, "one every year, a joust for one." Lancelot had won eight, and intended to present them all to the queen "when all were won." When the knight laid them before the queen, Guinevere, in a fit of jealousy, flung them out of the palace window into the river which ran below.—Idylls of the King, "Elaine."

Diamonds. (See BLACK.)

Dian'a (3 syl.). The temple of Diana at Ephesus was set on fire by Herostatos, for the sake of perpetuating his name. The Ionians decreed that any one who mentioned his name should be put to death, but this very decree gave it immortality.

Great is Diana of the Ephesians. Nothing like leather; self-interest blinds the eyes. Deme'trios was a silversmith of Ephesus, who made gold and silver shrines for the temple of Diana. When Christianity was preached in the city, and there was danger of substituting the simplicity of the Gospel for the grandeur of idolatry, the silversmiths, headed by Demetrios, stirred the people to a riot, and they cried out with one voice for the space of two hours, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!"

Dian's Worshippers. Midnight revellers. So called because they return home by moonlight, and Dian means the moon.

Diano'ra was the wife of Gilberto of Friuli, but was passionately beloved by Ansaldo. In order to get rid of his importunity, she told him she would never grant his suit and prove untrue till he made her garden at midwinter as full of flowers and odours as if it were midsummer. By the aid of a magician, Ansaldo accomplished this, and claimed his reward. Diano'ra went to meet him, and told him she had obeyed the command of her husband in so doing. Ansaldo, not to be outdone in courtesy, released her; and Gilberto became the firm friend of Ansaldo from that day to the end of his life.—Boccaccio, "Decamerone," day x. 5. (See DORIGEN.)

Diapa'son. Dryden says —

From harmony, from heavenly harmony
The universal frame began;
From harmony to harmony
Thro' all the compass of the notes it ran,
The diapason closing full in man.
Song for St. Cecilia's Day.

According to the Pythagorean system, the world is a piece of harmony, and man the full chord, which consists of a fundamental or tonic, its major third, its just fifth, and its octave.

From this diagram it will be seen at a glance that dia-pason (through all) means the complete chord, or, according to another system, a "microcosm of nature." Man touches Deity, passes through all the planets, and touches earth. It is because he touches Deity that he has an immortal soul, and it is because he runs through the planets that the planets influence his nature. (See MICROCOSM.)

Diar or Drottmar. A kind of priest, twelve of whom presided over the temples of Odin. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Diav'olo (Fra). Michele Pozza, an insurgent of Calabria. (1760-1806.) Scribo wrote a libretto on this hero for Auber.

Dibs or Dibbs. Money. A college perversion of diobis — i.e., diabolus, a classic coin equal to 2½d. The school-boy word tip is another form of dibbs, as in the phrase, "He gave me a famous tip" — i.e., present of money.

The huckle-bones of sheep used for gambling purposes are called dibbs; and Locke speaks of stones used for the same game, which he calls dibstones.

Dicilla (in "Orlando Furioso"). One of Logistilla's handmaids, famous for her chastity.

Dick. That happened in the reign of queen Dick — i.e., never; there never was a queen Richard.

Dick's Hatband.

(1.) As tight as Dick's hatband. The hatband of Richard Cromwell was the crown, which was too tight for him to wear with safety.

(2.) Dick's hatband, which was made of sand. His regal honours were "a rope of sand."

(3.) As queer as Dick's hatband. Few things have been more ridiculous than the exaltation and abdication of the Protector's son.

(4.) As fine as Dick's hatband. The crown of England would be a very fine thing for any one to get.

Dickens. A perverted oath, corrupted from "Nick." Mrs. Page says —

I cannot tell what the dickens his name is. Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," iii. 2.

Dickey or Dicky. A donkey; anciently called a Dick-ass, now termed Jack-ass. It is a term of endearment, as we call a pet bird a dicku-bird. The ass is called Dick-y (little Richard), Cuddy (little Cuthbert), Neddy (little Edward), Jack-ass, Moke or Mike, &c.

Dickey. The rumble behind a carriage; also a leather apron, a child's bib, and a false shirt or front. All these are from the same root (Dutch, dekken; German, decken; Saxon, thecan; Latin, tego, to cover).

Dicta'tor of Letters. François Marie Arouet de Voltaire, called the Great Pan. (1694-1778.)

Didactic Poetry is poetry that teaches some moral lesson, as Pope's "Essay on Man." (Greek, didasko, I teach.)

Diddler (Jeremy). An artful swindler; a clever, scedy vagabond, borrowing money or obtaining credit by his wit and wits. From Kenny's farce called "Raising the Wind."

Did'erick. (See DIETRICH.)

Di'do. It was Porson who said he could rhyme on any subject, and being asked to rhyme upon the three Latin gerunds, gave this couplet —

When Dido found Eneas would not come,
She mourned in silence, and was Di-do dum(h).

Die. The die is cast. The step is taken, and I cannot draw back. So said Julius Caesar when he crossed the Rubicon.

I have set my life upon the cast,
And I will stand the hazard of the die.
Shakespeare, "Richard III," v. 4.

Die-hards. The 57th Foot, so called from their gallantry at Albuera.

Diës Iræ. A famous mediæval hymn on the last judgment, probably the composition of Thomas of Celano, a native of Abruzzi, who died in 1255. Sir Walter Scott has introduced the former part of it into his "Lay of the Last Minstrel."

*Dies iræ, dies illa,
Solvat sæclum in favilla,
Testè David cum Sibylla.*

*On that day, that day of ire,
Saith the King of Wisdom's sire,
Earth shall melt with fervent fire.*

Diës Non. A non-business day. A law phrase, meaning a day when the courts do not sit, as on Sundays; the Purification, in Hilary term; the Ascension, in Easter term; St. John the Baptist, in Trinity term; and All Saints with All Souls, in Michaelmas term.

Diës San'guinis. The 24th March, called Belio'na's Day, when the Roman votaries of the war-goddess cut themselves and drank the sacrificial blood to propitiate the deity.

Dietrich (2 syl.), of Berne or Vero'na, a name given by the German minnesängers (minstrels) to Theodor'ic the Great, king of the Ostrogoths. One of the liegemen of king Etzel. In the terrible broil stirred up by queen Kriemhild in the banquet hall of the Hunnish king, after the slaughter of Sir Rudiger, his friend Dietrich interfered, and succeeded in taking prisoners the only two surviving Burgundians, kings Gunther and Hagan, whom he handed over to Kriemhild, praying that she would set them free, but the angry queen cut off both their heads with her own hands.—The Nibelungen-Lied.

Dieu. Dieu et mon droit (God and my right). The parole of Richard I. at the battle of Gisors (1198), meaning that he was no vassal of France, but owed his royalty to God alone. As the French were signally beaten, the battle-word was adopted as the royal motto of England.

Difference. Ophelia says to the Queen, "You may wear your rue with a difference." In heraldry differences or marks of cadency indicate the various branches of a family.

The eldest son (during the life-time of his father) bears a label.

The second son a crescent.

The third, a mullet.

The fourth, a martlet.

The fifth, an annulet.

The sixth, a fleur-de-lis.

The seventh, a rose.

The eighth, a cross-moline.

The ninth, a double quatre foil.

Ophelia says both she and the Queen are to wear rue, the one as the affianced of Hamlet, eldest son of the late king, the other as the wife of Claudius his brother, and the cadet branch. The latter was to have a "difference," to signify it was a cadet branch. Ophelia says, "I shall wear the rue, but you (the Queen) must now wear it with a 'difference.'"

Diggin's. He is gone to the diggin's. To California or Australia, to dig for gold.

Dig'gory. A barn labourer, taken on grand occasions for butler and footman to Mr. and Mrs. Hardcastle. He laughs and talks while serving, and is as gauche as possible.—Goldsmith, "She Stoops to Conquer."

Digit. The first nine numerals, so called from the habit of counting as far as ten on the fingers. (Latin, digitus, a finger.)

Dilem'ma. The horns of a dilemma. "Lemma" means a thing taken for granted (Greek, lan'bano, to take). "Dilemma" is a double lemma, a two-edged sword which strikes both ways, or a bull which will toss you whichever horn you lay hold of. A young rhetorician said to an old sophist, "Teach me to plead, and I will pay you when I gain a cause." The master sued for payment, and the scholar pleaded, "If I gain the cause I shall not pay you, because the judge will say I am not to pay; and if I lose my cause I shall not be required to pay, according to the terms of our agreement." To this the master replied, "Not so; if you gain your cause you must pay me according to the terms of our agreement; and if you lose your cause, the judge will condemn you to pay me."

Dilettan'tō (Italian). An amateur of the fine arts, in opposition to a professor. Plural, dilettanti.

These gentlemen are to be judged, not as dilettanti, but as professors.—Athenæum.

Diligence is that energy and industry which we show when we do what we like (Latin, di'ligo, I like); but indolence is that listless manner with which we do what thoroughly vexes us. (Latin, in, intensive; doleo, to grieve.)

Diman'che (Monsieur). A dun. The term is from Molière's "Don Juan," and would be in English, Mr. Sunday. The word dimanche is a corruption and contraction of dis Dominica (the Lord's day).

Dim'issory. A letter dimissory is a letter from the bishop of one diocese to some other bishop, giving leave for the hearer to be ordained by him. (Latin, di-mitto, to send away.)

Dim'ity. A cloth so called from Damietta, in Egypt, where it was originally manufactured. Parsons suggests the Greek di-mitos (double thread).

Di'nah (Aunt), in Sterne's "Tristram Shandy." She leaves Mr. Walter Shandy £1,000, which he fancies will enable him to carry out all the wild schemes that enter into his head.

Dinde (1 syl.). The French for a turkey is poulet d'Inde (an Indian fowl). This is an error, as the bird comes from America; unless, indeed, the whole Western continent, with all its contiguous islands, be called by the name of West Indies. Our word "turkey" is no better, as it seems to indicate that the bird is a native of Turkey; but all that is meant is the turkey-red bird, referring to the deep red of the wattie.

Dine. (See DINNERLESS, HUMPHREY.)

Ding-dong. They went at it ding-dong. Fighting in good earnest. To ding is to beat or bruise (Saxon, denegan); dong is a responsive word. One gives a ding and the other a dong.

Dinmont. (See DANDIE.)

Dinnerless. Their hosts are the cross-legged knights. That is, the stone effigies of the Round church. In this church at one time lawyers met their clients, and here a host of vagabonds used to loiter about all day, under the hope of being hired as witnesses. Dining with the cross-legged knights meant much the same thing as dining with duke Humphrey (q.v.).

Di'nos. One of the horses of Diomed.

Dint. By dint of war; by dint of argument; by dint of hard work. Dint means a blow or striking (Saxon, dynt); whence perseverance, power exerted, force; it also means the indentation made by a blow.

Diocle'tian. The Roman emperor, noted for his fierce persecution of the Christians, 303. The emperor Constantine, on the other hand, was the "nursing father" of the Church.

To make the Church's glory shine,
Should Diocletian reign, not Constantine.
Crabbe, "Borough."

Diocle'tian was the king, and Erastus the prince his son, in the Italian version of the Seven Wise Masters (q.v.).

Diog'enes (4 syl.). The cynic philosopher is said to have lived in a tub.

The whole world was not half so wide
To Alexander, when he cried
Because he had but one to sub'due,
As was a paltry narrow tub to Diogenes.

Butler, "Hudibras," i. 3.

Diog'enes. Romanus IV., emperor of the East. (1067-1071.)

Di'omed's Horses. Dinos (dreadful) and Lampon (bright-eyed).

Diomedēs or Dioméd. King of Ætolia, in Greece, brave and obedient to authority. He survived the siege of Troy, but on his return home found his wife living in adultery, and saved his life by living an exile in Italy.—Homer, "Iliad."

Diomed'e'an Swop. An exchange in which all the benefit is on one side. This proverbial expression is founded on an incident related by Homer in the "Iliad." Glaucus recognises Diomed on the battle-field, and the friends change armour.

For Diomed's brass arms, of mean device,
For which nine oxen paid (a vulgar price),
He (Glaucus) gave his own, of gold divinely wrought,
An hundred beebes the shining purchase bought.
Pope, "Iliad," vi.

Dio'ne (3 syl.). Venus, who sprang from the froth of the sea, after the mutilated body of U'ranus (the sky) had been thrown there by Saturn.

So young Dioue, nursed beneath the waves,
And rocked by Nereids in their coral caves...
Lisp'd her sweet tones, and tri'd her tender smiles.
Darwin, "Economy of Vegetation," ii.

Dionys'ius (the younger), being banished a second time from Syracuse, retired to Corinth, where he turned schoolmaster for a living. Posterity called him a tyrant. Byron, in his "Ode to Napoleon," alludes to these facts in the following lines:—

Corinth's pedagogue hath now
Transferred his byword to thy brow.

That is, Napoleon is now called tyrant, like Dionysius.

Diophan'tine Analysis. Finding commensurate values of squares, cubes, triangles, &c.; or the sum of a given number of squares which is itself a square; or a certain number of squares, &c., which are in arithmetical progression. These mathematical puzzles were first treated of by Diophantès, the mathematician of Alexandria.

Dios'curi. Castor and Pollux. (Greek, sons of Zeus.)

The horses of the Dioscuri. Cyl'laros and Har'pagos.

Diph'thera. The skin of the goat Amalthe'a, on which Jove wrote the destiny of man.

Diplo'ma literally means something folded (Greek). Diplomas used to be written on parchment, folded, and sealed. The word is applied to licences given to graduates to assume a degree, to clergymen, physicians, agents, and so on.

Diplom'acy. The tact, negotiations, privileges, &c., of a diplomatist, or one who carries a diploma to a foreign court to authorise him to represent the government which sends him out.

Diptych (dip'tik). A register folded into two leaves, opening like our books, and not like the ancient scrolls. The Romans kept in a book of this sort the names of their magistrates, and the Roman Catholics employed the word for the registers in which were written the names of those bishops, saints, and martyrs who were to be specially commemorated when oblations were made for the dead. (Greek, diptuchos, folded in two.)

Dircæan Swan. Pindar; so called from Dirce, a fountain in the neighbourhood of Thebes, the poet's birthplace. (B.C. 518-442.)

Direct Tax is one collected directly from the owner of property subject to the tax: as when the tax-gatherer goes direct to the owner of a house and demands five, ten, or twenty pounds, as it may be, for government uses. Indirect taxes are taxes upon marketable commodities, such as tea and sugar, the tax on which is added to the article taxed, and paid by the purchasers indirectly.

Dir'ect'ory. The French constitution of 1795, when the executive was vested in five persons called directors, one of whom retired every year. After a sickly existence of four years, it was quashed by Napoleon Bonaparte.

Dir'los (Count). A Paladin, the beau-ideal of valour, generosity, and truth. The story says he was sent by Charlemagne into the East, where he conquered Aliar'dë, a great Moorish prince. On his return he found his young wife, who thought he was dead, betrothed to Celi'nos, another of Charlemagne's peers. The matter being set right, the king gave a grand banquet. Dirlos is D'Yrlos.

Dirt. To eat dirt is to put up with insults and mortification. An Eastern method of punishment.

Dirty. (See Dog.)

Dirty Half-hundred. The 50th Foot, so called from the men wiping their faces with their black cuffs.

Dirty Lane. Now called Abingdon Street, Westminster.

Dis. Pluto.

Proserpine gathering flowers.
Herself a fairer flower, by gloomy Dis
Was gathered.—Milton, "Paradise Lost," iv.

Disas'ter is being under an evil star (Greek, dis-aster, evil star). An astrological word.

Disas'trous Peace (La Paix Mal-heureuse). It followed the battle of Gravelines, and was signed at Cateau-Cambre'sis. By this treaty Henri II. renounced all claim to Gen'oa, Naples, Mil'an, and Cor'sica. (1559.)

Discard'. To throw out of one's hands such cards as are useless.

Dis'cord means severance of hearts (Latin, dis-corda). It is the opposite of concord, the coming together of hearts. In music it means disagreement of sounds, as when a note is followed by another which is disagreeable to the ear. (See APPLE.)

Discuss. To discuss a bottle. To drink one with a friend. Same as

"crush" or "crack a bottle." (Discuss is the Latin dis-quatío; French, casser. The Latin quassa'rē vasū is to break a drinking-vessel.)

Consider the threefold effect of Jnpiter's trifulk—to burn, discuss, and terebrate.—Brown.

Dished (1 syl.). I was dished out of it. Cheated out of it; or rather, some one else contrived to obtain it. A contraction of disherit. The heir is dish't out of his inheritance when his father marries again and leaves his property to the widow and widow's family.

Where's Brummel? Dishell!
Byron, "Don Juan."

Disney Professor. The Professor of Archaeology in the University of Cambridge. This chair was founded in 1851 by John Disney, Esq., of the Hyde, Ingatestone.

Disor'der, says Franklin, "break-fasts with Plenty, dines with Poverty, sups with Misery, and sleeps with Death."

Dispensa'tion. The system which God chooses to dispense or establish between himself and man. The dispensation of Adam was that between Adam and God; the dispensation of Abraham, and that of Moses, were those imparted to these holy men; the Gospel dispensation is that explained in the Gospels. (Latin, dis-pendo, to spread forth, unroll, explain, reveal.)

A dispensation from the Pope. Permission to dispense with something enjoined; a licence to do what is forbidden, or to omit what is commanded.

A dispensation was obtained to enable Dr. Barrow to marry.—Ward.

Dispu'te (2 syl.) means, literally, to "lop down" (Latin, dis-puto); debate means to "knock down" (French, dé-battre); discuss means to "shake down" (Latin, dis-quatío); object' is to "cast against" (Latin, ob-jacio); contend is to "pull against" (Latin, contendo); quarrel is to throw darts at each other (Welsh, gwarel, a dart); and wrangle is to strain by twisting (Swedish, vränga; Saxon, wringan).

Diss. He knows nothing about Diss. He is an ignoramus. Diss is a pun on the town so called in Norfolk and disputat'ionēs, called disses, for shortness.

Dis'solute is one that runs loose, not restrained by laws or any other bonds (Latin, dis-solvo), like horses unharnessed.

Dis'taff. A woman. Properly the staff from which the flax was drawn in spinning. The allusion is to the ancient custom of women, who spun from morning to night. (See SPINSTER.)

The crown of France never falls to the distaff.—Kersey.

To have tow on the distaff. To have work in hand. Froissart says, "Il aura en bref temps autres estoupes en sa quenouille."

He haddē more tow on his distaf
Than Gerveys knew.
Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales," 3,772.

St. Distaff's Day. The 7th of January. So called because the Christmas festival terminates on Twelfth Day, and on the day following the women return to their distaffs or daily occupations. It is also called Rock Day, a distaff being called a rock. "In old times they used to spin with rocks."—Aubrey, "Wills."

Give St. Distaff all the right,
Then give Christmas sport good night,
And next morrow every one
To his own vocation. (1657.)

What! shall a woman with a rock drive thee away?
Eye on thee, traitor! Digby, "Mysteries," p. 11.

Distaffi'na. To whom Bombastēs Furio'so makes love.—Thomas Barnes Rhodes, "Bombastes Furioso."

Distem'per means an undue mixture. In medicine a distemper arises from the redundancy of certain secretions or morbid humours. The distemper in dogs is an undue quantity of secretions manifested by a running from the eyes and nose. (Latin, dis-temp'ero, to mix amiss.)

Applied to painting, the word is from another source, the French détremper (to soak in water), because the paints are mixed with water instead of oil.

Dithyram'bic. The father of dithyrambic poetry. Ari'on of Lesbos.

Dit'tany. When Godfrey was wounded with an arrow, an "odoriferous pan'acy" distilled from dittany was applied to the wound; whereupon the arrow-head fell out, and the wound healed immediately.—"Jerusalem Delivered," bk. xi.

Ditto. (See Do.)

Divan' (Arabic and Persian diwan) means a register kept on a white table, exactly similar to our board. Among the Orientals the word is applied to a council-chamber or court of justice; but in England we mean a coffee-house where smoking is the chief attraction.

Divert. To turn aside. Business is the regular walk or current of our life, but pleasure is a diversion or turning aside for a time from the straight line. What we call diversion is called in French distraktion (drawing aside).

Dives, Dies, or Deevs. Demons of Persian mythology. According to the Koran, they are ferocious and gigantic spirits, under the sovereignty of Eblis.

At Lahore, in the Mogul's palace, are pictures of Dews or Dives with long horns, staring eyes, shaggy hair, great fangs, ugly paws, long tails, and such horrible deformity, that I wonder the poor women are not frightened. — William Finch, "Purchas Pilgrims," vol. i.

Divēs. The name popularly given to the rich man in our Lord's parable of the "Rich Man and Lazarus" (Luke xvi.). The Latin would be Divēs et Lazarus.

Divide (2 syl.). When the members in the House of Commons interrupt a speaker by crying out divide, they mean, bring the debate to an end and put the motion to the vote—i.e., let the ayes divide from the noes, one going on one side of the house, and the other on the opposite side.

Divide and Govern. Divide a nation into parties, or set your enemies at loggerheads, and you can have your own way. A maxim of Machiavelli, a noted political writer of Florence. (1469-1527.)

Every city or house divided against itself shall not stand.—Matthew xii. 25.

Divine. The divine right of kings. The notion that kings reign by divine right, quite independent of the people's will. This notion arose from the Old Testament Scriptures, where kings are called "God's anointed," because they were God's vicars on earth, when the Jews changed their theocracy for a monarchy.

The right divine of kings to govern wrong.

Divine (The). Ferdinand de Herre'ra, a Spanish poet. (1516-1595.)

Raphael, the painter, il Divi'no. (1483-1520.)

Luis Mora'les, Spanish painter, el Divi'no. (1509-1586.)

Divine Doctor. Jean de Ruysbroek, the mystic. (1294-1381.)

Divine Speaker (The). So Aristotle called Tyr'tamos, who therefore adopted the name of Theophrastos. (B.C. 370-287.)

Divi'ning-rod. A forked branch of hazel, suspended by the two prongs between the balls of the thumbs. The inclination of the rod indicates the presence of water-springs, precious metal, and anything else that simpletons will pay for. (See DOUSTERSWIVEL.)

Divi'no Lodovi'co. Ariosto, author of "Orlando Furioso," an epic poem in twenty-four books. (1474-1533.)

Dix'ie Land. The Uto'pia of the American niggers. Dixie was a slaveholder of Manhattan Island, but the force of public opinion induced him to remove his negroes to the Southern States. Here they were strangers in a strange land, and had to work harder and fare worse, so that they were always sighing for the flesh-pots of Egypt, their dear old Dixie Land. Imagination and distance gave charms to the old place, which ultimately became the ideal paradise of negro song.

Dizzy. A nickname of Benjamin Disraeli.

Djin'nestan'. The realm of the djinns or genii of Oriental mythology.

Do. A contraction of ditto, which is the Italian detto (said), Latin dictus.

How do you do?—i.e., fare. How fare you?

Well to do. To fare. This is not the transitive verb, but the intransitive. (Saxon, dugan, equal to the Latin valeo; whence Quam'odo valēs? "How do you do?")

To do him. To cheat, or rather to do a person out of something. I have done the Jew—i.e., overreached him. Same as outdo (to excel).

Do, re, mi, fa, sol, la. Italian; ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la, French. These words are from an old monkish hymn, addressed to St. John, which Guido, in the eleventh century, used in teaching singing.

*Ut queant laxis, Re-sonare fibris,
Mi-ra gestorum Fi-nium tuorum,
Sol-ve poluit La-bii reatum.*

Sandē Joannēs.

Uttered be thy wondrous story,
 Reprehensive though I be,
 Me make mindful of thy glory,
 Famous son of Zebedee:
 Solace to my spirit bring,
 Labouring thy praise to sing.

A seventh syllable has been added, to complete the octave (si).

Do-for. I'll do for him. Ruin him; literally, provide for him in a bad sense. "Taken in and done for," is taken in and provided for; but, jeocosely, it means "cheated and fleeced."

Dobbin. A steady old horse, a child's horse. Dobby, a silly old man. Dobbies, house-elves, similar to brownies. All these are one and the same word. The dobbies lived in the house, were very thin and shaggy, very kind to servants and children, and did many a little service when people had their hands full.

Sober Dobbin lifts his clumsy heel.
Broomfield, "Farmer's Boy."

Dobbins (Humphrey). The valet-de-chambre and factotum of Sir Robert Bramble, of Blackbury Hall, in the county of Kent. A blunt, rough-spoken old retainer, full of the milk of human kindness, and most devoted to his master. — G. Colman, "The Poor Gentleman."

Docetes (3 syl.). An early heretical sect, which maintained that Jesus Christ was only God, and that his visible form was merely a phantom; that the crucifixion and resurrection were illusions, something like "Pepper's Ghost. (The word is Greek, and means phantomists.)

Dock-Alfar. The dark Alfs whose abode is underground. They are in appearance blacker than pitch. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Doctor (The). Brown sherry, so called because it is concocted from a harsh, thin wine, by the addition of old boiled mosto stock. Mosto is made by heating unfermented juice in earthen vessels, till it becomes as thick and sweet as treacle. This syrup being added to fresh "must" ferments, and the luscious produce is used for doctoring very inferior qualities of wine. — Shaw, "On Wine."

To doctor the wine. To drug it. (See above.)

To doctor the accounts. To falsify them. They are ill (so far as you are concerned), and you falsify them to make them look better. The allusion is to drugging wine, beer, &c., and to adulteration generally.

Dr. Dove. The hero of Southey's "Doctor."

Dr. Fell. I do not like thee, Dr. Fell. A correspondent of "Notes and Queries" says the author was Tom Brown, who wrote "Dialogues of the Dead," and the person referred to was Dr. Fell, Dean of Christchurch (1625-1686), who expelled him, but said he would remit the sentence if he translated the thirty-third Epigram of Martial—

Non amo te, Zabidi. nec possum dicere quare;
 Hoc tantum possum dicere, non amo te.

"I do not like thee, Dr. Fell,
 The reason why I cannot tell;
 But this I know, I know full well,
 I do not like thee, Dr. Fell"—T. Brown.

Doctor Mirabilis. Roger Bacon. (1214-1292.)

Doctor My-Book. Dr. John Abernethy, so called because he used to say to his patients, "Read my book"—on "Surgical Observations." (1765-1830.)

Dr. Rez'io or Pedro Rezio of Ague'ro. The doctor of Barataria, who forbade Sancho Panza to taste any of the meats set before him. Roasted partridge was forbidden by Hippoc'ratès; podrida was the most pernicious food in the world; rabbits are a sharp-haired diet; veal is prejudicial to health; but the governor might eat a "few wafers, and a thin slice or two of quince."—"Don Quixote," pt. ii., bk. iii., c. 10.

Dr. Sangra'do, of Vall'adolid', a tall, meagre, pale man, of very solemn appearance, who weighed every word he uttered, and gave an emphasis to his sage dicta. "His reasoning was geometrical, and his opinions angular." He said to the licentiate Sedillo, who was sick, "If you had drunk nothing else but pure water all your life, and eaten only such simple food as boiled apples, you would not now be tormented with gout." He then took from him six porringers of blood to begin with; in three hours he repeated the operation; and again the next day, saying: "It is a gross error to suppose that blood is necessary for life." With this depletion, the patient was to drink two or three pints of hot water every two hours. The result of this treatment was death "from obstinacy."—"Gil Blas," c. ii.

Doctor Slop. An enthusiast, who thinks the world hinges on getting Uncle Toby to understand the action of a new medical instrument.—Sterne, "Tristram Shandy."

A nickname given by William Hone to Sir John Stoddart, editor of the New Times. (1773-1856.)

Doctor Squintum. George Whitefield, so called by Foote in his farce entitled "The Minor." (1714-1770.)

Theodore Hook applied the same sobriquet to the Rev. Edward Irving, who had an obliquity of the eyes. (1792-1834.)

Doctor Syntax. A simple-minded, pious, henpecked clergyman, green as grass, but of excellent taste and scholarship, who left home in search of the picturesque. His adventures are told in eight-syllable verse in "The Tour of Dr. Syntax," by William Combe. (See DUKE COMBE.)

Dr. Syntax's horse. Grizzle, all skin and bone.

Doctors. False dice, which are doctored, or made to turn up winning numbers.

"The whole antechamber is full, my lord,—knights and squires, doctors and diceers."

"The diceers with their doctors in their pockets, I presume."—Scott, "Peveril of the Peak," c. xxviii.

Or ch'ired at White's, amidst the doctors sit.
"Dunciad," bk. i. 203.

Doctors' Commons. A locality near St. Paul's, where the ecclesiastical courts were formerly held, and where wills are preserved. To "common" means to dine together; a term still used at our universities. Doctors' Commons was so called because the doctors of civil law had to dine together four days in each term. This was called eating their terms.

Doctor's Stuff. Medicine; stuff sent from the doctor.

Doctour of Phisikes Tale, in Chaucer, is the Roman story of Virginius, given by Livy. There is a version of this tale in the "Roman de la Rose," vol. ii., p. 74; and another, by Gower, in his "Confessio Amantis," bk. vii.

Doctrinists or Doctrinaires. A political party which has existed in France since 1815. They maintain that true liberty is compatible with a monarchical Government; and are so called because they advocate what is only a doctrine or dream. M. Guizot is one of this party.

Dodge (1 syl.). An artful device to evade, deceive, or bilk some one. (Anglo-Saxon, deogian, to conceal or colour.)

Dodger. The Artful Dodger. A young thief, up to every artifice, and a perfect adept in villany. A sobriquet given by Dickens to such a rascal, in his "Oliver Twist."

Dodgington, whom Thomson invokes in his "Summer," was George Bubb Dodgington, lord Melcomb-Regis, a British statesman, who associated much with the wits of the time. Churchill and Pope ridiculed him, while Hogarth introduced him in his wig into his picture called the "Orders of Periwigs."

Dod'ipoll. As wise as Dr. Dodipoll (or Doddipole—i.e., not wise at all; a dunce. The verb dote is, to be of weak mind, or to have a mind impaired by age; hence, dotard. Dodipoll is one who has a poll or head without intellect.

Dodman or Doddiman. A snail. A word still common in Norfolk; but Fairfax, in his "Bulk and Selvedge" (1674), speaks of "a snayl or dodman." The word, like Dodipoll (q.v.), refers to the dull, stupid nature of the snail, which is a doted creature.

Doddiman, doddiman, put out your horns,
Here comes a thief to steal your corns.
Norfolk rhyme.

Dodo'na. A famous oracle in Epi'ros, and the most ancient of Greece. It was dedicated to Zeus (Jupiter), and situate in the village of Dodona.

Dods (Meg). The old landlady in Scott's novel called "St. Roman's Well." An excellent character, made up of consistent inconsistencies; a mosaic of oddities, all fitting together, and forming an admirable whole. She was so good a housewife that a cookery book of great repute bears her name.

Dodson and Fogg. The lawyers employed by the plaintiff in the famous case of "Bardell v. Pickwick," in the "Pickwick Papers," by Charles Dickens.

Doe. John Doe and Richard Roe. Any plaintiff and defendant in an action of ejectment. They were sham names used at one time to save certain "niceties of law;" but the clumsy device was abolished in 1852. Any mere imaginary persons, or men of straw. John Doe, Richard Roe, John o' Noakes, and Tom Styles, are the four sons of "Mrs. Harris," all bound apprentices to the legal profession.

Doeg (2 syl.), in the satire of "Absalom and Achitophel" by Dryden and Tate, is meant for Elka'nah Settle, a poet who wrote satires upon Dryden, but was no match for his great rival. Doeg was Saul's berdsman, who had charge of his mules and asses. He told Saul that the priests of Nob had provided David with food; whereupon Saul sent him to put them to death, and eighty-five were ruthlessly massacred. (1 Sam. xxi. 7; xxii. 18.)

Doeg, though without knowing how or why,
Made still a blundering kind of melody....
Let him rail on: let his invective Muse
Have four-and-twenty letters to abuse,
Which if he jumbles to one line of sense,
Indict him of a capital offence.

"Absalom and Achitophel," pt. ii.

Doff is do-off, as "Doff your hat."
So Don is do-on, as "Don your clothes."
Dup is do-up, as "Dup the door." (See HAMLET.)

Doff thy harness, youth.
Shakespeare, "Troilus and Cressida," v. 3.

Dog. Barry. The famous mastiff of Great St. Bernard's, in the early part of the present century instrumental in saving forty human beings. His most memorable achievement was rescuing a little boy whose mother had been destroyed by an avalanche. The dog carried the boy on his back to the hospice. The stuffed skin of this noble animal is kept in the museum of Berne.

Dog in monuments. The dog is placed at the feet of women in monuments to symbolise affection and fidelity, as a lion is placed at the feet of men to signify courage and magnanimity. Many of the Crusaders are represented with their feet on a dog, to show that they followed the standard of the Lord as faithful as a dog follows the footsteps of his master.

Dog of God. So the Laplanders call the bear. The Norwegians say it "has the strength of ten men and the wit of twelve." They never presume to speak of it by its proper appellation, gooustija, lest it should revenge the insult on their flocks and herds, but they call it Möddla-aija (the old man with a fur cloak).

Dog of Icar'ios. Mæra (the glistener). Icar'ios was slain by some drunken peasants, who buried the body under a tree. His daughter Erig'onë, searching for her father, was directed to the spot by the howling of Mæra, and when she discovered the body, hung herself for grief. Icar'ios became the constellation Boötës, Erig'one the constellation Virgo, and Mæra the star Procyon, which rises in July, a little before the Dog-star. (Greek, pro-kyon.)

Dog of Monta'gis. The same as Aubry's dog. A picture of the combat was for many years preserved in the castle of Montagis. (See AUBRY'S DOG.)

Dog of the Seven Sleepers. The seven noble youths that fell asleep for 200 years had a dog, which accompanied them to the cavern in which they were walled up. It remained standing for the two centuries, and neither moved from the spot, ate, drank, nor slept. This dog, called in the Koran Al Rakim, has been admitted by Mahomet into Paradise. In the legend of the "Seven Sleepers" the dog is called Ketmir.

Dogs of war. The horrors of war. (See ATE.)

Cry Havoc, and let slip the dogs of war.
Shakespeare, "Julius Cæsar," iii. 1.

Actæon's fifty dogs. Alcë (strength), Amary'nthos (from Amary'thia, in Eubæa), As'bolos (soot-colour), Ban'os, Bor'eas, Can'achë (ringwood), Chedia'tros, Cisse'ta, Co'ran (cropped, crop-eared), Cylo (halt), Cyllop'otës (zig-zag runner), Cyp'rios (the Cyprian), Draco (the dragon), Drom'as (the courser), Dro'mios (seize-em), Ech'nobas, Eu'dromos (good-runner), Harpalë (voracious), Harpie'a (tear-em), Ichnob'atë (track-follower), La'hros (furious), Lacena (lioness), Lach'në (glossy-coated), Lacon (Spartan), La'don (from Ladon, in Arca'dia), Lælaps (hurricane), Lampos (shining-one), Leu'cos (gray), Lycis'ca, Lynce'a, Mach'imos (boxer), Melampë (black), Melanche'të (black-coat), Melan'ca (black), Menela'a, Molossos (from Molossos), Na'pa (begotten by a wolf), Nebroph'onos (fawn-killer), Oë'y-droma (swift-runner), Oresit'rophos (mountain-bred), Ori'basos (mountain-ranger), Pachy'tos (thick-skinned), Pam'plagos (ravenous), Pæ'menis (leader), Pter'elas (winged), Stricta (spot), Therid'amas (beast-tamer or subduer), Théron (savage-faced), Thoös (swift), Uran'i (heavenly-one).

King Arthur's favourite hound. Caval.

Aubry's dog. Aubry of Mondid'ier was murdered, in 1371, in the forest of Bondy. His dog showed a most unusual hatred to a man named Richard of Macaire, always snarling and ready to fly at his throat whenever he appeared. Suspicion was excited, and Richard of Macaire was condemned to a judicial combat with the dog. He was killed, and in his dying moments confessed the crime.

Lord Byron's favourite dog. Boat-swain, buried in the garden of Newstead Abbey.

Fingal's dog was named Bran.

"Mar e Bran, is e a brathair" (If it be not Bran, it is Fran's brother) was the proverbial reply of Maccombich. — Waverley, ch. xlv.

Geryon's dogs. Gargittios and Orthos. The latter was the brother of Cer'beros, but had one head less. Herculës killed both these monsters.

Elewellyn's greyhound was named Gelert' (q.v.).

Lullum's dog. (See LAZY.)

Orion's dogs. Arctoph'onos (bear-killer), and Ptooph'agos (Ptoon-glutton. Ptoon is in Bæotia).

A black dog has walked over him. Said of a sullen person. Horace tells us that the sight of a black dog with its pups was an unlucky omen. (See BLACK DOG.)

A dog in the manger. A churlish fellow, who will not use what is wanted by another, nor yet let the other have it to use. The allusion is to the well-known fable of a dog that fixed his place in a manger, and would not allow an ox to come near the hay.

Barking dogs never bite. (See BARKING.)

Dog don't eat dog. One of a craft does not backbite another of the same craft.

Dogs howl at death. A rabbinical superstition.

In the rabbinical book it saith
The dogs howl when, with icy breath,
Great Sammaël, the angel of death,
Takes thro' the towu his flight.
Longfellow, "Golden Legend," iii.

Gone to the dogs. The ace in dice was by the Romans called canis (dog), and a cast at dice where all was lost was throwing three aces; hence, "dog" meant ruin, loss, ill-luck, and to "go to the dogs" meant to be in ill-luck, to go to the bad. I do not think it means "gone to the gods" (i.e., as good as dead), by a perversion of the word; nor yet "given to the dogs," like a horse in a knacker's yard. Bellenden Ker says it is the Dutch toe goë, toe de dog's (money gone, credit gone too), a suggestion which has the merit of the meaning without doubt. (See DOG-CHEAP.)

Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing? By a Jew a dog was regarded with abhorrence, not only because it was an "unclean" animal, but because it fed on offal. Even the "price" received for a dog was not accepted as an offering to God (Deut. xxiii. 18).

Sydney Smith being asked if it was true that he was about to sit to Landseer, the animal painter, for his portrait, replied, "What! is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing?"

It was the story of the dog and the shadow—i.e., of one who throws good money after bad; of one who gives "certa pro incertis." The allusion is to the well-known fable.

Illudit species, ac den'tibus aëra mordit.
(Down sank the meat in the stream for the fishes to hoard it.)

The hair of the dog that bit you. When a man has had a debauch, he is advised to take next morning "a hair of the same dog," in allusion to an ancient notion that the burnt hair of a dog is an antidote to its bite.

The Thracian dog. Zoilus.

Like curs, our critics haunt the poet's feast,
And feed on scraps refused by every guest;
From the old Thracian dog they learned the way
To snarl in want, and grumble o'er their prey.
Pitt, "To Mr. Spence."

To call off the dogs. To break up a disagreeable conversation. In the chase, if the dogs are on the wrong track, the huntsman calls them off. (French, rompre les chiens.)

You dirty dog. In the East the dog is still held in abhorrence, as the scavenger of the streets. "Him that dieth in the city shall the dogs eat" (1 Kings xiv. 11). The French say, Crotté comme un barbet (muddy or dirty as a poodle), whose hair, being very long, becomes filthy with mud and dirt. Generally speaking, "a dirty dog" is one morally filthy, and is applied to those who talk and act nastily. Mere skin dirt is quite another matter, and those who are so defiled we call dirty pigs.

He dogged me. He followed me like a dog, or as a dog follows the chase.

Your sins will dog you, pursue you, and the terrors of the Almighty be on you. — Burroughs on "Hosea."

Dog and Duck. A public-house sign, to announce that ducks were hunted by dogs within. The sport was to see the duck dive, and the dog after it. At Lambeth there was a famous pleasure resort so called, on the spot where Bethlehem Hospital now stands.

Dog-cheap. A perversion of the old English god-chepe (a good bargain). French, bon marché (good-cheap or bargain). (See GONE TO THE DOGS.)

The sack . . . would have bought me lights as good-che up at the dearest chandler's in Europe.—Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV." iii. 3.

Dog-days. Days of great heat. The Romans called the six or eight hottest weeks of summer canicula'rēs diēs. According to their theory, the dog-star or Sirius, rising with the sun, added to its heat, and the dog-days bore the combined heat of the dog-star and the sun. (July 3rd to August 11th.)

Dog-headed Tribes of India. Mentioned in the Italian romance of "Guerriño Meschini."

Dog-Latin. Pretended Latin, as dog-sleep is pretended sleep and doggerel is pretended verse. Similarly, dog-wheat, dog-grass, dog-rose, dog-brier, dog-cabbage, are pretended or bad imitations of those plants. Perhaps there is some fanciful allusion to the word mongrel, for which dog is substitutional.

Dirty dog, surly dog, dog-sick, &c., allude more to the animal called a dog, but imply the idea of badness.

Dog-watch. A corruption of dodge-watch: two short watches, one from four to six, and the other from six to eight in the evening, introduced to dodge the routine, or prevent the same men always keeping watch at the same time. (See WATCH.)

Dog-weary, says Bellenden Ker, is the Dutch doge waere hie (being long on one's legs tells at last).

Oh, master, muster. I have watched so long
That I'm dog-weary.
Shakespeare, "Taming of the Shrew," iv. 2.

Dogs. Isle of Dogs. When Greenwich was a place of royal residence, the kennel for the monarch's hounds was on the opposite side of the river, hence called the "Isle of Dogs."

Dogs'-ears. The corners of leaves crumpled and folded up. Dogs-eared.

Leaves so crumpled and turned up. The ears of many dogs turn down and seem quite limp.

Dog's-nose. Gin and beer, a mixture as cold as a dog's nose.

"Dog's-nose, which is, I believe, a mixture of gin and beer."
"So it is," said an old lady.—Pickwick Papers.

Dog-star. The brightest star in the firmament. So called by the Egyptians, because it watches the rising of the Nile, and gives notice by its appearance of that important event. (See SIRIUS.)

Do'gares'sa. The wife of a doge.

Dogberry. An ignorant, self-satisfied, overbearing, but good-natured night-constable in Shakespeare's "Much Ado About Nothing."

Doge. The chief magistrate in Venice while it was a republic. The first duke or doge was Anafesto Paoluc'cio, created 697. The chief magistrate of Gen'oa was called a doge down to 1797, when the republican form of government was abolished by the French. (Latin, dux, a "duke" or "leader.")

Doge. The ceremony of wedding the Adriatic was instituted in 1174 by pope Alexander III., who gave the doge a gold ring from off his own finger in token of the victory achieved by the Venetian fleet at Istria over Frederick Barbarossa, in defence of the pope's quarrel. When his holiness gave the ring, he desired the doge to throw a similar ring into the sea every year on Ascension Day, in commemoration of the event. (See BUCENTAUR.)

Doggèd. Sullen, snappish, like a dog.

Dogget. Dogget's coat and badge. The first prize in the Thames rowing-match, given on the 1st of August every year. So called from Thomas Dogget, an actor of Drury Lane, who signalled the accession of George I. to the throne by giving a waterman's coat and badge to the winner of the race. The Fishmongers' Company add a guinea to the prize.

Dogma (Greek). A religious doctrine formally stated. It now means a statement resting on the ipse dixit of the speaker. Dogmatic teaching used to mean the teaching of religious doctrines, but now dogmatic means overbearing and dictatorial.

Dogmatic Facts.

(7.) He has ultimate authority to appoint all bishops.

(8.) He has power to depose any ecclesiastic.

(9.) He has power to judge every question of doctrine, and pronounce infallibly what the church shall or shall not accept.

Dogmatic School of Medicine.

Founded by Hippocrates, and so called because it set out certain dogmas or theoretical principles, which it made the basis of practice.

Dogmatic Theology is that which treats of the dogmata (doctrines) of religion.

Doiley or Doily is the Dutch diraele (a towel). In Norfolk they call the thick house flannel there used doyelling, and a single length for use a doyel.

Dola'bra. The knife used by the priests of Rome in cutting up the victims offered in sacrifice.

Doll Money. A lady of Duxford left a sum of money to be given away annually in the parish, and to be called Doll Money. Doll is a corruption of dole, Saxon dal (a share distributed).

Dollar. Marked thus $—i.e., scutum. The two lines drawn through it indicate that a contraction is made, as in lb for pounds in weight.

The word is a corruption of thaler (Low German, dahler; Danish, daler), and means "a valley," our dale. The counts of Schlick, at the close of the fifteenth century, extracted from the mines at Joachim's thal (Joachim's valley) silver which they coined into ounce-pieces. These pieces, called Joachim's thalers, gained such high repute that they became a standard coin. Other coins being made like them were called thalers only.

Dolly Murrey. A character in Crabbe's "Borough," who died playing cards.

"A vole! a vole!" she cried, "'tis fairly won."
This said, she gently, with a single sigh,
Died as one taught and practised how to die.
Crabbe, "Borough."

Dolly Shop. A shop where rags and refuse are bought and sold. So called from the black doll suspended over it as a sign. Dolly shops are, in reality, no better than unlicensed pawnshops. A black doll used to be the sign hung out to denote the sale of silks and muslins which were fabricated by Indians.

Dolmen. A name given in France to what we term "cromlechs." These ancient remains are often called by the rural population devils' tables, fairies' tables, and so on. (Celtic, stone tables.)

Dolopa'tos. A French metrical version of San'dabar's Parables, written by Hebers or Herbers for prince Philippe, afterwards called Philippe le Hardi. Dolopa'tos is the Sicilian king, and Virgil the tutor of his son Lucinien. (See SEVEN WISE MASTERS.)

Dolphin. Called a sea-goose (oie de mer) from the form of its snout, termed in French bec d'oie (a goose's beak).

Dom. A title applied in the middle ages to the pope, and at a somewhat later period to other church dignitaries. In recent times it was restricted to the Benedictines and some few other monastic orders, as Dom Mabillon, Dom Calmet. The Spanish don, Portuguese dom, German von, and French dé, are pretty well equivalent to it. (Latin, dominus.)

Dombey (Florence). A motherless child, hungering and thirsting to be loved, but regarded with frigid indifference by her father, who thinks that sons alone are worthy of his regard.—Dickens, "Dombey and Son."

Mr. Dombey. A self-sufficient, purse-proud, frigid merchant, who feels satisfied there is but one Dombey in the world, and that is himself.—Dickens, "Dombey and Son."

Dom-Daniel. The abode of evil spirits, gnomes, and enchanters, somewhere "under the roots of the ocean," but not far from Babylon.—Continuation of the Arabian Tales.

In the Domdaniel caverns
Under the roots of the ocean. Southey.

Domesday Book consists of two volumes, one a large folio, and the other a quarto, the material of each being vellum. It was formerly kept in the Exchequer, under three different locks and keys, but is now kept in the Record Office. The date of the survey is 1086.

Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland and Durham are not included in the survey, though parts of Westmoreland and Cumberland are taken.

The value of all estates is given, firstly, as in the time of the Confessor; secondly, when bestowed by the Conqueror; and, thirdly, at the time of the survey. The last valuation is one-fourth less than the first.

Stowe says the book was so called because it was deposited in a part of Winchester Cathedral called Domus-dei, and that the word is a contraction of Domus-dei book; more likely it is connected with the previous surveys made by the Saxon kings, and called doms-bocs (libri judiciales), because every case of dispute was decided by an appeal to these registers.

Then seye Gamelyn to the Justise..
Thou hast given domes that bin evil dight.
I wil sitten in thy sete, and dresen him aright.
Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales" (The Cookes Tale).

Domestic. England's domestic poet.
William Cowper, author of "The Task."
(1731-1800.)

Domestic Evil Genius. (See ALASTOR, ASMODEUS.)

Domestic Poultry, in Dryden's "Hind and Panther," means the Roman Catholic clergy. So called from an establishment of priests in the private chapel at Whitehall. The nuns are termed "sister partlet with her hooded head."

Dominical Letters. The letters which denote the Sundays or diēs dominicæ. The first seven letters of the alphabet are employed; so that if A stands for the first Sunday in the year, the other six letters will stand for the other days of the week, and the octave Sunday will come round to A again. In this case A will be the Sunday or Dominical Letter for the year.

Dominicans. Preaching friars founded by Dominic de Guzman, at Toulouse, in 1215. Called in England

Black Friars, from their black dress, and in France Jacobins, because their mother-establishment in Paris was in the Rue St. Jacques.

Dom'nie Sampson. A village schoolmaster and scholar, poor as a church mouse, and modest as a girl. He cites Latin like a porcus literarum, and exclaims "Prodigious!" — Scott, "Guy Rannering." (See STILLING.)

Dom'inoes (3 syl.). The teeth; also called ivorines. Dominoes are made of ivory.

Domisellus. The son of a king, prince, knight, or lord, before he has entered on the order of knighthood. Also an attendant on some abbot or nobleman. The person domiciled in your house. As these pages, &c., were generally the sons of gentlemen, it is plain to see how the meaning became extended. (Norman damoiselle or demicelle, Italian donzel.)

The English damsel and the French damoiselle are the same word, but, strangely enough, the sex is changed. Froissart styles Richard II. le jeune damoiseel Richart. (See BACHELOR.)

Don is do-on, as "Don your bonnet."
(See DOFF, DUF.)

Then up he rose, and donned his clothes,
And cupp'd the chamber door
Shakespeare, "Hamlet," iv. 5.

Don. A man of mark, an aristocrat. At the universities the masters, fellows, and noblemen are termed doms. (Spanish.)

Don Felix, in "The Wonder," by Mrs. Centlivre.

Don Giovan'ni. Mozart's best opera. (See DON JUAN.)

Don Juan. A native of Seville, son of Don José and Donna Inez, a blue-stocking. When Juan was sixteen years old he got into trouble with Donna Julia, and was sent by his mother, then a widow, on his travels. His adventures form the story of the poem, which is incomplete. — Byron, "Don Juan."

A Don Juan. A libertine of the aristocratic class. The original of this character was Don Juan Teno'rio of Seville, who lived in the fourteenth century. The traditions concerning him have been dramatised by Tirso de Molina; thence passed into Italy and France. Glück has a musical ballet of "Don Juan," and Mozart has immortalised the character in his opera of "Don Giovanni." (1787.)

Don Quixote (2 syl.). A gaunt country gentleman of La Mancha, gentle and dignified, affectionate and simple-minded, but so crazed by reading books of knight-errantry, that he believes himself called upon to redress the wrongs of the whole world, and actually goes forth to avenge the oppressed and run a tilt with their oppressors. The word Quixote means The cuish-armed. (See QUIXOTIC.)

Don'atists. Followers of Don'atus, a Numidian bishop, who opposed Cecilia'nus. Their chief dogma is that the outward church is nothing, "for the letter killeth, it is the spirit that giveth life." (Founded 314.)

Dondasch'. An Oriental giant contemporary with Seth, to whose service he was attached. He needed no weapons, as he could destroy anything by the mere force of his arms.

Done Brown. He was done brown. Completely bamboozled or made a fool of. This is a variety of the many expressions of a similar meaning connected with cooking, such as "I gave him a roasting," "I cooked his goose," "I cut him into mincemeat," "I put him into a pretty stew," "I settled his hash," with many others.

Don'egild (3 syl.). The wicked mother of Ella, king of Northumberland. Hating Cunstane because she was a Christian, she put her on a raft with her infant son, and turned her adrift. When Ella returned from Scotland, and discovered this cruelty of his mother, he put her to death.—Chaucer, "Man of Lawes Tale."

Donkey, properly Dunkey. Chaucer calls a donkey a dun. "Dun is in the mire" ("Canterbury Tales," v. 16, 937). Key (kin) is seen in monkey, jockey; donkey, therefore, is the little tawny animal, or the little dunning animal, alluding to its dinning bray. Mr. Rix suggests the Low Country donker or donkerheyd (gloom).

Donkey. The cross of the donkey's back is popularly attributed to the honour conferred on the beast by our Lord and Saviour, who rode on an ass to Jerusalem in "his triumphant entry" into that city on Palm Sunday. A writer in Blackwood wittily adds, that the mark prior to that occasion was premonitory.

Ride the black donkey. To be pig-headed, obstinate like a donkey. Black s added, not so much to designate the colour, as to express what is bad.

The donkey means one thing and the driver another. Different people see from different standpoints, their own interest in every case directing their judgment. The allusion is to a fable in Phædrus, where a donkey-driver exhorts his donkey to flee, as the enemy is at hand. The donkey asks if the enemy will load him with double pack-saddles. "No," says the man. "Then," replies the donkey, "what care I whether you are my master or some one else?"

Three more, and up goes the donkey—i.e., three pennies more, and the donkey shall be balanced on the top of the pole or ladder. It is said to a braggart, and means—what you have said is wonderful, but if we admit it without gainsaying, we shall soon be treated with something still more astounding.

Who ate the donkey? When the French were in their flight from Spain, after the battle of Vittoria, some stragglers entered a village and demanded rations. The villagers killed a donkey, and served it to their hated foes. Next day they continued their flight, and were waylaid by the villagers, who assaulted them most murderously, jeering them as they did so with the shout, "Who ate the donkey?"

Do'ny. Florimel's dwarf.—Spenser's "Faëry Queen," bk. iii. cant. 5.

Don'zel (Italian). A squire or young man of good birth.

Doo'lin of Mayence. The hero of a French romance of chivalry, and the father of Ogier the Dane.

Doolin's Sword. Marveilleuse (wonderful).

Doom Book (dom boc) is the book of dooms or judgments compiled by king Alfred. (See DOMESDAY BOOK.)

Doom-rings, or Circles of Judgment. An Icelandic term for circles of stones resembling Stonehenge and Avebury.

Dooms'day Sedgwick. William Sedgwick, a fanatical prophet and preacher during the Commonwealth. He pretended to have had it revealed to him in a vision that doomsday was at hand; and, going to the house of Sir Francis Russell, in Cambridgeshire, he called upon a party of gentlemen playing at bowls to leave off and prepare for the approaching dissolution.

Door. The door must be either shut or open. It must be one way or the other. This is from a French comedy called "Le Grondeur," where the master scolds his servant for leaving the door open; the servant says that he was scolded the last time for shutting it, and adds, "Do you wish it shut?"—"No." "Do you wish it open?"—"No." "Why," says the man, "it must be either shut or open."

Door Nail. (See DEAD.) Savage's partner in "Dead as a Door-nail."—Dickens, "Christmas Carol," ch. i.

Door-opener (The). So Cratæus, the Theban, was called, because every morning he used to go round Athens, and rouse the people for their late rising.

Door'ga. The chief goddess of the Hindu triad; the other two are Luckshmi or Luxmee, and Saraswatee.

Doorm. An earl called "the Bull," who tried to make Enid his handmaid; but when she would neither eat, drink, nor array herself in bravery, at his bidding, "he smote her on the cheek;" whereupon her lord and husband, count Geraint, starting up, slew the "russet-bearded earl" in his own hall.—Tennyson, Idylls of the King, "Enid."

Do'ra. The first wife of David Copperfield; she was a child-wife, but no help-meet. She could do nothing of practical use, but looked on her husband with idolatrous love, and thought it glory enough to hold his pen or wipe it dry after it was done with. If this were not a work-a-day world, who would not envy the simplicity, the gentleness, the love, the single affection of a Dora? Tennyson has a poem entitled "Dora."

Dorado (El). (See EL.)

Do'rax. A Portuguese renegade, in Dryden's "Don Sebastian;" by far the best of all his characters.

Dor'cas Society. A society for supplying the poor with clothing. So called from Dorcas, mentioned in Acts ix. 39.

Dor'chester. As big as a Dorchester butt. Very corpulent, like the cider butts of Dorchester. Of Toby Filpot it is said—

*His breath-doors of life on a sudden were shut,
And he died full as big as a Dorchester butt.
O'Keefe, "Poor Soldier."*

Do'ric. The oldest, strongest, and simplest of the three Grecian orders of architecture. So called from Doris, in Greece, or the Dorians who employed it. The Greek Doric is simpler than the Roman imitation. The former stands on the pavement without fillet or other ornament, and the flutes are not scalloped. The Roman column is placed on a plinth, has fillets, and the flutings, both top and bottom, are scalloped.

Doric Land. Greece, Doris being a part of Greece.

Through all the bounds
Of Doric land.

Milton, "Paradise Lost," bk. i.

Do'ric Reed. Pastoral poetry. Everything Doric was very plain, but cheerful, chaste, and solid. The Dorians were the pastoral people of Greece, and their dialect was that of the country rustics. Our own Bloomfield and Robert Burns are examples of British Doric.

The Doric reed once more
Weil pleased, I tune.

Thomson, "Autumn."

Dor'icourt. A sort of Tremaine of the eighteenth century, who, having over-refined his taste by the "grand tour," considers English beauties insipid. He falls in love with Letitia Hardy at a masquerade, after feeling aversion to her in her assumed character of a hoyden.—Mrs. Cowley, "The Belle's Stratagem."

Dor'igen. A lady of high family, who married Arviragus out of pity for his love and meekness. She was greatly beloved by Aurelius, to whom she had been long known. Aurelius, during the absence of Arviragus, tried to win the heart of the young wife; but Dorigen made answer that she would never listen to him till the rocks that beset the coast of Britain are removed "and there n'is no stone yseen." Aurelius, by the aid of a young magician of Orleans, caused all the rocks to disappear, and claimed his reward. Dorigen was very sad, but her husband insisted that she should keep her word, and she went to meet Aurelius. When Aurelius saw how sad she was, and heard what Arviragus had counselled, he said he would rather die than injure so rue a wife and noble a gentleman. So she returned to her husband happy and untainted. (See DIANORA.)—Chaucer's "Franklines Tale."

Dor'imant. A photograph of the earl of Rochester; a witty aristocratic libertine, in Etherage's "Man of Mode."

Dormer-window. The window of an attic standing out from the slope of the roof. (French, dormir, to sleep; Latin, dormio.)

Dornock. Stout figured linen for table-cloths. So called from a town in Scotland, where it was originally made.

Dorsa'nes (3 syl.). The Indian Herules.

Dorset. Once the seat of a British tribe, calling themselves Dwr-trigs (water-dwellers). The Romans colonised the settlement, and Latinised Dwr-trigs into Duro-trigēs. Lastly, came the Saxons, and translated the original words into their own tongue, dor-setta (water-dwellers).

Dorset'ian Downs. The Downs of Dorsetshire.

Spread the pure Dorsetian downs
In boundless prospect. Thomson, "Autumn."

Dosith'eans. A religious sect which sprang up in the first century. So called because they believed that Dosith'eus had a divine mission, superior to that of prophets and apostles.

Do'son. A promise-maker and a promise-breaker. Antig'onos, grandson of Demetrios the besieger, was so called.

Doss. A hassock stuffed with straw; a bed—properly, a straw bed; whence the cant word for a lodging-house is a dossken. Dossel is an old word for a bundle of hay or straw, and dossier for a straw basket. These words were common in Elizabeth's reign. The French dossier means a "bundle." All these words are connected with dose, a given quantity. (Greek, dosis; Italian, dosa; French, dose.)

Do-the-Boys' Hall. A school where boys were taken in and done for by a Mr. Squeers, a puffing, ignorant, overbearing brute, who starved them and taught them nothing. — Dickens, "Nicholas Nickleby."

Do'to. One of the Nereids (q.v.).

Dot'terel or Dottrel. A doating old fool; an old man easily cajoled. The bird thus called, a species of plover, is so fond of imitation that any one may catch it.

Dou'ay Bible. The English translation of the Bible sanctioned by the Roman Catholic Church. The Old Testament was published by the English college at Douay, in France, in 1609; but the New Testament was published at Rheims in 1582. The English college at Douay was founded by William Allen (afterwards cardinal) in 1568. The Douay Bible translates such words as repentance by the word penance, &c., and the whole contains notes by Roman Catholic divines.

Double X. (See XX.)

Double or quits. The winner stakes his stake, and the loser promises to pay twice the stake if he loses again; but if he wins the second throw he pays nothing, and neither player loses or wins anything. This is often done when the stake is 3d., and the parties have no copper: if the loser loses again, he pays 6d.; if not, the winner does not claim his 3d.

Double or Double-walkers. Those aerial duplicates of men or women who represent them so minutely as to deceive those that know them. We apply the word to such persons as the Dromio brothers, the Corsican brothers, the brothers Antiph'olus. The "head centre Stephens" is said to have a double, who is perpetually leading astray those set to hunt him down.

Double-Dutch. Gibberish, jargon, or a foreign tongue not understood by the hearer. Dutch is a synonym for foreign; and double is simply excessive, in a twofold degree.

Double-edged Sword. Literally, a sword which cuts either way; metaphorically, an argument which makes both for and against the person employing it, or which has a double meaning.

"Your Delphic sword," the panther then replied.
"Is double-edged, and cuts on either side."
Dryden, "Hind and Panther," pt. iii.

Double-tongued. One who makes contrary declarations on the same subject at different times; deceitful.

Be grave, not double-tongued.—1 Tim. iii. 8.

Doubting Castle. The castle of the giant Despair, in which Christian and Hopeful were incarcerated, but from which they escaped by means of the key called "Promise."—Bunyan, "Pilgrim's Progress."

Douceur. French for sweetness. The English use of the word, meaning a present for service to be rendered, is unknown in France.

Douglas. The tutelary saint of the house of Douglas is St. Bridget. According to tradition, a Scottish king in 770, whose ranks had been broken by the fierce onset of the lord of Isles, saw the tide of battle turned in his favour by an unknown chief. After the battle, the king asked who was the "Du-glass" chieftain, his deliverer, and received for answer Sholto Du-glass (Behold the dark-grey man you inquired for). The king then rewarded him with the Clydesdale valley for his services.

"Let him not cross or thwart me," said the page; "for I will not yield him an inch of way, had he in his body the soul of every Douglas that has lived since the time of the Dark Gray Man.—Scott, "The Abbot," ch. xxviii.

Black Douglas, introduced by Sir Walter Scott in "Castle Dangerous," is James, eighth lord Douglas, who twice took Douglas Castle from the English by stratagem. The first time he partly burnt it, and the second time he utterly razed it to the ground. The castle, says Godscroft, was nicknamed the hazardous or dangerous, because every one who attempted to keep it from the "gud sekyr James" was in constant jeopardy by his wiles. (See BLACK.)

The Good Sir James, the dreadful blacke Douglas,
That in his dayes so wise and worthie was,
Wha here, and on the mndels of Spain,
Such honour, praise, and triumphs did obtain.
Gordon.

Douster-swivel. A German swindler, who obtains money under the promise of finding buried wealth by a divining-rod.—Scott, "Antiquary."

Dout. A contraction of do-out, as don is of do-on, and doff of do-off.

In Devonshire and other southern counties they still say Dout the candle and Dout the fire.

The dram of base
Doth all the noble substance dout.
Shakepeare, "Hamlet," i. 4.

Dove—i.e., the diver-bird; so called from its habit of ducking the head. So, also, columba (the Latin for dove) is the Greek kolumba'o (to dive).

Doves or Pigeons. The clergy of the Church of England are allegorised under this term in Dryden's "Hind and Panther."

A sort of doves were housed too near the hall . . .
Our pampered pigeons, with malignant eyes,
Beheld these inmates (the Roman Catholic clergy).
Tho' hard their fare, at evening and at morn,
A cruse of water.

Soiled doves. Young women of the demi-monde.

Dove-tail. Metaphorically, to fit on or fit in nicely; to correspond. It is a word in carpentry, and means the fitting one board into another by triangular notches or wedges, which resemble in shape a dove's tail.

Dover. When Dover and Calais meet—i.e., never.

A Jack of Dover. A bottle of wine made up of fragments of opened bottles. It is customary to pour the refuse into a bottle, cork it up, and sell it as a fresh bottle. This is called Dovering, a corruption of do-over, because the cork is done over with wax or resin.

Many a Jack of Dover hast thou sold.
Chaucer, "Cokes Prologue."

Dovercot or Dover-court. A confused gabble; a Babel. According to legend, Dover Court Church, in Essex, once possessed a cross that spoke, and Foxe says the crowd to the church was so great "that no man could shut the door." The confusion of this daily throng gave rise to the term. (See BABEL.)

And now the rood of Dovercot did speak,
Confirming his opinions to be true.
Tellier of Croydon.

Dowgate Ward (London). Some derive it from Dour (water), it being next to the Thames, at the foot of the hill; others say it is "Down-gate," the gate of the down, dune, or hill, as Brighton Downs (hills), South-downs, &c.

Dowling (Captain). A character in Crabbe's "Borough;" a great drunkard, who died in his cups.

"Come, fill my glass." He took it and he went (i.e., died).
Letter xvi.

Down. He is quite down in the month. Quite in the dumps; quite cast down or disheartened. When persons are very sad and low-spirited, the corners of the mouth are drawn down.

Down-hearted. Without spirit, cast down; the heart is faint and prostrate.

Downing Professor. The Professor of the Laws of England in the University of Cambridge. This chair was founded in 1800 by Sir George Downing, Bart.

Doxy. A baby; a plaything; a favourite woman. In the West of England babies are called doxies. Ortho-doxy has been wittily called our own doxy or pet, and hetero-doxy the doxy or pet of other folks. (Swedish, docka, a baby.)

Dozen. (See BAKER'S DOZEN.)

Drac. A sort of fairy in human form, whose abode is the caverns of rivers. Sometimes these dracs will float like golden cups along a stream to entice women and children bathing, and when they attempt to catch the prize drag them under water. (South of France Mythology.)

Fa le Drac, same as "Faire le diable;" Irish, "Play the Puck;" English, "Play the deuce."

Belomen qu' you faré le Drac
Se jamay trebi dins un sac
Cinc ó sis milante pistoles
Espessos como de redolos.
Goudelin, "Castel en l'Ayre."

Dra'chenfels (Dragon-rocks). So called from the legendary dragon killed there by the horned Siegfried, the hero of the Nibelungen-Lied.

The castled crag of Drachenfels
Frowns o'er the wide and winding Rhine,
Whose breast of waters broadly swells
Between the banks which bear the vine.
Byron, "Childe Harold," iii.

Dra'co. One of Actæon's dogs. (See CYPRIOS.)

Draco'nian Code. One very severe. Draco was an Athenian law-maker. As every violation of a law was made in this code a capital offence, Dema'dës the orator said "that Draco's code was written in human blood."

Draft. The Druids borrowed money on promises of repayment after death (Patricius). Purchas tells us of some priests of Pekin, who barter with the people in bills of exchange, to be paid in heaven a hundredfold.

Draggle-tail. A slut; a woman who allows her petticoats to trail in the dirt. The word should be "daggle-trail," from the Scotch dag (dew on the grass), daggle (wet with the grass-dew), like the Latin colla'tulo irro'ro.

Drag'oman. A ciceronë; a guide or interpreter to foreigners. The word is Turkish, and means simply a Turk (Turkeman).

Dragon. An imaginary animal something like a winged crocodile. The Irish dray means "fire," and the Welsh dreigiaw (silent flashes of lightning), fiery meteors; hence Shakespeare says—

Swift, swift, ye dragons of the night!—that dawning
May bare the raven's eye. "Cymbeline," ii. 2.

Dragon. This word is used by ecclesiastics of the Middle Ages as the symbol of sin in general and paganism in particular. The metaphor is derived from Rev. xii. 9, where Satan is termed "the great dragon." In Ps. xci. 13 it is said that the saints "shall trample the dragon under their feet," and many legends about the saints encountering dragons embody these ideas in an allegorical form.

Another source of the same legends is in the Celtic use of the word "dragon" for "a chief." Hence pen-dragon (summus rex), a sort of dictator, created in times of danger. Those knights who slew a chief in battle slew a dragon, and the military title soon got confounded with the fabulous monster.

Some great inundations have also been termed serpents or dragons. Hence Apollo (the sun) is said to have destroyed the serpent Python (i.e., dried up the overflow). Similarly, St. Roma'nus delivered the city of Rouen from a similar dragon, named Gargouille (waterspout), which lived in the river Seine.

Ladies guarded by dragons. The walls of feudal castles ran winding round the building, and the ladies were kept in the securest part. As adventurers had to scale the walls to gain access to the ladies, the authors of romance said they overcame the serpent-like defence, or the dragon that guarded them. Sometimes there were two walls, and then the bold invader overcame two dragons in his bold attempt to liberate the captive damsel. (See ENCHANTED CASTLES.)

The Green Dragon. A public-house sign in compliment to St. George.

The Red Dragon. A public-house sign in compliment to Henry VII., who adopted this device for his standard at Bosworth Field. It was the ensign of Cadwallader, the last of the British kings, from whom the Tudors descended.

Dragon of Wantley (i.e., Warn-cliff, in Yorkshire) a monster slain by More of More Hall, who procured a suit of armour studded with spikes, and, proceeding to the well where the dragon had his lair, kicked it in the mouth, where alone it was vulnerable. Dr. Percy says this dragon was an overgrown, rascally attorney, who cheated some children of their estate, but was made to disgorge by a gentleman named More, who went against him, "armed with the spikes of the law," after which the dragon attorney died of vexation.—Reliques of Ancient Poetry.

Dragon's Hill (Berkshire) is where the legend says St. George killed the dragon. A bare place is shown on the hill, where nothing will grow, and there the blood of the dragon ran out.

In Saxon annals we are told that Oedric, founder of the West Saxon kingdom, slew there Naud, the pen-dragon, with 5,000 men. This Naud is called Natan-leod, a corruption of Naud-an-ludh (Naud, the people's refuge).

Dragon-Slayers.

1. St. Philip, the apostle, is said to have destroyed a huge dragon at Hierapolis, in Phrygia.

2. St. Martha killed the terrible dragon called Tarasque at Aix (la Chapelle).

3. St. Florent killed a similar dragon which haunted the Loire.

4. St. Cado, St. Maudet, and St. Paull did similar feats in Brittany.

5. St. Keyne of Cornwall slew a dragon.

6. St. Michael, St. George, St. Margaret, pope Sylvester, St. Samson, archbishop of Dol; Donatus (fourth century), St. Clement of Metz, killed dragons.

7. St. Romain of Rouen destroyed the huge dragon called La Gargouille, which ravaged the Seine.

Dragon's Teeth. Subjects of civil strife; whatever rouses citizens to rise in arms. The allusion is to the dragon that guarded the well of Aër's. Cadmos slew it, and sowed some of the teeth, from which sprang up the men called Spartans, who all killed each other except five, who were the ancestors of the Thebans. Those teeth which Cadmos did not sow came to the possession of Æet's, king of Colchis; and one of the tasks he enjoined Jason was to sow these teeth and slay the armed warriors that rose therefrom.

Citizens rising from the soil, richly sown with dragon's teeth, for the rights of their several states.—The Times.

Drag'onnades (3 syl.). A series of religious persecutions by Louis XIV., which drove many thousand Protestants out of France. Their object was to root out "heresy;" and a bishop, with certain ecclesiastics, was sent to see if the heretics would recant; if not, they were left to the tender mercies of the dragoons who followed these "ministers of peace and goodwill to man."

Dragoons. So called because they used to be armed with dragons—i.e., short muskets, which spouted out fire like the fabulous beast so named. The head of a dragon was wrought on the muzzle of these muskets.

Drama. Father of the French Drama. Etienne Jodelle. (1532-1573.)

Father of the Greek Drama. Thespis. (Sixth century B.C.)

Father of the Spanish Drama. Lopë de Ve'ga. (1562-1635.)

Dram'atis Perso'næ. The characters of a drama, novel, or actual transaction.

The dramatis personæ were nobles, country gentlemen, justices of the quorum, and custodes rotulorum (keepers of the rolls).—The Times.

Dráp. One of queen Mab's maids of honour.—Dayton.

Dráp'ier's Letters. A series of letters written by dean Swift to the people of Ireland, advising them not to take the copper money coined by William Wood, by patent granted by George I. These letters crushed the infamous job, and the patent was cancelled.

Dean Swift signed himself M. D. Dráp'ier in these letters.

Draw. To draw amiss. To follow the scent in the wrong direction. A fox-hunting term, where to draw means to follow scent. (See DRAWN FOX.)

Draw it mild—i.e., gently, don't exaggerate. A musical expression: the leader tells the violin-players to draw it mild—i.e., to play piano, to draw the bow mildly or gently over the strings, and not to exaggerate the notes. (See COME IT STRONG.)

Drawback. Something to set against the profits or advantages of a concern. In commerce, it is duty charged on goods paid back again when the goods are exported.

Draw'cansir. A burlesque tyrant in "The Rehearsal," by G. Villiers, duke of Buckingham (1672). He kills every one, "sparing neither friend nor foe." The name stands for a blustering braggart, and the farce is said to have been a satire on Dryden's inflated tragedies. (See BAYES, BOBADIL.)

(He) frights his mistress, snubs up kings, baffles armies, and does what he will, without regard to numbers, good sense, or justice.—Bayes, "The Rehearsal."

Drawing-room. A room to which ladies withdraw or retire after dinner. Also a levee where ladies are presented to the sovereign.

Drawn. Hanged, drawn, and quartered—i.e., drawn on a hurdle to the place of execution, then hanged, then the head cut off, and, lastly, the body divided into four quarters. This punishment for treason is still unrepealed.

Drawn Battle. A battle in which the troops on both sides are drawn off, neither combatants claiming the victory.

Drawn Fox. A cunning fellow. A fox-hunting term, meaning a fox drawn from his cover, and started for the chase.

Dreadnought. The Seaman's Hospital Society; a floating hospital.

Dream Authorship. It is said that Coleridge wrote his "Kubla Khan," a poem, in a dream.

Dream'er. The Immortal Dreamer. John Bunyan. (1628-1688.)

Dreng. A servant, boy, similar to the French garçon and Latin puer. A Danish word, which occurs in Domesday Book.

Drink Deep. Drink a deep draught. The allusion is to the peg tankards. Those who drank deep, drank to the lower pegs. (See PEG.)

We'll teach you to drink deep ere you depart.
Shakespeare, "Hamlet," i. 2.

Drinking Healths was a Roman custom. Thus, in Plautus we read of a man drinking to his mistress with these words: Benè vos, bene nos, bene te, bene me, bene nostrum etiam Steph'anum (Here's to you, here's to us all, here's to thee, here's to me, here's to our dear—).—Stick.

v. 4. Persius (v. 1, 20) has a similar verse, Benè mihi, bene vobis, bene ami'cæ nostræ (Here's to myself, here's to you, and here's to I shan't say who). Martial, Ovid, Horace, &c., refer to the same custom.

The ancient Saxons followed the same habit, and Geoffrey of Monmouth says that Hengist invited king Vortigern to a banquet to see his new levies. After the meats were removed, Rowe'na, the beautiful daughter of Hengist, entered with a golden cup full of wine, and, making obeisance, said, Lauerd kyning, wass heil (Lord king, your health). The king then drank, and replied, Drinc heil (Here's to you). Robert de Brunne refers to this custom.

This is ther custom and hev gest
When they are at the ale or fest;
Ilk man that levis gware him drink
Salle say "Woselle" to him drink;
He that bidis sall say "Wassalle,"
The tother selle say again "Drinkaille."
That says "Woselle" drinks of the cup,
Kiss and his felaw he gives it up.

Robert de Brunne.

Drinking-Song. The oldest in the language is in the second act of "Gammer Gurton's Needle," by John Still, called "The Jolly Bishop." It begins—

I cannot eat but little meat,
My stomach is not good.

Drive. He is driving pigs, or driving pigs to market—i.e., snoring like pigs, whose grunt resembles the snore of a sleeper.

To drive a roaring trade. To be doing a brisk business. The allusion is to a coachman and team of horses; as the coachman conducts his horses, the tradesman conducts his trade. When horses are winded they are called rouers from the noise they make in breathing, and to drive a roaring trade is to drive it so fast that the team gets winded.

To drive a good bargain is to make an advantageous one. Here the word "drive" is about equal to push or urge home, and refers to driving nails; hence the expression "to nail him," "to drive it home," &c.

Drive-off. To defer, to procrastinate. The idea is, running away or drawing off from something that ought to be done, with the promise of coming to it at a future time.

Driver of Europe (Le Cocher de l'Europe). So the empress of Russia used to call the duc de Choiseul, minister of Louis XV., because he had spies all over Europe, and thus ruled its political cabals.

Driv'eller. An idiot, an imbecile, whose saliva drivels out of his mouth.

Droit d'Aubaine. In France, the king was entitled at the death of foreign residents to all their movable estates; the law was only abolished in 1819. Aubain means "alien," and droit d'aubaine the "right over an alien's property."

Dromas and Drom'ios. Two of the dogs of Actæon. (See DRACO.)

Dro'mio. The Brothers Dromio. Two brothers exactly alike, who serve two brothers exactly alike, and the mistakes of masters and men form the fun of Shakespeare's "Comedy of Errors," a drama borrowed from the Menach'mi of Plautus.

Drone (1 syl.). One of the two pipes of a bagpipe. So called because it sounds only one continuous note. The word is Saxon (dran).

Drone. An idle person who lives on the means of another, as drones on the honey collected by bees; a sluggard.

Drops. To take one's drops. To drink spirits in private. To take a drop is a euphemism for taking what the drinker chooses to call by that term. It may be anything from a sip to a Dutchman's draught.

Drop Serene (gutta serena). An old name for amaurosis. It was at one time thought that a transparent watery humour, distilling on the optic nerve, would produce blindness without changing the appearance of the eye.

So thick a "drop serene" hath quenched these orbs.

Milton, "Paradise Lost," iii.

Drowned Rat. As wet as a drowned rat—i.e., soaking wet. Drowned rats certainly look deplorably wet, but so also do drowned mice, drowned cats, drowned dogs, and all sic ilk.

Drows or Trows. A sort of fairy race, residing in hills and caverns. They are curious artificers in iron and precious metals. (Zetland superstition.)

I hung about thy neck that gifted chain, which all in our isles know was wrought by no earthly artist, but by the Drows in the secret recesses of their caverns.

Scott, "The Pirate," c. x.

Druid. A chief priest (Celtic der, superior; wydd, priest or instructor). In Taliesin we read, Bâmgwydd yagwarth an (at length I became a priest or wydd). It was after this period that the wydds were divided into two classes, the Derwydds and the Go-wydds (D'ruids and Ovids). We have the Irish draoi or draí (a magician), and the Hebrew drushim (interpreter), drsh (Deut. xviii. 11), and Idrush (2 Chron. xv. 12). Pliny derives the word from drus (an oak), but how could the Celts borrow from the Greeks?

Drum. A crowded evening party; also called a "rout," a "hurricane," &c. Drum applies to the close packing, as a drum of figs. Rout is the Welsh rhawter (a crowd). Hurricane alludes to the hurry, bustle, and confusion which mark these soirées.

It is impossible to live in a drum.

Lady M. W. Montagu.

John Drum's entertainment. Turning an unwelcome guest out of doors. The allusion is to drumming a soldier out of a regiment.

Drum Ecclesiastic. The pulpit cushion, often vigorously thumped by what are termed "rousing preachers."

When Gospel trumpeter, surrounded
With long-eared rout, to battle sounded;
And pulpit drum ecclesiastick
Was beat with it instead of a stick.

Butler, "Hudibras," pt. i., ch. i., v. 9.

Drum-head Court-martial. One held in haste; like a court-martial summoned on the field round the big drum to deal summarily with an offender.

Drum'mond Light. The lime-light. So named from Capt. Thomas Drummond, R.E., who suggested the idea, and prepared the necessary apparatus, in the trigonometrical survey of Great Britain.

Drunk as Chloe or Drunk as a fiddler. Chloë is a lady mentioned often in Prior's "Poems," who had a great propensity for strong drinks. The fiddler referred to is the fiddler at wakes and fairs, on board ship, and other places where a fiddler was paid in drink for playing to rustic dancers.

Drunk as David's Sow. (See DAVY'S SOW.)

Drupner (The dripper). A gold ring given to Odin; every ninth night other rings dropped from it of equal value to itself.—The Edda.

Drury Lane (London) takes its name from the habitation of the great Drury family. Sir William Drury, K.G., was a most able commander in the Irish wars. Drury House stood on the site of the present Olympic Theatre.

Dru'ses (2 syl.). A people of Syria governed by emir's, half Christian and half Mahometan. They offer up their devotions both in mosques and churches, worship the images of saints, and yet observe the fast of Ram'medan. Their language is pure Arabic.

Dry-nurse. When a superior officer does not know his duty, and is instructed in it by an inferior officer, he is said to be dry-nursed. The interior nurses the superior as a dry-nurse rears an infant.

Dry Rot. The spontaneous rot of timber or wall-paper, not unfrequently produced by certain fungi attaching themselves thereto. It is called dry rot because the wood is not purposely exposed to wet, although, without doubt, damp from defective ventilation is largely present.

Dry Wine. Wine neither sweet nor sparkling. In sparkling wine, some of the carbonic acid gas is retained to produce the "moss;" in sweet wine, some of the sugar is not yet decomposed; but in old dry wine the fermentation is complete, the carbonic acid gas has escaped and much of the water, leaving the spirit dry or alone.

Dry'ads. Nymphs of the trees (Greek, drus, any forest tree). They were supposed to live in the trees and die when the trees died.

Dryasdust (Rev. Dr.). A dull, plodding author, very prosy, very dull, and very learned; an antiquary. Sir Walter Scott employs the name to bring out the prefatory matter of some of his novels.

The Prussian Dryasdust . . . excels all other "Dry-asdusts" yet known. Carlyle.

Dsis'oo. The Japanese deity that presides over roads and travellers.

Du'alism. A system of philosophy which refers all things that exist to two ultimate principles. It is eminently a Persian doctrine. The Orphic poets made the ultimate principles of all things to be Water and Night, or Time and Necessity. In theology the Manichean doctrine is dualistic.

Dub. To make a knight by giving him a blow. Dr. Tusler says, "The ancient method of knighting was by a box on the ear, implying that it would be the last he would receive, as he would henceforth be free to maintain his own honour." The present ceremony is to tap the shoulder with a sword. (Saxon, dubban, to strike with a blow.)

Dubric (St.). A holy monk in the court of king Arthur.—Idylls of the King, "Enid."

Duc'at. A piece of money. So called from the legend on the early Sicilian pieces: Sit tibi, Christe, datus, quem tu regis, istè ducatus (May this duchy [ducat-us] which you rule be devoted to you, O Christ).

Duchesse (2 syl.). Le père Duchésne. Jacques René Hébert, chief of the Cordelier Club in the French Revolution, the members of which were called Hébertists. He was called "Father Duchésne," from the name of his vile journal. (1755-1794.)

Duchess. An old woman is often termed An old duchess or a regular old duchess. The longevity of the peers and peeresses is certainly very striking.

Duck. The wild duck covers up her eggs with moss or hay every time she leaves them.

Duck Lane. A row for old and second-hand books which stood formerly near Smithfield, but has given way to city improvements. It might be called the Holywell Street of Queen Anne's reign.

Scotists and Thornists now in peace remain
Amidst their kindred cobwebs in Duck Lane,
Pope, "Essay on Criticism."

Ducks-foot Lane (City). A corruption of Dukes' Foot Lane. So called from the dukes of Suffolk, whose manor-house was there.

Ducks and Drakes. To make Ducks and Drakes of one's money. To squander it in as foolish a manner as if it were a stone to make "Ducks and Drakes" with. The French call this rebound of a stone on water, Ric'ochet.

What figured slates are best to make
On watery surface duck and drake.
Butler, "Hudibras," ii. 3.

Duckweed. A corruption of dyke-weed—i.e., ditch-weed. So called because it always covers old moats and ponds; but it is by no means a favourite food of ducks. Its Latin name is "Lemna," from the Greek, limnē (a stagnant pool).

Dudley Locust. A fossil trilobite (Calymenē).

Dud'man. When Dudman and Ramhead meet.—Never. Dudman and Ramhead are two forelands on the Cornish coast, about twenty miles asunder. "I'll have it done, and that before Dudman and Ramhead meet!" means "assuredly," before "never" begins.

Make yourself scarce! depart! vanish! or we'll have you summoned before the mayor of Hal'gaver, and that before Dudman and Ramhead meet.

Scott, "Kenilworth," c. iv.

Duds. Old clothes, tattered garments (Gaelic, dud, a rag; Dutch, tod; Italian, tozzi). A dudder or dudsman is a scarecrow, or man of straw dressed in cast-off garments to fray birds; also a pedlar who sells duds or gown-pieces.

Dudu. A pensive maiden of seventeen, "who never thought about herself at all."—Byron, "Don Juan," vi., vii.

Duende (3 syl.). A Spanish goblin or house-spirit. Cal'deron has a comedy called "La Dama Duenda."

Disputase por los hombres entendidos
Si fué de los caídos este duende.

Calderon.

Duen'na (Lady). The female of don. The Spanish don is the same word as the Welsh dyn and Irish duinē. A duenna is the chief lady-in-waiting on the queen of Spain; but in common parlance it means a lady who is half companion and half governess, in charge of the younger female members of a nobleman's or gentleman's family in Spain.

Duer'gar (2 syl.). Dwarfs who dwell in rocks and hills; noted for their strength, subtlety, magical powers, and skill in metallurgy. They are the personification of the subterranean powers of nature. According to the Gotho-German myth, the duergar were first maggots in Ymir's flesh, but afterwards assumed the likeness of men. The first duergar was Modsen'er; the next Dyrin. N.B.—The giant Ymir is Chaos. (See HELDENBUCH.)

Dues'sa (Double-mind or False-faith). Daughter of Falsehood and Shame, who assumes divers disguises to beguile the Red Cross Knight. At one time she takes the name of Fidessa, and entices the knight into the Palace of Pride (Lucifer's). The knight having left the palace, is overtaken by Duessa, and drinks of an enchanted fountain, which paralyzes him, in which state he is taken captive by the giant Orgoglio. Prince Arthur slays the giant and rescues the knight; Duessa, being stripped of her gorgeous disguise, is found to be a hideous hag, and flees into the wilderness for concealment. She appears again in book ii.—Spenser, "Fairy Queen," book i.

Duff'er. A make-believe; a hawker of "Brummagem," whether moral, intellectual, or material. To duff is to rub up the nap of old clothes so as to make them look "amaist as weel as new;" a duffer is one who performs the operation.

Robinson, a thorough duffer he.
Alexander Smith, "Summer Idyll."

Duke. The Great Duke—i.e., the duke of Wellington. (1769-1852.)

Duke and Duchess in "Don Quixote," who play so many tricks on the Knight of the Woeful Countenance, were don Carlos de Borja, count of Ficallo, who married donna Maria of Aragon, duchess of Villahermosa, in whose right the count had extensive estates on the banks of the Ebro; among others he had a country seat called Bue-na'via, which was the place Cervantes referred to.

Duke Combe. William Combe, author of "Dr. Syntax," "The Devil upon Two Sticks," &c., who in the days of his prosperity was noted for the splendour of his dress, the profusion of his table, and the magnificence of his deportment. Having spent all his money, he turned author, but passed the last fifteen years of his life in the King's Bench. (1743-1825.)

Duke Humphrey. (See HUMPHREY.)

Duke or Darling. Heads or tails; pitch and toss. When the scandals about the duke of York and Mrs. Clarke were the common talk of the town, the street boys, instead of crying Heads or tails, used to say Duke or Darling.—Lord Colchester ("Diary," 1861).

Duke Street (Strand), so named from George Villiers, duke of Buckingham.

Duke's. A fashionable theatre in the reign of Charles II. It was situate in Portugal Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields. It was named from its great patron, James, duke of York, afterwards James II.

Duke's Walk. To meet one in the Duke's Walk. An invitation to fight a duel. In the vicinity of Holyrood House is a place called the Duke's Walk, from being the favourite promenade of the duke of York, afterwards James II., during his residence in Scotland. This walk was the common rendezvous for settling affairs of honour, as the site of the British Museum was in England.

If a gentleman shall ask me the same question, I shall regard the incivility as equivalent to an invitation to meet him in the Duke's Walk.—Scott, "Bride of Lammermoor," c. xxiv.

Dulcar'non. The horns of a dilemma (or Syllogismum cornutum); at my wits' end; a puzzling question. Dulcar'nein is the Arabic dhu'lkarnein (double-horned, having two horns). Hence the pons asinorum of Euclid is called the Dulcar'non, "a pons asinorum to some good Grecians." Alexander the Great is called Iscander Dulcarnein, and the Macedonian æra the æra of Dulcarnein. According to the Koran, c. xviii., "Dulcarnein (Alexander) built the famous iron walls of Jajuge and Majuge, within which Gog and Magog are confined till the end of the world." Hence, to send one to Dulcarnein is to send one to the prison of Gog and Magog, to daze them with puzzles, to defeat them, especially in argument.

Dulcê Domum. The holiday song of Winchester School. Mr. Brandon says it was composed by a boy of St. Mary's College, Winchester, who was confined for misconduct during the Whitsun holidays, "as report says, tied to a pillar." On the evening preceding the Whitsun holidays, "the master, scholars, and choristers of the above college walk in procession round the 'pillar,' chanting the six stanzas of the song." In the March number of the "Gentleman's Magazine," 1796, a translation, signed "J.R.," was given of the song; and Dr. Milner thinks the original is not more than a century old. It is rather remarkable that the author has made "domum" a neuter noun. (See ADESTE FIDELES.)

CHORUS.

Domum, domum, dulcê domum!
Domum, domum, dulce domum;
Dulce, dulce, dulce domum!
Dulce domum, resone'mus!
Home, home, dearest home!
Home, home, dearest home!
Dearest, dearest, dearest home!
Hurrah for darling home!

Dul'cimer is now applied chiefly to a stringed musical instrument, played by striking the wires with little hammers; but the word so translated in Daniel iii. 5 was a species of bagpipe. Fürst deduces the Hebrew word from smṛā (a pipe), and the Greek is symphonia. (Italian, dolcimello.)

In a vision once I saw
A damsel with a dulcimer.
Coleridge, "Vision of Kubla Khan."

Dulcine'a. A lady-love. Taken from Don Quixote's amie de cœur. Her real name was Aldonza Lorenzo, but the knight dubbed her Dulcine'a del Tobo'so.

I must ever have some Dulcinea in my head—it harmonises the soul.—Sterne.

Dul'cinists. Heretics who followed the teaching of Dulcin, who lived in the fourteenth century. He said that God reigned from the beginning to the coming of Messiah; and that Christ reigned from his ascension to the fourteenth century, when he gave up his dominion to the Holy Ghost.

Duli'a. An inferior degree of worship or veneration, such as that paid by Roman Catholics to saints and angels; Hyper-duli'a is a superior sort of veneration reserved for the Virgin; but that worship which is paid to God alone is called latri'a. "Dulia" means that sort of veneration which slaves pay to their lords (Greek, doulos, a slave); "Latria" means that sort of veneration which mortals pay to the gods (Greek, latreu'o, to worship the gods).

Dulness. King of dulness. Colley Cibber, poet laureate after Eusden.

"God save king Cibber!" mounts on every note...
So, when Jove's block descended from on high...
Loud thunder to its bottom shook the bog,
And the hoarse nation croaked, "God save king Log!"
Pope, "Dunciad," bk. i.

Du'machus. The impenitent thief. In Longfellow's "Golden Legend," Du-machus and Titus were two of a band of robbers who attacked Joseph in his flight into Egypt. Titus said, "Let these good people go in peace," but Dumachus replied, "First let them pay for their release." Upon this Titus gave his fellow-robber forty groats, and the infant Jesus said—

When thirty years shall have gone by,
I at Jerusalem shall die . . .
On the accursed tree.

Then on my right and my left side,
These thieves shall both be crucified;
And Titus thenceforth shall abide
In Paradise with me.

"The Miracle Play," iii.

Dumb-bells. A corruption of Dumps or Dumpsles, the same word as Dimplings, and meaning heavy (weights). (German and Danish, dumm, heavy, dull, insipid; dumpling, a heavy, insipid pudding; dumps, heavy, stupid moroseness.) (See DUMP.)

Dumb-waiter. A piece of dining-room furniture, fitted with shelves, to hold glasses, dishes, and plate. So called because it answers all the purposes of a waiter, and is not possessed of an insolent tongue.

Dum'my. In three-handed whist, the exposed hand is called dummy, from the German dumm (stupid), meaning "rather stupid or dull." The French call it mort (a dead man), and the party is said jouer avec un mort.

Dum'mies (2 syl.). Empty bottles or drawers in a druggist's shop; wooden heads in a hairdresser's shop; lay figures in a tailor's shop; persons on the stage who appear before the lights, but have nothing to say. These all are dumb, actually or figuratively.

Dump. A Brazilian copper coin, worth about 2½d.; also a round flat lump of lead used on board ship for playing quoits and chuck-penny. Hence, dummy or dumpty (squat or small). An egg is called a humpty-dumpty in the nursery verses beginning with "Humpty Dumpty sat on a wall," &c.

Dumps. To be in the dumps. Out of spirits; in the "sullens." According to etymological fable, it is derived from Dumops, king of Egypt, who built a pyramid and died of melancholy. Gay's Third Pastoral is "Wednesday, or the Dumps." (German, dumm, stupid, dull; Dutch, dom; Hebrew, dum, &c.)

Why, how now, daughter Katharine? in your dumps?—Shakespeare, "Taming of the Shrew," ii. 1.

Dun. One who importunes for payment of a bill (Saxon, dunan, to din or clamour). The tradition is, that it refers to Joe Dun, a famous bailiff of Lincoln in the reign of Henry VII. The "British Apollo" says he was so active and dexterous in collecting bad debts, that when any one became "slow to pay," the neighbours used to say to the creditors, "Dun him" (send Dun after him).

An Universitie dunne . . . is an inferior creditor of some ten shillings or downwards, contracted for horse-hire, or perchance drinke, too weake to put in suite.—Bishop Earle, "Microcosmographia," (1601-1693.)

Squire Dun. The hangman between Richard Brandin and Jack Ketch.

And presently a halter got,
Made of the best strong iempen teer;
And ere a cat could lick his ear,
Had tied him up with as much art
As Dun himself could do for 's heart.

Cotton, "Virgil Travestied," bk. iv.

As dull as Dun in the mire (Chaucer). Dun means a donkey or dun-key, so called from its colour. Ralph calls Hudibras "his dunship" (pt. iii. 3). "Dun in the mire" is one greatly embarrassed. There was a game so called, to which Shakespeare refers in "Romeo and Juliet" (i. 4): "If thou art dun, we'll draw thee from the mire." Gifford has described the game in his edition of Ben Jonson, vii. 283.

Well done, my masters, lend's your hands,
Draw Dun out of the ditch:
Draw, pull, heave all; so, so, well done.
(They pull him out.) Dutchease of Suffolk. (1631.)

Dun-cow. The Dun-cow of Duns-more heath was a savage beast slain by Sir Guy, earl of Warwick. A huge tusk, probably that of an elephant, is still shown at Harwich Castle, as one of the horns of the dun-cow. (See GUY.)

Dunce. A dolt; a stupid person. The word is taken from Duns Scotus, the learned schoolman and great supporter of the immaculate conception. His followers were called Dunsers. Tyn-dal says, when they saw that their hair-splitting divinity was giving way to modern theology, "the old barking curs raged in every pulpit" against the classics and new notions, so that the name indicated an opponent to progress, to learning, and hence a dunce.

He knew what's what, and that's as high

As metaphysic wit can fly. . .

A second Thomas, or at once

To name them all, another Dunce.

Builer, "Hudibras," l. 1.

Dunce. (See ABDERITAN, ARCADIAN, BRËOTIAN.)

Dun'ciad. The dunce-epic, a satire by Alexander Pope. Eusden, the poet laureate, being dead, the goddess of Dulness elects Colley Cibber to be his successor. The installation is celebrated by games, the most important being the proposal to read without sleeping two voluminous works, one in verse and the other in prose; as every one falls asleep, the games come to an end. King Cibber is now taken to the temple of Dulness, and is lulled to sleep on the lap of the goddess; and during his slumber sees in a vision the past, present, and future triumphs of the empire. Finally, the goddess, having destroyed order and science, establishes her kingdom on a firm basis, and having given directions to her several agents to prevent thought and to confine the people to foolish and trifling pursuits, Night and Chaos are restored, and the poem ends.

Dun'derhead. A blockhead, or, rather, a muddle-headed person. Dunder is the lees or dregs of wine, &c.; more correctly, the overflow of fermented liquors (yeast). (Spanish, redundar, to overflow or froth over.)

The use of Dunder in the making of rum answers the purpose of yeast in the fermentation of flour.—Edwards, "West Indies."

Dundrea'ry, Lord (3 syl.). The impersonation of a good-natured, indolent, blundering, empty-headed swell. The chief character in Tom Taylor's dramatic piece, called "Our American Cousin." Mr. Sothorn created the character of Lord Dundreary by the power of his conception and the genius of his acting. (See BROTHER SAM.)

Dungeon. A corruption of domin'ium (dominijum, contracted into dom'jum), that part of the castle in which the lord took his meals, and which dominated over the whole building. The underground storey of this grand tower was used for a prison, and persons of rank were confined in Keep-tower itself, as being the strongest part of the castle.

The word is sometimes spelt donjon, and at Canterbury is a mound corruptly called the Dane John, on which stood formerly the donjon or keep of the castle.

The grete tour, that was so thikke and strong.
Which of the castel was the cheef donjouun.
Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales," (1059.)

Dunghill. Thou hast it, ad dunghill, at thy fingers' ends. To this Holofernès replies, "Oh, I smell false Latin; 'dunghill' for 'unguem.'"—Shakespeare, "Love's Labour's Lost," v. 1.

Dunkers. (See TUNKERS.)

Dunmow. To cut Dunmow bacon. To live in conjugal amity, without even wishing the marriage knot to be less firmly tied. The allusion is to the institution of Robert Fitzwalter. Between 1244 and 1772, eight claimants have been admitted to eat the flitch. Their names merit immortality.

1445. Richard Wright, labourer, Bau-burgh, near Norwich.

1467. Steven Samuel, of Little Ayston, Essex.

1510. Thomas Ley, fuller, Coggeshall, Essex.

1701. William and Jane Parsley, butcher, Much-Easton, Essex. Same year, John and Ann Reynolds, Hatfield Regis.

1751. Thomas Shapshaft, wool-comber, Weathersfield, Essex.

1763. Names unknown!!

1772. John and Susan Gilder, Tarling, Essex.

The recent attempt to revive this "premium for humbug" is manifestly a mere "get-up" for the benefit of the town.

Ah, madam! cease to be mistaken;
Few married fowl peck Dunmow bacon.
Prior.

Dunmow Flitch. (See BACON.)

Dun'stable. Bailey, as if he actually believed it, gives the etymon of this word Duns' stable; adding Duns or "Dunus was a robber in the reign of Henry I., who made it dangerous for travellers to pass that way. (Dunes or duns twell, our table—i.e., the table-land or flat of the hills.)

Plain as the road to Dunstable; or, as Shakespeare says, "Plain as way to parish church." The road leading to Dunstable is the confluence of many leading to London, but the play is on the word dunce.

Dun'stan (St.). Patron saint of goldsmiths, being himself a noted worker in gold.

St. Dunstan and the Devil. Dunstan was a painter, jeweller, and blacksmith; being expelled from court, he built a cell near Glastonbury church, and there he worked at his handicrafts. It was in this cell that tradition says the devil had a gossip with the saint through the lattice window. Dunstan went on talking till his tongs were red-hot, when he turned round suddenly and caught his Satanic majesty by the nose. One can trace in this legend, the notion that all knowledge belonged to the Black Art; that the "saints" are always more than conquerors over the spirits of evil; and the singular cunning which our forefathers so delighted to honour.

Duodec'imo. A book whose sheets are folded into twelve leaves each. This word, which differs from both the Italian and French, is from the Latin duodecim (twelve). It is now called twelve-mo from the contraction 12mo.

Dup is do up. Thus Ophelia says, in one of her snatches, he "dipped the chamber door," i.e., did up or pushed up the latch, in order to open the door, that he might "let in the maid" ("Hamlet," iv. 1). "To dup the gate" sometimes means to do it up, or draw up the portcullis.

Duranda'na or Durin'dana. Orlando's sword, given him by his cousin Malagigi. It once belonged to Hector, and was made by the fairies. It could cleave the Pyrenees at a blow. N.B.—In French romance Orlando is called Roland, Malagigi Maugis, and the sword durandal or durin'dal.

Nor plated shield, nor tempered casque defends,
Where Durindana's trenchant edge descends.
Hoole, "Orlando Furioso," bk. v.

Du'randar'të. A knight who fell at Roncesvallës, cousin to Montesinos. The tale says he loved Belerma, whom he served seven years, at the expiration of which time he was slain. In his last breath he told Montesinos to take his heart and give it to Belerma. He is described by Lewis as

Sweet in manners, fair in favour,
Mild in temper, fierce in fight.

Dur'den (Dame). A notable housewife. Dame Durden of the famous English song kept five serving girls to carry the milking pails, and also kept five serving men to use the spade and flail. The five men loved the five maids.

'Twas Moll and Bet, and Doll and Kate, and Dorothy Dracylettail;
And John and Dick, and Joe and Jack, and Humphrey with his flail.

Anon.

Dur'ham Book. By Eadfrid, bishop of Lindisfarne, who died in 721, one of the most splendid examples of illumination in the world.

Durham Mustard. So called from the residence of Mrs. Clements, who first conceived the idea of grinding mustard in a mill, instead of pounding it in a mortar. George I. stamped it with his approval, hence the pots are labelled with the words, "Durham mustard," and bear the royal initials in a medallion.

Dus or Deuce. The chief god of the Brigantës, one of whose altars, bearing an inscription, was discovered at Grestland.—Camden, "Britannia."

Du'siens. The name given by the Gauls to those demons that produce nightmares.

Dust. Money: so called because it is made of gold-dust. Dean Swift took for the text of a charity sermon, "He who giveth to the poor, lendeth to the Lord:" and is reported to have said, "Now, brethren, if you like the security, down with your dust."

I'll dust your jacket for you. Give you a good beating. The allusion is to dusting carpets, &c., by beating them with a stick.

To throw dust in one's eyes. To mislead. The allusion is to a Mahometan practice of casting dust into the air for the sake of "confounding" the enemies of the faith. This was done by Mahomet on two or three occasions, as in the battle of Honein; and the Koran refers to it when it says, "Neither didst thou, O Mahomet, cast dust into their eyes; but it was God who confounded them." But the following incident will suffice: One day the Korishites surrounded the house of Mahomet, resolved to murder him. They peeped through the crevice of his chamber-door, and saw him lying asleep. Just at this moment his son-in-law Ali opened the door silently, and threw into the air a handful of dust. Immediately the conspirators were confounded. They mistook Ali for Mahomet, and Mahomet for Ali; allowed the prophet to walk through their midst uninjured, and laid hands on Ali. No sooner was Mahomet safe, than their eyes were opened, and they saw their mistake.

Dust. The wild Irish peasantry believe that dust is raised on roads by fairies on a journey, and raise their hats to it, saying, "God speed you, gentlemen." The Arabs think the whirlwind and waterspout are caused by evil jinns.

Dusty-foot. (See PIE POUDRE.)

Dutch. The Dutch have taken Holland. A quiz when any one tells what is well known as a piece of wonderful news. Similar to Queen Bess (or Queen Anne) is dead; the Greeks have turned Roman Catholics; &c.

Dutch Auction. An "auktion" in which the bidders decrease their bids till they come to the minimum price. Dutch gold is no gold at all; Dutch courage is no real courage; Dutch concert is no music at all, but mere hubbub; and Dutch auction is no auktion, or increase of bets, but quite the contrary.

Dutch Clocks. A corruption of Deutsche clocks (German clocks), chiefly made in the Black Forest. As many as 180,000 are exported annually from Frisburg.

A woman, that is like a German clock,
Still repairing; ever out of frame;
And never going aright.
Shakespeare, "Love's Labour's Lost," iii. 1.

Dutch Concert. A great noise and uproar, like that made by a party of Dutchmen in sundry stages of intoxication, some singing, others quarrelling, speechifying, wrangling, and so on.

Dutch Courage. The courage excited by drink; pot valour.

Dutch Gold. Deutsche or German gold. An alloy of copper and zinc, invented by prince Rupert of Bavaria.

Dutch School of painting is a sort of "pre-Raphaelite" exactness of detail without selection. It is, in fact, photographing exactly what appears before the artist, as faithfully as his art will allow. The subjects are generally the lower classes of social life, as pothouse scenes, drunken orgies, street groups, Dutch boors, &c., with landscapes and still-life. The greatest of the Dutch masters are: for portraits, Rembrandt, Bol, Flinck, Hals, and Vanderhelst; for conversation pieces, Gerhard Douw, Terburg, Metz, Mieris, and Netscher; for low life, Ostard, Bower, and Jan Steen; for landscapes, Ruysdael, Hobbema, Cuyp, Vanderneer, Berchem, and A. Both; for battle scenes, Wouverman and Huchtenburg; for marine pieces, Vandevelde and Bakhuizen; for still-life and flowers, Kalf, A. Van Utrecht, Van Huysum, and De Heem.

Dutch Uncle. I will talk to you like a Dutch uncle. Will reprove you smartly. (Dutch is Deutsch, "German," and Uncle is the Latin notion of patruius, which means "an uncle," "a severe guardian," "a stern castigator." Hence Horace, 2 Ser. iii. 88, Ne sis patruus mihi (Do not castigate me like an uncle). We still use the phrase "cousin german.")

Dutchman. I'm a Dutchman if I do. A strong refusal. During the rivalry between England and Holland, the word Dutch was synonymous with all that was false and hateful, and when a man said, "I would rather be a Dutchman than do what you ask me," he used the strongest term of refusal that words could express.

Duty means what is due or owing, a debt which should be paid. Thus obedience is the debt of citizens to rulers for protection, and service is the debt of persons employed for wages received.

Duum'virs (3 syl.). Certain Roman officers who were appointed in pairs, like our London sheriffs. The chief were the two officers who had charge of the Sibylline books, the two who had the supervision of the municipal cities, and the two who were charged with naval matters.

Dwarf (The). Richard Gibson, painter (1615-1690), a page of the back-stairs in the court of Charles I. He married Anne Shepherd, a dwarf also, and the king honoured the wedding with his presence. Each measured three feet ten inches.

Design or chance makes others wive,
But Nature did this match contrive.
Waller.

The Black Dwarf. A fairy of the most malignant character; a genuine northern Duergar, and once held by the dalesmen of the border as the author of all the mischief that befell their flocks and herds. Sir Walter Scott has a novel so called, in which the "black dwarf" is introduced under the aliases of Sir Edward Mauley; Elshander, the recluse; Cannie Elshie; and the Wise Wight of Mucklestane Moor.

Dwarf Albrich (in the Nibelungen Lied) is the guardian of the famous "hoard" won by Siegfried from the Nibelungs. The dwarf is twice vanquished by the hero, who gets possession of his Tarn-kappē (cloak of invisibility). (See ELBERICH.)

Dwarf Peter (das Peter Manchen). An allegorical romance by Ludwig Tieck. The dwarf is a castle spectre that advises and aids the family; but all his advice turns out evil, and all his aid productive of trouble. The dwarf represents that corrupt part of human nature called by St. Paul the "law in our members which wars against the law of our minds, and brings us into captivity to the law of sin."

Dwarfs. The most remarkable are : Phile'tas, a poet (contemporary with Hippoc'ratēs), so small "that he wore leaden shoes to prevent being blown away by the wind." (Died B.C. 250.)

Niceph'orus Calistus tells us of an Egyptian dwarf not bigger than a partridge.

Arist'ratos, the poet, was so small that Athen'e'os says no one could see him.

Sir Geoffrey Hudson, born at Oakham, in Rutlandshire, at the age of thirty was only eighteen inches in height. (1619-1678.)

Owen Farrel, the Irish dwarf, born at Cavan, hideously ugly, but of enormous muscular strength. Height, three feet nine inches. (Died 1742.)

Count Joseph Boruwlaski, at the age of twenty, was two feet four inches, and died at the age of ninety-eight. (1739-1837.)

Nicholas Ferry, usually called Bébé, a native of France, died at the age of twenty-three, and was not three feet high. A contemporary of Boruwlaski.

General Tom Thumb (Charles S. Stratton), born 1832, at Bridgeport, Connecticut, U.S., was twenty-five inches in height, and weighed twenty-five lbs. at the age of twenty-five.

Tom Thumb, a Dutch dwarf, at the age of eighteen was two feet four inches high.

Prince Colo'bri of Sleswig, at the age of twenty-five, was also twenty-five inches high, and weighed twenty-five lbs. (1851.)

Caroline Crach'ami, the Sicilian dwarf, born at Palermo, was twenty inches at death. Exhibited in Bond Street, 1824. (1811-1824.)

Therèse Souvray, &c. &c.

Dwergar. Demi-gods of pigmy size, who preside over echoes. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Dyeing Scarlet. Drinking deep. Drinking dyes the face scarlet.

They call drinking deep, dyeing scarlet.
Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV.," ii. 4

Dymph'na. The tutel'ar saint of those stricken in spirit. She was a native of Britain, and a woman of high rank. It is said that she was murdered, at Geel, in Belgium, by her own father, for resisting his incestuous passion. Geel or Gheel has long been a famous colony for the insane, who are sent thither from all parts of Europe, and are boarded with the peasantry.

Dyser. The deities who conduct the souls of the deceased to the palace of Odin. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Dy'vour. The debtor's badge in Scotland (French, devoir, to own). Bankrupts were compelled to wear an upper garment, half yellow and half brown, with a party-coloured cap. This law was abolished in the reign of William IV.

Dyz'emas Day. Tithe day. (Portuguese, dízimas, tithes; Law Latin, dec'ima.)

Dzoha'ra. The Arabian Venus.—Banier, vol. ii.

Dzohl. The Saturn of the Arabians.—Banier, vol. ii.

E.

E. This letter represents a window; in Hebrew it is called he (a window).

E.G. or e.g. (Latin for exempli gratia). By way of example; for instance.

Eager or eagre. Sharp, keen, acid; the French aigre.

Posset and curd, like eager droppings into milk.
Shakespeare, "Hamlet," i. 5.

It is a nipping and an eager air.
"Hamlet," i. 4.

Vex him with eager words.
Shakespeare, "3 Henry VI.," ii. 4.

Eagle is the supporter of a lectern, because the eagle is the natural enemy of the serpent. The two testaments are the two outspread wings of the eagle.

Eagle is emblematic of St. John the evangelist, because, like the eagle, he looked on "the sun of glory;" the eagle was one of the four figures which made up the cherub (Ezek. i. 10).

Eagle in heraldry signifies fortitude.

Eagle in royal banners. It was the ensign of the ancient kings of Babylon and Persia, of the Ptolemies and Seleucids. The Romans adopted it in conjunction with other devices, but Ma'rius made it the ensign of the legion, and confined the other devices to the cohorts. The French under the empire have assumed the same device.

The two-headed eagle signifies a double empire. Thus Austria has one for the eastern and one for the western empire. She claims to be the successor of the Cæsars of Rome, and also of Charlemagne. She added the second head to her standard in 802, to denote the union of Rome and Germany. Russia, also, has a double-headed eagle, having added that of Poland to her own. Constantine was the first to introduce this device, to intimate that the empire had two heads or kings, but was nevertheless one body or empire.

Eagle, a public-house sign, is in honour of queen Mary, whose badge it was. She put it on the dexter side of the shield, and the sun on the sinister—a conjugal compliment which gave great offence to her subjects.

The Golden Eagle and the Spread Eagle are commemorative of the crusades; they were the devices of the emperors of the East.

Thy youth is renewed like the eagle's. This refers to the superstition feigned by poets that every ten years the eagle soars into the "fiery region," and plunges thence into the sea, where, moulting its feathers, it acquires new life.

She saw where he upstart brave
Out of the well, . . .
As eagle fresh out of the ocean wave,
Where he hath left his plumes all hory gray,
And decks himself with fethers you hly gay.
Spenser, "Faery Queen," i. 11.

Eagle. The Romans used to let an eagle fly from the funeral pile of a deceased emperor. Dryden alludes to this custom in his stanzas on Oliver Cromwell after his funeral, when he says, "Officious haste 'did let too soon the sacred eagle fly.'"

Eagle of Brittany. Bertrand Duguesclin, constable of France. (1320-1380).

Eagle of Meaux (mo). Jacques Bénigne Bossuet, bishop of Meaux, the grandest and most sublime of the pulpit orators of France. (1627-1704.)

Eagle of the doctors of France. Pierre d'Ailly, a French cardinal and great astrologer, who calculated the horoscope of our Lord, and maintained that the stars foretold the great deluge. (1350-1425.)

Ear. I am all ear. All attention.

I was all ear,
And took in strains that might create a soul
Under the ribs of death.

Milton, "Comus."

I'll send you off with a flea in your ear—with a cuff or box of the ear. The allusion is to domestic animals, who are sometimes greatly annoyed with these "tiny torments." There seems also to be a pun implied—flea and flee.

Ears. If your ears burn, people say some one is talking of you. This is very old, for Pliny says, "When our ears do glow and tingle, some do talk of us in our absence." Shakespeare, in "Much Ado About Nothing" (iii. 1.), makes Beatrice say to Ursula and Hero, who had been talking of her, "What fire is in mine ears?" Sir Thomas Browne ascribes this conceit to the superstition of guardian angels, who touch the right ear if the talk is favourable, and the left if otherwise. This is done to cheer or warn.

One ear tingles; some there be
That are snarling now at me.
Herrick, "Hesperides."

To set people together by the ears. To create ill-will among them; to set them quarrelling. It is a pot-house metaphor, taken from the metal pots, which are collected, and being slung on a rope by their handles or ears, rattle against each other.

Mine ears hast thou bored. Thou hast accepted me as thy bond-slave for life. If a Hebrew servant declined to go free after six years' service, the master was to bring him to the doorpost, and bore his ear through with an awl, in token of his voluntary servitude (Exod. xxi. 6). This probably was an Egyptian custom, as the ear is an hieroglyphic of obedience.

Walls have ears. Things uttered in secret get rumoured abroad. Chaucer says, "That field hath eyen, and the wood hath ears."—"Canterbury Tales," v. 1524.

Ear-shot. Within ear-shot. Within hearing. The allusion is palpable.

Earing. Ploughing. (Anglo-Saxon, erian, to plough; Latin, arvo.)

And yet there are five years, in the which there shall neither be earing nor harvest.—Gen. xlv. 6.

In earing time and in harvest thou shalt rest.
Exod. xxxiv. 21.

Earl means an elder. The words seigneur and senator are of similar meaning. (Danish, jarl, an elder; our alderman.)

Earl of Mar's Grey Breeks. The 21st Foot are so called, because they wore grey breeches when the earl of Mar was their colonel. (1678-1686.)

Earth. To gather strength from the earth. The reference is to Antæos, son of Poseidon and Ge, a giant and wrestler of Lib'ya (Africa). So long as he touched the earth, his strength was irresistible. Hercules, knowing this, lifted him into the air and crushed him to death. Near the town of Tingis, in Mauritania, is a hill in the shape of a man, and called The hill of Antæos. Tradition says it is the wrestler's tomb. (See MALEGEA.)

Earwig. A corruption of the Saxon ear-wiga (ear-insect). So called because the hind wings resemble in shape the human ear.

East. The custom of turning to the east when the creed is repeated is a relic of the Roman Catholic notion about the real presence; but the custom of placing the altar at the east end of the church is to remind us of Christ, the "Day-spring" and "Resurrection." Persons are buried with their feet to the east, because they "look for the Day-spring and Resurrection;" and the ancient Greeks always buried their dead with the feet towards the east.—Diog. Laert., "Vit. Solon."

East Indies.

(1) He came safe from the East Indies, and was drowned in the Thames. He encountered many dangers of great magnitude, but was at last killed where he thought himself secure.

(2) To send to the East Indies for Kentish pippins. To go round about to accomplish a very simple thing. To crush a fly on a wheel. To send to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for a penny postage stamp.

Easter. April was called Ostermonah—the month of the Ost-end wind (wind from the east). Easter is therefore the April feast, which lasted eight days. Our Easter Sunday is the first Sunday after the first full moon after the 21st of March. It may fall as early as the 22nd of March, or as late as the 25th of April. (Teutonic, ostara; Anglo-Saxon, eastre.)

Easter. The Saxon goddess of the east, whose festival was held in the spring.

Easter-day Sun. It was formerly a common belief that the sun danced on Easter Day. Sir Thomas Browne combats the notion in his "Vulgar Errors."

But oh, she dances such a way,
No sun upon an Easter day
Is half so fine a sight.

Sir John Suckling.

Easter Eggs or Pasch eggs are symbolical of creation, or the re-creation of spring. The practice of presenting eggs to our friends at Easter is Magian or Persian, and bears allusion to the mundane egg, for which Ormuzd and Ahriman were to contend till the consummation of all things. It prevailed not only with the Persians, but also among the Jews, Egyptians, and Hindus. Christians adopted the custom to symbolise the resurrection, and they colour the eggs red in allusion to the blood of their redemption. There is a tradition, also, that the world was "hatched" or created at Easter-tide.

Bless, Lord, we beseech thee, this thy creature of eggs, that it may become a wholesome sustenance to thy faithful servants, eating it in thankfulness to thee, on account of the resurrection of our Lord.—Pope Paul V., "Ritual."

Eat. To eat the mad cow. A French phrase, implying that a person is reduced to the very last extremity, and is willing to eat even a cow that has died of madness; glad to eat cat's meat. (See LICK.)

Il manœva de cette chose inexprimable qu'on appelle de la vache enragée.—Victor Hugo, "Les Misérables."

To eat one out of house and home. To eat so much that one will have to part with house and home in order to pay for it.

Eating Together. To eat together in the East was at one time a sure pledge of protection. A Persian nobleman was once sitting in his garden, when a man prostrated himself before him, and implored protection from the rabble. The nobleman gave him the remainder of a peach which he was eating, and when the incensed multitude arrived, and declared that the man had slain the only son of the nobleman, the heart-broken father replied, "We have eaten together go in peace," and would not allow the murderer to be punished.

Eating Terms. (See DOCTORS' COMMONS.)

Eau de Cologne. A perfumed spirit prepared at Cologne. The most famous maker was Jean Marie Farina.

Eau de Vie. Brandy. A French translation of the Latin aqua vite (water of life). This is a curious perversion of the Spanish agua di vitē (water or juice of the vine), rendered by the monks into aqua vite instead of aqua vitis, and confounding the juice of the grape with the alchemists' elixir of life. The same error is perpetuated in the Italian acqua vite; the Scotch whisky, which is the Celtic uisge-lyf; and the Irish usquebaugh, which is the Gaelic and Irish uisge-beatha. (See AQUA VITE.)

Eaves-dropper. A listener under walls. The derivation of the term is not usually understood. The owners of private estates in Saxon times were not allowed to cultivate to the extremity of their possessions, but were obliged to leave a space for eaves. This space was called the yfesdryspe (eaves-drip). An eaves-dropper is one who places himself in the eaves-drip to overhear what is said in the adjacent house or field.

Under our tents I'll play the eaves-dropper,
To hear if any mean to shrink from me.
Shakespeare, "Richard III.," v. 3.

Eb'ionism. The doctrine that the poor only shall be saved. Ebion, plural ebionim (poor).

At the end of the second century, the Ebionites were treated as heretics, and a pretended leader (Ebion) was invented by Tertullian to explain the name.—Renan, "Life of Jesus," ch. xi.

Eb'ionites (4 syl.). A religious sect of the first and second centuries, who maintained that Jesus Christ was merely an inspired messenger, the greatest of all prophets, but yet a man and a man only, without any existence before his birth in Bethlehem. (See above.)

Eblis or Ibleis. A jinn, and the ruler of the evil genii or fallen angels. Before his fall he was called Azazel or Hh'aris. When Adam was created, God commanded all the angels to worship him; but Eblis replied, "Methou hast created of smokeless fire, and shall I reverence a creature made of dust?" God was very angry at this insolent answer, and turned the disobedient fay into a Sheytan (devil), and he became the father of devils.

His majesty was 100 feet in height; his skin, striped with red, was covered with small scales, which made it glisten like armour. His hair was so long and curly, a snake might have lost its way in it. His flat nose was pierced with a ring of admirable workmanship. His small eyes assumed all the prismatic colours; his ears, which resembled those of an elephant, flapped on his shoulders; and his tail, sixty feet long, terminated in a hooked claw.—"Croquemitaine," ii. 10.

When he said unto the angels, "Worship Adam," all worshipped him except Eblis.—At Koran, ii.

Eb'ony. God's image done in ebony. Negroes. Thomas Fuller gave birth to this expression.

Ebu'da. The Hebri'des.—Orlando Furioso.

Ecce Homo. A painting by Correggio of our Lord crowned with thorns and bound with ropes, as he was shown to the people by Pilate, who said to them, "Eccē homo!" (Behold the man.) (John xix. 5.)

There is a semi-theological work so called, published anonymously, but attributed to professor Seeley, of University College. The object is to show that the Lord Jesus Christ is not divine. "Ecce homo!" (behold a man), not "Ecce Deus!" nor "Ecce homo-Deus!"

Eccen'tric means deviating from the centre; hence irregular, not according to rule. Originally applied to those planets which wander round the earth, like comets, the earth not being in the centre of their orbit. (Latin, ex centrum.)

Ecclesiastical. The father of ecclesiastical history. Eusebius of Cæsarea. (264-340.)

Ecclesiasticus is so called, not because the writer was a priest, but because the book (in the opinion of the fathers) was the chief of the apocryphal books, designated by them Ecclesiastici Libri (books to be read in churches), to distinguish them from the canonical Scriptures.

Echidna (E-kid'-na). Half woman, half serpent. She was mother of the Chimæra, the many-headed dog Orthos, the hundred-headed dragon of the Hesperides, the Colchian dragon, the Sphinx, Cerberos, Scylla, the Gorgons, the Lernean hydra, the vulture that gnawed away the liver of Prometheus, and the Nemean lion.—Hesiod.

(She) seemed a woman to the waist, and fair;
But ended foul in many a scaly fold,
Voluminous and vast.

Milton, "Paradise Lost," bk. i.

Echno'bas (Ek-no'-bas). One of the dogs of Acteon.

Echo. The Romans say that Echo was a nymph in love with Narcissus, but her love not being returned, she pined away till only her voice remained. We use the word to imply similarity of sentiment, as You echo my ideas; That is an echo to my opinion.

Sweet Echo, sweetest nymph, that liv'st unseen
Within thy airy shell,

By slow Meander's margin green. . .
Canst thou not tell me of a gentle pair
That liketh thy Narcissus a' e?

Milton, "Comus."

Eckhardt. A faithful Eckhardt, who warneth every one (German). Eckhardt, in German legends, appears on the evening of Maunday-Thursday to warn all persons to go home, that they may not be injured by the headless bodies and two-legged horses which traverse the streets on that night.

Eclectic's. Ancient philosophers, who selected what they thought best in all other systems, and made a patchwork therefrom. There is the eclectic school of painters, of which Paul Delaroche was the founder and best exponent; the eclectic school of modern philosophy, founded by Victor Cousin; the eclectic school of architecture; and so on. (Greek, ek-lege, to pick out.)

Eclectics or Modern Platonists. A Christian sect which arose in the second century. They professed to make truth their sole object of inquiry, and adopted from existing systems whatever, in their opinion, was true. They were called Platonists, because they adopted Plato's notions about God and the human soul.

Eclip'tic. The path apparently described by the sun in his annual course through the heavens. Eclipses happen only when the moon is in or near the same plane.

Ecl'ogue (2 syl.). Pastoral poetry not expressed in rustic speech, but in the most refined and elegant of which the language is capable. (Greek, meaning "elegant extracts," "select poetry.")

Ecene'phia. A sort of hurricane, similar to the Typhon.

The circling Typhon whirled from point to point. . .
And dire Ecene'phia reigns.

Thomson, "Summer."

École des Femmes. Molière borrowed the plot of this comedy from the novelletti of "Ser Giovanni, composed in the fourteenth century.

Econ'omy means the rules or plans adopted in managing one's own house. As we generally prevent extravagant waste, and make the most of our means in our own homes, so the careful expenditure of money in general is termed house-management. The word is applied to time and several other things, as well as money. (Greek, oikos nomos, house-law.)

Écorcheurs. Freebooters of the twelfth century, in France; so called because they stripped their victims of everything, even their clothes. (French, écorcher, to flay.)

Ec'stasy means out of the body. St. Paul refers to this when he says he was caught up to the third heaven and heard unutterable words, "whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell" (2 Cor. xii. 2-4). St. John also says he was "in the spirit," i.e., in an ecstasy, when he saw the apocalyptic vision (i. 10). The belief that the soul left the body at times was very general in former ages, and is still the belief of many. (See ECSTATIC.)

Ecstat'ic Doctor. Jean de Ruysbroek, the mystic. (1294-1381.)

Ecstat'ici. A class of diviners among the ancient Greeks, who used to lay in trances, and when they came to themselves gave strange accounts of what they saw while they were "out of the body." (Greek, ex-ist'emi.)

Ector (Sir). The tutor of king Arthur.

Edda. There are two religious codes, so called, containing the ancient Scandinavian mythology. One is in verse, composed in Iceland in the eleventh century by Sæmund Sigfusson, the Sage; and the other in prose, compiled a century later by Snorri Sturleson, who wrote a commentary on the first edda. The poetical edda contains an account of creation, the history of Odin, Thor, Freyr, Balder, &c. &c. The prose one contains the exploits of such conquerors as Volsung, Sigurd, Atle, &c., and is divided into several parts. The first part contains historical and mythological traditions; the second a long poetical vocabulary; and the third Scandinavian prosody, or the modes of composition adopted by the ancient Skalds. The poetical compilation is generally called Sæmund's Edda, and the prose one Snorra Edda.

Eden. Paradise, the country and garden in which Adam and Eve were placed by God (Gen. ii. 15). The word means delightfulness, pleasure.

Eden Hall. The luck of Eden Hall. An old painted drinking-glass, supposed to be sacred. The tale is that the butler once went to draw water from St. Cuthbert's Well, in Eden Hall garden, when the fairies left their drinking-glass on the well, to enjoy a little fun. The butler seized the glass, and ran off with it. The superstition is—

If that glass either break or fall,
Farewell the luck of Eden Hall.

(See PALLADIUM.)

Edgar or Edgar'do. Master of Ravenswood, in love with Lucy Ashton (Lucia di Lammermoor). While absent in France on an important embassy, the lady is led to believe that her lover has proved faithless to her, and in the torrent of her indignation consents to marry the laird of Bucklaw, but stabs him on the wedding-night, goes mad, and dies. In the opera Edgardo stabs himself also; but in the novel he is lost in the quicksands at Kelpies-Flow, in accordance with an ancient prophecy.—Donizetti's opera of "Lucia di Lammermoor;" Sir Walter Scott's "Bride of Lammermoor."

Edhili'ngi. The aristocratic class among the Anglo-Saxons; the second rank were termed the Frilingi; and the third the Lazzi. (Anglo-Saxon, edel or edel, noble; free-ling, free-born. Ricardo says of the third class, they were the "unwilling to work, the dull"—quos hodie lazzi dicimus.)

Edict of Mil'an. Proclaimed by Constantine, after the conquest of Italy (313), to secure to Christians the restitution of their civil and religious rights.

Edict of Nantes. An edict published by Henri IV. of France, granting toleration to his Protestant subjects. It was published from Nantes in 1598. This edict was repealed in 1685 by Louis XIV.

Edie Ochiltree. In Scott's "Antiquary."

Charles II. would be as sceptical as Edie Ochiltree about the existence of circles and avenues, altars, stones and cromlechs.—Knight, "Old England,"

Ed'ify is to build a house (Latin, ædes-facio); morally, to build instruction in the mind methodically, like an architect. The Scripture word edification means the building up of "believers" in grace and holiness. St. Paul says, "Ye are God's building," and elsewhere he carries out the figure more fully, saying—

All the building (or body of Christians), fitly framed together, groweth unto a holy temple in the Lord.—Eph. ii. 21.

E'diles (2 syl.). Roman officers who had charge of the streets, bridges, aqueducts, temples, and city buildings generally. We call our surveyors city ediles sometimes. (Latin, ædes, a house.)

E'dith, called the Maid of Lorn (Argyleshire), was about to be married to lord Ronald, when Robert, Edward, and Isabel Bruce, tempest-tossed, sought shelter at the castle. Edith's brother recognised the Bruce, and being in the English interest, a quarrel ensued, in the course of which the abbot arrived, but refused to marry the bridal pair amidst such discord. Edith fled, and, assuming the character of a page, passed through divers adventures. At length Robert Bruce won the battle of Bannockburn, and when peace was restored Ronald married the "Maid of Lorn."—Scott, "Lord of the Isles."

Ednam, in Roxburghshire, near the Tweed, where Thomson, the author of "The Seasons," was born.

The Tweed, pure parent-stream,
Whose pastoral banks first heard my Doric reed.
Autumn.

Edo'be (2 syl.). Edobe cottages are those made of sun-dried bricks, like the buildings of ancient Egypt.—W. Hepworth Dixon, "New America," i. 16.

Edward. Edward the Confessor's sword. Curtana (the cutter), a blunt sword of state, emblematical of mercy.

The Chevalier Prince Charles Edward. The Young Pretender. Introduced by Sir Walter Scott in "Redgauntlet," first as "Father Buonaventura," and afterwards as Pretender to the crown. Again in "Waverley."

Ed'widge. Wife of William Tell.—Rossini's opera of "Guglielmo Tell."

Edwin. The hero of Beattie's "Min-strel."

And yet poor Edwin was no vulgar boy ;
Deep thought oft seemed to fix his infant eye,
Dainties he heeded not, nor gaud, nor toy,
Saw one short pipe of rudest minstrelsy ;
Silent when glad ; affectionate, though shy ;
And now his look was most demurely sad ;
And now he laughed aloud, yet none knew why.
The neighbours stared and sighed, yet blessed the lad ;
Some deemed him wondrous wise, and some believed him mad. Canto i. 16.

Ed'yrn. Son of Nudd ; called the "Sparrow hawk." He ousted the earl of Yn'iol from his earldom, and tried to win E'nid, the earl's daughter, but failing in this, became the evil genius of the gentle earl. Being overthrown in a tournament by prince Geraint', he was sent to the court of king Arthur, where his whole nature was completely changed, and "subdued to that gentleness which, when it weds with manhood, makes a man."—Idylls of the King, "Enid."

Eel. To skin an eel by the tail is to do things the wrong way.

Eelkhanse Tables. The celebrated calculations of Nazir' u Dien, the Persian astronomer, grandson of Zenghis Khan, brought out in the middle of the thirteenth century.

Effen'di. A Turkish title, about equal to our "squire," given to emir's, men of learning, and the high priests of mosques. The title is added after the name, as Ali effendi (Ali Esquire).

Eff'igy. To burn or hang one in effigy. To burn or hang the representation of a person, instead of the person himself. The custom comes from France, where the public executioner used to hang the effigy of the criminal, if the criminal himself could not be found.

Effrontery. Out-facing, rude persistence and overbearing impudence. (Latin, effrons—i.e., ex-frons, out-face.)

Egalité. Philippe, duc d'Orléans, father of Louis-Philippe, king of the French, was so called, because he sided with the revolutionary party, whose motto was "Liberty, fraternity, and equality." Philippe Egalité was guillotined in 1793.

Ege'ria. The nymph who instructed Numa in his wise legislation. Numa used to meet her in a grove near Aric'ia.

Egg. The serpent egg of the Druids. This wonderful egg was hatched by the joint labour of several serpents, and was buoyed into the air by their hissing. The person who caught it had to ride off at full speed to avoid being stung to death ; but the possessor was sure to prevail in every contest or combat, and to be courted by those in power. Pliny says he had seen one of these eggs, and that it was about as large as a moderate-sized apple.

The mundane egg. The Phœnicians, and from them the Egyptians, Hindus, Japanese, and many other ancient nations, maintained that the world was hatched from an egg made by the Creator. Orpheus speaks of this egg.

From the egg to the apples. (Latin, "ab ovo usque ad mala.") From first to last. The Romans began their "dinner" with eggs, and ended with fruits called "mala."

Eggs. Golden eggs. Great profits. (See GOOSE.)

I doubt the bird is flown that laid the golden eggs.
—Scott, "The Antiquary."

Pasch eggs. (See EASTER EGGS.)

Don't put all your eggs in one basket. Don't venture all you have in one speculation ; don't put all your property in one bank. The allusion is obvious.

I have eggs on the spit. I am very busy, and cannot attend to anything else. The reference is to roasting eggs on a spit. They were first boiled, then the yolk was taken out, braided up with spices, and put back again ; the eggs were then drawn on a "spit," and roasted. As this required both dispatch and constant attention, the person in charge could not leave them. It must be remembered that the word "spit" had at one time a much wider meaning than it has now. Thus toasting-forks and the hooks of a Dutch oven were termed spits.

I forgot to tell you, I write short journals now ; I have eggs on the spit.—Swift.

Like as two eggs. Exactly alike.

They say we are almost as like as eggs.—Shakespeare, "Winter's Tale," i. 2.

Sure as eggs is eggs. Professor De Morgan suggests that this is a corruption of the logician's formula, " x is x ."—Notes and Queries.

Teach your grandmother to roast eggs. Attempting to teach your elders and superiors. The French say, "The goslings want to drive the geese to pasture" (Les oisons veulent mener les oies paître). The great art of roasting eggs is to keep turning them incessantly.

There is reason in roasting eggs. Even the most trivial thing has a reason for being done in one way rather than in some other. When wood fires were usual, it was more common to roast eggs than to boil them, and some care was required to prevent their being "ill-roasted, all on one side," as Touchstone says ("As You Like It," iii. 2).

One likes the pheasant's wing, and one the leg;
The vulgar boil, the learned roast an egg.

Pope, "Epistles," ii.

Will you take eggs for your money?
"Will you allow yourself to be imposed upon? will you take kicks for halfpence?" This saying was in vogue when eggs were plentiful as blackberries. The phrase, I got eggs for my money, means, I gave valuable money, and received instead such worthless things as eggs. When Wolsey accused the earl of Kildare for not taking Desmond prisoner, the earl replied, He is no more to blame than his "brother Ossory, who (notwithstanding his high promises) is glad to take eggs for his money"—i.e., is willing to be imposed upon.—Campion, "History of Ireland." (1633.)

My honest friend, will you take eggs for money?—Shakespeare, "Winter's Tale," i. 2.

Egg-feast. In Oxford the Saturday preceding Shrove Tuesday is so called; it is also called Egg-Saturday; because pasch eggs are provided for the students on that day.

Egg-on or Edge-on. A corruption of the Saxon eggian (to incite). The Anglo-Saxon egg, and Scandinavian eg, means a "sharp point"—hence edge-hog (hedge-hog), a hog with sharp points, called in Danish, pen-svin (thorny swine), and in French, porc-épic, where épic is the Latin spicula (spikes).

Egg-trot. A cautious, jog-trot pace, like that of a good housewife riding to market with eggs in her panniers.

Egil. Brother of Weland, the Vulcan of Northern mythology. Egil was a great archer, and a tale is told of him the exact counterpart of the famous story about William Tell:—One day king Nidung commanded Egil to shoot an apple off the head of his son. Egil took two well-selected arrows from his quiver, and when asked by the king why he took two, replied (as the Swiss peasant to Gessler), "To shoot thee, O tyrant, with the second, if I fail."

Egis. (See Ægis.)

Eg'lantine (3 syl.). Daughter of king Pepin, and bride of her cousin Valentine, the brother of Orson. She soon died.—Valentine and Orson.

Madame Eglantine. The prioress in Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales." Good-natured, wholly ignorant of the world, vain of her courtly manners, and noted for her partiality to lap-dogs, her delicate oath, "by saint Eloy," her "entuning the service swetely in her nose," and her speaking French "after the scole of Stratford atte Bowe."

Eg'otism. The too frequent use of the word I; the habit of talking about one's-self, or of parading one's own doings. (Latin, ego, I.)

E'gypt, in Dryden's satire of "Ab-salom and Achitophel," means France.

Egypt and Tyros (Holland) intercept your trade,
And Jebusites (Papists) your sacred rites invade.
Part I.

Eider-down. The down of the eider duck. This duck is common in Greenland, Iceland, and the islands north and west of Scotland. It is about the size of a goose, and receives its distinctive name from the river Eider in Denmark.

Eikon Basilikē (likeness of a king). A book attributed to Charles I.; but in reality the production of John Gauden, bishop of Exeter. (1605-1662.)

Eisell. Wormwood wine. Hamlet says to Laertes, Woul't drink up eisell—i.e., drink wormwood wine to show your love to the dead Ophelia. In the "Troy Book" of Lydgate we have the line "Of bitter eycell and of eager (sour) wine." And in Shakespeare's sonnets—

I will drink
Potions of eycell, 'gainst my strong infection;
No bitterness that I will bitter think,
Nor double penance, to correct correction.
cxi.

Eisteddfod. The meetings of the Welsh bards. (Welsh, eistedd, to sit.)

Either. Greek, hekater; Irish, ceachtar; Saxon, ayther. "Ceach", our "each," and ayther, our "either."

El Dora'do. Golden illusion; a land or means of unbounded wealth. Orella'na, lieutenant of Pizarro, pretended he had discovered a land of gold (el dorado) between the rivers Orino'co and Am'azon, in South America. Sir Walter Raleigh twice visited Guia'na, as the spot indicated, and published a highly-coloured account of its enormous wealth.

The real "land of gold" is California, and not Guiana. (See BALNIBARBI.)

The whole comedy is a sort of El dora'do of wit—T. Moore.

El Infantë de Antequera is the regent Fernando, who took the city of Antequera from the Moors in 1419.

El Islam. The religion of the Moslems. The words mean "The resigning one's-self to God."

El Khi'dr. One of the good angels, according to the Koran.

Elagab'alus. A Syro-Phœnician sun-god. One of the Roman emperors was so called because he was priest of Elagabalus. This madman invited the principal men of Rome to a banquet, and smothered them in a shower of roses.

Ela'ine (2 syl.). The "lily maid of Astolat" (Guildford in Surrey), who loved Sir Lancelot "with that love which was her doom." Sir Lancelot, being sworn to celibacy, could not have married her, even if he had been willing; and, unhappily, what little love he had was bestowed on the queen. Elaine felt that her love was a vain thing, and died. According to her last request, the bed on which she died was placed on a barge, and on it was laid her dead body, arrayed in white, a lily in the right hand, and a letter avowing her love in the left. An old dumb servitor steered and rowed the barge down the river, and when it stopped at the palace staith, king Arthur ordered the body to be brought in. The letter being read, Arthur directed that the maiden should be buried like a queen, with her sad story blazoned on her tomb.—Idylls of the King, "Elaine."

El'amites (3 syl.). Persians. So called from Elam, son of Shem.

Elas'mothe'rium (Greek, the metal-plate beast). An extinct animal, between the horse and the rhinoceros.

El'berich. The most famous dwarf of German romance. He aided the emperor Otnit (who ruled over Lombardy) to gain for wife the Soldan's daughter.—The Heldenbuch.

Elbow. A constable in Shakespeare's "Measure for Measure."

Elbow Grease. Perspiration excited by hard manual labour. They say "Elbow grease is the best furniture oil." We have also the expression Palm oil, meaning hand-work.

Elden Hole. Elden Hole needs filling. A reproof given to great braggarts. Elden Hole is a deep pit in Derbyshire Peak, said to be fathomless.

Elder Tree. Sir John Maundeville, speaking of the Pool of Sil'oe, says, "Fast by is the elder-tree on which Judas hanged himself . . . when he sold and betrayed our Lord." Shakespeare, in "Love's Labour's Lost," v. 2, says, "Judas was hanged on an elder." (See FIG-TREE.)

Judas he japed
With Jewish siller,
And sitten on an elder tree
: Hanged himself.
Piers Plowman, "Vision."

Eleatic Philosophy. Founded by Xenoph'anës of El'ea about B.C. 530. The Ionic school believed there was but one element; the Eleatics said there were four or six, as heat and cold, moisture and dryness, odd and even, from the anagonism of which visible objects sprang: Thus, Fire is heat acting on dryness; Air is heat acting on moisture; Water is cold acting on moisture; and Earth is cold acting on dryness. (See below.)

The New Eleatic School was founded by Leucippus of El'ea, a disciple of Zeno. He wholly discarded the phantasmagoric theory, and confined his attention to the physical properties of the visible world. He was the father of the Atomic System, in which the agency of chance was again revived.

Elector. A prince who had a vote in the election of the emperor of Germany.

The Great Elector. Frederick-William of Brandenburg. (1620-1688.)

Electricity means the special property of amber (Greek, electron, amber).

Thalès (B.C. 600) noticed that amber, when rubbed, had the property of attracting light substances, and this was the fons et origo of this most important science.

Bright amber shines on his electric throne,
And adds ethereal lustres to his own.
Darwin, "Economy of Nature," i. 2.

Electro-Biology means the influence of electricity on life—i.e., the effect of magnetism on the affections, passions, and sensations of living animals.

Elec'tuary. Something to be licked up; a medicine made "thick and slap," which cannot be imbibed like a liquid, nor bolted like a pill, but which must be licked up like honey. (Greek, ek-leicho.)

Eleemos'ynam. Eleemos'ynam sepulcri patris tui (Alms on your father's grave). (See MEAT.)

Elegant Extracts. The 85th Foot, remodelled in 1813, after the numerous court-martials which then occurred. The officers of the regiment were removed, and officers draughted from other regiments were substituted in their places.

At the University of Cambridge, in the good old times, some few men were too good to be plucked and not good enough for the poll: a line was drawn below the poll-list, and these lucky unfortunates were allowed to pass, and were nicknamed the Elegant Extracts. There was a similar limbo in the honour-list, called the Gulf, in allusion to a Scripture passage well-known and thus parodied, "Between them (in the poll) and us (in the honour-lists) there is a great gulf fixed," &c.

El'ements. Aristotle's elements. The ancient Greeks asserted that there are four elements—fire, air, water, and earth; and this assertion has been the subject of very unwise ridicule. Modern chemists maintain the same fact, but have selected four new words for the four old ones, and instead of the term "element," use "material forms." We say that matter exists under four forms, the imponderable (fire), the gaseous (air), the liquid (water), and the solid (earth), and this is all the ancient philosophers meant by their four elements or elemental forms. It was Empedocles of Sicily who first maintained that fire, air, earth, and water are the four elements; but he called them Zeus, Hera, Gœa, and Posidon. (Latin, eleo, to grow out of.)

Let us the great philosopher (Aristotle) attend,....
His elements, "Earth, Water, Air, and fire;"....
Tell why these simple elements are four;
Why just so many; why not less or more?
Lackmore, "Creation," v.

Elephant and Castle. A public-house sign at Newington, said to derive its name from the skeleton of an elephant dug up near Battle Bridge in 1714. A hint-headed spear lay by the remains, whence it is conjectured that the creature was killed by the British in a fight with the Romans.—The Times.

There is another public-house with the same sign in St. Pancras, probably intended to represent an elephant with a howdah.

Elephan'ta, in Bombay, is so called from a stone elephant, which carried a tiger on its back, and formerly stood near the landing-place on the south side of the island. It has now nearly disappeared. The natives call it Gahrapoorce (cave town), from its cave, 130 feet long.—Chow-chow.

Elephan'tine (4 syl.). Heavy and ungainly, like an elephant. In Rome, the registers of the senate, magistrates, generals, and emperors, were called elephantine books, because they were made of ivory. In geology, the elephantine period was that noted for its numerous large thick-skinned animals. The disease called elephantiasis is when the limbs swell and look like those of an elephant more than those of a human being.

Eleusin'ian Mysteries. The religious rites in honour of Demeter or Cerēs performed at Eleusis, in Attica.

Elevation of the Host. The lifting up of the sacred elements immediately after consecration. The object is that the people may see them and fall down in adoration.

Eleven. The eleven thousand virgins. Ursula being asked in marriage by a pagan prince, fled towards Rome with her eleven thousand virgins. At Cologne they were all massacred by a party of Huns, and even to the present hour "their bones" are exhibited to visitors through windows in the wall. Maury says that Ursula's handmaid was named Undecimella, and that the legend of her eleven thousand virgins rose out of this name.—Légendes Picuses.

Elf, plural "Elves;" Swedish, alp, alf. Properly a mountain fay, but more loosely applied to those airy creatures that dance on the grass or sit in the leaves of trees and delight in the full moon. They have fair golden hair, sweet musical voices, and magic harps. They have a king and queen, marry and are given in marriage. They impersonate the shimmering of the air, the felt but indefinable melody of Nature, and all the little prettinesses which a lover of the country sees, or thinks he sees, in hill and dale, copse and meadow, grass and tree, river and moon-light. Spenser says that Prometheus called the man he made "Elfe," who found a maid in the garden of Adonis whom he called "Fay," of "whom all Fayres spring."

Of these a mighty people shortly grew,
And puissant kings, which all the world warrayd,
And to themselves all nations did subdue.
"Faery Queen," ii. 9, stanza 70, &c.

Red Elf. In Iceland, a person gaily dressed is called a red elf (raud alfr), in allusion to a superstition that dwarfs wear scarlet or red clothes. — Niul's Sagas.

Elf-arrows are what we call celts—triangular pieces of flint occasionally found under-ground, and superstitiously supposed to have been shot by elves against cattle for the purpose of bewitching them.

There every herd by sad experience knows
How, winged with fate, their elf-shot arrows fly,
When the sick ewe her summer food forgoes,
Or stretched on earth the heart-mit heifers lie.
Collins, "Popular Superstitions."

Elf-fire. The ignis-fatuus. The name of this elf is Will o' the Wisp, Jack o' lantern, Peg-a-lantern, or Kit o' the canstick (candlestick).

Elf-land. The realm ruled over by Oberon, king of Faery. King James says, "I think it is liker Virgilis Campi Elysii nor anything that ought to be believed by Christians." — "Damocles," iii. 5.

Elf-locks. Tangled hair. It is said that one of the favourite amusements of queen Mab is to tie people's hair in knots. When Edgar impersonates a madman, "he elfs all his hair in knots." — Lea, ii. 3.

This is that very Mab
That plats the manes of horses in the night,
And bakes the elf-locks in foul sluttish hairs.
Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet," i. 4.

Elf-marked. Those born with a natural defect, according to the ancient Scottish superstition, are marked by the elves for mischief. Queen Margaret called Richard III. —

Thou elvish-marked, abortive, rooting hog!
Shakespeare, "Richard III.," i. 3.

Elf-shot. Afflicted with some unknown disease, and supposed to have been wounded by an elfin arrow. The rinderpest would, in the Middle Ages, have been ascribed to elf-shots. (See ELF-ARROWS.)

Elfin. The first fairy king. He ruled over India and America. (Middle Age Romance.)

Elgin Marbles. A collection of ancient bas-reliefs and statues made by lord Elgin, and sent to England in 1812. They are chiefly fragments of the Parthenon at Athens, and were purchased by the British government for £35,000, to be placed in the British Museum. (1816.)

Elia. A nom de plume adopted by Charles Lamb. — Essays of Elia.

The adoption of this signature was purely accidental. Lamb's first contribution to the London Magazine was a description of the old South-Sea House, where he had passed a few months' novitiate as a clerk, . . . and, remembering the name of a gay, light-hearted foreigner, who flattered there at the time, substituted his name for his own. — Talfourd.

Eli'ab, in the satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," by Dryden and Tate, is meant for Sir Henry Bennet, earl of Arlington. Eliab was one of the chiefs of the Gadites who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 9).

Hard the task to do Eliab right;
Long with the royal wand-rer (Charles II) he roved,
And firm in all the turns of fortune proved.

Part ii.

Eli'akim. Jehoiakim, king of Judah. (B.C. 635, 610-599.)

El'idure (3 syl.). A legendary king of Britain, advanced to the throne in place of his elder brother Artegal, supposed by him to be dead. Artegal, after a long exile, returned to his country, and Elidure resigned to him the throne. Wordsworth has a poem on the subject.

Elim'inate (4 syl.). To turn out of doors; to turn out on an equation everything not essential to its conditions. (Latin, ē limine, out of doors.)

Elind'nir (dark clouds). The dwelling-place of the goddess Hael (q. v.).

Eliot (George). A nom de plume of Miss Evans, author of "Adam Bede," &c.

Elis'sa (deficiency or parsimony; Greek, ellipsis). Step-sister of Medi'na and Peris'sa, but they could never agree upon any subject.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. ii.

Eliva'ager (4 syl.). A cold venomous stream which issued from Niflheim, and in the abyss called the Ginnunga Gap hardening into layer upon layer of ice. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Elixir of Life. A tincture or decoction supposed by the alchemists to prolong life indefinitely. The tincture for transmuting metals was also called an elixir. (Arabic, el or al ecsir, the decoction. Some derive it from the Latin elixo, to boil.) (See AMRITA.)

Elizabeth had pet names for all her favourite courtiers—q.e.:

The mother of Sir John Norris she called "My own Crow."

Burghley was her "Spirit."

Mountjoy she termed her "Kitchen-maid."

Elizabeth of Hungary (St.). Patron saint of queens, being herself a queen. (1207-1231.)

Elizabe'than. After the style of things in the reign of queen Elizabeth. Elizabethan architecture is a mixture of Gothic and Italian, prevalent in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I.

Ell means the arm; el-bow, the bow or joint of the arm; the ell measure was the length of Henry I.'s arm. (1101.)

Give him an inch and he'll take an ell. Give him a little licence and he will take great liberties, or make great encroachments. The ell was no definite length. The English ell was a yard and a quarter, the Scotch ell a little more than a yard, while the Flemish ell was only three-quarters of a yard. This indefinite measure expresses the uncertainty of the length to which persons will go to whom you give the inch of liberty. Some will go the English ell; while others, of more modesty or more limited desires, will be satisfied with the shorter measures.

Ella. King of Northumberland, who married Cunstance.—Chaucer, "Man of Lawes Tale."

Elliot. In the "Black Dwarf," by Sir Walter Scott, are seven of that name—viz., Halbert or Hobbie Elliot, of the Heugh-foot (a farmer); Mrs. Elliot, his grandmother; John and Harry, his brothers; and Lillas, Jean, and Arnot, his sisters.

Ellyl'lon. The souls of the ancient Druids, which, being too good for hell, and not good enough for heaven, are permitted to wander upon earth till the judgment day, when they will be admitted to a higher state of being. (Welsh mythology.)

Elmo (St.). Comazants or electric lights occasionally seen on the masts of ships before and after a storm. So called by the Spaniards, but by the Italians they are called "the fires of St. Peter and St. Nicholas." (See CASTOR AND POLLUX.)

Sudden, breaking on their raptured sight,
Appeared the splendour of St. Elmo's light.
Moore, "Orlando Furioso," book ix.

Elohistic and Jehovistic Scriptures. The Pentateuch is supposed by bishop Colenso and many others to have been written at two widely different periods, because God is invariably called Elo'him in some paragraphs, while in others he is no less invariably called Jehovah. The Elohistic paragraphs, being more simple, more primitive, more narrative, and more pastoral, are said to be the older; while the Jehovistic paragraphs indicate a knowledge of geography and history, seem to exalt the priestly office, and are altogether of a more elaborate character. Those who maintain this theory think that some late transcriber has compiled the two Scriptures and combined them into one, much the same as if the four Gospels were collated and welded together into a single one. To give one or two examples:—Gen. i. 27, it is said, "So God (Elohim) created man in his own image, (both) male and female;" whereas, in the next chapter (21-24), it is said that God (Jehovah) caused a deep sleep to fall on Adam, and that he then took from the sleeping man a rib and made it a woman, and therefore (says the writer) a man shall cleave unto his wife, and the two be considered one flesh. Again, Gen. vi. 19, Elohim tells Noah, "Two of every sort shalt thou bring into the ark, a male and a female;" and (vii. 9)

"There went in two and two unto Noah into the ark, the male and the female, as God (Elohim) commanded Noah." In Gen. vii. 2, Jehovah tells Noah he is to make a distinction between clean and unclean beasts, and that he is to admit the former by sevens and the latter by twos. In the first example, the priestly character is indicated by the moral, and in the latter, by the distinction made between clean and unclean animals. We pass no opinion upon this theory, but state it as fairly as we can in a few lines.

Eloi (St.). Patron saint of artists and smiths. He was a celebrated worker in gold and silver, and was made bishop of Noyon in the reign of Dagobert. Probably the St. Eloi of Chaucer's Prioress was St. Louis (St. 'Loy).

There was also a nonne, a prioresse,
That of hire smiling was full simp' and coy;
Hire gretest othe n'as but by Seint Eloy.
Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales."

Eloquent. The Old Man Eloquent. Isoc'ratés, the Greek orator. When he heard that Grecian liberty was extinguished by the battle of Chærone'a, he died of grief.

That dishonest victory
At Chæronea, fatal to liberty,
Killed with report that Old Man Eloquent.
Milton, "Sonnets."

The Eloquent Doctor. Peter Aure'olus, archbishop of Aix, a schoolman.

Elshander or Cunnie Elshie. The Black Dwarf, alias Sir Edward Mauley, alias the Recluse, alias the Wise Wight of Mucklestane Moor.—Sir Walter Scott, "The Black Dwarf."

Elsie. The daughter of Gottlieb, a farm tenant of prince Henry of Hohenneck. The prince was suffering severely from some malady, and was told that he would be cured if any maiden would give her life as a substitute. Elsie vowed to do so, and accompanied the prince from Germany to Salerno. Hero Elsie surrendered herself to Lucifer, but was rescued by the prince, who married her. His health was perfectly re-established by the pilgrimage.—Longfellow, "The Golden Legend."

Elvino. A rich farmer, in love with Ami'na, the somnambulist. Ami'na being found in the bed of count Rodolpho, the day before the wedding, induces Elvino to reject her hand and promise marriage to Liza; but he is soon undeceived—Ami'na is found to be innocent, and Liza to have been the paramour of another; so Ami'na and Elvino are wedded under the happiest auspices.—Belli'ni's best opera, "La Sonnambula."

Elvi'ra (Donna). A lady deceived by don Giovanni, who deluded her into a liason with his valet, Leporello.—Mozart's opera of "Don Giovanni."

Elvira. A lady who loves Ernani, the robber-captain and head of a league against don Carlos, afterwards Charles V. of Spain. Being betrothed to don Ruy Gomez de Silva, an old Spanish grandee, whom she detests, Ernani resolves to rescue her; but it so happens that the king himself falls in love with her, and tries to win her. When Silva learns this, he joins the league; but the king, overhearing the plot in concealment, arrests the conspirators. Elvira intercedes for them, and the king grants them a free pardon. When Ernani is on the point of wedding Elvira, Ernani, being summoned to death by Silva, stabs himself.—Verdi's opera of "Ernani."

El'vish. Irritable, peevish, spiteful; full of little mischievous ways, like the elves. Our superstitious forefathers thought such persons were actually "possessed" by elves.

Elysian Fields. (See BEHESTH.)

Ely'sium. Elysian Fields. The Paradise or Happy Land of the Greek poets. Elysian (the adjective) means happy, delightful.

O'er each were shadowy cast Elysian gleams.
Thomson.

Wrapped my spirit in Elysium.
Milton, "Comus."

El'zevir. An edition of a classic author, published and printed by the family of Elzevir, and said to be immaculate. Virgil, one of the masterpieces, is certainly incorrect in some places. (1592-1626.)

Em. The unit of measure in printing. The standard is a pica M; and the width of a line is measured by the number of such M's that would stand side by side in the "stick." This dictionary is in double columns, each column equals 11 pica Ms in width, and one M is allowed for the space between. Some work is made up to 10½, 20½, &c., ems; and for the half-em printers employ the letter N, which is in width half a letter M. As no letter is wider than the M, and all narrower letters are fractions of it, this letter forms a very convenient standard for printing purposes.

Embargo. To lay an embargo on him or it is to impose certain conditions before you give your consent. It is a Portuguese and Spanish word, meaning an order issued by authority to prevent ships leaving port for a fixed period.

Ember Days are the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday of Ember Weeks (q.v.).

Ember Weeks. A corruption of quatuor tempora, through the Dutch quatemper and German quaterember. The four times are after Quadragesima Sunday, Whit Sunday, Holyrood Day (September), and St. Lucia's Day (December). The supposition that persons sat in embers (or ashes) on these days is without foundation.

Emblem is a picture with a hidden meaning; the meaning is "cast into" or "inserted in" the visible device. Thus, a balance is an emblem of justice, white of purity, a sceptre of sovereignty. (Greek, en-ballo.) (See APOSTLES, PATRON SAINTS.)

Some of the most common and simple emblems of the Christian church are—

The circle inscribed in an equilateral triangle, to denote the co-equality and co-eternity of the Trinity.

A hand from the clouds, to denote God the Father.

A lamb, fish, pelican, &c. &c. The Lord Jesus Christ.

A dove. The Holy Ghost.

A chalice. The eucharist.

A phoenix. The resurrection.

A cross. The Christian's life and conflict; the death of Christ for man's redemption.

A crown. The reward of the perseverance of the saints.

Emblers, de Gentz (French). A stealing from the people.—Old Rolls.

Em'bryo means that which swells inside something (Greek, en-bru'o); hence, the child in the womb; the rudiment in a plant before it shows itself in a bud; an idea not developed, &c.

Em'elye. The sister-in-law of "duke Thesens," beloved by the two knights, Pal'amon and Ar'eyte, the former of whom had her to wife. It is of this lady the poet says, "Up roos the sun, and up roos Emelye" (v. 2275).

This passeth yee by yee, and day and day,
Till it fel oones in a morne of May.
That Emelie, that fairer was to scene
Than is the lillie on hire stalkes grene,
And frescher than the May with flourés newe. . .
Er it was day, as sche was wont to do,
Sche was arisen.
Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales" (The Knightes Tale).

Em'eralds. According to tradition, if a serpent fixes its eyes upon an emerald it becomes blind.—Ahmed ben Abdulaziz, "Treatise on Jewels."

Em'erald Isle. Ireland. This term was first used by Dr. Drennan (1754-1820), in the poem called "Erin." Of course, it refers to the bright green verdure of the island.

An emerald set in the ring of the sea.
Cushlamachree.

Emer'gency. A sudden emergency is something which starts suddenly into view, or which rises suddenly out of the current of events. (Latin, e-mergo, to rise out of "the water.")

Emeute (French). A seditious rising or small riot. Literally, a moving-out. (Latin, e-mov'eo.)

Emile (2 syl.). The French form of Emil'ius. The hero of Jean Jacques Rousseau's novel of the same name, and his ideal of a perfectly educated young man.

Emil'ia (in Shakespeare's "Othello"). Wife of Iago. She is induced by her husband to purloin Desdemona's handkerchief, which Iago conveys to Cassio's chamber, and tells the Moor that Desdemona had given it to the lieutenant as a love-token. At the death of Desdemona, Emilia (who till then, never suspected the real state of the case) reveals the fact, and Iago rushes upon her and kills her.

Emil'ia. The sweetheart of Peregrine Pickle, in Smollett's novel.

Em'ily. (See EMELYE.)

Em'inance (His). The title given to cardinals since 1620.

Emol'ument. Literally, that which comes out of the mill. (Latin, e-mola.) It originally meant toll on what was ground. (See GRUST.)

Emo'tion. Literally, the movement of the mind brought out by something which affects it. The idea is this: The mind is passive till something occurs to affect it, when it becomes roused; the active state thus produced is its emotion, and the result thereof is passion or affection. Thus, in the famous "Hermetic Books" (q.v.), passion is said to be the result of motion. (Latin, e-movere, to move out of.)

Empan'nel or Impannel is to write the names of a jury on a pannel or piece of parchment. (French, panneau—i.e., pan de peau, piece of skin.)

Empedoclē's (4 syl.) of Sicily. A disciple of Pythagoras. According to Lucian, he threw himself into the crater of Etna, that persons might suppose he was returned to the gods; but Etna threw out his iron sandal, and destroyed the illusion.—Horace, "Ars Poetica," 464. (See CLEOMBROTOS.)

He who, to be deemed
A god, leaped fondly into Etna flames,
Empedoclē's.

Milton, "Paradise Lost," iii.

Emperor. Emperor of Believers. Omar I., father-in-law of Mahomet, and second caliph of the Mussulmans. (581-644.)

Emperor of the mountains, king of the woods, and lord of the highways from Florence to Naples. A title assumed by Peter the Calabrian, a famous bandit-chief. (1812.)

Emperor, not for myself, but for my people. The maxim of Hadrian, the Roman emperor. (117-138.)

Empire. The empire of reason; the empire of truth; &c.—i.e., reason or truth as the governing principle. Empire is the Latin imperium, a jurisdiction, and an emperor is one who holds command.

Empirics. Quacks. A school of medicine founded by Serap'ion, of Alexandria, who contended that it is not necessary to obtain a knowledge of the nature and functions of the body in order to treat diseases, but that experience is the surest and best guide. They were opposed to the Dogmatics (q.v.). (Greek, en-pira'o, to experimentalise on.)

We must not
So stain our judgement, or corrupt our hope,
To prostitute our past-cure malady
To empirics.

Shakespeare, "All's Well that Ends Well," ii. 1.

Employé (French). One in our employ; such as clerks, shopmen, servants, &c.

Empson. The favourite flageolet-player of Charles II., introduced into Scott's "Peveril of the Peak."

Julian could only bow obedience, and follow Empson, who was the same person that played so rarely on the flageolet.—Ch. xxx.

Empty Chance. A chance not worth calculating on. The ace of dice was, by the Greeks and Romans, left empty, because the number of dice was equal to the number of aces thrown. As ace is the lowest chance, the empty chance was the least likely to win.

Empyre'an. According to Ptolemy, there are five heavens, the last of which is pure elemental fire and the seat of deity; this fifth heaven is called the empyrean (from the Greek, en-pur, in fire). (See HEAVEN.)

Enalio-saurians (Greek, sea-lizards). A group of fossil saurians, including the Ichthyosaur, Plesiosaur, Sauropterygy, &c. &c.

Encelados. The most powerful of the giants that conspired against Zeus (Jupiter). The king of gods and men cast him down, and threw Mount Etna over him. The poets say that the flames of this volcano arise from the breath of this giant. The battle-field of his contest was Phleg'ra, in Macedonia.

So fierce Enceladus in Phlegra stood.

Hoole, "Jerusalem Delivered," vi.

I tell you, younglings, not Enceladus,
With all his threat'ning band of Typhon's brood...
Shall seize this prey out of his father's hands.

Shakespeare, "Titus Andronicus," iv. 2.

Enchanter is one who sings incantations. (Latin, in-canto, to sing over or against some one.)

Enchanted Castles. De Saint Foix says that women and girls were subject to violence whenever they passed by an abbey, quite as much as when they approached a feudal castle. When these victims were sought for and demanded back, the monks would sustain a siege rather than relinquish them, and, if close pressed, would bring to the walls some sacred relic, which so awed the assailants that they would desist rather than incur the risk of violating such holy articles. This, he says, is the origin of enchanters, enchantments, and enchanted castles.—Historical Essays.

Encore (French). Our use of this word is unknown to the French, who use the word bis (twice) if they wish a thing to be repeated. The French, however, say, encore une tasse (another cup), encore une fois (still once more). It is strange how we have perverted almost every French word that we have naturalised.

Encratites (4 syl.). A sect of the second century, who condemned marriage, forbade eating flesh or drinking wine, and rejected all the luxuries and comforts of life as "things sinful." The sect was founded by Tatian, a disciple of Justin Martyr. (Greek, egcrates, self-mastery.)

Encroach means literally to put on a hook, or to hook on. Those who hook on a little here and a little there. (French, en croc, on a hook.)

End-irons. Two movable iron cheeks or plates, still used in cooking-stoves to enlarge or contract the grate at pleasure. The term explains itself, but must not be mistaken for andirons or "dogs."

Endorse. I endorse that statement. I accept it; I fully accord with it. The allusion is to the commercial practice of writing your name on the back of a bill of exchange or promissory note if you choose to make yourself responsible for it. (Latin, in-dorsum, on the back.)

Endym'ion, in Greek mythology, is the sunshine, with which the moon is in love. Endym'ion was condemned to endless sleep and everlasting youth, and Sile'nē kisses him every night on the Latmian hills.

The moon sleeps with Endymion,
And would not be awaked.
Shakespeare, "Merchant of Venice," v. 1.

Enemy. How goes the enemy? or What says the enemy? What o'clock is it? Time is the enemy of man, especially of those who are behind time.

Enfield Rifle. So called from the factory at Enfield where it is made.

Enfilade (French) means literally to spin out; to put thread in [a needle], as enfiler une aiguille; to string beads by putting them on a thread, as enfiler des perles. Soldiers being compared to thread, we get the following metaphors: to go through a place as thread through a needle—to string artillery by placing it in a line and directing it against an enemy; hence to scour or rake with shot.

England. Verstegan quaintly says that Egbert was "chiefly moved" to call his kingdom England "in respect of pope Gregory's changing the name of Engelise into Angellike." And this "may have moved our kings upon their best gold coins to set the image of an angel."—"Restit. of Decayed Intell. in Antiq.," p. 147.

England expects that every man will do his duty. The parole signalled by Horatio Nelson to his fleet before the battle of Trafalgar.

Englishman. The national nickname of an Englishman is "A John Bull." The nation, taken in the aggregate, is nicknamed "John Bull." The French nickname for an Englishman is "Godam'," from a familiar oath once common, and still too frequently used. (See BULL.)

Englishman's Castle. His house is so called, because so long as a man shuts himself up in his own house, no bailiff can break through the door to arrest him or seize his goods. It is not so in Scotland.

En'id. The daughter and only child of Yn'iol, and wife of prince Geraint, one of the Knights of the Round Table. Ladies called her "Enid the Fair," but the people named her "Enid the Good." She is a model of conjugal love and obedience, and was one of the three celebrated ladies in the court of king Arthur.—Idylls of the King, "Enid."

Enlightened. The Enlightened Doctor. Raymond Lully, of Palma, one of the most distinguished men of the thirteenth century. (1234-1315.)

Enniskillens. The 6th Dragoons; instituted 1689, on account of their brave defence of the town of Inniskillen, in favour of William III.

En'n'ius. The Chaucer or father of Roman poets. (B.C. 239-169.)

The French Ennius. Guillaume de Lorris (1235-1265), author of the "Romance of the Rose," called the "Iliad" of France.

The Spanish Ennius. Juan de Mena, born at Cor'dova. (1412-1456.)

Enskon'ce (2 syl.). To hide; to put under cover. Literally, to cover with a schanze or fort. (German, schanze, a fort; Danish, schanz; Swedish, skans.)

Ensemble. The tout ensemble. The general effect; the effect when the whole is regarded. (French.)

Ensign.

Of Ancient Athens. An owl.

The British Navy. A double cross (St. George and St. Andrew) on a red, white, or blue field.

China. A dragon.

Ancient Corinth. A flying horse—i.e.,

Pegasus.

Ancient Danes. A raven.

Ancient Egypt. A bull, a crocodile, a vulture.

England (in the Tudor era). St. George's cross.

Ancient France. The cape of St. Martin; then the oriflamme.

The Franks (Ripuarian). A sword with the point upwards.

The Franks (Salian). A bull's head.

The Gauls. A wolf, bear, bull, cock.

The ancient Lacedemonians. The letter alpha (A).

The ancient Messenians. The letter mu (M).

The ancient Persians. A golden eagle, with outstretched wings on a white field; a dove.

The Paisdad'ian Dynasty of Persia. A blacksmith's apron. (See STANDARD.)

The ancient Romans. An eagle for the legion; a wolf, a horse, a boar, a minotaur, &c.

Romanulus. A handful of hay or fern (manipulus).

The ancient Saxons. A trotting horse.

The Turks. Horses' tails.

The ancient Welsh. A dragon.

Entail. An entail is an estate cut from the power of a testator. The testator cannot bequeath it; it must go to the legal heirs. (French, en-tailler.)

Entele'chie. The kingdom of queen Quintessence, in the famous satirical romance of Rabelais called the "History of Gargantua and Pantagruel." Pantagruel and his companions went thither in search of the Holy Bottle. It may be called the city of speculative science.

Entering Short. When bills are paid into a banker's hands to receive the amount when due, it is called "entering them short." In this case, if the banker fails, the assignees must give them up.

Bills in the hands of factors may be so entered.

Enthu'siast is one who believes that he himself is in God, or that God is in him (Greek, en theos). Our word inspired is very similar, being the Latin in spiritu (in the spirit).

Entremets (arm-tre-may). Sweet foods or kickshaws served at table between the main dishes, courses, or removes; literally, entre-mets (French), things put between. We now use two words, entrées and entremets, the former being meats handed round between the main dishes, and the latter being sweet made-dishes.

Entre Nous (French). Between you and me; in confidence.

Eolian. An Eolian harp. A box fitted with strings, like a fiddle. The strings, however, are not sounded by a bow, but by a current of air or wind passing over them.

Eölus. God of the winds. (Roman mythology.)

Epact. The excess of the solar above the lunar year, the former consisting of 365 days and the latter of 354, or eleven days fewer. The epact of any year is the number of days from the last new moon of the old year to the 1st of the following January. (Greek, epactos, adscitions.)

Eper'gne (2 syl.). A large ornamental stand placed in the middle of a dining-table. It is generally said to be a French word, but is not known in France. The French call such an ornamental stand a surtout, strangely adopted by us to signify a frock-coat, which the French call a pardessus.

Ephe'bi. Youths between the age of eighteen and twenty were so called at Athens. (Greek, arrived at puberty.)

Ephe'sian. A jovial companion; a thief; a roysterer. A pun on the verb to pheeze—A-pheeze-ian. Pheeze is to flatter.

It is thine host, thine Ephesian, calls.
Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," iv. 5.

The Ephesian Poet. Hippo'nax, born at Ephesus in the sixth century B.C.

Eph'ial'tes (4 syl.). A giant who was deprived of his left eye by Apollo, and of his right eye by Hercules.

Eph'ori or Ephors. Spartan magistrates, five in number, annually elected from the ruling caste. They exercised control even over the kings and senate.

Epic. Father of epic poetry. Homer (about 950 B.C.), author of the "Iliad" and "Odyssey."

The great Puritan epic. Milton's "Paradise Lost."

Speaking of M. Doré's performances as an illustrator of the great Puritan epic.—The Times.

Ep'icure (3 syl.). A sensualist; one addicted to good eating and drinking. So called from Epicúros (q.v.).

Sir Epicure. A worldly sensualist in "The Alchemist," by Ben Jonson. His surname is "Mammon."

Epicure'an. Carnal; sensual; pertaining to good eating and drinking. (See EPICUROS.)

T. Moore has a prose romance entitled "The Epicurean."

Epicurean cooks
Sharpen with cloyless sauce his appetite.
Shakespeare, "Antony and Cleopatra," ii. 1.

Epicúros. (Latin form, Epicurus.) The Greek philosopher who founded the Epicurean school. His axiom was, that "happiness or enjoyment is the summum bonum of life." His disciples corrupted his doctrine into "Good living is the object we should all seek," or, according to the drinking song, "Who leads a good life is sure to live well."

Blest be the day I 'scaped the wrangling crew,
From Pyrrho's maze and Epicurus' sty.
Beattie, "Minstrel."

The Epicurus of China. Tao-tse, who commenced the search for the "elixir of life." Several of the Chinese emperors lost their lives by drinking his "Potion of Immortality." (B.C. 540.)

Epi-dem'ic is from the two Greek words, epi-dēmos (upon the people), a disease that attacks a number of people at once, either from bad air, bad drainage, or other similar cause.

EPI-ZOÖT'IC is epi-zōon (upon the herds and flocks). Zoology is used to signify a treatise on animals, but we generally except man; so epi-zoötic is used, demos (man) not being included.

Ep'ilepsy was called by the Romans the "Comitial or Congress sickness (morbis comitialis), because the polling for the comitia centuriata was null and void if any voter was taken with epilepsy while the votes were being taken.

Epimen'ides (5 syl.). A philosopher of Crete, who fell asleep in a cave when a boy, and did not wake again for fifty-seven years, when he found himself endowed with miraculous wisdom. (See RIP VAN WINKLE.)

Like Epimenides, I have been sleeping in a cave; and, waking, see those whom I left children are bearded men.—Sir E. L. Bulwer Lytton (Lord Lytton).

Epiph'any. The time of appearance, meaning the period when the star appeared to the wise men of the East. The 6th January is the feast of the Epiphany. (Greek, epi-phaino.)

Ep'isode (3 syl.) is the Greek epi-eis-odos (coming in besides—i.e., adventitious), meaning an adventitious tale introduced into the main story.

Epistle is something sent to another. A letter sent by messenger or post. (Greek, epi-stello.)

E Plu'ribus Unum (Latin). One unity composed of many parts. The motto of the United States of America.

Ep'och means that which bounds in or holds in hand. A sequence of events harnessed together like a team of horses. (Greek, epi-êcho.)

Ep'ode (2 syl.). Father of choral epode. Stesic'horos of Sicily. (B.C. 632-552.)

Epsom Salts. A salt formerly obtained by boiling down the mineral water in the vicinity of Epsom, but now chemically prepared. It is the sulphate of magnesia.

Equation of Time. The difference between mean and apparent time—i.e., the difference between the time as shown by a good clock and that indicated by a sun-dial. The greatest difference is in November, at the beginning of which month the sun is somewhat more than sixteen minutes too slow. There are days in December, April, June, and September, when the sun and the clocks agree.

Equēs Aura'tus. A knight bachelor, called aura'tus because he was allowed to gild his armour—a privilege confined to knights.

Equipage (3 syl.). Tea equipage. A complete tea-service. To equip means to arm or furnish, and equipage is the furniture of a military man or body of troops. Hence camp equipage (all things necessary for an encampment); field equipage (all things necessary for the field of battle); a prince's equipage, and so on.

Equity. (See ASTREA.)

Eraclius, the emperor, condemned a knight to death because the companion who went out with him returned not. "Thou hast slain thy fellow," said the emperor, "and must die. Go," continued he, to another knight, "and lead him to death." On their way, they met the knight supposed to be dead, and returned to Eraclius, who, instead of revoking his sentence, ordered all three to be put to death—the first because he had already condemned him to death; the second because he had disobeyed his orders; and the third because he was the real cause of the death of the other two. Chaucer tells this anecdote in his "Somptuous Tale." It is told of Cornelius Piso by Seneca in his "De Ira," lib. i. 16; but in the "Gesta Romanorum" it is ascribed to Eraclius.

Eras'tians. The followers of Erastus, a German "heretic" of the sixteenth century. They referred the punishment of all offences in the church to the civil magistrate.

E'rebus. Darkness. The gloomy cavern underground through which the Shades had to walk in their passage to Hades. "A valley of the shadow of death."

Not Erebus itself were dim enough
To hide thee from prevention.
Shakespeare, "Julius Caesar," ii. 1.

Eret'rian. The Eretrian bull. Menodemos of Eretria, in Eubœa; a Greek philosopher of the fourth century B.C., and founder of the Eretrian school, which was a branch of the Socratic. He was called a "bull" from the bull-like gravity of his face.

Erige'na. John Scotus, the schoolman. (1265-1308.)

Erin. Ireland (q.v.).

Erin'nys or Erin'ys. The goddess of vengeance, one of the Furies. (Greek mythology.)

Eriph'ila. The personification of Avarice, who guards the path that leads to pleasure, in "Orlando Furioso," vi. 61.

Erl-king. King of the elves, who prepares mischief for children, and even deceives men with his seductions. He is said to haunt the Black Forest.

Er'meline (Dame). Reynard's wife, in the tale of "Reynard the Fox."

Er'minage Street. One of the four great public ways made in England by the Romans. The other three are Walling Street, Ikenild Street, and the Fosse. Germanicus derives Ermin from Hermès, whence Irmisull (a column of Mercury), because Mercury presided over public roads.

Fair weyes many on ther ben in Englonde,
But four most of all ben zunderston.
Fram the south into the north takit Erming-strete;
Fram the east into the west goeth Ikeneld-strete;
Fram south-east (east) to North-west (that is sum del grete)
Fram Dore (Dover) into Chestre go'th Walling-strete;
The forth is most of all that tiths from Totenars;
Fram the one end of Cornwall anon to Catenays
(Cuthness)—
From the south to North-east into Englonde end
Fosse men callith thisk voix. Robert of Gloucester.

Er'mine (2 syl.). A corruption of Arménion, the ermine being the mus Ponticus or Armenian mustela.

Ermin'ia. The heroine of "Jerusalem Delivered." When her father, the king of Antioch, and Erminia fell captive into the crusaders' hands, Tancred gave her her liberty, and restored to her all her father's treasures. This generous conduct quite captivated her heart, and she fell in love with the Christian prince. Aladine, king of Jerusalem, took charge of her. When the Christian army besieged Jerusalem, she dressed herself in Clorinda's armour to go to Tancred, but, being discovered, fled, and lived awhile with some shepherds on the banks of the Jordan. Meeting with Vafri'no, sent as a secret spy by the crusaders, she revealed to him the design against the life of Godfrey, and, returning with him to the Christian camp, found Tancred wounded. She cured his wounds and nursed him tenderly, so that he was able to take part in the last great day of the siege. We are not told the ultimate lot of this fair Syrian.

Emire'nes (4 syl.). A renegade Christian, whose name was Clement. He was entrusted with the command of the caliph's "regal host," and was slain by Godfrey. — Tasso, "Jerusalem Delivered."

Erna'ni. The bandit-captain, duke of Segor'bia and Cardo'na, lord of Ara'gon, and count of Ernani, in love with Elvi'ra, who is betrothed to don Ruy Gomez de Silva, an old Spanish grandee, whom she detests. Charles V. of Spain also loves her, and tries to win her. Silva, finding that the king has been tampering with his betrothed, joins the league of Ernani against the king. The king in concealment overhears the plotters, and at a given signal they are arrested by his guards, but at the intercession of Elvira are pardoned and set free. Erna'ni is on the point of marrying Elvira, when a horn is heard. This horn Ernani had given to Silva when he joined the league, saying, "Sound but this horn, and at that moment Ernani will cease to live." Silva insists on the fulfilment of the compact, and Ernani stabs himself.—Verdi's opera of "Ernani."

Erot'ic Poetry. Love songs. So called from Eros, the god of love in Greek mythology.

Erra-Pater. An almanack. William Lilly, the almanack-maker and astrologer, is so called by Butler. It is said to have been the "name" of an eminent Jewish astrologer.—Halliwell, "Archaic Diet."

In mathematics he was greater Than Tycho Brahe or Erra Pater.
Butler, "Hudibras,"

Erse (1 syl.). The native language of the West Highlanders of Scotland, who are of Irish origin. It is a corruption of Irish. The proper name is Gaelic.

Er'udite. Most erudite of the Romans. Marcus Terentius Varro, a man of vast and varied erudition in almost every department of literature. (B.C. 116-27.)

Erythre'os. One of the horses of the sun. (Greek, the red-producer.)

Escapa'de (3 syl.) means, literally, the fling of a horse. Applied to any "fling," prank, or spree.

Eschales, Escales, &c. These proper names are from their armorial device, six escallops or scallop-shells.

Escu'age (3 syl.) means "shield service," and is applied to that obligation which bound a vassal to follow his lord to war at his own private charge. (French, escu, écu, a shield.)

Escula'pios (Latin, Esculapius). A disciple of Esculapius means a medical student. Escula'pian, medical. Escula'pios, in Homer, is a "blameless physician," whose sons were the medical attendants of the Greek army. Subsequently he was held to be the "god of the medical art."

Escu'rial. The palace of the Spanish sovereigns, about fifteen miles north-west of Madrid. It is one of the most superb structures in Europe, but is built among rocks, as the name signifies.

Esh-Shea'ra-l-Aboor'. The name given to Sirius, and worshipped by the Keys, an Arab tribe.

Esin'gæ. A title given to the kings of Kent, from Esë, their first king, sometimes called Ohta.

Esmond (Henry). A chivalrous cavalier in the reign of queen Anne. The hero of Thackeray's novel entitled "Esmond."

Esoter'ic (Greek, those within). Exoter'ic, those without. The term originated with Pythag'oras, who stood behind a curtain when he gave his lectures. Those who were allowed to attend the lectures, but not to see his face, he called his exoteric disciples; but those who were allowed to enter the veil, his esoteric.

Aristotle adopted the same terms, though he did not lecture behind a curtain. He called those who attended his evening lectures, which were of a popular character, his exoterics; and those who attended his more abstruse morning lectures, his esoterics.

Espiet (Es-pe-a). Nephew of Oriande la Fée. A dwarf not more than three feet high, with yellow hair as fine as gold, and though above a hundred years old, a seeming child of seven. He was one of the falsest knaves in the world, and knew every kind of enchantment.—Romançe of Maugis d'Aggremont et de Vivaisson frère.

Esplan'dian. Son of Am'adu and Ori'ana. He is the hero of Moutalvo's continuation of "Am'adis," called "The Five Book."

Esp'rit de Corps. Fellow-feeling for the society with which you are associated. A military term—every soldier will stand up for his own corps.

Esquire. One who carried the escu or shield of a knight. (Latin, scut'iger, a shield-bearer.)

Esquire. A title given to the younger sons of the nobility, to officers of the queen's court and household, to counsellors of law, justices of the peace, sheriffs, gentlemen who held commissions in the army and navy, and graduates of the universities not in holy orders. By courtesy it is given to attorneys, solicitors, surgeons, merchants, bankers, the landed gentry, and gentlemen living in independence.

Es'says. Lord Bacon's essays were the first that bore the name.

To write just treatises requireth leisure in the writer and leisure in the reader . . . which is the cause which hath made me choose to write certain brief notes . . . which I have called essays.—Dedication to Prince Henry.

Esse'nes (2 syl.). A sect among the Jews in the time of our Saviour. They took no part in public matters, but devoted themselves to contemplative studies. They held the Jewish Scriptures in great reverence, but interpreted them allegorically.

Essex. Eest seaxē (the territory of the East Saxons).

Essex Lions. Calves, for which the county is famous.

Valiant as an Essex lion (ironical).

Essex Stile. A ditch. As Essex is very marshy, it abounds in ditches, and has very few stiles.

Est-il-possible. A nickname of prince George of Denmark, given him by James II. The story goes that James, speaking of those who had deserted his standard, concluded the catalogue with these words, "And who do you think besides? Why, little Est-il-possible, my worthy son-in-law." James applied this cognomen to the prince because, when George was told of his father-in-law's abdication, all he did was to exclaim, "Est-il-possible!" and when told of the several noblemen who had fallen away from him, "Est-il-possible!" exhausted his indignation.

Estafette (French; Spanish, estafeta). Military couriers sent express. Their duty is to deliver the despatches consigned to them to the postilions appointed to receive them.

Estates. Estates of the realm. The powers that have the administration of affairs in their hands. The three estates of our own realm are the Lords Spiritual, the Lords Temporal, and the Commons; popularly speaking, the public press is termed the fourth estate. It is a great mistake to call the three estates of England, the Sovereign, the Lords, and the Commons, as many do. The word means that on which the realm stands. (Latin, sto, to stand.)

Herod . . . made a supper to his . . . chief estates.—Mark vi. 21.

Este. The house of Este had for their armorial bearing a white eagle on an azure shield. Rinaldo, in "Jerusalem Delivered," adopted this device; and Ariosto, in his "Orlando Furioso," gives it both to Mandricardo and Rogero, adding that it was once borne by Trojan Hector. As the dukes of Brunswick are a branch of the house of Este, our queen is a descendant of the same noble family.

D'Este was the surname adopted by the children of the duke of Sussex and lady Augusta Murray.

Estella. Heroine of Dickens's "Great Expectations."

Estot'iland. An imaginary tract of land near the Arctic Circle in North America, said to have been discovered by John Scalvū, a Pele.

The snow
From cold Estotiland.
Milton, "Paradise Lost," x. 685.

Estrildis or Estrild. Daughter of a German king, and handmaid to the mythical king Humber. When Humber was drowned in the river that bears his name, king Loerine fell in love with Estrildis, and would have married her, had he not been betrothed already to Guendolœ'na; however, he kept Estrildis for seven years in a palace underground, and had by her a daughter named Sabri'na. After the death of Loerine, Guendolœ'na threw both Estrildis and Sabri'na into the Severn.—Geoffrey, "British History," ii. c. ii.—v.

Estuary. Literally, the boiling place; the mouth of a river is so called because the water there seems to seethe and boil. (Latin, astuo, to boil.)

Eter'nal. The Eternal City. Rome. Virgil makes Jupiter tell Venus he would give to the Romans imperium sinē fine (an eternal empire). ("Æneid," i. 79.)

Eternal Tables. A white pearl, extending from east to west, and from heaven to earth, on which, according to Mahomet, God has recorded every event, past, present, and to come. Thus Mahomet writes in the Koran, "As Allah has ordained, and recorded on the eternal tables."

Eth'nic-plot. The Popish plot. In Dryden's satire of "Absalom and Achitophel." Charles II. is called David, the royalists are called the Jews, and the Papists Gentiles or Ethnoi, whence "Ethnic plot" means the Gentile or Popish plot.

Saw with disdain an Ethnic plot begun....
'Gainst form and order they their power employ,
Nothing to build, and all things to destroy.

Pt. i.

Eth'nophronēs (4 syl.). A sect of heretics of the seventeenth century, who practised the observances of the ancient Pagans. (Greek, ethnos phrēn, heathen-minded.)

E'thon. The eagle or vulture that gnawed the liver of Prometheus.

Et'iquette (3 syl.). The usages of polite society. The word means a ticket or card, and refers to the ancient custom of delivering a card of directions and regulations to be observed by all those who attended court.

Et'na. Virgil ascribes its eruption to Typhon, a hundred-headed giant, who breathed flames of devouring fire, and lies buried under the mountain.

E'trenn'es (2 syl.). New-year's gifts are so called in France. Strenia, the Roman goddess, had the superintendence of new-year's gifts, which the Romans called strenæ. Tatius entered Rome on New-year's Day, and received from some augurs palms cut from the sacred grove, dedicated to the goddess Strenia. Having succeeded, he ordained that the 1st of January should be celebrated by gifts to be called strenæ, consisting of figs, dates, and honey; and that no word of ill omen should be uttered on that day.

Ettrick Shepherd. James Hogg, the Scotch poet, who was born in the forest of Ettrick, Selkirkshire. (1772-1835.)

The Ettrick Shepherd was my guide.

Wordsworth.

Etzel—i.e., Attila. King of the Huns, a monarch ruling over three kingdoms and more than thirty principalities; being a widower, he married Kriemhild, the widow of Siegfried. In the Nibelungen-Lied, where he is introduced (part ii.), he is made very insignificant, and sees his liegemen, and even his son and heir, struck down without any effort to save them or avenge their destruction. He is as unlike the Attila of history as possible.

Eu'charis, in Fénelon's "Télémaque," is meant to represent Mdle. de Fontanges.

Eu'charist literally means a thank-offering. Our Lord said, "Do this in remembrance of me"—i.e., out of gratitude to me. The elements of bread and wine in the Lord's supper. (Greek, eu-charistia.)

Eu'clio. A penurious old hunk in one of the comedies of Plautus ("Aulularia").

Eu'cratēs (3 syl.). More shifts than Eu'cratēs. Eucratēs, the miller, was one of the archons of Athens, noted for his shifts and excuses for neglecting the duties of the office.

Eudox'ians. Heretics, whose founder was Eudox'ius, patriarch of Antioch in the fourth century. They maintained that the Son had a will independent of the Father, and that sometimes their wills were at variance.

Eu'dromos. One of Actæon's dogs. (Greek, the good runner.)

Euge'nus. The friend and wise counsellor of Yorick in Sterne's "Tristram Shandy."

Eu'gubine Tables. Bronze tables found near Egu'bium (Gobbo) in 1444. Of the inscriptions, five are Umbrian and Etruscan, and two are Latin.

Eu'alie (St.). Eu'alon is one of the names of Apollo; but in the calendar there is a virgin martyr called Eu'alie, born at Mérida, in Estramad'ra. When she was only twelve years old, the great persecution of Diocletian was set on foot, whereupon the young girl left her maternal home, and, in the presence of the Roman judge, cast down the idols he had set up. She was martyred by torture, 12th of February, 308.

Longfellow calls Evangeline the "Sunshine of St. Eulalie."

Eulen-spie'gel (Tyll), or Tyll Owl-glass. The hero of a German tale, which relates the pranks and drolleries, the ups and downs, the freak and fun of a wandering mechanic of Brunswick. The author is said to have been Dr. Thomas Murner. (1475-1530.)

Eumæ'os or Eumæus. A swineherd. So called from the slave and swineherd of Ulysses.

This second Eumæus strols hastily down the forest-glade, driving before him....the whole herd of his inharmonious charge.—Sir Walter Scott.

Eumen'idēs (the good-tempered goddesses). A name given by the Greeks to the Furies, as it would have been ominous and bad policy to call them by their right name, Erin'nyēs.

Eumes'tēs (Memory), who, being very old, keeps a little boy named Anamnestēs (Research) to fetch books from the shelves. — Spenser, "Fairy Queen," book ii.

Euno'mians. Heretics, the disciples of Euno'mius, bishop of Cyz'ieum in the fourth century. They maintained that the Father was of a different nature to the Son, and that the Son did not in reality unite himself to human nature.

Eupat'ridæ. The oligarchy of Attica. These lords of creation were subsequently set aside, and a democratic form of government established.

Eu'phemisms. Words or phrases substituted, to soften down offensive expressions.

Place never mentioned to ears polite. In the reign of Charles II., a worthy divine of Whitehall thus concluded his sermon: "If you don't live up to the precepts of the Gospel . . . you must expect to receive your reward in a certain place which 'tis not good manners to mention here."—Laconics. Pope tells us this worthy divine was a dean:—

To rest the cushion and soft dean invite,
Who never mentioned "hell" to ears polite.
—Moral Essays, ep. st. iv.

"His Satanic majesty;" "light-fingered gentry;" "a gentleman on his travels" (one transported); "she has met with an accident" (has had a child before marriage); "help" or "employé" (a servant); "not quite correct" (a falsehood); "an obliquity of vision" (a squint);

"an innocent" (a fool), and hundreds of others.

Eure'ka or rather Heure'ka (I have found it out). The exclamation of Archimedes, the Syracusan philosopher, when he discovered how to test the purity of Hiero's crown. The tale is, that Hiero delivered a certain weight of gold to a workman, to be made into a votive crown, but suspecting that the workman had alloyed the gold with an inferior metal, asked Archimedes to test the crown. The philosopher went to bathe, and, in stepping into the bath, which was quite full, observed that some of the water ran over. It immediately struck him that a body must remove its own bulk of water when it is immersed, and, putting his idea to the test, found his surmise to be correct. Now, then, for the crown. Silver is lighter than gold, therefore a pound-weight of silver will be more bulky than a pound-weight of gold, and being of greater bulk will remove more water. Vitruvius says: "When the idea flashed across his mind, the philosopher jumped out of the bath, exclaiming, 'Heure'ka! heure'ka!' and, without waiting to dress himself, ran home to try the experiment." Dryden has mistaken the quantity in the lines—

The deist thinks he stands on firmer ground,
Cries "Eureka!" the mighty secret's found.
Religio Læci.

But Byron has preserved the right quantity—

Now we clap
Our hands and cry "Eureka!"
—Childe Harold, iv. st. 81.

Eu'rus (2 syl.). The east wind. So called, says Buttmann, from eōs, the east. Probably it is eos eru'o, drawn from the east. Ovid confirms this etymology: Vires capit Euræus ab ortu.

While southern gales o'er western oceans roll,
And Euræus steals his ice-winds from the pole.
—Darwin, "Economy of Vegetation," canto vi.

Euryd'icē (4 syl.). Wife of Orpheus, killed by a serpent on her wedding night. Orpheus went down to the infernal regions to seek her, and was promised she should return on condition that he looked not back till she had reached the upper world. When the poet got to the confines of his journey, he turned his head to see if Eurydice were following, and she was instantly caught back again into Hades.

Restore, restore Eurydice to life;
Oh, take the husband or restore the wife.
Pope, "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day."

Eustace (Father). Abbot of St. Mary's, alias William Allan, alias Henry Wellwood.

Eusta'thians. A denomination so called from Eusta'thius, a monk of the fourth century, excommunicated by the council of Gangra.

Euty'ch'ians. Heretics of the fifth century, violently opposed to the Nesto'rians. They maintained that Jesus Christ was entirely God previous to the incarnation, and entirely man during his sojourn on earth. The founder was Euty'chēs, an abbot of Constantinople, excommunicated in 448.

Evangel'ic. The Evangelic Doctor. John Wycliffe, "the morning star of the Reformation." (1324-1384.)

Evan'geline (4 syl.). The heroine of Longfellow's poem so called. The subject of the tale is the expulsion of the inhabitants of Aca'dia (Nova Scotia) from their homes in 1755.

Evan'gelist, in Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," represents the effectual preacher of the Gospel, who opens the gate of life to Christian.

Evangelists. Symbols of the four:—Matthew. A man with a pen in his hand, and a scroll before him, looking over his left shoulder at an angel. This Gospel was the first, and the angel represents the Being who dictated it.

Mark. A man seated writing, and by his side a couchant winged lion, emblematical of the resurrection, which is most fully described by this evangelist. (See LION.)

Luke. A man with a pen, looking in deep thought over a scroll, and near him a cow or ox chewing the cud. The latter part refers to the eclectic character of St. Luke's Gospel.

John. A young man of great delicacy, with an eagle in the background to denote sublimity.

The more ancient symbols were—for Matthew, a man's face; for Mark, a lion; for Luke, an ox; and for John, a flying eagle; in allusion to the four cherubim before the throne of God, described in the Book of Revelation: "The first . . . was like a lion, and the second . . . like a calf, and the third . . . had a face as a man, and the fourth . . . was like a flying eagle" (iv. 7). Irenæus says: "The lion signifies the royalty of Christ; the calf his sacerdotal office; the man's face his incarnation; and the eagle the grace of the Holy Ghost."

Evans (William). The giant porter of Charles I., who carried about in his pocket Sir Geoffrey Hudson, the king's dwarf. He was nearly eight feet high. (Died 1632.) Fuller speaks of him in his "Worthies," and Sir Walter Scott introduces him in "Peveril of the Peak."

As tall a man as is in London, always excepting the king's porter Master Evans, that carried you about in his pocket, Sir Geoffrey, as all the world has heard tell.—Ch. xxxiii.

Evans (Sir Hugh). A pedantic Welsh parson and schoolmaster of wondrous simplicity and shrewdness.—Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor."

Evap'orate (4 syl.). Be off; vanish into thin air.

Evil. "Of two evils, I have chosen the least."—Prior.

Evil Eye. It was anciently believed that the eyes of some persons darted noxious rays on objects which they glared upon. The first morning glance of such eyes was certain destruction to man or beast, but the destruction was not unfrequently the result of emaciation. Virgil speaks of an evil eye making cattle lean.

Nes'cio quis ten'eros oc'ulus mihi fas'cinat agnos.

Ed. iii.

Who has bewitched my lambs, prithee say, if any the hag knows?

Evil Principle. (See AHRIMAN, ARIMANES, ASALOR.)

Ex Cathe'dra (Latin). With authority. The pope, speaking ex cathedra, is said to speak with an infallible voice—to speak as the successor and representative of St. Peter, and in his pontifical character. The words are Latin, and mean "from the chair"—i.e., the throne of the pontiff. The phrase is applied to all dicta uttered by authority, and ironically to self-sufficient, dogmatical assertions.

Ex Officio (Latin, by virtue of his office). As the Lord Mayor for the time being shall be ex officio one of the trustees.

Ex Partē (Latin, proceeding only from one of the parties). An ex-partē statement is a one-sided statement, a partial statement, a statement made by one of the litigants without being modified by the counter-statement.

Ex Ped'è Her'culém. From this sample you can judge of the whole. Plutarch says that Pythag'oras ingeniously calculated the height of Hercules by comparing the length of various stadia in Greece. A stadium was 600 feet in length, but Hercules' stadium at Olympia was much longer. Now, says the philosopher, as the stadium of Olympia is longer than an ordinary stadium, so the foot of Hercules was longer than an ordinary foot; and as the foot bears a certain ratio to the height, so the height of Hercules can be easily ascertained.—Varia Scripta.

Ex Post Facto (Latin). An ex post facto law. A law made to meet and punish a crime after the offence has been committed.

Exalta'tion. In old astrology, a planet was said to be in its "exaltation" when it was in that sign of the zodiac in which it was supposed to exercise its strongest influence. Thus the exaltation of Venus is in Pisces, and her "dejection" in Virgo.

And thus, God wot, Merc'ry is desolate/
In Pisces, wher Venus' is exaltate'.
Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales," 6, 285.

Exaltation of the Cross. A feast held in the Roman Catholic Church, on September 14th, to commemorate the restoration of the cross to Calvary in 628. It had been carried away by Kosroes the Persian.

Excal'ibar. Arthur's famous sword, given him by the Lady of the Lake.

No sword on earth, were it the Excalibar of king Arthur, can cut that which opposes no steady resistance to the blow.—Sir Walter Scott.

Ex'cellency (His). A title given to colonial and provincial governors, ambassadors, and the lord-lieutenant of Ireland.

Excel'sior. Aim at higher things still. It is the motto of the United States, and has been made popular by Longfellow's beautiful poem so named. We use the word, also, as the synonym of super-excellent.

Excep'tions. Exceptions prove the rule. They prove there is a rule, or there could be no exceptions; the very fact of exceptions proves there must be a rule.

Excheq'uer. Court of Exchequer. In the subdivision of the court in the reign of Edward I., the Exchequer acquired a separate and independent position. Its special duty was to order the revenues of the crown and recover the king's debts. It was denominated Scacca'rium, from scacrum (a chess-board), and was so called because a checkered cloth was laid on the table of the court.—Madox, "History of the Exchequer."

Excise (2 syl.) means literally, a coupon, or piece cut off (Latin, excido). It is a toll or duty levied on articles of home consumption—a slice cut off from these things for the national purse.

Exclu'sion. Bill of Exclusion. A bill to exclude the duke of York from the throne, on account of his being a Papist. Passed by the Commons, but rejected by the Lords, in 1679; revived in 1681.

Excommunica'tion. (1) The greater is exclusion of an individual from the seven sacraments, from every legitimate act, and from all intercourse with the faithful. (2) The lesser excommunication is sequestration from the services of the Church only. The first Napoleon was excommunicated by pope Pius VII., and the present king of Italy is still under the anathema of Pius IX.

Excommunication by Bell, Book, and Candle. (See CURSING.)

Excommunication by the ancient Jews. This was of three sorts—(1) Nid'ui (separation), called in the New Testament "casting out of the synagogue" (John ix. 22); (2) Cherem, called by St. Paul "delivering over to Satan" (1 Cor. v. 5); (3) Maran'utho, delivered over to divine vengeance. The Sadducees had an interdiction called Tetragram'meton, which was cursing the offender by Jeho'vah, by the decalogue, by the inferior courts, and with all the curses of the superior courts.

Exeru'ciate (4 syl.). To give one as much pain as crucifying him would do. (Latin, ex crux, where ex is intensive.)

Exeat (Latin, he may go out). Permission granted by a bishop to a priest to leave his diocese. In the universities, it is permission to a student to leave college after the gates are closed.

Ex'ecrate (3 syl.). To many Roman laws, this tag was appended, "If any one breaks this law, sacer esto"—i.e., let his body, his family, and his goods be consecrated to the gods. When a man was declared sacer, any one might kill him with impunity. Any one who hurt a tribune was held a sacer to the goddess Cerēs. Ex in this word is intensive.

Ex'ercises. Week-day sermons were so called by the Puritans. Hence the title of Morning Exercises, week-day sermons preached in the morning.

Ex'eter. The duke of Exeter's daughter was a sort of rack invented by the duke of Exeter during the reign of Henry VI.—Blackstone.

I was the lad that would not confess one word... though they threatened to make me hug the duke of Exeter's daughter.—Scott, "Fortunes of Nigel," c. xxv.

Ex'eter Controversy. A controversy raised upon a tract entitled "Plain Truth," by the Rev. John Agate, of Exeter, an Episcopalian; replied to by several dissenting ministers, as Withers, Trosse, Pierce, &c. (1707-1715.)

Exeter Domesday. A record containing a description of Wilts, Dorset, Somerset, Devon, and Cornwall, kept among the muniments of the dean and chapter of Exeter. It was published by Sir Henry Ellis, as a supplement to the Great Domesday, in 1816.

Exhibition. My son has got an exhibition at Oxford. An allowance of meat and drink; a benefaction for maintenance. (Latin, exhibitio, an allowance of food and other necessities, "alimentis exhibere alicui.")

I crave fit disposition for my wife,
Due reference of place, and exhibition.
Shakespeare, "Othello," i. 3.

Exile. The Neapolitan Exile. Baron Poërio. One of the kings of Naples promised the people a constitution, but broke his word; whereupon a revolution broke out, and the baron, with many others, was imprisoned for many years in a dreadful dungeon near Naples. He was at length liberated and exiled to America, but compelled the captain to steer for Ireland, and landed at Cork, where he was well received.

Ex'it (Latin, he goes out). A theatrical term placed at the point when an actor is to leave the stage. We also say of an actor, Exit So-and-so—that is, So-and-so leaves the stage at this point of the drama.

He made his exit. Left under shady circumstances; he died: as, "He made his exit of this life in peace with all the world." Except in the drama, we say, "made or makes his exit." (See above.)

Ex'odus. The Exodus of Israel. The departure of the Israelites from Egypt under the guidance of Moses. We now speak of the Exodus of Ireland—i.e., the departure of the Irish in large numbers for America; the Exodus of the Acadians—i.e., the expulsion of these colonists from Nova Scotia in the reign of George II.; &c. (Greek, ex odos, a journey out.)

Ex'ons or Exempts of the Guards. Officers who commanded when the lieutenant or ensign was absent, and who had charge of the night watch. (French, Capitaines exempts des gardes du corps.)

Exor'bitant means literally out of the rut (Latin, ex or'bita, out of the wheel-rut); out of the track; extravagant (extra-vagant).

Exoter'ic. (See ESOTERIC.)

Expectation Week. Between the Ascension and Whit Sunday, when the apostles continued praying "in earnest expectation of the Comforter."

Experimental Philosophy. Science founded on experiments or data, in contradistinction to moral and mathematical sciences. Experimental philosophy is also called natural philosophy, and by the French physics.

Experimen'tum Cru'cis (Latin). A decisive experiment. (See CRUCIAL.)

Explo'sion means literally, driven out by clapping the hands (Latin, explo'do—i.e., ex-pluendo); hence the noise made by clapping the hands, a report made by ignited gunpowder, &c.

Expo'nent. One who explains or sets forth the views of another. Thus, a clergyman should be the exponent of the Bible and Thirty-nine Articles. (Latin, ex pono, to expose or set forth.)

Exposé (French). An exposing of something which should have been kept out of sight. Thus we say a man made a dreadful exposé—i.e., told or did something which should have been kept concealed.

Expressed Oils are those which are obtained by pressure. Unlike animal and essential oils, they are pressed out of the bodies which contain them.

Expression. A geographical expression. Vox et præterea nihil. A word used in geography to describe a people who have no recognised nationality.

This territory is to a very great extent occupied by one race....and yet to the present day Germany is little more than a geographical expression.—Daily Telegraph.

Ex'quisite (3 syl.). One sought out; a coxcomb, a dandy, one who thinks himself superlatively well dressed, and of most unexceptionable deportment.

Exten'sive (3 syl.). Rather extensive, that. Rather fast. A slang synonym for a swell.

Extravagantēs Constitutio'nēs or Extravagants. The papal constitutions of John XXII. and some few of his successors, supplemental to the "Corpus Juris Canonici." So called because they were not ranged in order with the other papal constitutions, but were left "out-wanderers" from the general code.

Extreme Unction. One of the seven sacraments of the Romish Church, founded on St. James v. 14, "Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord."

Extrin'sic (Latin). Without, but near to. Thus we say matter cannot be moved without extrinsic agency—that is, some power from without, yet near to the thing moved. Not belonging to. Intrinsic is the correlative term.

Exult (Latin). To leap out. Thus we say, "I am ready to leap out of my skin;" to leap for joy.

Eye. Latin, oculus; Italian, occhio; Spanish, ojo; Russian, oko; Dutch, oog; Saxon, edge (where g is pronounced like y); French, œil.

The king's eyes. His chief officers. An Eastern expression.

One of the seven Who in God's presence, nearest to the throne stand ready at command, and are his eyes That run thro' all the heavens, and down to earth Bear his swift errands.—"Paradise Lost," iii.

Eye of the storm. An opening between the storm clouds. (See BULL'S EYE.)

One-eyed people. (See ARIMASPIANS, CYCLOPS.)

Eyes. Your eyes are bigger than your stomach. You fancied you could eat more, but found your appetite satisfied with less than you expected. A French phrase.

To rend the eyes with paint (Jer. iv. 30). The ladies of the East tinge the edge of their eye-lids with the powder of lead-ore. They dip into the powder a small wooden bodkin, which they draw "through the eye-lids over the ball of the eye." Jezebel is said "to have adjusted her eyes with kohol" (a powder of lead-ore), 2 Kings ix. 30. N.B.—The word "face," in our translation, should in both these cases be rendered "eyes."—Shaw, Travels.

Eyes to the blind. A staff. So called in allusion to the staff given to Tiresias by Athēna, to serve him for the eyes of which she had deprived him. (See TIRESIAS.)

Eye-sore. Something offensive to the sight. Sore is the Saxon sar (painful) or sæc (grievous). It is painful or grievous to the eye.

Mordecai was an eyesore to Haman.—D'Estrange.

Eye-teeth. The canine teeth are so called because their fangs extend upwards nearly to the orbits of the eyes.

To draw one's eye-teeth. To take the conceit out of a person; to fleece one without mercy; to make one suffer loss without seeing the manœuvre by which it was effected.

I guess these Yanks will get their eye-teeth drawn if they don't look sharp.

W. Hepworth Dixon, "New America," vol. i.

Ey'ra. The physician of the gods. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Eyre. Justices in Eyre. A corruption of "Justices in itin'erē." At first they made the circuit of the kingdom every seven years, but Magna Charta provided that it should be done annually.

Eyre (Jane). The heroine of Charlotte Brontë's novel so called. Jane Eyre is a governess, who stoutly copes with adverse circumstances, and ultimately wins the love of a man of fortune.

Ezour Vē'da or Atharvāna Vē'da. The last of the four sacred books of the Hindus. It regulates ceremonies, offerings, the forms of worship, and the plan of building and decorating the temples. The whole four books are called the vedas or vedams.

F

F. F is written on his face. "Rogue" is written on his face. The letter F used to be branded near the nose, on the left cheek of felons, on their being admitted to "benefit of clergy." The same was used for brawling in church. The custom was not abolished by law till 1822.

F Sharp. A flea. The pun is F, the initial letter, and sharp because the bite is acute. (See B FLATS.)

ff. A corrupt way of making a capital f in Old English, and used as low down as 1750; as *f*rance for France; *f*arrington for Farrington; &c.

F. E. R. T. The letters of the Sardinian motto.

Either Fortitu'do Ejus Rhodum Ten'uit, in allusion to the succour rendered to Rhodes by the house of Savoy, 1310;

Or, Fæd'erë Et Religio'në Tenëmur, on the golden doubloon of Victor Amadeus I.;

Or, Fortitu'do Ejus Rempublicam Tenet.

F. O. B. Free on board; meaning that the shipper, from the time of shipment, is free from all risk.

Fabian Tactics or Policy—i.e., delay. "Win like Fabius, by delay." The Roman general Fabius wearied out Hannibal by marches, counter-marches, ambuscades, and skirmishes, without ever coming to an open engagement.

Met by the Fabian tactics, which proved fatal to its predecessor.—The Times.

Fabila's Sad Fate. The king don Fabila was a man of very obstinate purpose and fond of the chase. One day he encountered a boar, and commanded those who rode with him to remain quiet and not interfere, but the boar overthrew him and killed him.—"Chronica Antiqua de España," p. 121.

Fabius. The American Fabius. Washington (1732-1799), whose military policy was similar to that of Fabius. He wearied out the English troops by harassing them, without coming to a pitched battle. Duguesclin pursued the same policy in France, by the advice of Charles V., whereby all the conquests of Edward and the Black Prince were retrieved.

Fabius of the French. Anne, duc de Montmorency, grand constable of France; so called from his success in almost annihilating the imperial army which had invaded Provence, by laying the country waste and prolonging the campaign. (1493-1567.)

Fables. The most famous writers of fables are—

Pilpay, among the Hindus.

Lokman, among the Arabs.

Æsop and Babrios, among the Greeks.

Phædrus and Ariæus, among the Romans.

Færnë, Abste'mius, and Casti, among the Italians. The last wrote "The Talking Animals."

La Fontaine and Florian, among the French.

John Gay and Edward Moore, among our own countrymen. The former is sometimes called "The English Æsop."

Lessing and Pfeffel, among the Germans.

Kryloff, among the Russians.

(See ÆSOP.)

Fabliaux. The metrical fables of the Trouvères, or early poets north of the Loire, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The word fable, in this case, is used very widely, for it includes not only such tales as "Reynard the Fox," but all sorts of familiar incidents of knavery and intrigue, all sorts of legends and family traditions. The fabliau of "Aucassin and Nicolette" is full of interesting incidents, and contains much true pathos and beautiful poetry.

Fabricius (Fa-brick'-ius). A Roman hero, representative of inflexible purity and honesty. The ancient writers love to tell of the frugal way in which he lived on his hereditary farm; how he refused the rich presents offered him by the Samnite ambassadors; and how at death he left no portion for his daughters, whom the senate provided for.

Fabricius, scorner of all-conquering gold.
Thomson, "Seasons" (Winter).

Face. To face it out. To persist in an assertion which is not true. To maintain without changing colour or hanging down the head.

A rebec face. (French, "visage de rebec".) An ugly, grotesque face, like that which used to be cut on the upper part of a rebec or three-stringed fiddle.

Dead is the noble Badigbee,
Who had a face like a rebec.
Rabelais, "Pantagruel," book ii. 4.

Face-card or Faced card. A court card, a card with a face on it.

Fach'iman. The Japanese god of war.

Facilë Princeps. By far the best.

But the facilë princeps of all gypsologists is Professor Pott, of Halle.—Chambers, "Cyclopædia."

Faction. The Romans divided the combatants in the circus into classes, called factions, each class being distinguished by its special colour, like the crews of a boat-race. The four original factions were the leek-green (pras'ina), the sea-blue (ven'eta), the white (alba), and the rose-red (ros'ea). Two other factions were added by Domitian, the colours being golden-yellow (aura'ta) and purple. As these combatants strove against each other, and entertained a strong esprit de corps, the word was easily applied to political partisans.

Factor. An agent; a substitute in mercantile affairs; a commission merchant. (Latin, facio, to do, whence the French facteur, one who does something for an employer.)

Asleep and naked, as an Indian lay,

An honest factor stole a gem away.

Pope, "Moral Essays," Ep. iii. 361.

Thomas Pitt, ancestor of the earl of Chatham, was appointed by queen Anne governor of Fort St. George, in the East Indies, and in 1702 purchased there, for £20,400, a diamond weighing 127 carats, which he sold to the king of France. This gem is still called the Pitt diamond. Pope insinuates that Pitt stole the diamond; but, although there were many ugly rumours, no definite charge was ever brought against the governor.

Factotum. One who can turn his hand to anything; or, rather, one who does for his employer all sorts of services. Sometimes called a Johan'nës Factotum. Our "Jack of All Trades" does not mean a factotum, but one who on his own account does odd jobs for any one who will pay him. (Latin, facere totum, to do all sorts of things.)

Fada. A fée or kobold of the south of France, sometimes called "Hada." These house-spirits, of which, strictly speaking, there are but three, bring good luck in their right hand and ill luck in their left.

Fadda. Mahomet's white mule.

Fadge (1 syl.). To suit or fit together, as, It won't fadge; we cannot fadge together; he does not fadge with me.

(Saxon, fægen, to fit together; Welsh, fag, the point of juncture.)

How will this fadge?

Shakespeare, "Twelfth Night," ii. 2.

Fa'dha (Al). Mahomet's silver cuirass, confiscated from the Jews on their expulsion from Medi'na.

Fad'ladeen'. The great Nazir' or chamberlain of Aurungz'e'b's harem, in "Lalla Rookh." The criticism of this self-conceited courtier upon the several tales which make up the romance are very racy and full of humour, and his crest-fallen conceit when he finds out that the poet was the prince in disguise is well conceived.

He was a judge of everything—from the pencilling of a Circassian's eyelids to the deepest questions of science and literature; from the mixture of a conserve of rose-leaves to the composition of an epic poem... all the cooks and poets of Delhi stood in awe of him.—T. Moore.

Faerie or Feerie. The land of the fays or faeries. The chief fay-realms are Av'alon, an island somewhere in the ocean; O'beron's dominions, situate "in wilderness among the holtis hairy;" and a realm somewhere in the middle of the earth, where was Pari Banon's palace.

For learned Colin (Spenser) lays his pipes to gage,
And is to Faëry gone a pilgrimage.

Drayton, "Eclogue," iii.

Faëry Queen. A metrical romance in six books, by Edmund Spenser (incomplete). It details the adventures of various knights, who impersonate different virtues, and belong to the court of Gloria'na, queen of faëry land.

The first book contains the legend of the Red Cross Knight (the spirit of Christianity), and is by far the best. The chief subject is the victory of Holiness over Error. It contains twelve cantos.

The second book is the legend of Sir Guyon (the golden mean), in twelve cantos.

The third book is the legend of Britomartis (love without lust), in twelve cantos. Britomartis is Diana, but Spenser uses the word equivocally for a Britoness.

The fourth book is the legend of Cambel and Tri'and' (fidelity), in twelve cantos.

The fifth book is the legend of Ar'tegal (justice), in twelve cantos.

The sixth book is the legend of Sir Cal'idore (courtesy), in twelve cantos.

There are parts of a seventh book—viz., cantos 6 and 7, and two stanzas of canto 3. The subject is Mutability.

The plan of the "Faëry Queen" is borrowed from the "Orlando Furioso," but the creative power of Spenser is more original and his imagery more striking than Ariosto's. Thomson says of him—

(He) like a copious river, poured his song
O'er all the mazes of enchanted ground.
"The Seasons," (Summer).

Fag. One who does, and perseveres in doing. In public schools, it means a little boy who waits upon a bigger one. (Saxon, fegan; Latin, facio; Scotch, faik.)

Fag. Servant of Captain Absolute, who apes his master in all things.—Sheridan, "The Rivals."

Even the mendacious Mr. Fag assures us, though he never scruples to tell a lie at his master's command, yet it hurts his conscience to be found out.—Sir Walter Scott.

Fa'gin. An infamous Jew, who teaches boys and girls to rob with dexterity.—Dickens, "Oliver Twist."

Fagot. A badge worn in mediæval times by those who had recanted their "heretical" opinions. It was designed to show what they merited, but had narrowly escaped.

Il y a fagots et fagots. There are divers sorts of fagots; every alike is not the same. The expression is in Molière's "Le Médecin malgré lui," where Sganarelle wants to show that his fagots are better than those of other persons: "Ay, but those fagots are not so good as my fagots." (Welsh, fag, that which unites; Saxon, fegan, to unite.)

Sentir les fagots. To be heretical; to smack of the fagots. In allusion to the custom of burning heretics by surrounding them with blazing fagots.

Fagots. Cakes made of the "insides" of pigs, with scraps of pork, sage and other herbs, fried together in grease, and eaten with potatoes. (Greek, phago, to eat.)

Fagot Votes. Votes given by electors expressly qualified for party purposes. Bailey says, "Ineffective persons, who receive no regular pay, but are hired to appear at muster and fill up the companies," are called fagots.

The object was to prevent the creation of fagot votes.—The Times.

Fah'fah. One of the rivers of paradise in Mahometan mythology.

Fa'ids. The second class of Druids.

Fa'ience (2 syl.). Majolica. So called from Faen'za, where it was once largely manufactured. It is termed majolica because the first specimens the Italians saw came from Majorca.

Fain'eant. Les Rois Fainéants (the cipher or puppet kings). Clovis II. and his ten successors, who were the puppet kings of the Palace Mayors. Louis V. (last of the Carolingian dynasty) received the same designation.

"My signet you shall command with all my heart, madam," said earl Philip.... "I am, you know, a complete Roy Fainéant, and never once interfered with my Maire de Palais in her proceedings.—Sir W. Scott, "Peveril of the Peak," ch. xv.

Faint. Faint heart ne'er won fair lady.

The bold a way will find or make.

King, "Orpheus and Eurydice."

Fair (The).

Charles IV., king of France, le Bel. (1294, 1322-1328.)

Philippe IV. of France, le Bel. (1268, 1285-1314.)

Fair as lady Done. A great Cheshire family that has long occupied a mansion at Utkinson. (Cheshire expression.)

Fair Maid of Anjou. Lady Edith Plantagenet, who married David, prince royal of Scotland.

Fair Maid of February. The snow-drop, which blossoms in February.

Fair Maid of Kent. Joan countess of Salisbury, wife of the Black Prince, and only daughter of Edmond Plantagenet, earl of Kent. She had been twice married ere she gave her hand to the prince.

Fair Maid of Norway. Margaret, daughter of Eric II. of Norway, and granddaughter of Alexander III. of Scotland. Being recognised by the states of Scotland as successor to the throne, she set out for her new kingdom, but died on her passage from sea-sickness. (1290.)

Fair Maid of Perth. Katie Glover, the most beautiful young woman of Perth. Heroine of Scott's novel of the same name.

Fair. (See GERALDINE, ROSAMOND.)

Too late for the fair. A day after the fair. Too late for the fun, the fair being over.

Fair fall you. Good befall you.

Fair City. Perth; so called from the beauty of its situation.

Fair'limb. The sister of Bitelas, and daughter of Rukenaw, the ape; in the tale of "Reynard the Fox."

Fairservice (Andrew). A shrewd Scotch gardener at Osbaldisstone Hall.—Sir Walter Scott, "Rob Roy."

Fair-star. The princess Fair-star, in love with prince Chery, whom she sets to obtain for her "the dancing water," "the singing apple," and "the green bird" (q.v.). This tale is borrowed from the fairy tales of Straparola the Milanese. (1550).—"Chery and Fair-star," by the Countess d'Aulnoy.

Fairies are the dispossessed spirits which once inhabited human bodies, but are not yet meet to dwell with the "saints in light."

All those airy shapes you now behold
Were human bodies once, and clothed with earthly mould;
Our souls, not yet prepared for upper light,
Till dooms-day wander in the shades of night.
Dryden, "The Flower and the Leaf."

Fairy of nursery mythology is the personification of Providence. The good ones are called fairies, elves, elle-folks, and fays; the evil ones are urchins, ouphes, ell-maids, and ell-women.

Fairies, black, grey, green, and white,
You moonshine revellers, and shades of night,
You ouphen-heirs of fixed destiny,
Attend your office.
Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," v. 5.

The dress of the fairies. They wear a red conical cap; a mantle of green cloth, inlaid with wild flowers; green pantaloons, buttoned with bobs of silk; and silver shoon. They carry quivers of adder-slough, and bows made of the ribs of a man buried where "three lairds' lands meet;" their arrows are made of bog-reed, tipped with white flints, and dipped in the dew of hemlock; they ride on steeds whose hoofs would not "dash the dew from the cup of a harebell."—Cromek.

Fairies small, two foot tall,
With caps red on their head,
Dance around on the ground.
Dodsley's Old Plays, "Faimus Tröës," i. 5.

Fairy of the Mine. A malevolent being supposed to live in mines, busying itself with cutting ore, turning the windlass, &c., and yet effecting nothing. (See GNOME.)

No goblin, or swart fairy of the mine,
Hath hurtful power o'er true virginity.
Milton, "Comus."

Fairy-darts. Flint arrow-heads, now called celts; supposed at one time to have been darted by fairies in their mischievous pranks.

Fairy-hillocks. Little knolls of grass, like mole-hills, said in the "good old times" to be the homes of fairies.

Fairy-ladies or Mayë, such as Urganda, the guardian of Amadi'gi; the fair Oria'na; Silva'na, the guardian of Alido'ro; Luci'na, the protectress of Alido'ro and his lady-love, the maiden-warrior, Mirinda; Eufros'ina, the sister of Luci'na; Argea, the protectress of Floridantë; and Filide'a, sister of Ardea; all in Tasso's "Amadi'gi."

Fairy-loaves or Fairy-stones. Fossil sea-urchins (echi'ni), said to be made by the fairies.

Fairy-money. Found money. Said to be placed where it was picked up by some good fairy.

Fairy-rings. Circles of rank or withered grass, often seen in lawns, meadows, and grass-plots. Said to be produced by the fairies dancing on the spot. In sober truth, these fairies are simply an agaric or fungus below the surface, which has seeded in a circular range, as many plants do. Where the ring is brown and almost bare, the "spawn" is of a greyish-white colour. The grass dies because the spawn envelops the roots so as to prevent their absorbing moisture; but where the grass is rank, the "spawn" is dead.

You demi-puppets, that
By moonshine do the green-sour ringlets make,
Whereof the ewe not bites.
Shakespeare, "Tempest," v. 1.

Fairy Sparks. The phosphoric light from decaying wood, fish, and other substances. Thought at one time to be lights prepared for the fairies at their revels.

Fait Accompli (French). A scheme which has been already carried out with success.

The subjection of the South is as much a fait accompli as the declaration of independence itself.—The Times.

Faith. Defender of the Faith. (See DEFENDER.)

Faithful, in Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," is seized at Vanity Fair, burnt to death, and taken to heaven in a chariot of fire. A Puritan used to be called Brother Faithful, and it was this, no doubt, that suggested the name.

Jacob Faithful. The hero of Captain Marryatt's novel so called.

Father of the Faithful. Abraham (Rom. iv.; Gal. iii. 6—9).

Fakâr (Dhu'l). The scimitar of Mahomet, which fell to his share when the spoil was divided after the battle of Bekr. This term means "The Trenchant."

Fake (1 syl.). Fake away. Cut away, make off (Latin, fac, do, make). It also means to do—i.e., to cheat or swindle.

Fuke. A single fold of a coiled cable. (Scotch, fuik, a fold; Swedish, vika, to involve; Saxon, fegan, to unite.)

Fakenham Ghost. A ballad by Robert Bloomfield, author of "The Farmer's Boy." The ghost was a donkey.

Fakir' (Indian). A poor man, a mendicant, a religious beggar.

Falcon and Falconet. Pieces of light artillery, the names of which are borrowed from hawks. (See SAKER.)

Falcon Peregrine or Pelerin. La seconde lignie est faucens que hom apele "pelerins," par ce que nus ne trouve son ni; ains est pris autresi come en pelerinage, et est mult legiers a norrir, et mult cortois, et vaillans, et de bone maniere.—Tresor de Brunst Latin "Des Faucons."

A faukoun peregryn than semed sche
Of fremde (foreign) land.
Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales," 10,742.

Fald-stool. A small desk at which the Litany is sung or said. The place at the south side of the altar at which sovereigns kneel at their coronation. (Barb. Latin, fulda, a thing which folds or shuts up.)

Faldistory. The episcopal seat in a chancel, which used to fold or lift up.

Falernian, the second best wine in Italy, was so called by the ancient Romans, because it was made of grapes from Falernum. There were three sorts—the rough, the sweet, and the dry.

Falkland. In Godwin's novel called "Caleb Williams." He commits murder, and keeps a narrative of the transaction in an iron chest. Williams, a lad in his employ, opens the chest, and is caught in the act by Falkland. The lad runs away, but is hunted down. This tale, dramatised by Colman, is entitled "The Iron Chest."

Fal-lals. Nick-nacks; ornaments of small value. (Greek, phalara, metal ornaments for horses, &c.)

Fall. In the fall. In the autumn, at the fall of the leaf. (An Americanism.)

To try a fall. To wrestle, when each tries to "fall" or throw the other.

I am given sir, to understand that your younger brother, Orlando, hath a disposition to come in disguised against me to try a fall.—"As You Like It," i. 1.

Fall Foul. To fall foul of one is to make an assault on some one. A sea term. A rope is said to be foul when it is entangled; and one ship falls foul of another when it runs against her and prevents her free progress. Hence to run up against, to assault.

Fall-in. To concur with. To fall out, to disagree with. To "fall in with my desire" is to come or fall into the lot of my desire. To "fall out with one" is to drop out of one's lot, and therefore to be no longer united.

Falling Bands. Neck-bands which fall on the shoulders, common in the seventeenth century.

Falling Sickness. Epilepsy, in which the patient falls suddenly to the ground.

Brutus.—He (i.e., Cæsar) hath the falling-sickness. Cassius.—No, Cæsar hath it not; but you, and I, And honest Casca, we have the falling-sickness. Shakespeare, "Julius Cæsar," i. 2.

Falling Stars are said by Mahometans to be firebrands flung by good angels against evil spirits when they approach too near the gates of heaven.

Fallow Land. Land ploughed, but not sown; so called from its brown or tawny colour. (German, fahl, tawny; Saxon, falewe, pale-red; hence fallow deer, red deer.)

False Ceiling. The space between the garret ceiling and the roof.

Fal'staff. A fat, sensual, boastful, and mendacious knight, full of wit and humour; he was the boon companion of Henry prince of Wales.—"1, 2 Henry IV.," and "Merry Wives of Windsor."

Famil'iar. A cat, dog, raven, or other dumb creature, petted by a "witch," and supposed to be her demon in disguise. (See below.)

Famil'iar Spirits. Spirit slaves. From the Latin, fam'ulus (an attendant). Away with him; he has a familiar under his tongue. Shakespeare, "2 Henry VI." iv. 7.

Fam'ilists. Members of the "Family of Love," a fanatical sect founded by David George, of Delft, in 1556. They maintained that all men are of one family, and should love each other as brothers and sisters. Their system is called Familism.

Fan. I could brain him with his lady's fan ("1 Henry IV.," ii. 3)—i.e., knock his brains out with a fan handle. The ancient fans had long handles, so that ladies used their fans for walking-sticks, and it was by no means unusual for testy dames to chastise unruly children by beating them with their fan-sticks.

Wert not better

Your head were broken with the handle of a fan?
Beaumont and Fletcher, "Wit at Several Weapons," v.

Fanatic. Those transported with religious or temple madness. Among the Romans there were certain persons who attended the temples and fell into strange fits, in which they pretended to see spectres, and uttered what were termed predictions. (Latin, fūnum, a temple.)

Fancy. Love—i.e., the passion of the fantasy or imagination. Fancy-free means not in love; a fancy-man is a man (not your husband) whom you fancy or select for chaperon.

Tell me where's fancy bred,
Or in the heart or in the head.
Shakespeare, "Merchant of Venice," iii. 2

The fancy. Pugilists. So called because boxing is the chief of sports, and fancy means sports, pets, or fancies. Hence "dog-fancies," "pigeon-fancies," &c.

Fane (1 syl.). A weather fane is a machine to show which way the wind blows, from which the weather may be pretty accurately prejudged. (Greek, phaino, to show.)

Fane'sii. A Scandinavian tribe far north, whose ears were so long that they would cover their whole body.—Pliny.

Fanfar'on. A swaggering bully; a cowardly boaster who blows his own trumpet. Sir Walter Scott uses the word for finery, especially for the gold chains worn by military men, common in Spain amongst the conquerors of the New World. (Spanish, fanfarr'on, a bully; French, fanfare, a flourish of trumpets, or short piece of military music performed by brass instruments and kettle-drums.)

"Marry, hang thee, with thy fanfarons about thy neck!" said the falconer.—Scott, "The Abbot," cxvii.

Fanfar'onade (4 syl.). A swaggering; vain boasting; ostentatious display. (See above.)

The bishop copied this proceeding from the fanfaronade of M. Boufflers.—Swift.

Fang. A sheriff's officer in Shakespeare's "2 Henry IV."

Fang'led. A new-fangled notion is one just started or entertained. (Saxon, fengan, to begin.)

Fangs. I fell into his fangs. Into his power, his clutches. (Anglo-Saxon, fungen, to catch.)

Fanny Fern. A nom de plume of Mrs. Sarah Payson Parton, sister of Mr. N. P. Willis, the American poet. (Born 1811.)

Fanti'gue (2 syl.). A function; a fussy anxiety; that restless, nervous commotion which persons have who are phantom-struck.

Fantocci'ni (fanto-ché'ny). A dramatic performance by puppets. (Italian, fantoccio, a puppet.)

Fantom-corn. Unproductive corn; corn bewitched by ghosts or phantoms. (French, fantome, a ghost.)

Fantom-fellow. A person who is light-headed, and under the ban of some hobgoblin. (See above.)

Fantom-flesh. Flesh that hangs loose and flabby—supposed to be under the evil influence of some spectre. (See above.)

Farce (1 syl.). Stuffing. Dramatic pieces of no solid worth, but stuffed full of ludicrous incidents and expressions. They bear the same analogy to the regular drama as force-meat does to a solid joint.

Farceur (The). Angelo Beolco, surnamed Russantè, the Italian farce-writer. (1502-1542.)

Farfarel'lo. A devil, in Dantè's "Inferno."

Fari'na. Ejusdem farinae. Other rubbish of the same sort. Literally, "Other loaves of the same batch." Our more usual expressions are, "Others of the same kidney," "others of the same feather," "others tarred with the same brush."

Far'ina'ta or Farinata Degli Uberti. A nobleman of Florence, chief of the Ghibelline faction, placed by Dantè, in his "Inferno," in a red-hot coffin, the lid of which is suspended over him till the day of judgment. He is represented as faithless and an epicure. (Thirteenth century.)

Farleu or Farley. A duty of 6d. paid to the lord of the manor of West Slapton, in Devonshire.—Bailey.

Farm means food. So called because anciently the tenant was required to provide the landlord with food by way of rent. (Saxon, farma.)

To farm taxes is the French affermer (to let or lease), from ferme, a letting for the supply of food.

Farmer George. George III. So called from his farmer-like manners, taste, dress, and amusements. (1738-1820.)

Farnese Bull (Far-na'-ze). A name given to a colossal group attributed to Apollonius and Tauriscus of Tralles, in Asia Minor. They belonged to the Rhodian school, and lived about B.C. 300. The group represents Dircæ bound to the horns of a bull by Zethus and Amphion, for ill-using her mother. It was restored by Bian'chi in 1546, and placed in the Farnesè palace, in Italy.

Farnese Hercules (Far-na'-ze Her-cu-lees). A name given to Glykon's copy of the famous statue of Lysippos, the Greek sculptor in the time of Alexander the Great. It represents the hero leaning on his club, with one hand on his back, as if he had just got possession of the apple of the Hesperides. Farnesè is the name of a celebrated family in Italy, which became extinct in 1731.

It struck me that an iron-clad is to a wooden vessel what the Farnese Hercules is to the Apollo Elvidere. The Hercules is not without a beauty of its own.—The Times (Paris correspondent).

Farra'go. A furrago of nonsense. A confused heap of nonsense. Farrago is properly a mixture of far (meal) with other ingredients for the use of cattle.

Farringdon Ward (London). The aldermanry, &c., granted by John le Feure to William Farendon, citizen and goldsmith of London, in consideration of twenty marks given beforehand as a gersum to the said John le Feure. (1279).

Far'thing. A fourth part. Penny pieces used to be divided into four parts, thus, ♂. One of these quarters was a fourthing or farthing, and two a halfpenny. (Saxon, feorthing.)

I don't care for it a brass farthing. James II. debased all the coinage, and issued, amongst other worthless coins, brass pence, halfpence, and farthings.

Farthingale (3 syl.). A sort of crinoline petticoat. The word means a "guard for modesty." (French, vertugarde, corrupted into verdingade, and then into farthingale.)

Faryndon Inn. Serjeants' Inn, Chancery Lane, used to be so called.

Fascina'tion means "slain or overcome by the eyes." The allusion is to the ancient notion of bewitching by the power of the eye. (Greek, phæsi kaino; Latin, fus'cino.) (See EVIL EYE.)

None of the affections have been noted to fascinate and bewitch, but love and envy.—Bacon.

Fast. A fast man is one who lives a continual round of "pleasure" so fast that he wears himself out. A fast young lady is one who talks slang, assumes the airs of a knowing one, and has no respect for female delicacy and retirement. She is the ape of the fast young man.

To play fast and loose. To run with the hare and hold with the hounds; to blow both hot and cold; to say one thing and do another. The allusion is to a cheating game practised at fairs. A belt is folded, and the player is asked to prick it with a skewer, so as to pin it fast to the table; having so done, the adversary takes the two ends, and looses it or draws it away, showing that it has not been pierced at all.

He forced his neck into a noose,
To show his play at fast and loose;
And when he chanced t'escape, mistook,
For art and subtlety, his luck.

Budler, "Hudibras," iii. 2.

Fasti. Working days. The "dies non" or holy days were called by the Romans ne-fasti. (Latin, fas, sacred law; fasti, the days when the law courts were open.)

Fastra'de (2 syl.). Daughter of the Saxon count Rodolph and Luitgarde the German. One of the nine wives of Charlemagne.

Those same soft bells at eventide
Ring in the ears of Charlemague,
As, seated by Fastra'dn's side
At Ingelheim, in all his pride,

He heard their sound with secret pain,
Longfellow, "Golden Legend," vi.

Fat. All the fat is in the fire. The allusion is to the process of frying. If the grease is spilt into the fire, the coals smoke and blaze, so as to spoil the food. The proverb signifies that something has been let out inadvertently which will cause a terrible blaze of wrath and sputter of dissatisfaction.

The Fat:—

Alfonzo II. of Portugal. (1212-1223.)

Charles II. of France, le Gros. (832-888.)

Louis VI. of France, le Gros. (1078, 1108-1137.)

Fat Men.

Edward Bright, of Essex, weighed 44 stone or 616 pounds at death. He was 5 feet 9 inches high, 5 feet round the chest, and 6 feet 11 inches round the paunch. He died 1750, aged thirty.

Daniel Lambert, born at St. Margaret's, Leicester, weighed 739 pounds. He was 3 yards 4 inches round the waist, and 1 yard 1 inch round the leg. (1770-1809.)

Fata. Women introduced in medieval romance not unlike witches, and under the sway of Demogorgon. In "Orlando Innamorato" we meet with the "Fata Morgana"; in "Bojardo" with the "Fata Silvanella"; "Le Fatö Nera and Bianca," the protectresses of Guido'nö and Aquilantö; the "Fata della Fonti," from whom Mandricardo obtains the arms of Hector; and "Alci'na," sister of Morga'na, who carries off Astolfo. In Tasso we have the three daughters of Morga'na, whose names are Morganetta, Nivetta, and Carvilia; we have also Dragont'na, Monta'na, Argea, (called "La reina della Fatö," protectress of Floridantö), Filidea (sister of Argea), and several others. In the "Ado'nö" of Mari'ni, we have the Fata named "Falsire'na."

Fa'ta Morga'na. A sort of mirage occasionally seen in the Straits of Messi'na. Fata is Italian for a "fairy," and the fairy Morga'na was the sister of Arthur and pupil of Merlin. She lived at the bottom of a lake, and dispensed her treasures to whom she liked. She is first introduced in the "Orlando Innamorato" as "Lady Fortune," but subsequently assumes her witch-like attributes. In Dantö her three daughters are introduced.

Fa'tes (1 syl.). The cruel fates. The Greeks and Romans supposed there were three Parce or Fates, who arbitrarily controlled the birth, events, and death of every man. They are called cruel because they pay no regard to the wishes and requirements of any one.

Fa'ther. A friar in priest's orders. (See BROTHER.)

A father suckled by his daughter. Euphrasia, the Grecian daughter, so preserved the life of Evan'der, her aged father.

Xantip'pö so preserved the life of her father Cimo'nos in prison. The guard marvelling the old man held out so long, set a watch and discovered the fact. Byron alludes to these stories in his "Childe Harold."

There is a dugeon, in whose dim, drear light
What do I gaze on?

An old man, and a female young and fair,

Fresh as a nursing mother, in whose vein

The blood is nectar.

Here youth offers to old age the food,

The milk of his own gift. . . . It is her sire

To whom she renders back the debt of blood. . . .
Drink, drink and live, old man; heaven's realm holds no such tide.

Byron, "Childe Harold," iv. st. 143.

Without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life—i.e., Melchisedec (Heb. vii. 3). He was not the son of a priest, either on his father's or mother's side; his pedigree could not be traced in the priestly line, like that of the ordinary high priests, which can be traced to Aaron; nor did he serve in courses like the Levites, who begin and end their official duties at stated times.

He fathers it on me. He imputes it to me; he says it is my bantling.

Father Neptune. The ocean.

Father Norbert. Pierre Parisot, the French missionary. (1697-1769.)

Father Paul. Pie'tro Sarpi, father of the order of Servitö in Venice, who changed his Christian name when he assumed the religious habit. (1552-1623.)

Father Prout. Francis Mahoney, a humorous writer in Fraser's Magazine and the Globe newspaper. (1805-1866.)

Father Thames or Old Father Thames. The Thames, so far as it belongs to London.

Say, Father Thames, for thou hast seen
Full many a sprightly race

Disporting on thy margin green

The patus of pleasure trace.

Gray, "Distant Prospect of Eton College."

The epithet is not uncommonly applied to other great rivers, especially those on which cities are built. The river is the father of the city, or the reason why the site was selected by the first settlers there.

O Tiber, father Tiber,
To whom the Romans pray.
Macaulay, "Lay of Horatius."

The Indian name "Mississippi" means "father of waters."

Father Thoughtful. Nicholas Catinat, a marshal of France. So called by his soldiers for his cautious and thoughtful policy. (1637-1712.)

Father of his Country.

Cicero was so entitled by the Roman senate. They offered the same title to Mærius, but he refused to accept it.

Several of the Cæsars were so called—Julius, after quelling the insurrection of Spain; Augustus, &c.

Cosmo de' Medici. (1389-1464.)

G. Washington, the defender and paternal counsellor of the American States. (1732-1799.)

Andrea Dórea (1468-1560). Inscribed on the base of his statue by his countrymen of Gen'oa.

Andronicus Paleologus II. assumed the title. (1260-1332.)

(See also 1 Chron. iv. 14.)

Father of the People.

Louis XII. of France. (1462, 1498-1515.) Henri IV. was also termed "the father and friend of the people." (1553, 1589-1610.)

Christian III. of Denmark. (1502, 1534-1559.) (See FATHER.)

Gabriel du Pineau, the French lawyer. (1573-1644.)

Fathers of the Church. The early advocates of Christianity, who may be thus classified:—

(1) Five apostolic fathers, who were contemporary with the apostles—viz., Clement of Rome, Barnabas, Hermas, Ignatius, and Polycarp.

(2) The primitive fathers. Those advocates of Christianity who lived in the first three centuries. They consisted of the five apostolic fathers (q.v.), together with the nine following:—Justin, Theophilus of Antioch, Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Cyprian of Carthage, Origen, Gregory Thaumaturgus, Dionysius of Alexandria, and Tertullian.

(3) The fathers, or those of the fourth and fifth century, who were of two groups, those of the Greek and those of the Latin Church. (See below.)

Fathers of the Greek Church. Eusebius, Athanasius, Basil the Great, Gregory Nazianzenus, Gregory of Nyssa, Cyril of Jerusalem, Chrysostom, Epiphanius, Cyril of Alexandria, and Ephraim deacon of Edessa.

Fathers of the Latin Church. Lactantius, Hilary, Ambrose of Milan, Jerome, Augustin of Hippo, and St. Bernard.

The last of the fathers. St. Bernard (1091-1153). The schoolmen who followed treated their subjects systematically.

Founder of the fathers of Christian doctrine. Cæsar de Bus. (1544-1607.)

Fath'om (Count). A villain in Smollet's novel so called. After robbing his benefactors and fleecing all who trusted him, he died in misery and despair.

Fat'ima. The last of Bluebeard's wives, who was saved from death by the timely arrival of her brother with a party of friends. Mahomet's daughter was called Fatima.

Fat'ua Mul'ier. A law term for a courtesan. Fatuus with jurisconsults means one not in a right mind, incorrigibly foolish.

Faul and Zab'ulus. Two evil spirits much dreaded by the Saxons

Fault. At fault. Not on the right track; doubtful whether right or wrong. Hounds are at fault when the scent is broken because the fox has jumped upon a wall, crossed a river, cut through a flock of sheep, or doubled like a hare.

Fau'na (2 syl.). The animals of a country at any given geological period. So called from the mythological faunus, who were the patrons of wild animals.

Nor less the place of curious plant he knows—
He both his Flora and his Fauna shows
Crabbe, "Borough."

Faust (1 syl.). The grandest of all Goethe's dramas. Faust makes a compact with Mephistophélus, who on one occasion provides him with a cloak, by means of which he is wafted through the air whithersoever he chooses. "All that is weird, mysterious, and magical, groups round this story." Gounod has an opera based on it. An English dramatic version has been made by Bayle Bernard.

Faux-jour (French). A false or contrary light; meaning that a picture is hung so that the light falls on it in the opposite direction to what it ought. The artist has made his light fall in one direction, but it is so hung that the light falls the other way.

Faux Pas. A "false step;" a breach of manners or moral conduct. (English-French.)

Favo'nius. The zephyr or west wind. It means the wind favourable to vegetation.

Favori'ta (La). Donizetti's opera. (See LEONORA DI GUZMAN.)

Fa'vours. Ribbons made into a bow; so called from being the favours bestowed by ladies on the successful champions of tournaments. (See TRUE-LOVE KNOT.)

Here, Fluellen; wear thou this favour for me, and stick it in thy cap.—Shakespeare, "Henry V." iv. 7.

Favourite. One to whom a lady gives a "favour" or token. (See above.)

Faye (1 syl.) The way to Faye. (French, "Faic-la-vinense.") A winding or zigzag manner, like "Crooked Lane at Easteheap." A person who tries to do something indirectly, goes by the pathway to Faye. Faye is a little village in France, built on an eminence so steep that there is no getting to it except by a winding or very zigzag pathway.

They go to Paradise as the way is to Faye.
Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel," bk. i. 27.

Fazio. A native of Florence, who first tried to make his fortune by alchemy; but being present when Bartoldo, an old miser, died, he buried the body secretly, and stole his money-bags. Being now rich, he became acquainted with the marchioness Aldabella, with whom he passed his time in licentious pleasure. His wife Bianca, out of jealousy, accused him to the duke of being privy to the death of Bartoldo; and Fazio was condemned to death for murder. Bianca now tried to undo the mischief she had done, but it was too late: she went mad with grief, and died of a broken heart.—Dean Milman, "Fazio."

Fear Fortress. An hypothetical castle in a forest near Saragossa. It represents that terrible obstacle which fear conjures up, but which vanishes into thin air as it is approached by a stout heart and clear conscience. The allegory forms the third part of the legend of "Croquemitaine."

If a child disappeared, or any cattle were carried off, the trembling peasants said, "The lord of Fear-fortress has taken them." If a fire broke out anywhere, it was the lord of Fear-fortress who must have lit it. The origin of all accidents, mishaps, and disasters was traced to the mysterious owner of this invisible castle.—"Croquemitaine," iii. 1.

It sunk before my earnest face,
It vanished quite away,
And left no shadow on the place,
Between me and the day.
Such castles rise to strike us dumb;
But, weak in every part,
They melt before the strong man's eyes
And fly the true of heart.
C. Mackay, "The Giant" (slightly altered).

Fearless (Sans peur). Jean, duke of Burgundy. (1371-1419.)

Feasts. Anniversary days of joy. They are either immovable or movable. The chief immovable feasts are the four rent-days—viz., the Annunciation, or Lady-Day (March 25), the Nativity of John the Baptist (June 24), Michaelmas Day (September 29), St. Thomas's Day, which is the shortest (Dec. 21), and the great church festivals—viz., Christmas Day (Dec. 25), the Circumcision (Jan. 1), Epiphany (Jan. 6), Candlemas Day (Feb. 2), Lady-Day (as above), All-Saints (Nov. 1), All Souls (Nov. 2), and the several Apostles' days.

The movable feasts depend upon Easter: they are Palm Sunday, Good Friday, Ash-Wednesday, Sexagesima Sunday, Ascension Day, Pentecost, Trinity Sunday, and so on.

Feather. Meaning species or kind. From the proverb, "Birds of a feather"—i.e., of the same plumage, and therefore of the same sort.

I am not of that feather to shake off
My friend, when he must need me.
Shakespeare, "Timon of Athens," i. 1.

Feather. A light, volatile person.

A wit's a feather, and a chief's a rod;
An honest man's the noblest work of God.
Pope, "Essay on Man."

In full feather. Flush of money. In allusion to birds not on the moult.

He has feathered his nest well. He has plenty of money; has married a rich woman. The allusion is to birds, which line their nests with feathers to make them soft and warm.

That's a feather in your cap. An honour to you. The allusion is to the very general custom in Asia and among the American Indians of adding a new feather to their head-gear for every enemy slain. The Cautirs of Cabul stick a feather in their turban for every Musulman slain by them. The Incas and Caciques, the Meunitarris and Mandans (of America), the Abyssinians and Turcomans, &c. &c., follow the same custom. So did the ancient Lycians, and many others. In Scotland and Wales it is still customary for the sportsman who kills the first woodcock to pluck out a feather and stick it in his cap. In fact, the custom, in one form or another, seems to be almost universal.

To feather an oar is to turn the blade parallel with the surface of the water as the oar is drawn home. (The Greek pteron means both "an oar" and "a feather;" and the verb pteroō, to "furnish with oars" or "with feathers.") Probably the movement of a bird's wings in flying suggested the word.

He feathered his oars with such skill and dexterity
Jolly Young Waterman.

Cut a feather. A ship going fast is said to cut a feather, in allusion to the ripple which she throws off from her bows. Metaphorically, "to cut a dash."

Jack could never cut a feather.
Sir W. Scott, "The Pirates," xxxiv.

Feathers (The). A public-house sign in compliment to Henry VI., whose cognizance it was.

Fine feathers make fine birds. (Latin, "Vestis virum facit," dress makes the man.)

The Prince of Wales' feathers. The tradition is, that the Black Prince, having slain John of Luxemburg, king of Bohemia, in the battle of Cressy, assumed his crest and motto. The crest consisted of three ostrich feathers, and the motto was, "Ich dien" (I serve). John of Arden discovered a contemporary MS. in which it is expressly said that this was the case; but much controversy has arisen on the question. Dr. Bell affirms that the crest is a rebus of queen Philippa's hereditary title—viz., countess of Ostre-vant (ostrich-feather). Randall Holmes claims an old British origin; and the Rev. H. Longueville asserts that the arms of Roderick Mawe, prior to the division of Wales into principalities, was thus blazoned:—"Argent, three lions passant regardant, with their tails passing between their legs and curling over their backs in a feathery form."

Feather-stone. A federal stone, or stone table at which the ancient courts baron were held in the open air, and at which covenants were made. (Latin, foedus, a treaty.)

Feature means the "make." Spenser speaks of God's "secret understanding of our feature"—i.e., make or structure. It now means that part which is most conspicuous or important. Thus we speak of the chief feature of a painting, a garden, a book, &c. &c. (Norman, faiture; Latin, factura.)

February. The month of purification amongst the ancient Romans. (Latin, februus, to purify by sacrifice.)

The 2nd of February (Candlemas Day). It is said if the weather is fine and frosty at the close of January and beginning of February, we may look for more winter to come than we have seen up to that time.

Si sol splendescat Mari'a Purificante,
Major erit glaciēs post festum quam iuit ante.
Sir T. Browne, "Vulgar Errors."

If Candlemas Day be dry and fair,
The half o' winter's come aod mair;
If Candlemas Day be wet and foul,
The half o' wiater was gane at Youl.
Scotch Proverb.

The badger peeps out of his hole on Candlemas Day, and if he finds snow, walks abroad; but if he sees the sun shining, he draws back into his hole.—German Proverb.

Fec'it (Latin, he did it). A word inscribed after the name of an artist, sculptor, &c., as David fecit, Goujon fecit—i.e., David painted it, Goujon sculptured it, &c.

Fec'ula means sediment. Starch is a fec'ula, being the sediment of flour steeped in water. (Latin, jacces, dregs.)

Fed'eral States. In the late American war the Unionists were so called—i.e., those northern states who combined to resist the eleven southern or Confederate states (q.v.).

Fee-farm-rent is where an estate is granted, subject to a rent in fee of at least one-fourth its value. It is rent paid on lands let to farm, and not let in recompense of service at a greatly reduced value.

Feeble. Most forcible feeble. A writer whose language is very "loud," but whose ideas are very jejune. Feeble is a "woman's tailor," brought to Sir John Falstaff as a recruit. He tells Sir John

"he will do his good will," and the knight replies, "Well said, courageous Feeble! Thou wilt be as valiant as the wrathful dove, or most magnanimous mouse . . . most forcible Feeble."—Shakespeare, "2 Henry IV.," iii. 2.

Feed of Corn. A quartern of oats, the quantity given to a horse on a journey when the ostler is told to give him a feed.

Fehm-gericht or Vehmgericht (3 syl.). The secret tribunals of Westphalia, for the preservation of public peace, suppression of crime, and maintenance of the "Catholic" religion. The judges were enveloped in profound mystery; they had their secret spies through all Germany; their judgments were certain, but no one could discover the executioner. These tribunals rose in the twelfth century and disappeared in the sixteenth. Sir Walter Scott, in "Anne of Geierstein," has given an account of the Westphalian Fehmgericht. (Old German, fekmen, to condemn; Gericht, a tribunal.)

This Vigilance Committee (of Denver city) is a modern reproduction of the famous Vehmgericht.—The Times.

Felician (Father). The priest and schoolmaster of Grand Pré, who accompanied Evangeline in her wanderings to find Gabriel, her affianced husband.—Longfellow, "Evangeline."

Felixmarte (4 syl.). The hero of a Spanish romance of chivalry by Melchior de Orteza, Caballero de Ubeda (1566). The curate in "Don Quixote" condemned this work to the flames.

Fellow Commoner. A wealthy or married undergraduate of Cambridge, who pays extra to "common" (i.e., dine) at the fellows' table. In Oxford, these demi-dons are termed Gentlemen Commoners.

Fellow Commoner or Gentleman Commoner. An empty bottle. So called because these sort of students are, as a class, empty-headed.

Felo de Se. One who commits felony on himself. Murder is felony, and if a man murders himself he is a felon of his own life.

Feme-covert. A married woman, who is under covert of her husband, and cannot, therefore, sue or be sued for debt. (French, femme, a woman.)

Feme-sole. A single woman. Feme-sole merchant. A woman who carries on a trade on her own account.

Fem'nyne (3 syl.). A mediæval name for the kingdom of the Amazons. Gower terms Penthesilea "queen of Feminee."

He (Theseus) conquered at the regne of Fem'nyne.
Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales," 893.

Fen-Nightingale. A frog, which sings at night in the fens, as nightingales sing in the groves.

Fenchurch Street (London). The church in the fens or marshy ground by the "Langbourne" side.

Fenella. A pretended deaf and dumb sylph-like attendant on the countess of Derby, in Scott's "Peveril of the Peak."

Fenians. An anti-British association of disaffected Irishmen, incorporated in the United States in 1865, and having for its object the separation of Ireland from England. They gave out that they intended to form Ireland into a republic. The word Fenian means a hunter—Gaelic, fianna, from feadhach (pronounced fee-agh), a hunt. Before the Germanic invasion, a Celtic race so called occupied not only parts of Ireland and Scotland, but also the north of Germany and the Scandinavian shores. Oisín (Ossian) refers to them, and one passage is thus rendered in "The Antiquary": "Do you compare your psalms to the tales of the bare-armed Fenians?" Oisín was the grandson of Fionn, the "fair-haired righ (chief) of the Fenians," and all the high officers of this volunteer association were men of rank. It appears that the Fenians of Ireland (Eirín), Scotland (Alba), England (Lochlín), and Scandinavia, had a great civil battle at Gabhra, in Ireland, and extirpated each other. Oisín alone escaped, and he had slain "twice fifty men with his own hand." In the rebellion of 1865, &c., the leaders were termed "head centres," and their subordinates, "centres."

Fen'rír. The demon wolf, brother of Hel (q.v.). It was cast by the gods into Nifheim.

Fenton. One who seeks to mend his fortune by a matrimonial alliance. Fenton is the suitor of Anne Page, and he tells the lady that her father objected to his suit, saying—

I am too great of birth;
And that, my state being gall'd with my expense,
I seek to heal it only by his wealth.
Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," iii. 4.

Fer'amorz. The young Cashmere poet, who relates poetical tales to Lalla Rookh, in her journey from Delhi to Lesser Buchar'ia. Lalla Rookh is going to be married to the young sultan, but falls in love with the poet. On the wedding morn she is led to her future husband, and finds that the poet is the sultan himself, who had gallantly taken this course to win the heart of his bride and beguile her journey.—T. Moore.

F'er'dinand. Son of the king of Naples, and suitor of Miranda, daughter of Prospero, the banished duke of Milan.—Shakespeare, "Tempest."

In "Love's Labour's Lost," the same name is given to the king of Navarre.

Ferdinan'do. A brave soldier who obtained a complete victory over the king of Morocco and Grenada, near Tarifa, in 1340. Being in love with Leonora de Guzman, Alfonso XI., whose life he had saved in the battle, created him count of Zamora and marquis of Montreal, and gave him the hand of Leonora in marriage. No sooner was this done, than Ferdinando discovered that Leonora was the king's mistress; so he restored his ranks and honours to the king, repudiated his bride, and retired to the monastery of St. James of Compostella. Leonora entered the same monastery as a novice, obtained the forgiveness of Ferdinando, and died.—Donizetti's opera of "La Favorita."

Ferdo'si. A Persian poet, famous for the copious flow of his diction. He wrote in verse the "Shah-Nâmeh," or history of the Persian kings, which took him thirty years, and contains 120,000 verses.

Fern. (See FANNY.)

Fern-seed. We have the receipt of fern-seed, we walk invisible ("1 Henry IV.," act iv. 4). The seed of certain species of fern is so small as to be invisible to the naked eye, and hence the plant was believed to confer invisibility on those who carried it about their person. It was at one time believed that plants have the power of imparting their own speciality to their wearer. Thus the herb-dragon was said to cure the poison of serpents; the yellow celandine the jaundice; wood-sorrel, which has a heart-shaped leaf, to cheer the heart; liver-wort to be good for the liver, and so on.

Why, did you think that you had Gyges' ring,
Or the herb that gives invisibility?
Beaumont and Fletcher, "Fair Maid of the Inn," i. 1.

The seeds of fern, which, by prolific heat
Cheer'd and unfolded, form a plant so great,
Are less a thousand times than what the eye
Can unassisted by the tube descry.
Blackmore, "Creation," iv.

Fernando Florestan. A state prisoner of Seville, married to Leonora, who, in man's disguise, and under the name of Fide'lio, became the servant of Rocco, the jailor. Pizarro, governor of the prison, conceived a hatred to Fernando, and resolved to murder him. Rocco and Leonora were sent to dig his grave, and when Pizarro entered the dungeon, Leonora intercepted his purpose. At this juncture the minister of State arrived, and commanded the prisoner to be released.—The Opera, "Fidelio."

Ferney. The patriarch of Ferney. Voltaire. So called because he retired to Ferney, a little desert village near Geneva, from which obscure retreat he poured forth his invectives against the French Government, the Church, nobles, nuns, priests, and indeed all classes of men.

There are in Paris five or six statues of the patriarch of Ferney.—The Times.

Fero'hers. The guardian angels of Persian mythology. They are countless in number, and their chief tasks are for the well-being of man.

Fer'racute (sharp-iron). A giant in Turpin's "Chronicle of Charlemagne." He had the strength of forty men, and was thirty-six feet high. Though no lance could pierce his hide, Orlando slew him by Divine interposition.

Fer'ragus. The giant of Portugal, who took Bellisant under his care after she had been divorced by Alexander, emperor of Constantinople.—Valentine and Orson.

The great "Brazen Head," that told those who consulted it whatever they required to know, was kept in the castle of this giant.—Valentine and Orson. (See FERRAU.)

Ferra'ra. An Andrew Ferrara. A broadsword or claymore of the best quality, bearing the name of Andrea Ferrara, either an Italian or Spanish sword cutler, of whom nothing is known. Genuine "Andrew Ferraras" have a crown marked on the blade.

We'll put in bail, boy: old Andrew Ferrara shall lodge his security.—Sir W. Scott, "Waverley," ch. i.

Ferrau (in "Orlando Furioso"). Ferraute, Fer'racute, or Fer'ragus, a Saracen, son of Lanfu'sa. He dropped his helmet in a river, and vowed he would never wear another till he had won that worn by Orlando. Orlando slew him with a wound in the navel, his only vulnerable part.

Ferrex and Porrex. Two sons of Gorbogu'do, a mythical British king. Porrex drove his brother from Britain, and when Ferrex returned with an army he was slain, but Porrex was shortly after put to death by his mother. One of the first, if not the very first, historical play in the English language was "Ferrex and Porrex," by Thomas Norton and Thomas Sackville.

Ferumbras. (See FIERABRAS.)

Fes'cennine Verses. Lampoons; so called from Fescennia in Tuscany, where performers at merry-meetings used to extemporise scurrilous jests of a personal character to amuse the audience.

Fest (Saxon). Apledge. Festing-man, a surety to another. Festing-penny, a penny given in earnest to secure a bargain.

Fetch. A wraith—the disembodied ghost of a living person. (See FETICHE.)

Fetches. Excuses, tricks, artifices. (Saxon.)

Deny to speak with me? They are sick? they are weary?

They have travelled hard to-night? Mere fetches. Shakespeare, "King Lear," ii. 4.

Fet'iche or Fet'ish. The African idol, the same as the American Man'itou. The worship of this idol is called Fet'ichism or Fet'ishism. (Portuguese, fetisso, magician, fairy, oracle.)

The Fet'iche or Fet'ish of the bottle. The imp drunkenness, or drunkenness itself.

Fetter Lane (London). Howel says it is a corruption of Factor Lane—i.e., the lane where worthless fellows were always sauntering about on their way to the gardens. (Latin, factor, means "an evil-doer;" Norman-French, faitour.)

Fettle, as a verb, means to repair; as an adjective, it means well-knit, all right and tight. It is connected with our word feat, the French faire, the Latin facere.

Fettled ale, in Lancashire, means ale warmed and spiced.

Feu de Joie (French). A running fire of guns on an occasion of rejoicing.

Feud, meaning "hatred," is the Saxou fiekh (hatred); but feud, a "fief," is the Teutonic fee-odh (trust-land). (See below.)

Feudal or Feodal (2 syl.). In Gothic, odh means "property," hence odh-all (entire property); Flemish, udal. By transposition we get All-odh, whence our allodium (absolute property claimed by the holders of fiefs); and by combining the words fee and odh we get fee-odh, feodh, or feod (property given by way of fee for services conferred).—Pontoppidan.

Feuillans. A religious order, an offshoot of the Bernardines. So called from the convent of Feuillant, in Languedoc, where they were established in 1577.

The club of the Feuillants, in the French Revolution, composed of moderate Jacobins. So called because the convent of the Feuillants, near the Tuileries, was their original club-room. (1791-2.)

Feuilleton (feu-ton). A fly-sheet. Applied to the bottom part of French newspapers, generally devoted to a tale or some other light literature.

Fever-lurdan or Fever-lurgan. A fit of idleness. Lurden means a blockhead. (French, lourd, heavy, dull, thick-headed; lourdand, a blockhead.)

Fever-lurk. A corruption of Fever-lurg, as "Fever-lurgan" is of Fever-lurdan. The disease of laziness.

Fever-lurk.
Neither play nor work.

Fe'zon. Daughter of Savary, duke of Aquitaine, demanded in marriage by a pagan, called the Green Knight; but Orson, having overthrown the pagan, was accepted by the lady instead.—Valentine and Orson.

Fi or Fie! An exclamation indicating that what is reproved is dirty or indecent. The dung of many animals, as the boar, wolf, fox, marten, and badger, is called fiants, and the "orificium ana'të" is called a fi, a word still used in Lincolnshire. (Anglo-Norman, fay, to clean out; Saxon, afylan, to foul; our defile or file, to make foul; filth, &c.)

The old words, fi-corn (dross corn), fi-lands (unclosed lands), fi-mashings (the dung of any wild beast), &c., are compounds of the same word.

I had another process against the dung-farmer, Master Fifi.—Rabelais, "Pantagruel," book ii. 17.

Fi. Fa. A contraction of the two Latin words, fi'eri facias (cause it to be done). A judicial writ for one who has recovered damages in the Queen's courts, being a command to the sheriff to see the judgment of the court duly carried out.

Fiars. Striking the fiars. Taking the average price of corn. Fiars is a Gothic word, still current in Ireland. (Scotch.)

Fias'co. A failure, a mull. In Italy they cry Old, old, fiasco! to an unpopular singer. This word, common in France and Germany, is employed as the opposite of furor.

Fiat. I give my fiat to that proposal. I consent to it. (Latin, fiat, let it be done.)

Fib. An attendant on queen Mab in Drayton's "Polyolbion."

Fi'co. (See FIG.)

Fico for the phrase.

Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," i. 3.

I see contempt marching forth, giving me the fico with this thornbe in his mouth.—Wit's Miseries. (1596.)

Fiddle. He was first fiddle. Chief man, the most distinguished of the company.

To play second fiddle. To take a subordinate part. The allusion is to the leader of concerts, who leads with a fiddle.

Fiddleback. The name of Oliver Goldsmith's poor unfortunate pony, on which he made his country excursions.

Fiddler. Drunk as a fiddler. Fiddlers at wakes and fairs were allowed meat and drink to their heart's content, and seldom left a merry-making in sobriety.

Fiddler's-fare or Fiddler's pay. Meat, drink, and money.

Fiddler's Money. Sixpence. The usual fee in money given to a fiddler at a wake was sixpence from each dancer.

Fiddlestick. In the great German epic called "The Nibelungen-Lied," this word is used six or eight times for a broadsword.

His fiddlestick he grasped, 'twas massy, broad, and long,
As sharp as any razor.

Stanza 1,841.

My fiddlestick's no feather; on whom I let it fall,
If he has friends that love him, 'twill set them weeping all.

Stanza 1,880.

His fiddlestick, sharp-cutting, can hardest steel divide,
And at a stroke can shiver the morion's beamy pride.

Stanza 2,078.

Fiddling About. Wasting one's time in trifles; like fiddlers, who spend the day in scraping catgut, and picking up stray gifts.

Fide'le (3 syl.). The name assumed by Imogen in Shakespeare's "Cymbeline." Collins has a beautiful elegy on Fidelë.

Fide'lio. Beethoven's best opera. (See LEONORA.)

Fidës (2 syl.). Mother of John of Leyden. Not knowing that her son was the "prophet" and ruler of Westphalia, but thinking that the prophet had caused his death, she went to Munster to curse the new-crowned monarch. The moment she saw him, she recognised him, but the "prophet-king," surrounded by his courtiers, pretended not to know her. Fidës, to save her son annoyance, declared she had made a mistake, and was confined in the dungeon of the palace at Munster, where John visited her and was forgiven. When her son set fire to his palace, Fidës rushed into the flames, and perished with him.—Meyerbeer's opera of "Le Prophète."

Fidës Carbona'rii. Blind faith, faith of a child. A carbona'ro being asked what he believed, replied, "What the church believes;" and being asked again what the church believes, made answer, "What I believe." (See CARBONARI.)—Roux, "Dictionnaire Comique."

Field (The), in huntsman's language, means all the riders. To keep back the field is to keep back the riders.

In the racing world, to lay against the field is to back one horse against all comers.

To keep the field. To continue military operations.

Field of Ice. A large body of floating ice.

Field of Blood. Acel'dama, the piece of land bought by the chief priests with the money which Judas threw down in the temple; so called because it was bought with blood-money.—Matt. xxvii. 5; Acts i. 19.

Field of Vision. The space in a telescope, microscope, stereoscope, &c., within which the object is visible. If the object is not distinctly visible, it must be brought into the field by adjustment.

Field of the Cloth of Gold. The plain, near Guisnes, where Henry VIII. had his interview with François I., in 1520; so called from the splendour and magnificence displayed there on the occasion.

Field of the Forty Footsteps. At the back of the British Museum, once called Southampton Fields. The tradition is that two brothers, in the Duke of Monmouth's rebellion, took different sides, and engaged each other in fight. Both were killed, and forty impressions of their feet remained on the field for many years, where no grass would grow. The encounter took place at the extreme north-east of Upper Montague Street. The Miss Porters wrote a novel on the subject, and the Messrs. Mayhew a melo-drama.

Field-day. Day of business. Thus, a clergyman jocosely calls a "kept festival" his field day. A military term, meaning a day when a regiment is taken to the fields for practice.

Field Officer. Any officer above the rank of captain; so called because he is qualified to command whole battalions, or a "field."

Field Pieces. Small cannons carried into the field with an army.

Field Works. Works thrown up by an army in besieging or defending a fortress, or in strengthening its position.

Fielding. The Fielding of the drama. George Farquhar, author of the "Beaux Stratagem," &c. (1678-1707.)

Fiërabras (Sir). A Saracen of Spain who made himself master of Rome, and carried away the crown of thorns and the balsam which embalmed the body of the Lord, one drop of which would cure any sickness or heal any wound. One of his chief exploits was to slay the "fearful huge giant" that guarded the bridge of Mantible, famous for its thirty arches of black marble. Having accomplished this feat, he next slew "an innumerable multitude of pagans under his command." Sir Fiërabras figures in several mediæval romances. (See BALAND.)

Fiërabras of Alexandria. The greatest giant that ever walked the earth, who for height of stature, breadth of shoulder, and hardness of muscle, never had his equal. He possessed all Babylon, even to the Red Sea; was seigneur of Russia, lord of Cologne, master of Jerusalem, and even of the Holy Sepulchre itself. His pride was laid low by Oliv'ier. The giant became a child of God, and ended his days in the odour of sanctity, "meek as a lamb, and humble as a chidden slave."

Fifth-Monarchy Men. A sect of English fanatics in the days of the Puritans, who maintained that Jesus Christ was about to come a second time to the earth, and establish the fifth universal monarchy. The four preceding monarchies were the Assyrian, the Persian, the Macedonian, and the Roman. In politics the Fifth-Monarchy Men were arrant Radicals and levellers.

Fig. Full fig. Full dress. A corruption of the Italian in fioc'chi (in gala costume). It was derived from the tassels with which horses were ornamented in state processions. Thus we read in Miss Knight's "Autobiography," "The Pope's throne was set out for mass, and the whole building was in perfect fiocchi (in full fig)." Another etymology has been suggested by a correspondent in "Notes and Queries," that it is taken from the word full fig. (figure) in fashion books.

Fig or Figo. I don't care a fig for you; not worth a fig. Anything at all. Here fig is fioco—a fillip or snap of the fingers. Thus we say, "I don't care that for you," snapping the fingers at the same time. (Italian, far le fiche, to snap the fingers; French, faire la figue; German, diefeigen weisen; Dutch, de vjghe setten, &c.) (See FICO.)

A fig for Peter.
Shakespeare, "2 Henry VI.," ii. 3.
The figo for thy friendship.
Shakespeare, "Henry V.," iii. 4.

Figs. I shan't buy my Attic figs in future, but grow them. Don't count your chickens before they are hatched. It was Xerxes who boasted that he did not intend any longer to buy his figs, because he meant to conquer Attica and add it to his own empire; but Xerxes met a signal defeat at Salamis, and "never leosed his sandal till he reached Abde'ra."

"In the name of the Prophet, Figs!" A burlesque of the solemn language employed in eastern countries in the common business of life. The line occurs in the imitation of Dr. Johnson's pompous style, in "Rejected Addresses," by James and Horace Smith.

Fig-tree. It is said that Judas hanged himself on a fig-tree. (See ELDER-TREE.)

Quæret aliquis quâ ex arborè Judas se suspenderit? Arbor ficus fuisse dicitur.—Barradius.

Figaro. A type of cunning, dexterity, and intrigue. The character is in the "Barbier de Séville" and "Mariage de Figaro," by Beaumarchais. In the former he is a barber, and in the latter a valet; but in both he outwits every one. There are several operas founded on these dramas, as Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro," Paisiello's "Il Barbiere di Siviglia," and Rossini's "Il Barbiere di Siviglia."

Fight.

He that fights and runs away
May live to fight another day;
But he that is in battle slain
Can never rise to fight again.

James Smith, "Musarum Deliciae," (1636.)

Demos'thenës, being reproached for running away from Philip of Macedon, at Chærone'a, replied, "A man that runs away may fight again (Ἀνὴρ ὁ φεύγων καὶ πάλιν μαχίσκεται)."

Fighting-cocks. To live like fighting-cocks. To have a profusion of the best food. Fighting-cocks used to be high fed in order to aggravate their pugnacity and increase their powers of endurance.

Fighting Fifth (The). The 5th Foot. This sobriquet was given to the regiment during the Peninsular war.

Fighting Kings (Chen-kuo). Certain feudatories of China incessantly contending for mastery over each other. (B.C. 770-320.)

Fighting Prelate. Henry Spencer, bishop of Norwich, who greatly distinguished himself in the rebellion of Wat Tyler. He met the rebels in the field, with the temporal sword, then absolved them, and sent them to the gibbet.

Figure. What's the figure? The price; what am I to pay; what "figure" or sum have you set down against me?

Figures. A corruption of fingers, that is, "digits" (Latin, digiti, fingers). So called from the primitive method of marking the monades by the fingers. Thus the first four were simply i., ii., iii., iiiii.; five was the outline of the hand simplified into a V; the next four figures were the two combined, thus, vi., vii., viii., viiii.; and ten was a double v, thus x. At a later period iiiii. and viiii. were expressed by one less than five (i-v.) and one less than ten (i-x.). Nineteen was ten-plus-nine (x + ix.), &c.—a most clumsy and unphilosophical device.

Filch. To steal or purloin. A filch is a staff with a hook at the end, for plucking clothes from hedges and articles from shop windows. Probably it is a corruption of pilfer. (Welsh, yspeiliata and yspeiliaw; Spanish, pellizcar; French, pillier and peler; our pillage, peel, &c.)

With cunning hast thou filched my daughter's heart.
Shakespeare, "Midsummer Night's Dream," i. 2.

File. To cheat. The allusion is to filing money for the sake of the dust which can be used or sold. A file is a cheat; one who can make a sovereign go further than twenty shillings. Hence "a jolly file," "a rum old file," &c.

Sorful becom that fals file.

Cursor Mundi MS.

In single file. Single row; one behind another. (French, file, a row.)

Rank and file. Common soldiers. Thus we say, "Ten officers and three hundred rank and file fell in the action." Rank refers to men standing abreast, file to men standing behind each other. Thus twenty-five files in four ranks would be one hundred men four deep.

It was only on the faith of some grand expedition that the credulous rank and file of the Brotherhood subscribed their dollars.—The Times.

Filia Dolorosa. The Duchesse d'Angoulême, daughter of Louis XVI.,

also called the modern Antig'onë. (1778-1851.)

Filibuster. A piratical adventurer. The most notorious was William Walker, who was shot in 1855. (French, flibustier, a corruption of our "freebooter;" German, freibeuter; Dutch, vrybuiters.) (See BUCCANEER.)

Fill-dike. The month of February, when the rain and melted snow fills the ditches to overflowing.

Fillet. A royal diadem anterior to the crown, made of silk or wool. Aurelianus was the first Roman emperor that wore one in public. In the time of Constantine the fillet was adorned with precious stones.

Filomena. Longfellow calls Florence Nightingale St. Filomena, not only because Filomena resembles the Latin word for a nightingale, but also because this saint, in Sabatelli's picture, is represented as hovering over a group of sick and maimed, healed by her intercession. (See THAUMATURGUS.)

Filter. To run through felt (Latin, feltrum), as jelly is strained through dannel. The Romans strained the juice of their grapes through felt into the wine-vat, after which it was put into the casks.

Fin. The hand. A contraction of finger. Thus we say, "Give us your fin" —i.e., shake hands. The derivation from the fin of a fish is good only for a joke.

Finality John. Earl Russell, who maintained that the Reform Bill of 1832 was a finality, yet in 1854, 1860, and 1866, brought forth other Reform Bills.

Finance (French). Revenue derived from fines or subsidies. In feudal times, finance was money paid to a lord for a privilege. In the plural we use the word to signify available money resources. Thus we say, "My finances are exhausted," meaning I have no more funds or available money. (Armoric, financz; Cimbric, finio.)

Finch Lane (London). So called from a family of consideration by the name of Finch or Finke.

Find. You know what you leave behind, but not what you will find. And this it is that "makes us rather bear the ills we have, than fly to others that we know not of."

Findy. Plump, full. (Saxon, find'ig.)

A cold May and a windy
Make barns fat and findy.

Old Proverb.

Fine Arts. Those arts which chiefly depend on a delicate or fine imagination, as music, painting, poetry, and sculpture.

Fine-ear. One of Fortu'nio's servants, who could hear the grass grow and the mole work underground.—"Grimm's Goblins," Fortunio.

Fin'etor. A necromancer, father of the Enchantress-Damsel, in "Amadis of Gaul."

Fingal's Cave. The basaltic cavern of Staffa. So called from Fion na Gael (Fingal), the great Gaelic hero, whose achievements have been made familiar by the "Fingal" of Macpherson, in six books.

Finger. The custom of holding up one's finger in an auction room, by way of a bid, comes to us from the Romans. The Latin for bidding at an auction is digitum tollere (to hold up the finger).

My little finger told me that. The same as "A little bird told me that," meaning, I know it, though you did not expect it. The former expression is from Molière's "Malade Imaginaire." (See BIRD.)

By the pricking of my thumbs,
Something wicked this way comes.

Shakespeare, "Macbeth," iv. 1.

Cry, baby, cry; put your finger in your eye, &c. This nursery rhyme seems to be referred to by Shakespeare in his "Comedy of Errors," ii. 2:—

No longer will I be fool,

To put the finger in the eye and weep.

The Ring Finger. The finger between the long and little finger was used by the Romans as a ring-finger from the belief that a nerve ran through it to the heart. Hence the Greeks and Romans used to call it the medical finger, and used it for stirring mixtures, under the notion that nothing noxious could touch it without its giving instant warning to the heart. It is still a very general notion in England that it is bad to rub on salve or scratch the skin with any but the ring-finger. The fact that there was no such intimacy between the finger and the heart was not discovered till after the notion was deeply rooted.

The Medical Finger.

At last he put on her medical finger a pretty handsome gold ring, wherewith was enchased a precious loadstone, Benusse.—Rabelais, "Pantagruel," iii. 17.

Fingers. The old names for the fingers are:—

Thumb.

Towcher (the finger that touches), foreman, or pointer.

Long-man or long finger.

Lech-man or ring-finger. The former means "medical finger," and the latter is a Roman expression, digitus annularis.

Little-man or little finger.

Fingers. Ben Jonson says—

The thumb, in chiromancy, we give to Venus;
The fore-finger to Jove; the midst to Saturn;
The ring to Sol; the least to Mercury.

"Alchemist," i. 2.

Fingers before Forks.

This Vulcan was a smith, they tell us,
That first invented longs and bellows;
For breath and fingers did their works
King, "Art of Love."

Finger Benediction. In the Greek and Roman Church the thumb and first two fingers represent the Trinity. The thumb, being strong, represents the Father; the long or second finger, Jesus Christ; and the first finger, the Holy Ghost, which proceedeth from the Father and the Son. (See BLESSING.)

Some bishops of the Anglican Church use this gesture while pronouncing the benediction.

Fingers' Ends. I have it at my fingers' ends. I am quite familiar with it and can do it readily. It is a Latin proverb (Scire tanquam unguis digitosque), where the allusion is to the statuary, who knows every item of his subject by the touch. (See UNGUEM.)

Go to; thou hast it ad dunghill (unguem), at the fingers' ends, as they say. — Shakespeare, "Love's Labour's Lost," v. 1.

Fingerstall. A hutkin, a cover for a sore finger. The Germans call a thimble a finger-hut, where hut is evidently the word hut or huth (a tending, keeping, or guarding), from the verb huten (to keep watch over). Our hutkin is simply a little cap for guarding a sore finger. Stall is the Saxon stæl (a place), whence our stall, a place for horses.

Finny Tribe. Fish. So called because they are furnished with fins.

Finsbury (London). A corruption of Fens-bury, the town in the fens.

Fiörgwyn, in Scandinavian mythology. A giant, father of Frigga (q.v.).

Fir-cone on the Thyrsus. The juice of the fir-tree (turpentine) used to be mixed by the Greeks with new wine, to make it keep; hence it was adopted as one of the symbols of Bacchus.

Fire. More fire in the bed-straw. More mischief brewing. Alluding to the times when straw was used for carpets and beds.

I have myself passed through the fire—been afflicted or persecuted. The allusion is to Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, who were cast into the fiery furnace by Nebuchadnezzar for not worshipping his golden image. (Dan. iii.)

I have smelt the smell of fire. I have had experience in trouble. A similar allusion.

If you will enjoy the fire, you must put up with the smoke. (Latin, "Commoditas quævis sua fert incommoda secum.") Every convenience has its inconvenience.

No fire without smoke. (French, "Nul feu sans fumée.") No good without its mixture of evil.

Where there is smoke there is fire. Every effect is the result of some cause. The cotyledon may be very small, but it shows that the seed is fructifying.

Fir Tree. (See ATYS.)

Fire and Sword. Letters of fire and sword. If a criminal resisted the law and refused to answer his citation, it was accounted treason in the Scottish courts; and "letters of fire and sword" were sent to the sheriff, authorising him to use either or both these instruments in order to apprehend the contumacious party.

Fire Away. Start at once, get on. A playful substitution: If you "fire away," your gun "goes off;" and if you go off, you "get on."

Fire away, Flanagan. A taunt to a boaster. A man threatening you, says he will do this, that, and the other; you reply, "Fire away, Flanagan." Cromwell marched against a castle, defended by Flanagan, who threatened to open his cannon on the Parliamentarians unless they withdrew. Cromwell wrote on the corner of the missive sent to him, "Fire away, Flanagan," and the doughty champion took to his heels immediately.

Fire-brand. An incendiary, one who incites to rebellion; like a blazing brand which sets on fire all it touches.

Our fire-brand brother, Paris, burns us all.
Shakespeare, "Troilus and Cressida," ii. 2.

Fire-drake or Fire-dragon. A fiery serpent, an ignis-fatuus of large proportions, superstitiously believed to be a flying dragon keeping guard over hid treasures.

There is a fellow somewhat near the door, he should be a brazier by his face, for, o' my conscience, twenty of the dog-days now reign in 's nose.... That fire-drake did I hit three times on the head.—Shakespeare, "Henry VIII.," v. 3.

Fire-eaters. Persons ready to quarrel for anything. The allusion is to the jugglers who "eat" flaming tow, pour melted lead down their throats, and hold red-hot metal between their teeth. Richardson, in the seventeenth century—Signora Josephine Girardelli (the original Salamander), in the early part of the present century—and Chaubert, a Frenchman, of the present century, are the most noted of these exhibitors.

The great fire-eater lay unconscious upon the floor of the house.—Nashville Banner.

Fire-new. Spick and span new (q.v.).

You should have accosted her; and with some excellent jets, fire-new from the mint.—Shakespeare, "Twelfth Night," iii. 2.

Fire-ship. A ship filled with combustibles to be sent against adverse vessels in order to set them on fire.

Fire Worship was introduced into Persia by Phœ'dima, widow of Smerdis and wife of Gushtasp daravesh, usually called Darius (B.C. 521-485). It is not the sun that is worshipped, but God, who is supposed to reside in it; at the same time they reverence the sun, not as a deity, but as the throne of deity. (See PARSEES.)

First-fruits. The first profitable results of labour. In husbandry, the first corn that is cut at harvest. We also use the word in an evil sense; as the first-fruits of sin, the first-fruits of repentance, &c. &c.

First Gentleman of Europe. A nickname given to George IV., who certainly was first in rank, but it would be sad indeed to think he was ever the most gentlemanly man in feeling, manners, and deportment.

First Grenadier of France. A title given by Napoleon to Latour d'Auvergne. (1743-1800.)

Fish. The reason why fish are employed as card counters is from a misapprehension of the French word fiche

(a five-son piece). The two points allowed for the "rub" are called in French la fiche de consolation. The Spanish word pez has also a double meaning—a "winning," or a "fish;" pez is the Welsh pysg, Latin pisc, English fish.

Mute as a fish. Fish have no language like birds, beasts, and insects. Their utmost power of sound is a feeble cry of pain, the result of intestinal respiration.

I have other fish to fry. Other business to attend to. (See above.)

A pretty kettle of fish. (See KITTLE.)

Fisherman. The fisherman who was father of three kings. Abu Shujah al Bouyah was a Persian fisherman in the province of Delēm', whose three sons, Imad, Ruken, and Moez, all rose to sovereign power.

Fishing. Fishing for compliments. Laying a bait for praise.

Fisk (in "Hudibras") was Nicholas Fisk, a physician and astrologer, who used to say that a physician never deserved his bread till he had no teeth to eat it. In his old age he was almost a beggar.

Fitz (Norman). Son of; as Fitz-Herbert, Fitz-William, Fitz-Peter, &c. It is sometimes applied to illegitimate children, as Fitz-Clarence, Fitz-roy, &c.

Fitz-Fulke (Hebē). "A gracious, graceful, graceless grace;" "fat, fair, and forty."—Byron, "Don Juan," c. xvi.

Fitzwilliam Museum (Cambridge University). So called from earl Fitzwilliam, who left £100,000, with books, paintings, &c., to form the nucleus of a museum for the benefit of the university.

Five. A mystical number; the Greek diapantē. The major chord consists of a fundamental or tonic, its major third, and its just fifth; and in the "Harmony" of Nature all these numbers are mystical. The eighth note, or complement of the octave, is the diapason or man, and beyond that is Deity. (See DIAPASON.)

Five-minute-clause. A provision sometimes inserted in deeds of separation, whereby it is stipulated that the deed is null and void, if the husband and wife remain together five minutes after the separation is enjoined.

Five Points. (See CALVINISM.)

Fives. A bunch of fives. The fist, in which the five fingers are bound in a bunch.

Fix. I'm in a fix. A predicament. The allusion is to machinery which will not move. The Northumberland was in a terrible fix at the launch, when it refused to leave the dock. (1866.)

Fixed Air. Carbonic acid gas. Dr. Black gave it this name, because carbonate of magnesia evolved by heat carbonic acid, that is, MgO , CO_2 evolved CO_2 , thereby proving that CO_2 (carbonic acid) is a "fixed air."

Fixed Oils. Oils which do not readily dry or fly off, but remain fixed in their oily character.

Fixed Stars. Stars whose relative position to other stars is fixed or always the same. Planets are always shifting their relative positions.

Flaccus. Horace, the Roman poet, whose full name was Quintus Flaccus Hora'tius.

Flag. To unfurl the black flag. To declare war. The curtain which used to hang before the door of Ayeshah, Mahomet's favourite wife, was taken for a national flag, and is regarded by Mussulmans as the most precious of relics. It is black, and is never unfolded except as a declaration of war.

To display the red flag. To defy or dare to battle. Red is the emblem of blood.

To hang out the white flag. To sue for quarter; to give in. The white flag throughout the world is a token of peace.

To hang the flag half-mast high is in token of mourning or distress.

To strike the flag. To lower it or pull it down upon the cap, in token of respect or submission. In naval warfare, it means to surrender.

Flag of Distress. A card at one's window announcing "lodgings" or "board and lodgings." The allusion is evident.

Flag-officer. Either an admiral, vice-admiral, rear-admiral, or commodore. These officers alone are privileged to carry a flag denoting rank. Admirals carry their flag at the main, vice-admirals at the fore, and rear-admirals at the mizen. (See ADMIRAL.)

Flag-ship. The admiral's ship, or the ship in which the admiral is sailing. (See ADMIRAL.)

Flagellants. A sect of enthusiasts in the middle of the thirteenth century, who ran naked about the streets inflicting on themselves daily flagellations, in order to merit thereby the favour of God. They were put down soon after their appearance, but revived in the fourteenth century.

Flam. Flattery for an object; blarney. (Irish, flim.)

Flamberge or Floberge. The sword which Maugis took from Anthénor, the Saracen admiral, when he came to attack the castle of Oriande la Féé. It was made by Weyland, the Vulcan of the Northern Olympus.—Romance of "Maugis d'Agremont et de Vivian son Frère."

Mais si une fois je luy fais essayer ceste-cy plus tranchaute que "Joyeuse, Durandel, Hauteclaire, ou Flamberge," je le fendrai jusques à l'estomach. —Pierre de l'Arivey, "Les Jaloux," v. 6.

Flamboroughs (The Miss). The daughters of a village farmer, whose homeliness contrasts well with the vulgar, flashy pretenders to fashion introduced by squire Thornhill.—Goldsmith, "Vicar of Wakefield."

Flaming. Superb, captivating, attractive. The French flambant. This word was originally applied to those persons who dressed themselves in rich dresses "flaming" with gold and silver thread. We now speak of a "flaming advertisement," &c.

Le velour, trop commun en France.

Sous toy reprend son viel honneur,

Tellement que ta remontrance

Nous a fait voir la différence

Du valet et de son seigneur,

Et du muguet chargé de soye

Qui à tes princes s'escaloit,

Et riche en draps de soye, alloit

Faisaut flamber toute la voye.

Ronsard, "Au Roy Henri II." (1546.)

Flaming Swords. Swords with a wavy or flamboyant edge, generally used for state purposes. The dukes of Burgundy carried swords of this sort, and they were worn in our own country till the accession of William III.

Flaminian Way. The great northern road of ancient Italy, constructed by C. Flaminius, and beginning at the Flaminian gate of Rome.

Flanders (Moll). The chief character of De Foe's novel of the same name. She runs through the whole career of female profligacy, and then turns religious.

Flaneur (French). A lounge, gossip. From flaner, to saunter about.

Flap-dragons. Small combustible bodies blazing at one end and floating in a glass of liquor. The liquor was stirred about with a candle-end to promote combustion. A skilful toper would swallow them blazing, as we swallow the blazing raisins of snap-dragons.

He drinks off candles' ends for flap-dragons.
Shakespeare, "2 Henry IV," ii. 4.

Flare-up. To be suddenly very angry, as a gas-jet or other ignitable body flares when lighted with a sudden blaze.

Flash. All flash in the pan. All sound and fury, signifying nothing; like the explosion of a gun which ends with a flash in the lock-pan, the gun itself "hanging fire."

To cut a flash or dash is to make a flashy show—i.e., a show very pronounced but of short duration, like the flash of a gun.

Flash Men and Flash Notes. Between Buxton, Leek, and Macclesfield is a wild country, called the Flash, from a chapel of that name. Here used to live a set of pedlars, who hawked about buttons, ribbons, and other articles made at Leek, together with handkerchiefs and small wares from Manchester. They were known on the road as Flash-men, and frequented fairs and farm-houses. They paid, at first, ready-money; but when they had established a credit, paid in promissory notes, which were rarely honoured. They were ultimately put down by the magistracy. Autolycus, in "The Winter's Tale," is a "Flash Man."

Flat. One who is not sharp.

Oh, Messrs. . . . what flats you are!—The Times.

Flat as a flounder. I knocked him down flat as a flounder; I beat him flat as a flounder, &c. A flounder is one of the flat-fish.

Flat as a pancake. Quite flat. A pancake is a thin flat cake, fried in a pan.

Flat-fish. He is a regular flat-fish. A dull, stupid fellow, not up to anything. The play is upon flat (stupid), and such fish as plaice, dabs, and soles.

Flat Milk or Fleet Milk. Skimmed milk. The verb to fleet, meaning "to skim," has several forms in the past participle, as fleeted, fleeten, or fleet; flatted, flattened, or flat. Same word as flit.

Flath-innis (Isle of the Brave). The Paradise of Celtic mythology.

Flatter is to stroke or smooth with the "flat" of the hand.

Flea. When the princess Badoura was placed on prince Camaralzamar's bed, in order to compare their claims to beauty, the fairy Maimounë changed herself into a flea, and bit the prince on the neck in order to awake him. Next, the genius Danhasch changed himself into a flea, and bit the princess on the lip, that she might open her eyes and see the prince.—Arabian Nights (Camaralzaman and Badoura).

I sent him off with a flea in his ear. Peremptorily. A dog which has a flea in the ear is very restless, and runs off in terror and distress. Probably there is a pun implied.

Flea-bite. It is a mere flea-bite. A thing of no moment. Thus, a merchant who has suffered loss by speculation or failure might say that the loss is a mere flea-bite to him. A soldier might call a wound a mere flea-bite. A passing inconvenience, which annoys but leaves no permanent injury. Mr. Disraeli spoke of the National Debt as a mere flea-bite.

Flea's Jump. Aristoph'anes, in the "Clouds," says that Soc'rates and Chæ'rephon tried to measure how many times its own length a flea jumped. They took in wax the size of a flea's foot; then on the principle of ex pedē Herculem calculated the length of its body. Having found this, and measured the distance of the flea's jump from the hand of Socrates to Chæ'rephon, the knotty problem was resolved by simple multiplication.

Fle'ance (2 syl.). Son of Banquo.—Shakespeare, "Macbeth."

Flèche. Faire flèche de tout bois. To turn every event into a cause of censure. To make whatever wood falls in your path an arrow to discharge at your adversary.

Flecknoe (Richard). An Irish priest, who printed a host of poems, letters, and travels. As a poet his name, like the names of Mævius and Bævius among the Romans, is proverbial for vileness. Dryden says he—

Reigned without dispute
Through all the realms of nonsense, absolute.
Mac Flecknoe.

Fledgeby (2 syl.). An over-reaching, cowardly sneak, who conceals his dirty bill-broking under the trade name of Pubsey and Co. He is soundly thrashed by Alfred Lammle, and quietly pockets the affront.—Dickens, "Mutual Friend."

Fleeced (1 syl.). Cheated of one's money; sheared like a sheep.

Fleet-book Evidence. No evidence at all. The books of the old Fleet prison are not admissible as evidence to prove a marriage.—Wharton, "Law Dictionary."

Fleet Marriages. Clandestine marriages, at one time performed without banns or licence by needy chaplains, in Fleet Prison, London. As many as thirty marriages a day were sometimes consummated in this disgraceful manner; and Malcolm tells us that 2,954 were registered in the four months ending with February 12th, 1705. Suppressed by the Marriage Act in 1754.

Fleet Street (London). For two hundred years after the Conquest, London was watered on the west by "the river of Wells," afterwards called "Fleet dyke, because (Stowe says) it runneth past the Fleete." In the middle of the city and falling into the Thames was Wellbrooke; on the east side, Langbourne; and in the western suburbs, Oldbourne. Along the Fleete and Oldbourne "ships" used to ply with merchandise. These four, together with the Roding, the Lea, the Ravensbourne, and the Wandle, are now merely sewers to the great metropolis.

Fleet of the Desert. A caravan.—Washington Irving.

Flemish Account. A sum less than that expected. In Antwerp accounts were kept in livres, sols, and pence; but the liere or pound was only 12s., so that what the Antwerp merchant called one livre thirteen and fourpence, would in English currency be only 20s. In "Notes and Queries" we have an example of a Flemish account, where £373 Flemish becomes £213 2s. 10d. English.

Flemish School. A school of painting established by the brothers Van Eyck, in the fifteenth century. The chief early masters were Memling, Weyden, Matsys, Mabius, and Moro. Of the second period, Rubens and Vandyck, Snyders, Jordaens, Gaspar de Crayer, and the younger Teniers.

Flesh. He fleshed his sword. Used it for the first time. Men fleshed in cruelty—i.e., initiated or used to it. A sportsman's expression. When a sportsman wishes to encourage a young dog or hawk, he will allow it to have the first game it catches for its own eating. This "flesh" is the first it has tasted, and fleshing its tooth thus gives the creature a craving for similar food. Hence, also, to eat with avidity.

The wild dog
Shall flesh his tooth in every innocent.
Shakespeare, "2 Henry IV.," iv. 4.

Flesh-pots. Sighing for the flesh-pots of Egypt. Hankering for good things no longer at your command. The children of Israel said they wished they had died "when they sat by the flesh-pots of Egypt" (Exodus xvi. 3)—i.e., when they sat watching the boilers which contained the meat they were to have for dinner. The expression also means abundance of appetising food.

Fleta. An excellent treatise on the common law of England, written in the fourteenth century by an unknown writer, while a prisoner in the Fleet.

Fleurs-de-Lys (Louis' flowers), at one time supposed to be the iris flower or blossoming flag, which was accordingly adopted by Louis VII. (1137-1180), when the national standard was thickly charged with these flowers. In 1365 the number was reduced by Charles VI. to three (the mystical church number). Givillim, in his "Display of Heraldrie," 1611, says the device is "Three toads erect, saltant;" in allusion to which Nostradamus, in the sixteenth century, calls Frenchmen crapauds (toads). Recently it has been thought that the device is really a "bee flying," because certain ornaments resembling bees were found in the tomb of Childeric, father of Clovis, when it was opened in 1653. These bees are now generally believed to be the fleurons of horse-trappings, and quite independent of the emblem.

The fleur-de-lys was chosen by Flavio Gio'ja to mark the north point of the compass, out of compliment to the king of Naples, who was of French descent. (1302.)

Flibbertigibbet. One of the five fiends that possessed "poor Tom." Shakespeare got it from Bishop Harsnet's account of the Spanish invasion, where we are told of forty fiends which the Jesuits cast out, and among the number was Fliberdigibet. Shakespeare says, he "is the fiend of mopping and mowing, who possesses chambermaids and waiting women" ("King Lear," iv. 2). And, again, that he "begins at curfew and walks till the first cock," giving men pins and needles, squint eyes, bare-lips, and so on.—Shakespeare, "Lear," iii. 4.

Flic (French). A policeman or sergent de ville. "Une allusion à l'épée des sergents de ville, ou plutôt aux flèches des archers primitifs" (Raille). Hence, "flic-flacs," thumps and thwacks.

Flick. To strike with a quick jerk. To "flick a whip in one's face" is to strike the face with the lash and draw the whip suddenly back again. (Anglo-Saxon, fliccerian; Scotch, flicker; Danish, nikkeren, to twinkle, &c.)

Flin (a stone). An idol of the ancient Vandals settled in Lusace. It was a huge stone, draped, wearing a lion's skin over its shoulders, and designed to represent death. Mr. Lower says that the town of Flint in North Wales is named in honour of this stone deity, and gives Alwin Flint in Suffolk as another example.—Pat. Brit.

The Welsh call Flint Flint Teg-cingl (Flin's beautiful band or girdle).

Flint Im'plements. Arrow-heads, axe-heads, lance-heads, and knives, made of granite, jade, serpentine, jasper, basalt, and other hard stones. The first were discovered on the banks of the Somme, near Amiens and Abbeville, but others have been discovered in Belgium, Germany, Italy, &c. They were the rude instruments of men before the use of metal was known.

Flint Jack. Edward Simpson, an occasional servant of Dr. Young, of Whitby. So called because he used to tramp the kingdom vending spurious fossils, flint arrow-heads, stone celts, and other imitation antiquities. Professor Tennant charged him with forging these wares, and in 1867 he was sent to prison for theft.

Flirt. A coquette. The word is from the verb flirt (to move to and fro with a pert motion), as "to flirt a fan." The fan being used for coquetting, those who coquetted were called fan-flirts. Lady Frances Shirley, the favourite of lord Chesterfield, introduced the word. Flirt is allied to flutter, flit, jerk, &c.

Flitter-mouse. A bat. South calls the bat a flinder-mouse. (German, fledermaus.)

Flo (French). A crowd. A contraction of flot; Latin, fluctus (a wave).

Grant flot de gens après s'arrive.
Guillaume Guiart, (1031.)
Puis lor tramist par huiz ouverz
Grand flo d'Anglois de fer couverz.
Ditto, verse. (1692.)

Flog. Flogging the dead horse. Trying to revive an interest in a subject out of date. Bright said that earl Russell's "reform bill" was a "dead horse," and every attempt to create any enthusiasm in its favour was like "flogging the dead horse."

Floor. I floored him. Knocked him down on the floor; hence to overcome, beat, or surpass. Thus, we say at the university, "I floored that paper"—i.e., answered every question on it. "I floored that problem"—did it perfectly, or made myself master of it.

Floorer. That was a floorer. That blow knocked the man down on the floor. In the university we say, "That paper or question was a floorer;" meaning it was too hard to be mastered. (See above.)

Flora. Flowers; all the vegetable productions of a country or of a geological period, as the flora of England, the flora of the coal period. Flora was the Roman goddess of flowers.

Another Flora there, of bolder hues,
And richer sweets, beyond our garden's pride.
Thomson, "Summer."

Metropolis of Flora. Aranjuez, in Spain, is so called, from its many beautiful gardens.

Flora's Dial. A dial formed by flowers which open or close at stated hours.

I. Dial of flowers which open—
(a.) The first twelve hours.

- ♂ M. OPENS.
1. (Scandinavian Southistle closes.)
2. Yellow Goat's-beard.
3. Common Ox-tongue.

4. Hawkweed; Late-flowering Dandelion; and Wild Succory.
 5. White Water-lily; Naked-stalked Poppy; and Smooth Sowthistle.
 6. Shrubby Hawkweed and Spotted Cat's-ears.
 7. White Water-lily; Garden Lettuce; and African Marigold.
 8. Scarlet Pimpernel; Mouse-ear Hawkweed; and Proliferous Pink.
 9. Field Marigold.
 10. Red Sandwort.
 11. Star of Bethlehem.
- Noon. Ice Plant.

(b.) The second twelve hours.

- P.M. OPENS.
1. Common Purslane.
 2. (Purple Sandwort closes.)
 3. (Dandelion closes.)
 4. (White Spiderwort closes.)
 5. Julap.
 6. Dark Crane's-bill.
 7. (Naked stalked Poppy closes.)
 8. (Orange Day-lily closes.)
 9. Cactus Opuntia.
 10. Purple Bindweed.
 11. Night-blooming Catch-fly.
- Midnight. (Late-flowering Dandelion closes.)

II. Dial of closing flowers—

- A.M. CLOSES.
1. Scandinavian Sowthistle.

 4. White Spadewort and Field Bindwort.
 5. Common Cat's-ears.
 6. White Water-lily.
 7. Naked-stalked Poppy.
 8. Orange Day-lily and Wild Succory.
 9. Convolvulus Lunæus and Chickweed.
 10. Common Nipple-wort.
 11. Smooth Sowthistle.
- Midnight. Creeping Mallow and Late Dandelion.

Flor'delice (3 syl.). The mistress of Bran'dimart.—Ariosto, "Orlando Furioso."

Florence. The German Florence. Dresden is so called.

Florent'ius. A knight who bound himself to marry a "foul and ugly witch," if she would teach him the solution of a riddle on which his life depended.—Gower, "Confessio Amantis."

Flor'ian (St.). Patron saint of merchants, being himself of the same craft.

Floria'ni. A sect of heretics of the second century, who maintained that God is the author of evil, and taught the Gnostic doctrine of two principles. Floria'nus was their founder.

Florid Architecture. The latter division of the perpendicular style, often called the Tudor, remarkable for its florid character or profusion of ornament.

Flor'imel (honey-flower). A damsel of great beauty, but so timid that she feared the "smallest monstrous mouse that creeps on floor," and was abused by every one. Her form was simulated by a witch out of wax, but the wax image melted, leaving nothing behind except the girdle that was round the waist.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen."

Florimel loved Mar'inel, but Proteus cast her into a dungeon, from which being released by the order of Neptune, she married the man of her choice.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. iv.

St. Amand had long since in bitterness repented of a transient infatuation, had long since distinguished the true Florimel from the false.—Sir E. B. Lytton, "Pilgrims of the Rhine," iii.

Flor'imel's Girdle gave to those who could wear it "the virtue of chaste love and wifehood true;" but if any woman not chaste and faithful put it on, it "loosed or tore asunder." It was once the cestus of Venus, made by her husband Vulean; but when she waned with Mars it fell off, and was left on the "Acida'lian mount."—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. iv.

Florin. A coin; so called from Florence, where it was first struck in the thirteenth century. It had a lily on one side and the head of John the Baptist on the other.

Flor'ipes (3 syl.). Sister of Sir Fi'rabras, daughter of Laban, and wife of Guy, the nephew of Charlemagne.

Florisan'do. One of the knights of the Spanish version of "Amadis of Gaul," whose exploits and adventures are recounted in the 6th and following books. This part of the romance was added by Paez de Ribera.

Flor'isel of Nice'a. A knight whose exploits and adventures form a supplemental part of the Spanish version of "Amadis of Gaul." This part was added by Felicia'no de Silva.

Flor'ismart. One of Charlemagne's paladins, and the bosom friend of Roland.

Flor'izel. Prince of Bohemia in love with Per'dita.—Shakespeare, "Winter's Tale."

Florizel. George the Fourth, when prince, corresponded, under this name, with Mrs. Robinson, actress and poet, generally known as Perdita, that being the character in which she first attracted the prince's attention.

Flotsam and Jetson. Waifs found in the sea or on the shore. "Flotsam" means goods found floating on the sea after a wreck. "Jetson," things thrown out of a ship to lighten it. (Saxon, flotan, to float; French, jeter, to throw out.)

Flower of Chivalry. A name given to several cavaliers—e.g., William Douglas, lord of Liddesdale, in the fourteenth century.

Sir Philip Sidney. (1554-1586.)

Chevalier de Bayard (le chevalier sans peur et sans reproche). (1476-1524.)

Flower of Kings. Arthur is so called by John of Exeter. (Sixth century.)

Flower of Paradise. The Ipomœa or Camala'ta, called by Sir W. Jones "Love's creeper." It symbolises that mythological plant which fulfils all desire.

Flowers and trees.—(I.) Dedicated to heathen gods—

The Cornel cherry-tree	to Apollo.
" Cypress	" Pluto.
" Hittany	" The Moon.
" Laurel	" Apollo.
" Lily	" Juno.
" Maiden's-hair	" Pluto.
" Myrtle	" Venus.
" Narcissus	" Ceres.
" Oak	" Jupiter.
" Olive	" Minerva.
" Pine-cone	" Assyrian temples.
" Poppy	" Ceres.
" Vine	" Bacchus.

(II.) Dedicated to saints—

Canterbury Bells	to St. Augustine of England.
Crocus	" St. Valentine.
Crown Imperial	" Edward the Confessor.
Daisy	" St. Margaret.
Herb Christopher	" St. Christopher.
Lady's-smock	" The Virgin Mary.
Rose	" Mary Magdalene.
St. John's-wort	" St. John.
St. Barnaby's Thistle	" St. Barnabas.

(III.) National emblems—

Leek	emblem of Wales.
Lily (Fleur-de-lys)	" France.
" (Giulio bianco)	" Florence.
" white	" the Guelphine badge.
" red	" badge of the Guelphs.
Linden	" Prussia.
Niggonette	" Saxony.
Pomegranate	" Spain.
Rose	" England.
" red	" Lancastrians
" white	" Yorkists.

(IV.) Symbols—

Box	is a symbol of the resurrection.
Cedars	" the faithful.
Corn-ears	" the Holy Communion.
Dates	" the faithful.
Grapes	" this is my blood.
Holly	" the resurrection.
Ivy	" the resurrection.
Lily	" purity.
Olive	" peace.
Orange-blossom	" virginity.
Palm	" victory.
Rose	" incorruption.
Vine	" Christ our Life.
Yew	" death.

N.B.—The laurel, oak, olive, myrtle, rosemary, cypress, and amaranth are all funeral plants.

You are welcome as flowers in May.
Your coming is as opportune and gives me as much pleasure as flowers in the month of May.

Fluellen. A Welsh captain and great pedant, who, amongst other learned quiddities, attempted to draw a parallel between Henry V. and Alexander the Great; but when he had said that one was born at Monmouth, and the other at Macedon, both beginning with the same letter, and that there was a river in both cities, he had exhausted his best parallelisms.—"Henry V.," iv. 7.

His parallel is, in all essential circumstances, as incorrect as that which Fluellen drew between Macedon and Monmouth.—Lord Macaulay.

Fluke. Hap-hazard. (Saxon, floc, whence fluke, a flounder.)

We seem to have discovered, as it were by a fluke, a most excellent rule for all future Cabinet arrangements.—The Times.

Flummery. Flattering nonsense, palaver. In Wales it is a food made of oatmeal steeped in water and kept till it has become sour. In Cheshire and Lancashire it is the prepared skin of oatmeal mixed with honey, ale, or milk; pap; blanc-mange. (Welsh, llymry, sour food, from llym, sour or sharp.)

Flunkey. A livery servant. (Old French, flunchier, a henchman.)

Flur. The bride of Cassivelaun, "for whose love the Roman Cæsar first invaded Britain."—Tennyson, "Æid."

Flush. I'm all of a flush. My whole hand of cards is of one and the same suit: as a "flush of clubs," a "flush of hearts," &c. (See below.)

I am flush of money. Full of money. A flush of water is a sudden and full flow of it. (Latin, flux.)

Strut was not very flush in [the] ready.—Dr. Arbuthnot.

Flutter. A very weak specimen of a fop, in the "Belle's Stratagem," by Mrs. Cowley.

Fly. An insect. All flies shall perish except one, and that is the bee-fly.—Koran.

The Mahometans say six animals besides man will go to heaven: Mahomet's camel, his horse Borak, Balaam's ass, Tobit's dog, Ketmir (the dog of the seven sleepers), and the honey-bee.

Crushing a fly on a wheel. Making a mountain of a mole-hill. Taking a wheel used for torturing criminals and heretics for killing a fly, which one might destroy with a flapper.

The fly on the coach-wheel. One who fancies himself of mighty importance, but who is in reality of none at all. The allusion is to the fable of a fly sitting on a chariot-wheel and saying, "See what a dust we make."

Not a fly with him. Domitian, the Roman emperor, was fond of catching flies, and one of his slaves being asked if the emperor was alone, wittily replied, "Not a fly with him."

Flies in Amber. An incongruous mixture of natural objects, which cause wonderment, like flies in amber. Leaves and insects are often found imbedded in amber, and the fact gave rise to a political satire, where a learned philosopher is represented as noting the phenomenon, and puzzling his brains to account for it. (See AMBER.)

Fly. A hackney coach; a cab. A contraction of Fly-by-night, as sedan-chairs on wheels used to be called in the regency. These "Fly-by-nights," patronised greatly by George, Prince of Wales, and his boon companions, during their wild night pranks at Brighton, were invented 1809, by John Butcher, a carpenter of Jew Street.

To fly in one's face. To get into a passion with a person; to insult; as a hawk, when irritated, flies in the face of its master.

To fly in the face of danger. To run in a foolhardy manner into danger, as a hen flies in the face of a dog or cat.

Fly-boy. The boy in a printing office who lifts the printed sheets off the press. He is called the fly-boy because he catches the sheets as they fly from the tympan (q.v.), immediately the frisket (q.v.) is opened. This is now generally performed by the pressmen.

Fly-by-night. One who defrauds his creditors by decamping at night-time. (See FLY.)

Flying Dutchman. A spectral ship, seen in stormy weather off the Cape of Good Hope, and considered ominous of ill luck. Sir Walter Scott says she was originally a vessel laden with precious metal, but a horrible murder having been committed on board, the plague broke out among the crew, and no port would allow the vessel to enter. The ill-fated ship still wanders about like a ghost, doomed to be sea-tossed, but never more to enjoy rest.

No flying without wings. Nothing can be done without the proper means.

Sine pennis vola're haud facillè est — Plautus.

Fogie or Fogey. An old Fogey. Properly an old military pensioner. This term is derived from the old pensioners of Edinburgh Castle, whose chief occupation was to fire the guns, or assist in quelling street riots. The word is allied to a host of Teutonic words, meaning policemen, guards, watchmen, protectors, and the like (q.v.)—fogat, phogat, vogel, foged, fogde, &c. Another plausible derivation is the French fougueux—peppery, irritable, tetchy. A correspondent in "Notes and Queries" tells us that the Scotch use the word fog as synonymous with "moss;" as the "fogie rose" (moss rose); the "fogie bee" (humble bee); a "rolling stone gathers no fog" (moss); and thinks that "old fogie" means "old mossy" (like a ruined tower). The suggestion is not without wit and poetical ingenuity.

Fo-hi or Foë. One of the chief deities of the Chinese. His mother, Moyë, was walking one day along a river bank when she became suddenly encircled by a rainbow, and at the end of twelve years was the mother of a son. During gestation she dreamed that she was pregnant with a white elephant, and hence the honours paid to this beast. (Asiat. Res.)

Foigard. A humorous French refugee priest, in the "Beaux Stratagem," by Farquhar.

Foil. That which sets off something to advantage. The allusion is to the metallic leaf used by jewellers to set off precious stones. (French, feuille; Latin, folium; Greek phyllon, a leaf.

Hector as a foil to set him off.—Broome.

It'll be your foil, Laertes. In mine ignorance
Your skill shall, like a star i' the darkest night,
Stick fiery off indeed.
Shakespeare, "Hamlet," v. 2.

He foiled me. He outwitted me. The allusion is to fighting with foils or blunt swords. Similar expressions are "I speared him," "I harpooned him," "I hooked him," "I piked him," &c. &c. (Welsh, fwyl, a thrust.)

If I be foiled, there is but one shamed who never was gracious.

Shakespeare, "As You Like It," i. 2.

To run a foil. To puzzle; to lead astray. The track of game is called its foil; and an animal hunted will sometimes run back over the same foil, in order to mislead its pursuers. This is the Saxon ful, German foul (foul), in allusion to the scent left behind.

Folio. A book of the largest size, formed by folding the paper only once, so that each sheet makes two leaves. It is from the Italian un libro in foglio, through the French in-folio. Fol. is the contraction for folio.

Folio (so-and-so) in mercantile books means page so-and-so, and sometimes the two pages which lie exposed at the same time, one containing the credit and the other the debit of one and the same account. So called because lodgers, &c., are made in folio. The paging is called the folio also.

Folio. In conveyances seventy-two words, and in Parliamentary proceedings ninety words, make a folio.

Folk. Latin, vulg' (the common people); German, volk; Dutch, volk; Saxon, folc; Danish, folk; our folk and vulgar.

Folk, fairies, also called "people," "neighbours," "wights." The Germans have their klein volk (little folk), the Swiss their hill people and earth people.

The little folk.

So happy and so gay, amuse themselves

Sometimes with singing...

Sometimes with dancing, when they jump and spring

Like the young skipping kids in the Alp-grass.

Bos, "Idyll of Gertrude and Rosy,"

In the hinder end of harvest, at All-hallow e'en,

When our good neighbours ride, if I read right,

Some buckled on ben-wand, and some on a becn....

Montgomery, "Fatale against Fatale,"

I crouched thee from the elves, and from wights.

Chaucer, "The Miller's Tale,"

Folk-lore. Legends, traditions, and superstitions connected with fairy mythology, customs, and ways.

Folk-mote (a folk meeting). A word used in England before the conquest for what we now call a Parliament.

Follets. Goblins of the North of France, who live in the houses of simple rustics, and can be expelled neither by water nor exorcism. They can be heard but are never seen. In the singular number, "Esprit Follet."

Follower. A male sweetheart, who follows the object of his affections. A word very common among servants. Mistresses say to female servants, "I allow no followers,"—i.e., I do not allow men to come into my house to see you.

Follow. Follow your nose, go straight on. He followed his nose, he went on and on without any discretion or thought of consequences.

Folly. Father of Folly (Abu Jahl) an aged chief who led 100 horse and 700 camels against Mahomet, and fell at the battle of Bedr. His own people called him Father of Wisdom (Abu Lhoem).

Folly. A country seat (French folie, a mansion, hall, or gentleman's house. (See "Spiers' Dictionary.")

Fisher's Folly. A large and beautiful house in Bishopsgate, with pleasure gardens, bowling-green, and hot-houses, built by Jasper Fisher, one of the six clerks of Chancery and a Justice of the Peace. Queen Elizabeth lodged there.

Kirby's castle, and Fisher's folly,
Spinola's pleasure, and Megge's glory.
Stowe, "Survey."

Fond. A foolish, fond parent. Here fond does not mean affectionate, but silly. Chaucer uses the word fonne for a simpleton, and the Scotch fou is to play the fool. Shakespeare has "fond desire," "fond love," "fond shekels of gold," "fond wretch," "fond mad-woman," &c. "Fondling" means an idiot, or one fond.

See how simple and how fond I am.

Shakespeare, "Midsummer Night's Dream," ii. 2.

Fonder than ignorance.

Shakespeare, "Troilus and Cressida," i. 1.

Fonda del Caiman, or the sign of the Crocodile, in "Croquemitaine."

Fondlewife. An uxorious banker in Congreve's "Old Bachelor."

Font, in printing, sometimes called Fount, a complete set of type of any one size with all the usual points and accents; a font consists of about 100,000 characters. The word is French fonte from fondre (to melt or cast). When a letter of a different type to the rest gets into a page it is called a "wrong font," and is signified in the margin by the two letters w.f.

Taken to the font, baptised. The font is a vessel employed for baptism.

Fontarabía. Now called Fuenterrabía (in Latin Fons rap'idus), near the Gulf of Gascony. Here, according to Maria'na and other Spanish historians, Charlemagne and all his chivalry fell by the sword of the Spanish Saracens. Mez'ray and the French writers say that the rear of the king's army being cut to pieces, Charlemagne returned and revenge'd their death by a complete victory.

When Charlemagne with all his peerage fell
By Fontarabia. Milton, "Paradise Lost," bk. I.

Food. Sir Walter Scott remarks that live cattle go by Saxon names, and slain meat by Norman-French, a standing evidence that the Normans were the lords who ate the meat, and the Saxons the serfs who tended the cattle. Examples:

Sheep Ox Calf Hog Pig (Saxon).
Mutton Beef Veal Bacon Pork (Norman-French).

Food of the gods. (See AMBROSIA, NECTAR.)

Fool. In chess, the French call the "bishop" fou, and used to represent the piece in a fool's dress; hence Regnier says, "Les fous sont aux échecs les plus proches des Rois" (14 Sat.). Fou is a corruption of the eastern word Fol (an elephant), as Thomas Hyde remarks in his Ludis Orientalibus i. 4, and on old boards the places occupied by our "bishops" were occupied by elephants.

A Tom Fool. A person who makes himself ridiculous. (See TOM.)

The ancient and noble family of Tom Fool.—Quarterly Review.

Every man hath a fool in his sleeve. No one is always wise. The allusion is to the tricks of jugglers.

As the fool thinks, so the bell clinks (Latin, "Quod valde volumus facile credimus"). A foolish person believes what he desires.

Fools.

(I.) The most celebrated court fools:

(a) Dag'onet, jester of King Arthur; Scogan, of Edward IV.; Thomas Killigrew, called "King Charles's jester" (1611-1682); Archie Armstrong, jester in the court of James I.

(b) Trib'oulet, jester of Louis XII. and François I. (1487-1536); Brusquet, of whom Brantôme says "he never had his equal in repartee" (1512-1563); Chicot, jester of Henri III. and IV. (1553-1591); and An'geli, jester of Louis XIV., last of the titled fools of France.

(c) Klaus Narr, jester of Frederick the Wise, elector of Prussia.

(d) Yorick, in the court of Denmark, referred to by Shakespeare in "Hamlet," v. 1.

(II.) Not attached to the court.

(a) Patrick Bonny, jester of the regent Morton; John Heywood, in the reign of Henry VII., author of numerous dramatic pieces, died 1565; Dickie Pearce, the fool of the earl of Suffolk, on whom Swift wrote an epitaph.

(b) Kunz von der Rosen, private jester to the emperor Maximilian I.

(c) Gonnella the Italian (q.v.).

(d) Le Glorieux, the jester of Charles le Hardi, of Burgundy.

(III.) Men worthy of the motley.

(a) Andrew Borde, physician to Henry VIII., usually called Merry Andrew (1500-1549).

(c) Jacob Paul, baron Gundling, who was laden with titles in ridicule by Frederick William I. of Prussia.

(d) Seigni Jean (Old John), so called to distinguish him from Johan "fol de Madame," of whom Marot speaks in his epitaphs. Seigni Jean lived about a century before Caillette.

(e) Caillette "flourished" about 1494. In the frontispiece of the "Ship of Fools," printed 1497, there is a picture both of Seigni Jean and also of Caillette.

Feast of Fools. A kind of Saturnalia, popular in the Middle Ages. Its chief object was to honour the ass on which our Lord made his triumphant entry into Jerusalem. This ridiculous mummery was held on the day of circumcision (January 1). The office of the day was first chanted in travesty; then a procession being formed, all sorts of absurdities, both of dress, manner, and instrumentation, were indulged in. An ass formed an essential feature, and from time to time the whole procession imitated the braying of this animal.

Fool's Bolt. A fool's bolt is soon shot ("Henry V.," iii. 7). Simpletons cannot wait for the proper time, but waste their resources in random endeavours; a fool and his money are soon parted. The allusion is to the British bowmen in battle, where the good soldier shot with a purpose, but the foolish soldier at random. (See Prov. xxix. 11.)

Foolscap. A corruption of the Italian folio-capo (folio-sized sheet). The error must have been very ancient, as the water-mark of this sort of paper from the thirteenth to the seventeenth century was a fool's head, with cap and bells.

Fool's Paradise. Unlawful pleasure, illicit love, vain hopes. Thus, in "Romeo and Juliet," the Nurse says to Romeo, "If ye should lead her (Juliet) into a fool's paradise, it were a gross . . . behaviour." The old schoolmen said there were three places where persons not good enough for paradise were admitted: (1) The limbus patrum, for those good men who had died before the death of the Redeemer; (2) The limbus infantum or paradise of unbaptised infants; and (3) The limbus fatuorum or paradise of idiots and others who were non compos mentis. (See LIMBO.)

Foot. Greek, pod'; Latin, ped'; French, piéd; Dutch, voet; Saxon, fo't; our foot, pedal, &c.

Foot of a page. The bottom of it.

Foot-notes. Notes placed at the bottom of a page.

A trifling sum of misery
New added to the foot of thy account.
Dryden.

I have not yet got my foot in. I am not yet familiar and easy with the work. The allusion is to the preliminary exercises in the great Roman foot-race. While the signal was waited for, the candidates made essays of jumping, running, and posturing, to excite a suitable warmth and make their limbs supple. This was "getting their foot in" for the race. (See HAND.)

You have put your foot in it nicely. You have got yourself into a pretty mess. A French expression, indicating that something nasty has been stamped into (vous avez mis le pied dedans—you have put your foot in it).

Your best foot foremost. Use all possible dispatch. To "set on foot" is to set agoing; so here, "your best foot" means your best powers of motion. If you have various powers of motion, set your best foremost.

Nay, but make haste; the bet'er foot before.
Shakespeare, "King John," iv. 2.

Turn away thy foot from the Sabbath (Isa. lviii. 13). Abstain from working and doing your own pleasure on that day. The allusion is to the law which prohibited a Jew from walking on a Sabbath more than a mile. He was not to "foot it" on that day, but was to turn away his foot from the road and street.

I have the measure or length of his foot. I know the exact calibre of his mind. The allusion is to the Pythagorean admeasurement of Hercules by the length of his foot. (See EX PEDE.)

The matter is now afoot. In train, stirring. Il marche bien, it goes on well.

Now let it work. Mischief, thou art afoot,
Take thou what course thou wilt.
Shakespeare, "Julius Cæsar," iii. 2.

Foot-breadth or Quern-biter. The sword of Thoralf Skolinson the Strong, a companion of Hako I. of Norway. (See SWORDS.)

Foot-lights. To appear before the foot-lights. On the stage, where a row of lights is placed in front along the floor to lighten it up.

Foot Monsters. In the Italian romance of "Guerino Meschino," Indians are spoken of with feet so large that they carry them over their heads like umbrellas.

Foot-pound. The unit of result in estimating work done by machinery. Thus, if we take 1 lb. as the unit of weight and 1 foot as the unit of distance, a foot-pound would be 1 lb. weight raised 1 foot.

Footing. He is on good footing with the world. He stands well with the world. This is a French phrase, Être sur un grand pied dans le monde. "Grand pied" means "large foot," and the allusion is to the time of Henry VIII., when the rank of a man was designated by the size of his shoe—the higher the rank the larger the shoe. The proverb would be more correctly rendered, "He has a large foot in society."

To pay your footing. To give money for drink when you first enter on a trade. Entry money for being allowed to put your foot in the premises occupied by fellow-craftsmen. This word is called foot-ale by ancient writers. (See GARNISH.)

Foppington (Lord). An empty coxcomb, in Vanbrugh's "Relapse," of which Sheridan's "Trip to Scarborough" is a modified version.

The shoemaker in the "Relapse" tells lord Foppington that his lordship is mistaken in supposing that his shoe pinches.—Lord Macaulay.

Forbès, referred to by Thomson in his "Seasons," was Duncan Forbes, of Cullo'den, lord president of the Court of Session. For many years he ruled the destinies and greatly contributed to the prosperity of Scotland. He was on friendly terms with Pope, Swift, Arbuthnot, &c. The word is now pronounced as a monosyllable.

Thee, Forbès, too, whom every worth attends....
Thy country feels thro' her reviving arts,
Planned by thy wisdom, by thy soul informed.

Autumn.

Forbidden Fruit (The), Mahometan doctors aver, was the banana or Indian fig, because fig-leaves were employed to cover the disobedient pair when they felt shame as the result of sin.

Forcible Feeble School. Applied to writers who crush flies upon wheels, and elaborate things not worth elaborating. They may be termed literary Nathos. Feeble, a recruit (in "Henry IV.," pt. 2), calls himself a "woman's tailor," but says "he will do his best," that "no one can die more than once," and "if one dies this year he cannot die next." Falstaff calls him "most forcible Feeble," "valiant as a wrathful dove or most magnanimous mouse."

Ford. Mr. and Mrs. Ford are characters in "The Merry Wives of Windsor." Mrs. Ford pretends to accept Sir John Falstaff's protestations of love, in order to punish him by her devices.

Fordelis (in "Orlando Furioso"). Wife of Bran'dimart, Orlando's intimate friend. When Brandimart was slain, she dwelt for a time in his mausoleum in Sicily, and died broken-hearted.

Fore and Aft. The whole length of a ship from stem to stern. The stem is called the fore-end, and the stern the hind-part or aft-end. (See STERN.)

A slight spar deck fore and aft.—Sir W. Raleigh.

Fore-castle. Ancient ships had a castle, as may be seen in the tapestry of the House of Lords, representing the Spanish Arma'da. The term fore-castle means before the castle. The Romans called the castled ships navēs tur'ritæ.

That part of the fore-castle which is aloft, and not in the hold, is called the prow.—Sir W. Raleigh.

Fore-close. To put an end to. A legal term, meaning to close before the time specified; g.e.—suppose I hold the mortgage of a man called A, and A fails to fulfil his part of the agreement, I can insist upon the mortgage being cancelled, foreclosing thus our agreement.

The embargo with Spain foreclosed this trade.—Carew.

Fore-shortened. The representation of an object, in drawing, as it appears when beheld obliquely. Thus a man's leg lying on the ground, with the sole of the foot presented foremost, would be perspectively shortened.

He forbids the fore-shortenings, because they make the parts appear little.—Dryden.

Forfar. Do as the cow o' Forfar did, tak' a stunnin' drink. A cow, in passing a door in Forfar, where a tub of ale had been placed to cool, drank the whole of it. The owner of the ale prosecuted the owner of the cow, but a learned baillie, in giving his decision, said, "As the ale was drank by the cow while standing at the door, it must be considered deoch an' doriùs (stirrup-cup), to make a charge for which would be to outrage Scotch hospitality."—Waverley.

Fork out. Hand over; pay down; stand treat. To fork out is properly to thrust your fingers into a person's pocket, then by "forking them," i.e., opening them like a pair of scissors, and closing them again, to draw out whatever is so caught up. We use the word fork in a similar way when we say, "the roads forked at this point," "forked lightning," a "forked tongue," &c. Fingers are also called forks.

Forlorn Hope means simply the troop sent forward. For-lorn is the Saxon fore-leoran (to send forward), and hope is haufe (a troop). Cromwell says,

"Our forlorn of horse marched within a mile of the enemy"—i.e., our horse picket sent forward to reconnoitre approached within a mile of the enemy's camp. In huntsman's language, a hound that goes before the rest of the pack, and follows the chase, is called a forlorn, or forloyne one.

Forlot or Firlot. The fourth part of a boll. From fewer (four), hlot (part).

Forma Pau'peris (Latin, Under plea of poverty). To sue in formâ pauperis. When a person has just cause of a suit, but is so poor that he cannot raise £5, the judge will assign him lawyers and counsel without the usual fees.

For'seti. God of Justice in Scandinavian mythology. He was a son of Baldur, and lived in Glitner Palace. (Old Norse, for-sitja, to preside.)

For'titer in Re (Latin). Firmness in doing what is to be done; an unflinching resolution to persevere to the end.

Fortunate Islands. Now called the Canaries.

Fortuna'tus. You have found Fortunate's purse. Are in luck's way. The nursery tale of "Fortuna'tus" records that he had an inexhaustible purse. It is from the Italian fairy tales of Straparola, called "Nights." Translated into French in 1585. (See WISHING CUP.)

Fortune. Fortune favours the brave. (Fortis fortuna adjuvat.) — Terence, "Phor'mio," i. 4.

Fortu'nio. The assumed name of a damsel, youngest of three sisters, who dressed herself as a cavalier to spare her aged father, who was summoned to the army. Fortunio on the way engaged seven servants: Strong-back, who could carry on his back enough liquor to fill a river; Lightfoot, who could traverse any distance in no time; Marksman, who could hit an object at any distance; Fine-ear, who could hear anything, no matter where uttered; Boisterer, who could do any amount of cudgelling; Gourmand, who could eat any amount of food; and Tippler, who could drink a river dry and thirst again. Fortunio having rendered invaluable services to king Alfourite, by the aid of her seven servants, at last married him.—Grimm's Goblins, "Fortunio."

Forty. A superstitious number, arising from the Scripture use. Thus Moses was forty days in the mount; Elijah was forty days fed by ravens; the rain of the flood fell forty days, and another forty days expired before Noah opened the window of the ark; forty days was the period of embalming; Jonah gave Nineveh forty days to repent; our Lord fasted forty days; he was seen forty days after his resurrection; &c.

St. Swithin betokens forty days' rain or dry weather; a quarantine extends to forty days; forty days, in the old English law, was the limit for the payment of the fine for manslaughter; the privilege of sanctuary was for forty days; the widow was allowed to remain in her husband's house for forty days after his decease; a knight enjoined forty days' service of his tenant; a stranger at the expiration of forty days was compelled to be enrolled in some tithing; members of parliament were protected from arrest forty days after the prorogation of the house, and forty days before the house was convened; a new-made burgess had to forfeit forty pence unless he built a house within forty days; &c. &c.

The ancient physicians ascribe many strange changes to the period of forty; the alchemists looked on forty days as the charmed period when the philosopher's stone and elixir of life were to appear.

Forty Thieves. In the tale of "Ali Baba."—Arabian Nights' Entertainments.

Forty Winks. A short nap. Forty is an indefinite number, meaning a few. Thus we say, "A, B, C, and forty more." Coriola'nus says, "I could beat forty of them," iii. 1. (See FORTY.)

The slave had forty thousand lives.

Shakespeare, "Othello," iii. 1.
I loved Ophelia; forty thousand brothers
Could not, with all their quantity of love
Make up my sum.

Shakespeare, "Hamlet," v. 1.

Fos'cari (Francis). Doge of Venice. He occupied the office for thirty-five years, added Brescia, Bergamo, Crema, and Ravenna to the Republic, greatly improved the city, and raised Venice to the pinnacle of its glory. Of his four sons only one, named Jacopo, survived, who was thrice tortured. Before his final banishment, the old doge, then eighty-four years of age, hobbled on crutches to the gaol where his son was confined, but would not mitigate the sentence of "The Ten." His son, being banished to Candia, died, and Francis was deposed. As he descended the Giant Staircase he heard the bell toll for the election of his successor, and dropped down dead.—Byron, "The Two Foscari."

Jacopo Foscari. Denounced by the Council of Ten for taking bribes of foreign powers. He was tried before his own father, confessed his guilt, and was banished. During his banishment a Venetian senator was murdered, and Jacopo, being suspected of complicity in the crime, was again tortured and banished. He returned to Venice, was once more brought before the council, subjected to torture, and banished to Candia, where in a few days he died.

Nothing can sympathise with Foscari.
Not e'en a Foscari.

Byron, "The Two Foscari."

Fos'eta. A Frissian goddess, who had a temple in Fos'etis-land. Called, since the preaching there of St. Willibrod in the seventh century, Hel'igoland (Holy land).

Foss (Corporal). An attendant on lieutenant Worthington. A similar character to Trim, in Sterne's "Tristram Shandy."—G. Colman, "The Poor Gentleman."

Foss-way. One of the four principal highways made by the Romans in England, leading from Cornwall to Lincoln. It had a foss or ditch on each side of it.

Fossa et Furca (Pit and Gallows). An ancient privilege granted by the crown to its vassals, to cast female felons into a ditch, and hang male ones on a gallows.

Fossils. Things dug up, animal and vegetable remains dug out of the earth. (Latin, fodio, to dig up.)

Many other bodies, which, because we discover them by diving into the bowels of the earth, are called by one common name, fossils, under which are comprehended metals and minerals. [Not now.]—Locke.

Foster Brother or Sister. One brought up by the same nurse.

A foster-child is one brought up by those who are not its real parents. (Saxon, fostrian, Danish, fostrer, to nurse.)

Fot'ei (3 syl.) or Miroku'. God of health and wealth, represented with a very projecting paunch (Japanese mythology).

Fou Drunk. "Wilbraham has fou-drunk"—i.e., is despicably drunk, dead drunk. (French, foutis, "base, despicable.") Or it may be the French fât, "a cask or barrel," hence senter le fât, "to smack of the cask."

Foul Proof. A proof is a rough impression of a manuscript set up in type, or of a drawing engraved, for the author's correction. The proof with many faults is a foul proof, but the "pull" after the errors are corrected is termed a clean proof. These impressions are called proofs because they must be approved of by author and reader before they are finally printed.

Foul-weather Jack. Commodore Byron, said to be as notorious for foul weather, as our queen is for fine. (1723-1786.)

Admiral Sir John Norris, who died 1746.

Fountain of Death. In "Jerusalem Delivered," the hermit tells Charles and Ubald of a fountain, the sight of which excites thirst, but those who taste its water die with laughter.

Pomponius Mela speaks of a fountain in the Fortunate Islands, "Qui potaverë risu solvuntur in mortem." Petrarch alludes to the same.

These fountains symbolise the pleasures of sin.

Fountain of Youth. A fountain supposed to possess the power of restoring youth. It was thought to be on one of the Baha'ma Islands, and was the object of earnest search by Juan Ponce de Leon, the Spanish navigator.

Four Kings. The History of the Four Kings (Livre des Quatre Rois). A pack of cards. In a French pack the four kings are Charlemagne, David, Alexander, and Cæsar, representatives of the four great monarchies—the Franco-German, Jewish or Christian, Macedonian, and Roman.

Four Letters, containing the name of God, and called by divines "tetragrammaton." Thus, in Hebrew, JHVH (JeHoVaH); in Greek, Θεος; in Latin, Dens; in French, Dieu; in Assyrian, Adad; Dutch, Godt; German, Gott; Danish, Godh; Swedish, Goth.

Four Masters. Michael and Cu-coirighe O'Clerighe, Maurice and Fear-feafa Conry, authors of the "Annals of Donegal."

Fou'rierism. A communistic system so called from Charles Fourier, of Besançon. According to Fourier all the world was to be cantoned into groups, called phalansteries, consisting each of 400 families or 1,800 individuals, who were to live in a common edifice, furnished with workshops, studios, and all sources of amusement. The several groups were at the same time to be associated together under a unitary government, like the cantons of Switzerland or the States of America. Only one language was to be admitted; all the gains of each phalanstery were to belong to the common purse; and though talent and industry were to be rewarded, no one was to be suffered to remain indigent, or without the enjoyment of certain luxuries and public amusement. (1772-1837).

Fou'rierists. French communists, so called from Charles Fourier. (See above.)

Fowler. Henry the Fowler. Heinrich I., emperor of Germany, was so called, because when the deputies announced to him his election to the throne, they found him fowling with a hawk on his fist. (876, 919-936.)

Fox. An old English broadsword. (Latin, fulx; French, fauchon; our jul-chion.)

O signieur Dew, thou dy'st on point of fox,
Except, O signieur, thou do give to me
Eg'regious ransom,
Shakespeare, "Henry V.," iv. 4.

I had a sword, ay, the flower of Smithfield for a sword, a right fox i' faith.—Two Angry Women of Abington. (1590.)

Fox. So our Lord called Herod Agrippa II., whose crafty policy was thus pointed at, "Go ye, and tell that fox, Behold, I cast out devils" (St. Luke xiii. 32). (31-100.)

Marshal Soult was nicknamed The old Fox, from his strategic talents and fertility of resources. (1769-1851.) (See REYNARD.)

Fox. In illustration of Shylock's remark, that some men "cannot abide a gaping pig, and others a harmless cat," it may be stated that Tycho Brahe always fainted at sight of a fox; marshal d'Albert at a pig; Henri III. at a cat; and duke d'Epernon at a leveret.

A wise fox will never rob his neighbour's hen-roost, because it would soon be found out. He goes further from home, where he is not known.

Every fox must pay his skin to the furrier. (French, En fin le renard se trouve chez le pelletier.) The crafty shall be taken in their own wiliness.

Tutte le volpi si trovano in pellicaria.—Italian Proverb.

He sets a fox to keep his geese. (Latin, Ovem lupo commisit.) He entrusted his money to sharpers.

Fox-glove, called by the Welsh Fairy's glove, and by the Irish Fairy-bells, is either a corruption of Folk's glove—i.e., the glove of the good folks or fairies, or else of the Latin fuscus, Italian fosco, meaning "red." (Welsb, Meny Ellylon.)

Fox-sleep. A pretended sleep. The fox, like the cat, simulates sleep in order to deceive its prey. It is said that a fox always sleeps with one eye open.

Fox-tail. I gave him a flap with a fox-tail. I cajoled him; made a fool of him. The fox-tail was one of the badges of the motley, and to flap with a fox-tail is to treat one like a fool.

Foxy. Strong-smelling, or red-haired; like a fox.

Fra Diav'olo (Michele Pezza). A celebrated brigand and renegade monk, who evaded pursuit for many years amidst the mountains of Calabria (1760-1806). Auber has made him the subject of an opera.

Fradu'bio (Brother Doubt), says Spenser, wooed and won Dnessa (Fa'se-faith); but one day, while she was bathing, discovered her to be a "filthy old hag," and resolved to leave her. False-faith instantly metamorphosed him into a tree, and he will never be relieved till "he can be bathed from the well of living water."—"Fa'ery Queen," book i.

Frame of Mind. Disposition. A printer's frame is a stand on which the type is dis-posed; a founder's frame is a mould into which molten metal is dis-posed or poured; a weaver's frame is a loom where the silk or thread is dis-posed or stretched for quilting, &c.; a picture frame is an ornamental edging within which the picture is dis-posed; a mental frame, therefore, is the boundary within which the feelings of the mind are dis-posed.

Frances'ca. A Venetian maiden, daughter of Minotti, governor of Corinth. She loved Alp, and tried to restore him to his country and faith, but, as he refused to recant, gave him up, and died broken-hearted.—Byron, "Siege of Corinth."

France. The heraldic device of the city of Paris is a ship. As Sanval says, "L'île de la cité est faite comme un grand navire enfoncé dans la vase, et échoué au fil de l'eau vers le milieu de la Seine." This form of a ship struck the heraldic scribes, who in the latter part of the middle ages emblazoned a ship on the shield of Paris.

Frances'ca da Rim'ini. Daughter of Guido da Polenta, lord of Ravenna. Her story is told in Dantë's "Inferno" (c. v.), from which it seems that she committed adultery with Lanciotto, her husband's brother, and was put to death, with her paramour, by her husband in 1389. Leigh Hunt has a poem, and Silvio Pellico a tragedy, on the subject.

Franciscans, or Min'orites (3 syl.). Founded in 1208 by St. Francis of Assisi, who called poverty "his bride." Poverty was the ruling principle of the order. Duns Scotus, Roger Bacon, cardinal Ximenes, Ganganelli, &c., were of this order.

Frangipa'ni. A powerful Roman family. So called from their benevolent distribution of bread during a famine.

Frangipani. A delicious perfume, made of spices, orris-root, and musk, in imitation of real Frangipani. Mercurio Frangipani, the famous Italian botanist, visited the West Indies in 1493. The sailors perceived a delicious fragrance as they neared Antigua, and Mercurio told them it proceeded from the Pluméria Alba. The plant was re-named Frangipani, and the distilled essence received the same name.

Frangipani pudding is pudding made of broken bread. (Frangere, to break; panis, bread.)

Frank. A name given by the Turks, Greeks, and Arabs, to any of the inhabitants of the western parts of Europe, as the English, Italians, Germans, Spaniards, French, &c.

Frank Pledge. Neighbours bound for each other's good conduct. Hallam says every ten men in a village were answerable for each other, and if one of them committed an offence the other nine were bound to make reparation. The word means the security given by Franklins or free-men.

Frankelynes Tale, in Chaucer, resembles one in Boccaccio, "Decameron," Day x. No. 5, and one in the fifth book of his "Philopoe." (See DORIGEN.)

Frank'enstein (3 syl.). A young student, who made a soulless monster out of fragments of men picked up from churchyards and dissecting-rooms, and endued it with life by galvanism. The tale, written by Mrs. Shelley, shows how the creature longed for sympathy, but was shunned by every one. It was only animal life, a parody on the creature man, powerful for evil, and the instrument of dreadful retribution on the student who usurped the prerogative of the Creator.

The Southern Confederacy will be the soulless monster of Frankenstein.—Charles Sumner.

Frankforters. The people of Frankfort.

Franklin. The Polish Franklin. Thaddeus Czacki. (1765-1813.)

Frantic. Brain-struck (Greek, phren, the brain), madness being a disorder of the brain.

Cebel's frantic rites have made them mad.
Spenser.

Frater. An Abram-man (q.v.). (Latin, frater, a brother, one of the same community or society.)

Frat'eret'to. A fiend mentioned by Edgar in the tragedy of "King Lear."

Frateretto calls me, and tells me Nero is an angler in the lake of darkness. Pray, innocent, and beware of the foul fiend.—Act iii. 6.

Frat'ery. The refectory of a monastery, or chief room of a frater-house. A frater is a member of a fraternity or society of monks. (Latin, frater, a brother.)

Frat'icellians (Little Brethren). A sect of the Middle Ages, who claimed to be the only true Church, and threw off all subjection to the pope, whom they denounced as an apostate. They wholly disappeared in the fifteenth century.

Fre'a. The Anglo-Saxon form of Frigga, wife of Odin. Our Friday is Freu's daeg.

Free. A free and easy, a social gathering where persons meet together without formality to chat and smoke.

Free Bench (francus bancus). The widow's right to a copyhold. It is not a dower or gift, but a free right independent of the will of the husband. Called bench because, upon acceding to the estate, she becomes a tenant of the manor, and one of the benchers—i.e., persons who sit on the bench occupied by the parës curiæ.

Freebooter means a free rover. (Dutch, buiten, to rove, whence vry-buiter; German, freibeuter, &c.)

His forces consisted mostly of base people and free-booters.—Bacon.

Freeholds. Estates which owe no duty or service to any lord but the sovereign. (See COPYHOLD.)

Free-lances. Roving companies of knights, &c., who wandered from place to place, after the Crusades, selling their services to any one who would pay for them. In Italy they were termed Condottieri.

Freeman (Mrs.). A name assumed by the duchess of Marlborough in her correspondence with queen Anne. The queen called herself Mrs. Morley.

Freeman of Bucks. A cuckold. The allusion is to the buck's horn. (See HORNS.)

Freeman's Quay. Drinking at Freeman's Quay. Free of cost. There was once a celebrated wharf so called, near London Bridge, where the porters, carmen, &c., had beer given them gratis.

Freemasons. In the Middle Ages a guild of masons specially employed in building churches. Called "free" because exempted by several papal bulls from the laws which bore upon common craftsmen, and exempt from the burdens thrown on the working classes.

The Lady freemason was the Hon. Miss Elizabeth St. Leger, daughter of Lord Doneraile, who (says the tale) hid herself in an empty clock-case when the lodge was held in her father's house, and witnessed the proceedings. She was discovered, and compelled to submit to initiation as a member of the craft.

Freeport (Sir Andrew). A London merchant, industrious, generous, and of great good sense. He was one of the members of the hypothetical club under whose auspices the "Spectator" was published.

Free-spirit. Brethren of the Free Spirit, a fanatical sect, between the thirteenth and fifteenth century, diffused through Italy, France, and Germany. They claimed "freedom of spirit," and based their claims on Romans viii. 2—14, "The law of the Spirit hath made me free from the law of sin and death."

Freestone is Portland stone, which cuts freely in any direction.

Free-thinker. One who thinks unbiassed by revelation or ecclesiastical canons, as deists and atheists.

Atheist is an old-fashioned word. I am a free-thinker.—Addison.

Free Trade. The Apostle of Free Trade. Richard Cobden (1804-65).

Freezing-Point. We generally mean by this expression that degree of Fahrenheit's thermometer which indicates the temperature of frozen water—viz., 32° above zero. If we mean any other liquid we add the name, as the freezing-point of milk, sulphuric ether, quicksilver, and so on. In centigrade and Réaumur's instruments zero marks the freezing-point.

Freischütz (pronounce fry-shoots), the free-shooter, a legendary German archer in league with the devil, who gave him seven balls, six of which were to hit infallibly whatever the marksman aimed at, and the seventh was to be directed according to the will of his co-partner. F. Kind made the libretto, and Weber set to music, the opera based on the legend, called "Der Freischütz."

Freki and Geri. The two wolves of Odin.

French Cream. Brandy. In France it is extremely general to drink after dinner a cup of coffee with a glass of brandy in it instead of cream. This "patent digester" is called a Gloria.

French Leave. To take French leave. To take without asking leave or giving any equivalent. The allusion is to the French soldiers, who in their invasions take what they require, and never wait to ask permission of the owners or pay any price for what they take.

Frenchman. Done like a Frenchman, turn and turn again ("1 Henry VI., iii. 4). The French are usually satirised by mediæval English authors as a fickle, wavering nation. Dr. Johnson says he once read a treatise the object of which was to show that a weather-cock is a satire on the word Gallus (a Gaul or cock).

Frenchman. The nickname of a Frenchman is "Crapaud" (q.v.), "Johnny" or "Jean," "Moosoo," "Robert Macaire" (q.v.); but of a Parisian "Grenonille" (Frog). (See BRISOTINS.)

They stand erect, they dance where'er they walk;
Monkeys in action, perroquets in talk.
Gay, "Epistle III."

French Canadian, "Jean Baptiste."

French Peasantry, "Jacques Bonhomme."

French Reformers, "Brissotins" (q.v.).

Fresco-painting means fresh-painting, or rather paint applied to walls while the plaster is fresh and damp. Only so much plaster must be spread as the artist can finish painting before he retires for the day. There are three chambers in the pope's palace at Rome done in fresco by Raphael Urbino and Julio Roma'no; at Fontainebleau there is a famous one, containing the travels of Ulysses in sixty pieces, the work of several artists, as Bollame'o, Martin Rouse, and others.

A fading fresco here demands a sigh.

Pope.

Fresh-man, at College, is a man not salted. It was anciently a custom in the different colleges to play practical jokes on the new-comers. One of the most common was to assemble them in a room and make them deliver a speech. Those who acquitted themselves well had a cup of caudle; those who passed muster had a caudle with salt water; the rest had the salt water only. The ceremony being over, the spouters were received by their companions as inaugurated collegians. (See BEJAN.)

Freston. An enchanter introduced into the romance of "Don Belia'nis of Greece."

Truly I can't tell whether it was Freston or Friston; but sure I am that his name ended in "ton."—Don Quixote.

Freyja. Daughter of Niord, goddess of love; drawn in a car yoked with cats. She is the Venus of the north. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Frey. (See FREYR.)

Freyr. Son of Niord, of the dynasty of the Vanagods; god of fertility and peace, and the dispenser of rain. He was the patron god of Sweden and Iceland, and rode on the boar called Gullinbursti. (See GERDA.)

Friar, in printing. A part of the sheet which has failed to receive the ink, and is therefore left blank. As Caxton set up his printing-press in Westminster Abbey, it is but natural to suppose that monks and friars should give foundation to some of the printers' slang. (See MONK.)

Friar Dom'nic, in Dryden's "Spanish Friar," designed to ridicule the vices of the priesthood.

Friar Ger'und. Designed to ridicule the pulpit oratory of Spain in the eighteenth century; full of quips and cranks, tricks and startling monstrosities.—Joseph Isla, "Life of Friar Gerund." (1714-1783.)

Friar John. A tall, lean, wide-mouthed, long-nosed friar of Seville, who dispatched his matins with wonderful celerity, and ran through his vigils quicker than any of his fraternity. He swore lustily, and was a Trojan to fight. When the army from Lernë pillaged the convent vineyard, Friar John seized the staff of a cross, and pummelled the rogues most lustily. He beat out the brains of some, crushed the arms of others, battered their legs, cracked their ribs, gashed their faces, broke their thighs, tore their jaws, dashed in their teeth, dislocated their joints, that never corn was so mauled by the threshers' flail, as were these pillagers by the ("baton of the cross."—Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel," bk. i. 27.

If a joke more than usually profane is to be uttered. Friar John is the spokesman.... A mass of lewdness, debauchery, profanity, and valour.—Foreign Quarterly Review.

Friar Laurence, in "Romeo and Juliet," by Shakespeare.

Friar Rush. A house-spirit, sent from the infernal regions in the seventeenth century to keep the monks and friars in the same state of wickedness they were then in. The legends of this roysterer are of German origin. (Bruder Rausch, brother Tiptic.)

Friar Tuck. Chaplain and steward of Robin Hood. Introduced by Sir Walter Scott in "Ivanhoe." He is a pudgy, paunchy, humorous, self-indulgent, and combative clerical Falstaff. His costume consisted of a russet habit of the Franciscan order, a red corded girdle with gold tassel, red stockings, and a wallet. A friar was nicknamed tuck, because his dress was tucked by a girdle at the waist. Thus, Chaucer says, "Tucked he was, as is a frere about."

In this our spacious isle I think there is not one
But he hath heard some talk of hood and Little John;
Of Tuck, the merry friar, which many a sermon
made
In praise of Robin Hood, his outlaws, and their trade. Drayton, "Polyolion," s. 25.

Friars (brothers). Applied to the four great religious orders: Dominicans, Franciscans, Augustines, and Carmelites. Later, a fifth order was added—that of the Trinitarians. The first two were called Black and Grey friars, the Carmelites were called White friars, and the Trinitarians Crutched friars (q.v.).

Friars. (See BLACK.)

Friar's Heel. The outstanding upright stone at Stonehenge is so called. Geoffrey of Monmouth says the devil bought the stones of an old woman in Ireland, wrapped them up in a wyth and brought them to Salisbury plain. Just before he got to Mount Ambre the wyth broke, and one of the stones fell into the Avon, the rest were carried to the plain. After the fiend had fixed them in the ground, he cried out, "No man will ever find out how these stones came here." A friar replied, "That's more than thee canst tell," whereupon the foul fiend threw one of the stones at him and struck him on the heel. The stone stuck in the ground, and remains so to the present hour.

Friar's Lantern. Milton uses the expression as a synonym of "Jack o' Lantern," but Friar Rush, the esprit follet, who got admittance into a monastery as a scullion, and played the monks sad pranks, was not a field bogie but a house spirit, and is never called "Jack." The poet seems to have considered Friar Rush the same as "Friar with the Rush (light)," and, therefore, Friar with the Lantern or Will o' the Wisp.

She was pinched and pulled, she said,
And he by Friar's lantern led
Milton, "L'Allegro."
Better we had through mire and bush
Been lantern-led by Friar Rush,
Sir Walter Scott, "Marmion."

Friars Major (Fratrēs majores). The Dominicans.

Friars Minor (Fratrēs minores). The Francis'cans.

Friar's Tale. A certain archdeacon had a sumpnour, who acted as his secret spy, to bring before him all offenders. One day as he was riding forth on his business he met the devil disguised as a yeoman, swore eternal friendship, and promised to "go snacks" with him. They first met a carter whose cart stuck in the road, and he cried in his anger, "The devil take it, both horse and cart and hay!" Soon the horse drew the cart out of the slough, and cried, "God bless you, my brave boy!" "There," said the devil, "is my own true brother, the churl spake one thing but he thought another." They next came to an old screw, and the sumpnour declared he would squeeze twelve pence out of her for sin, "though of her he knew no wrong;" so he knocked at her door and summoned her "for cursing" to the archdeacon's court, but said he would overlook the matter for twelve pence, but she pleaded poverty and implored mercy. "The foul fiend fetch me if I excuse thee," said the sumpnour, whereat the devil replied that he would fetch him that very night, and seizing him round the body, made off with him. —Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales."

Fribble. An effeminate coxcomb of weak nerves, in Garrick's farce of "Miss in her Teens."

Friday is the Mahometan sabbath. It was the day on which Adam was created, and our Lord was crucified. The Sabe'ans consecrate it to Venus or Astartë. (See FREA.)

Friday. Fairies and all the tribes of elves of every description, according to mediæval romance, are converted into hideous animals on Friday, and remain so till Monday. (See the romance of "Gueri'no Meschi'no," and others.)

Friday, Lucky. In America, Friday is a lucky day, and a large number of their greatest political events have been consummated on that day.

Sir William Churchill says, "Friday is my lucky day. I was born, christened, married, and knighted on that day; and all my best accidents have befallen me on a Friday."

In Scotland Friday is the most usual day for weddings, but they are very rarely performed on that day in England.

Friday, Unlucky. Because it was the day of our Lord's crucifixion; it is accordingly a fast-day in the Roman Catholic Church. Soames says, "Adam and Eve ate the forbidden fruit on a Friday, and died on a Friday." (Anglo-Saxon Church, p. 255.)

Long Friday, Good Friday, long being a synonym of great. Thus Mrs. Quickly says, "'Tis a long loan for a poor lone woman to bear" ("Henry IV."), and the Scotch proverb, "Between you and the long day"—i.e., the great or judgment day. Good Friday in Danish is Langfredag, and in Swedish Långfredag.

He who laughs on Friday will weep on Sunday. Sorrow follows on the wake of joy. The line is taken from Racine's comedy of "Les Plaideurs."

Friday. (See BLACK.)

My Man Friday. The young savage found by Robinson Crusoe on a Friday, and kept as his servant and companion on the desert island.

Friday Street (London). A corruption of Friga Street. (See FRIGGA.)

Friends. "Lovely and pleasant in their lives, and in their death they are not divided." Said of Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. i. 2—3.) (See ACHATES.)

Friend at Court properly means a friend in a court of law who watches the trial, and tells the judge if he can nose out an error; but the term is more generally applied to a friend in the royal court, who will whisper a good word for you to the sovereign at the proper place and season. (See AMICUS CURIE.)

Friend of Man. Marquis de Mirabeau. So called from one of his works, "L'ami des Hommes" (5 vols.). This was the father of the great Mirabeau, called by Barnave "The Shakespeare of eloquence" (1715-1789).

Friendship, examples of—

Her'culës and Iola'os; Theseus and Pirith'ous; Pyl'adës and Orestës; Achilles and Patroc'lus; Idom'eneus and Mer'ion; Diome'dës and Sthen'elos; Harmo'dios and Aristogi'ton; Epaminon'das and Pelop'idas; Septim'ios and Alcander (all Greeks); Damon and Pyth'ias; Scharissa and Am'oret (Syracusans); Amys and Amylion (q.v.); David and Jonathan; our divine Redeemer and the apostle John.

Frieze. The central part of the entablature of a building, generally enriched with sculpture. (Italian, fregio, an ornament, &c.)

Frigga, in the genealogy of Ases, is the supreme goddess, wife of Odin, and daughter of the giant Fiörgwyn. She presides over marriages, and may be called the Juno of the Valhalla. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Frilingi. The second rank of people among the ancient Saxons. (See EDHLINGI.)

Fringe. The Jews wore fringes to their garments, and these fringes on the garments of the priests were accounted sacred, and were touched by the common people as a charm. Hence the desire of the woman who had the issue of blood to touch the fringe of our Lord's garment (Matt. ix. 20-22).

Frippery. Rubbish of a tawdry character; worthless finery; foolish levity. A friperer or fripperer is one who deals in frippery, either to sell or clean old clothes. (French, fripierie, old clothes and cast-off furniture.)

We know what belongs to a frippery,
Shakespeare, "Tempest," iv. 1.

Old cloaths, cast dresses, tattered rags,
Whose works are e'en the frippery of wit,
Ben Jonson.

Frippery properly means rags and all sorts of odds and ends. French, fripie (a rag), fripierie (old clothes and furniture), fripier (a broker of old clothes, &c.). Applied to pastry. Eugène Grandet says, "En Anjou la frippe exprime l'accompagnement du pain, depuis le beurre plus distinguée des frippes."

Frisket. The light frame of the printing-press, which folds down upon the tympan (q.v.) over the sheet of paper to be printed. Its object is two-fold—to hold the sheet in its place and to keep the margins clean. It is called frisket because it frisks or skips up and down very rapidly—i.e., the pressman opens it and shuts it over with great alacrity, the movement being called "flying the frisket."

Frisco'. God of peace and pleasure among the ancient Saxons.

Frith. By frith and fell. By wold and wild, wood and common. Frith is the Welsh frith or friz, and means a "woody place." Fell is the German fels (rock), and means barren or stony places, a common.

Frithiof (pron. Frit-yoff) means "peace-maker." In the Icelandic myths he married Ingëborg (In-ge-boy'-e), the daughter of a petty king of Norway, and widow of Hring, to whose dominions he succeeded. His adventures are recorded in the Saga which bears his name, and which was written at the close of the thirteenth century.

Frithiof's Sword. Angurva'del (stream of anguish).

Fritz. Old Fritz. Frederick II. the Great, king of Prussia. (1712, 1740-1786.)

Fro. God of the air and tempests. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Frog. A frog offered to carry a mouse across a ditch with the intention of drowning it, but both were carried off by a kite.

Old Æsop's fable, where he told
What fate unto the mouse and frog befell.
Cury, "Dante," exxiii.

Nic Frog is the Dutchman (not Frenchman) in Arbuthnot's "History of John Bull." Frogs are called "Dutch Nightingales."

Frogs. Frenchmen, properly Parisians. So called from their ancient heraldic device, which was three frogs or three toads. Qu'en disent les genouilles? What will the frogs (people of Paris) say, was in 1791 a common court phrase at Versailles. There was a point in the pleasantry when Paris was a quagmire, called Lutetia (mud-land) because, like frogs or toads, they lived in mud, but now it is quite an anomaly. (See CRAPAUD.)

Frogs. The Lycian shepherds were changed into frogs for mocking Latona. Ovid, "Met.," vi. 4.

As when those hind's that were transformed to frogs
Railed at Latona's twin-born progeny.
Milton, "Sonnet," vii.

It may be all fun to you, but it is death to the frogs. The allusion is to the fable of the boy stoning the frogs, who was told by one of the persecuted creatures, "It may be fun to you; but it is death to us."

Frollo (Archdeacon Claude). A priest who has a great reputation for sanctity, but falls in love with a gipsy girl, and pursues her with relentless persecution, because she will not yield to him. — Victor Hugo, "Notre Dame de Paris."

Fronde. A political squabble during the ministry of cardinal Maz'arin, in the minority of Louis XIV. (1648-1653.) The malcontents were called Frondeurs from a witty illustration of a councillor, who said that they were "like school-boys who sling stones about the streets. When no eye is upon them they are bold as bullies; but the moment a 'policeman' approaches, away they scamper to the ditches for concealment" (Montglat). The French for a sling is fronde, and for slingers, frondeurs.

Frondeur. (See FRONDE.)

Frontalet'to. Name of Sa'cripant's horse. — Orlando Furioso.

Fronti'no, once called Balisarda. Name of Rogero's horse. — Orlando Furioso.

The renowned Frontino, which Bradamantë purchased at so high a price, could never be thought thy equal. — Don Quixote.

Frost. Jack Frost. The personification of frost.

Jack Frost looked forth, one still, clear night,
And he said, "Now I shall be out of sight;
So over the valley and over the height
In silence I'll take my way."
Miss Gould.

Froth (Master). "A foolish gentleman" in "Measure for Measure."

Lord Froth. A pompous coxcomb in "The Double Dealer," by Congreve.

Frozen Music. Architecture. So called by F. Schlegel.

Frozen Words appears to have been a household joke with the ancient Greeks, for Antiphanës applies it to the discourses of Plato: "As the cold of certain cities is so intense that it freezes the very words we utter, which remain congealed till the heat of summer thaws them, so the mind of youth is so thoughtless that the wisdom of Plato lies there frozen, as it were, till it is thawed by the ripened judgment of mature age."—Plutarch's Morals.

The moment their backs were turned, little Jacob thawed, and renewed his crying from the point where Quip had frozen him.—Dickens, "Curiosity Shop."

Truth in person doth appear
Like words concealed in northern air.
Butler, "Hudibras," pt. i. l.

Every one knows the incident of the "Frozen Horn" related in "Baron Munchausen."

Frumen'tius (St.). Apostle of Ethiopia and the Abyssinians in the fourth century.

Fry. Children (a word of contempt). Get away, you young fry. It means properly a crowd of young fishes, and its application to children should be limited to those that obstruct your path, crowd about you, or stand in your way. (French, frai, spawn.)

Nothing to fry with (French). Nothing to eat; nothing to live on. (See WIDENOSTRILS.)

Frying-pan. Out of the frying-pan into the fire. In trying to extricate yourself from one evil, you fell into a greater. The Greeks used to say, "Out of the smoke into the flame;" and the French say, "Tombre de la poêle dans la braise."

Fuacam et Flagellum (gallows and whip). The meanest of all servile tenures, the bondman being at the lord's mercy, both life and limb.

Fuh. To steal, to prig. (French, fourbi, "a Jew who conceals a trap;" fourber, "to cheat;" four, "a false pocket for concealing stolen goods.")

Fuch (fox). A freshman of the first year in the German University. In the second year he is called a Bursch.

Fudge. A statement concocted to fadge in with something. The word is the same as fadge, "to have one part consistent with another." (Saxon, fiegen; German, fügen; Gaelic, ffug, deception.)

Disraeli quotes the following clause:

There was, in our time, one Captain Fudge, a commander of a merchant-man; who, upon his return from a voyage, always brought home a good cargo of lies; inasmuch that now, aboard ship, the sailors, when they hear a great lie, cry out, Fudge!—Remarks upon the Navy. (1701.)

We were put on board the Black Eagle. The master's name was Fudge, by some called Lying Fudges.—Mr. Crouch, "A Collection of Papers." (1712.)

Fudge Family. A series of metrical epistles by Thomas Moore, purporting to be written by a family on a visit to Paris.

Fuel. Adding fuel to fire. Saying or doing something to increase the anger of a person already angry. The French say, "pouring oil on fire."

Fuggers. German merchants, proverbial for their great wealth. "Rich as a Fugger" is common in old English dramatists. Charles V. introduced some of the family into Spain, where they superintended the mines.

I am neither an Indian merchant, nor yet a Fugger, but a poor boy like yourself.—Guzman d'Alfarache.

Fugleman means properly wingman, but is applied to a soldier who stands in front of men at drill to show them what to do. Their proper and original post was in front of the right wing. (German, flügel, a wing.)

Fulhams, or Fullams. Loaded dice. So called from the suburb where the bishop of London resides, which, in the reign of queen Elizabeth, was the most notorious place for black-legs in all England. Dice made with a cavity were called "Gourds." Those made to throw the high numbers (from five to twelve) were called "High Fullams" or "Gourds," and those made to throw the low numbers (from ace to four) were termed "Low Fullams" or "Gourds."

For gourd and fallam holds,
And "high" and "low" beguile the rich and poor.
Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," l. 3.

Fulhams. Make-believes. So called from false or loaded dice. (See above.)

Fulhams of poetic fiction.
Butler, "Hudibras," pt. ii. l.

Have their fulhams at command,
Brought up to do their feats at hand.
Butler, "Upon Gaming."

Full Cry. When all the hounds have caught the scent, and give tongue in chorus.

Fum, or Fung (the phoenix). One of the four symbolical animals supposed to preside over the destinies of the Chinese empire. It originated from the element of fire, was born in the Hill of the Sun's Halo, and has its body inscribed with the five cardinal virtues. It has the forepart of a goose, the hind-quarters of a stag, the neck of a snake, the tail of a fish, the forehead of a fowl, the down of a duck, the marks of a dragon, the back of a tortoise, the face of a swallow, the beak of a cock, is about six cubits high, and perches only on the woo-tung tree. It is this curious creature that is embroidered on the dresses of certain mandarins.

Fu'mage (2 syl.). A tax for having a fire, mentioned in Domesday Book, and abolished by William III. (Latin, fumus, smoke.)

Fume. In a fume. In ill-temper, especially from impatience. The French say, Fumer sans tabac; Fumer sans pipe (to put oneself into a rage). Smoking with rage, or rather with the ineffectual vapour of anger.

A! Rienot, il est couragieux
Pour un homme aventureux
Et terrible quant il se fume.
L'Aventureux (a farce).

Fund. The sinking fund is money set aside by the Government for paying off a part of the national debt. This money is "sunk," or withdrawn from circulation, for the bonds purchased by it are destroyed.

Funds or Public Funds. Money lent at interest to Government on Government security. It means the national stock, which is the foundation of its operations.

To be interested in the funds is to have money in the public funds.

A rise in the funds is when the quotation is higher than it was before.

A fall in the funds is when the quotation is lower than when it was last quoted.

Funeral means a torchlight procession (from the Latin, funus, a torch), be-ause funerals among the Romans took place at night by torchlight, that magistrates and priests might not be violated by seeing a corpse, and so be prevented from performing their sacred duties.

Funeral Banquet. The custom of giving a feast at funerals came to us from the Romans, who not only feasted the friends of the deceased, but also distributed meat to the persons employed.

Thrift, thrift, Horatio! the funeral baked meats
Did coldly furnish forth the marriage tables.
Shakespeare, "Hamlet," l. 2.

Fungo'so. A character in "Every Man in His Humour," by Ben Jonson.

Unlucky as Fungoso in the play.
Pope, "Essay on Criticism," 323.

Funny Bone. A pun on the word humerus. The bone at the end of the os humeri, or bone which runs from the shoulder to the elbow.

Furbelow. A corruption of falbala, a word in French, Italian, and Spanish, to signify a sort of flounce.

Flounced and furbelowed from head to foot.—Addison.

Furca. (See Fossa.)

Furor. Son of Occasion, an old hag, who was quite bald behind. Sir Guyon bound him "with a hundred iron chains and a hundred knots."—Spenser, "Faery Queen," bk. ii.

Fusberta. Rinaldo's sword is so called in "Orlando Furioso."

This awful sword was as dear to him as Durinda's or Fushberta to their respective masters.—Sir W. Scott.

Fusilier's. Foot-soldiers that used to be armed with a fusil or light musket. The word is now a misnomer, as the six British and two Indian regiments so called carry Enfield rifles like the rest of the infantry.

Fuss. Much ado about nothing. (Allied to fizz, froth; fuzz, to fly off in minute particles. Latin, fundo, to pour out; Greek, phuza, flight with terror, &c.; Anglo-Saxon, fus, eager.)

Nor with senates keep a fuss.

Swift.

Fus'tian. Stuff, bombast, pretentious words. Properly, a sort of cotton velvet. (French, futaine; Spanish, Fustan, the name of a place.) (See BOMBAST.)

Fustian his thoughts and words ill-sorted.

Dryden.

Discourse fustian with one's own shadow.

Shakespeare, "Othello," ll. 3.

Futile (2 syl.) is that which will not hold together; inconsistent. A futile scheme is a design conceived in the mind which will not hold good in practice. (Latin, fulio, to run off like water.) (See SCHEME.)

Fylla. Confidante and lady's-maid of queen Frigga.—Scandinavian mythology.

Fy'rapel (Sir). The leopard, king Lion's nearest kinsman, in the Beast epic of "Reynard the Fox."

G.

G. This letter is the outline of a camel's head and neck. It is called in Hebrew gimel (a camel).

G.C.B. (See BATH.)

G.H.V.L. on the coin of William III. of the Netherlands is Groot Hertog Van Luxemburg (grand duke of Luxembourg).

Gab (g hard). The gift of the gab. Fluency of speech; or rather, the gift of boasting. (French, gaber, to gasconade; Danish and Scotch, gab, the mouth; Gaelic, gob; Irish, cab; whence our gap and gape, gabble and gobble. The gable of a house is its beak.)

There was a good man named Job,
Who lived in the land of Uz,
He had a good gift of the gab,
The same thing happened us.
"Book of Job," by Zach. Boyd.

Thou art one of the knights of France, who hold it for glee and pastime to gab, as they term it, of exploits that are beyond human power.—Sir W. Scott, "The Talisman," ch. ii.

Gabel', Gabelle (g hard). A salt-tax. A word applied in French history to the monopoly of salt. All the salt made in France had to be brought to the royal warehouses, and was there sold at a price fixed by the government. The iniquity was that some provinces had to pay twice as much as others. Edward III. jokingly called this monopoly "King Philippe's Salic law." It was abolished in 1789. (German, gabe, a tax.)

Gaberlunzie, or A gaberlunzie man (g hard). A mendicant; or, more strictly speaking, one of the king's bedesmen, who were licensed beggars. The word galan is French and Spanish for "a cloak with tight sleeves and a hood." Hence gabardine (the Jewish cassock). Lunzie is a diminutive of laine (wool), as in linsey-woolsey (half linen half woollen). So that gaber-lunzie means "coarse woollen gown." These bedesmen were also called blue-gowns (q.v.), from the colour of their cloaks.

Gabriel (g hard), in Jewish mythology, is the angel of death to the favoured people of God, the prince of fire and thunder, and the only angel that can speak Syriac and Chaldee. The Mahometans call him the chief of the four favoured angels, and the spirit of truth. In mediæval romance he is the second of the seven spirits that stand before the throne of God, and, as God's messenger, carries to heaven the prayers of men ("Jerusalem Delivered," bk. i.). The word means "power of God." Milton makes him chief of the angelic guards placed over Paradise.

Betwixt these rocky pillars Gabriel sat,
Chief of the angelic guards,
"Paradise Lost," iv.

Longfellow, in his "Golden Legend," makes him the angel of the moon, and says he brings to man the gift of hope.

I am the angel of the moon . . .
Nearest the earth, it is my ray
That best illumines the midnight way.
I bring the gift of hope,
"The Miracle Play," iii.

Gabriel's horse. Häizum.

Gabriel's hounds. Wild geese. The noise of the bean goose (anser segētum) in flight is like that of a pack of hounds in full cry.

Gabriel Lajeunesse (3 syl.). Son of Basil, the blacksmith of Grand Pré (Nova Scotia), the affianced husband of Evangeline. Longfellow, "Evangeline."

Gab'riell'e (3 syl.; g hard). La Belle Gabrielle. Daughter of Antoine d'Estrées, grand-master of artillery, and governor of the Ile de France. Henri IV., towards the close of 1590, happened to sojourn for a night at the Château de Cœuvres, and fell in love with Gabrielle, then nineteen years of age. To throw a flimsy veil over his intrigue, he married her to Darnerval de Liancourt, created her duchess de Beaufort, and took her to live with him at court.

Charmante Gabriell'e,
Percé de mille darts,
Quand la gloire m'appelle
A la suite de Mars.
Henri IV.

Gabri'na, in "Orlando Furioso," is a sort of Potiphar's wife. She was the wife of Arge'o, a baron of Servia. While Philander, a Dutch knight, was entertained by Arge'o, Gabrina assayed his virtue, but Philander fled the house. Gabrina, in revenge, accused him to her husband of adultery, and Arge'o followed him, brought him back, and locked him in the castle dungeon. One day Gabri'na went to visit him, and implored him to avenge her on a faithless knight who had tempted her virtue. Philander readily undertook to be her champion; but the pretended lover was Arge'o, whom Philander ignorantly slew. Gabrina now threatened to deliver up her champion to the law unless he married her; an alternative that Philander accepted, but ere long he was killed by poison. The whole affair being brought to light, Gabrina was shut up in prison, but effecting her escape, wandered about the country as an old hag. Knight after knight had to defend her, but at last she was committed to the charge of Odorico, who, to get rid of her, hung her on an elm.

Ga'briole'ta (g hard). Governess of Brittany, rescued by Amadis of Gaul from the hands of Balan, "the bravest and strongest of all the giants."—"Amadis of Gaul," bk. iv., ch. 129.

Gad (g hard). Gadding from place to place. Wandering from pillar to post without any profitable purpose. (Irish, gad, a roving; Russian, chod, &c.) A gadabout is one who gads.

Give water no passage, neither a wicked woman liberty to gad abroad.—Ecclesi.

Gad-fly is not the roving but the *goad*ing fly. (Saxon, gad, a goad.)

I will go get a leaf of brass,
And, with a gad of steel, will write these words.
Shakespeare, "Titus Andronicus," iv. 1.

Gad-steel. Flemish steel. So called because it is wrought in gads, or small bars. (Saxon, gad, a small bar or goad.)

Gadshill, in Kent, near Rochester. Famous for the attack of Sir John Falstaff and three of his knavish companions on a party of four travellers, whom they robbed of their purses. While the robbers were dividing the spoil, Poins and the Prince of Wales set upon them, and "outfaced them from their prize;" and as for the "Hercules of flesh," he ran and "roared for mercy, and still ran and roared," says the prince, "as ever I heard a bull-calf." Gadshill is also the name of one of the thievish companions of Sir John.—Shakespeare, "I Henry IV.," ii. 4.

Gaels. A contraction of Gad-hels (hidden rovers). The inhabitants of Scotland who maintained their ground in the Highlands against the Celts. It is an error to derive this word from Gaul, Gallia.

Gaff (g hard). Crooked as a gaff. A gaff is an iron hoe or hook. The metal spurs of fighting cocks; in nautical language, a boom or spar used to extend the upper edge of the mizen. (Irish, gaf; Spanish and Portuguese, gafa; Shemitic, cafah, to bend.)

Gaffer (g hard). A title of address, as "Gaffer Grey," "Good-day, Gaffer." About equal to "mate." (Saxon, gefere, a companion or mate.)

Ga'heris (Sir). Brother of Sir Gawain, and a knight of the Round Table.

Ga'ilan. Forest demon of Arabian mythology.

Gaiter (g hard). A proper name. (See BREWER.)

Gala Day (g hard). A festive day; a day when people put on their best attire. (Spanish, gala, court dress; Italian, gala, finery; French, gala, pomp.)

Ga'ahad, or Sir Galahalt (g hard). Son of Sir Launcelot and Ganor (Guinever), one of the Knights of the Round Table, so pure in life that he was successful in his search for the sangrael. Tennyson has a poem on the subject. "Mort d'Arthur."

There Galaad sat, with manly grace,
Yet maiden meekness in his face.
Sir W. Scott, "Bridal of Triermain," ii. 13.

Ga'lor (Don). Brother of Amadis of Gaul, a gay libertine, whose adventures form a strong contrast to those of the more serious hero.

Galate'a (g hard). A sea-nymph, beloved by Polyphemus, but herself in love with Acis. Acis was crushed under a huge rock by the jealous giant. Handel has an opera entitled "Acis and Galatea."

Gal'athe (3 syl.). Hector's horse.

There are a thousand Hectors in the field;
Now here he fights on Galathé his horse,
And there he lacks work.
Shakespeare, "Troilus and Cressida," v. 3.

Gal'axy (g hard). A galaxy of beauty. A cluster, assembly, or coterie of handsome women. The galaxy is the "Milky Way" sown thick with stars. (Greek, gala, milk.)

Gale's Compound. Powdered glass mixed with gunpowder to render it non-explosive. Gale is the patentee.

Galen (g hard). Galen says "Nay," and Hippocratès "Yea." The doctors disagree, and who is to decide? Galen was a physician of Asia Minor in the second Christian century. Hippocratēs—a native of Cos, born B.C. 460—was the most celebrated physician of antiquity.

Galen. A generic name for an apothecary. Thus, the host says to Dr. Caius—

Is he dead, . . . my Galen? . . . is he dead?
Shakespeare, "Merry Wives," ii. 3.

Galeot'ti (Martius). Louis XI.'s Italian astrologer. Being asked by the king if he knew the day of his own death, he craftily replied that he could not name the exact day, but he knew this much: it would be twenty-four hours before the decease of his majesty. Thra-sullus, the soothsayer of Tiberius, emperor of Rome, made verbally the same answer to the same question.

"Can thy pretended skill ascertain the hour of thine own death?"

"Only by referring to the fate of another," said Galeotti.

"I understand not thine answer," said Louis.

"Know then, O king," said Martius, "that this only I can tell with certainty concerning mine own death, that it shall take place exactly twenty-four hours before your majesty's."

Sir W. Scott, "Quentin Durward," ch. xxix.

Galera'na (g hard). According to Ariosto, was wife of Charlemagne.—"Orlando Furioso," bk. xxi. (See CHARLEMAGNE.)

Galère (g hard). Qu' allait-il dans cette galère? (What business had he to be on this galley?) This is from Molière's comedy of "Les Fourberies de Scapin." Scapin wants to bamboozle Géronte out of his money, and tells him that his master (Géronte's son) is detained prisoner on a Turkish galley, where he went out of curiosity. He adds, that unless the old man will ransom him, he will be taken to Algiers as a slave. Géronte replies to all that Scapin urges, "What business had he to go on board the galley?" The retort is given to those who beg money to help them out of difficulties which they have brought on themselves. "I grant you are in trouble, but what right had you to go on the galley?"

Gale'sus (g hard). A river of Puglia, not far from Tarentum. The sheep that fed on the meadows of Gale'sus were noted for their fine wool.—Horace, "Carm.," ii. 6, 10.

Galia'na (g hard). A Moorish princess. Her father, king Gadafé of Iolédé, built for her a palace on the Tagus so splendid that the phrase, "a palace of Galiana" became proverbial in Spain.

Galimaufrey (g hard). A medley; any confused jumble of things; but strictly speaking, a hotch-potch made up of all the scraps of the larder. (French, galimafrée; Spanish, gallofa, "broken meat," from gallofero, a beggar.)

He wooes both high and low, both rich and poor,
 Both young and old, one wif h another, Ford;
 He loves thy gally-mawfry (all sorts).
Shakespeare, "Merry Wives," ii. 1.

Gall (g hard). St. Gall's bell. A four-sided bell, which was certainly in existence in the seventh century, and is still shown in the monastery of St. Gall, Switzerland.

Gallant' (g hard). Brave, polite, courteous, &c. (Gael, gallan, "a branch," whence also culland, "a stripling" or, in Bible language, an "olive branch.") Only the aristocracy have a genealogical tree, and therefore gallant applies strictly to them alone.

Galley (g hard). A printer's frame into which type from the stick (q.v.) is emptied. In the galley the type appears only in columns; it is subsequently divided into pages, and transferred to the "chase" (q.v.). (French, galée.)

Galley Pence. Genoese coin brought over by merchants who imported their wines and other goods in galleys. These pence, or rather half-pence, were larger than our own.

Gallia (g hard). France.

Impending hangs o'er Gallia's humbled coast.
Thomson, "Summer."

Gall'ia Bracca'ta (trousered Gaul). Gallia Narbonen'sis was so called from the "braccæ" or trousers which the natives wore in common with the Scythians and Persians.

Gall'ia Coma'ta. That part of Gaul which belonged to the Roman emperor, and was governed by legates (legat'i), was so called from the long hair (coma) worn by the inhabitants flowing over their shoulders.

Gallice'næ. The nine virgin priestesses of the Gallic oracle. By their charms they could raise the wind and waves, turn themselves into any animal form they liked, cure wounds and diseases, and predict future events.—Gallic mythology.

Gall'icism (g hard). A phrase or sentence constructed after the French idiom; as "when you shall have returned home you will find a letter on your table." Government documents are especially guilty of this fault. In St. Matt. xv. 32 is a Gallicism: "I have compassion on the multitude, because they continue with me now three days, and have nothing to eat." Compare St. Mark viii. 2.

Galligan'tus (g hard). The giant who lived with Hocus-Pocus, the conjuror. Jack the Giant-killer blew the magic horn, and both the giant and conjuror were "overthrown."—Nursery Tale of "Jack the Giant Killer."

Gallimaufrey. (See GALIMAUFREY.)

Gall'ipot (g hard) means a glazed pot, as galletyles (3 syl.) means glazed tiles. (Dutch, gleipot, glazed pot.) In farce and jest it forms a by-name for an apothecary.

Gallo-Bel'gicus. An annual register in Latin for European circulation, first published in 1598.

It is believed,
And told for news with as much diligence
As if 'twere writ in Gallo-Belgicus.
Thomas May, "The Heir." (1615.)

Galloo. (See CADDICE.)

Gall'oway (g hard). A small horse the breed which originally came from Galloway in Scotland.

Thrust him downstairs! Know we not Galloway nags?—Shakespeare, "2 Henry IV.," ii. 4.

Galor'e (2 syl., g hard). A sailor's term, meaning "in abundance." (Irish, go leor, in abundance.)

For his Poll he had trinkets and gold galore,
Besides of prize-money quite a store.
Jack Robinson.

Gal'vanism (g hard). So called from Louis Galva'ni, of Bologna. Signora Galvani in 1790 had frog-soup prescribed for her diet, and one day some skinned frogs which happened to be placed near an electric machine in motion exhibited signs of vitality. This strange phenomenon excited the curiosity of the experimenter, who subsequently noticed that similar convulsive effects were produced when the copper hooks on which the frogs were strung were suspended on the iron hook of the larder. Experiments being carefully conducted, soon led to the discovery of this important science.

Galway Jury. An enlightened, independent jury. The expression has its birth in certain trials held in Ireland in 1635 upon the right of the king to the counties of Ireland. Leitrim, Roscommon, Sligo, and Mayo, gave judgment in favour of the crown, but Galway opposed it; whereupon the sheriff was fined £1,000, and each of the jurors £4,000.

Gam. (See GANELON.)

Ga'ma (g hard). Vasco de Gama, the Portuguese, was the first European navigator who doubled the Cape of Good Hope.

With such mad seas the daring Gama fought . . .
Incessant labouring round the stormy Cape.
Thomson, "Summer."

Vasco de Gama. The hero of Camoëns' "Lusiad." He is represented as sagacious, intrepid, tender-hearted, pious, fond of his country, and holding his temper in full command. He is also the hero of Meyerbeer's posthumous opera, "L'Africaine."

Gama, captain of the venturous band,
Of bold enterprise, and born for high command.
Whose martial fires, with prudence close allied,
Ensured the smiles of fortune on his side.
Camoëns, "Lusiad," bk i.

Gama'hës (g hard). Stones which contain naturally the representation of some object, such as a plant, landscape, or animal.

The word is used by Albertus Magnus, and is from the French cameieu (an agate). The natural "cameos" are called agate-stones, because most of them belong to the agate family.

Gambo'ge (2 syl., first g hard, second g soft). So called from Gambo'gia or Cambogia, whence it was first brought.

Game (1 syl., g hard). Are you game for a spree? Are you inclined to join in a bit of fun? The allusion is to game-cocks, which never show the white feather, but are always ready for a fight.

You are making game of me. You are chaffing me. (Anglo-Saxon, gamen, jest, scoffing.)

Game-leg. A bad or lame leg. (Welsh, cam; Irish, gam, bad, crooked.)

Gam'elyn (3 syl., g hard). The youngest of the three sons of Sir Johan de Boundys. On his death-bed the old knight left "five plowes of land" to each of his two elder sons, and the rest of his property to Gamelyn. The eldest took charge of the boy, but entreated him shamefully; and when Gamelyn, in his manhood, demanded of him his heritage, the elder brother exclaimed, "Stand still, gadelyng, and hold thy peace!" "I am no gadelyng," retorted the proud young spirit; "but the lawful son of a lady and true knight." At this the elder brother sent his servants to chastise the youngling, but Gamelyn drove them off with "a pestel." At a wrestling-match held in the neighbourhood, young Gamelyn threw the champion, and carried off the prize ram; but on reaching home found the door shut against him. He at once kicked down the door and threw the porter into a well. The elder brother, by a manœuvre, contrived to bind the young scapegrace to a tree, and left him two days without food; but Adam, the spencer, unloosed him, and Gamelyn fell upon a party of ecclesiastics who had come to dine with his brother, "sprinkling holy water on the guests with his stout oaken cudgel." The sheriff now sent to take Gamelyn and Adam into custody; but they fled into the woods and came upon a party of foresters sitting at meat. The captain gave them welcome, and in time Gamelyn rose to be "king of the outlaws." His brother, being now sheriff, would have put him to death, but Gamelyn constituted himself a lynch judge, and hanged his brother. After this the king appointed him chief ranger, and he married. This tale is the foundation of Lodge's novel, called "Euphues's Golden Legacy," and the novel furnished Shakespeare with the plot of "As You Like It."

Gammer (g hard). A contraction of grandmère, first into gan-mer, then into gammer.

Gammer Gurton's Needle. The earliest comedy but one in the English language. It was "Made by Mr. S., Master of Arts." The author is said to have been Bishop Still of Bath and Wells. (1543-1607.)

Gam'mon (g hard). A corruption of gamene. Stuff to impose upon one's credulity; chaff. (Anglo-Saxon, gamen, scoffing; our game, as "You are making game of me.")

Gammon (g hard) means the leg, not the buttock. (French, jambon, the leg, jambe; Italian, gamba.)

Gam'mut, or Gamut (g hard). It is gamma ut, "ut" being the first word in the Guido-von-Arrezzo scale of ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la. In the eleventh century the ancient scale was extended a note below the Greek proslamban'omy note (our A), the first space of the bass staff. The new note was termed γ (gamma), and when "ut" was substituted by Arrezzo, the "supernumerary" note was called gamma or ut, or shortly gamm' ut—i.e., "G ut." The gammut, therefore, properly means the diatonic scale beginning in the bass clef with "G."

Gamp (Mrs.), or Sarah Gamp (g hard). A monthly nurse, famous for her gouty umbrella and perpetual reference to Mrs. Harris, a purely imaginary person, whose opinions always confirmed her own.—Dickens, "Martin Chuzzlewit."

Punch caricatures the Standard as "Mrs. Sarah Gamp," a little woman with an enormous bonnet and her characteristic umbrella.

A Sarah Gamp, or Mrs. Gamp. A big, pawky umbrella, so called from Sarah Gamp. (See above.)

In France it is called un Robinson, from Robinson Crusoe's umbrella.—Defoe.

Gamps and Harrises. Work-house nurses, real or supposititious. (See GAMP.)

Mr. Gathorne Hardy is to look after the Gamps and Harrises of Lambeth and the Strand.—The Telegraph.

Gan'abim. The island of thieves. So called from the Hebrew ganab (a thief).—Rabelais, "Pantagruel," iv. 66.

Gander (g hard). What's sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. Both must be treated exactly alike. Apple-sauce is just as good for one as the other.

Gander-cleugh. Folly cliff; that mysterious land where any one who makes a "goose of himself" takes up his temporary residence. The hypothetical Jedediah Cleishbotham, who edited the "Tales of my Landlord," lived there, as Sir Walter Scott assures us.

Gander-month. Those four weeks when the "monthly nurse" rules the house with despotic sway, and the master is made a goose of.

Gan'elon (g hard). Count of Mayence, one of Charlemagne's paladins, the "Judas" of knights. His castle was built on the Blocksberg, the loftiest peak of the Hartz Mountains. Jealousy of Roland made him a traitor; and in order to destroy his rival, he planned with Marsillus, the Moorish king, the attack of Roncesvallès. He was six and a half feet high, with glaring eyes and fiery hair; he loved solitude, was very taciturn, disbelieved in the existence of moral good, and never had a friend. His name is a by-word for a traitor of the basest sort.

Have you not held me at such a distance from your counsels, as if I were the most faithless spy since the days of Ganelon?—Sir Walter Scott, "The Abbot," ch. xxiv.

You would have thought him [Ganelon] one of Attila's Huns, rather than one of the paladins of Charlemagne's court.—"Croquemitaine," iii.

Ga'nem (g hard), having incurred the displeasure of Calif Haroun-al-Raschid, effected his escape by taking the place of a slave, who was carrying on his head dishes from the calif's table.—Arabian Nights' Entertainments.

Gan'esa (g hard). Son of Siva and Parbutta; also called Gunputty, the elephant god. The god of wisdom, forethought, and prudence. The Mercury of the Hindus.

Canideo bright and Ganesa sublime
Shall bless with joy their own propitious clime.
Campbell.

Ganga. One of the three goddesses of rivers.—Indian mythology.

Gangas. Black priests of Angola, Congo, &c.—African mythology.

Gang-board, or Gang-way (g hard). The board or way made for the rowers to pass from stern to stern, and where the mast was laid when it was unshipped. Now it means the board with cleats or bars of wood by which passengers walk into or out of a ship or steamboat. A gang is an alley or avenue.

Gang-day (g hard). The day when the boys gang round the parish to beat its bounds.

Gan'ges (2 syl.; first g hard, second g soft). Pliny tells us of men living on the smell of the Ganges, "Nat. Hist.," xii.

By Ganges' bank, as wild traditions tell,
Of old the tribes lived healthful by the smell;
No food they knew, each fragrant vapours rose,
Rich from the flowery lawn where Ganges flows.
Camoëns, "Lusina," bk. vii.

Ganglati (Slow-pace). The servant of the goddess Hiel (q.v.).

Gangway (g hard). Below the gangway. In the House of Commons there is a sort of bar extending across the house, which separates the Ministry and the Opposition from the rest of the members. To sit "below the gangway" is to sit amongst the general members, neither among the Ministers nor with the Opposition.

Clear the gangway. Make room for the passengers from the boat, clear the passage. (See GANG-BOARD.)

Ganna. A Celtic prophetess, who succeeded Velle'da. She went to Rome, and was received by Domitian with great honours.—Tacitus, "Annals," 55.

Ganor (g hard), Gineura (g soft), or Guinever. Arthur's wife.

Gan'ymede (3 syl.; g hard). Jove's cup-bearer; the most beautiful boy ever born. He succeeded Hebe in office.

When Ganymede above
His service ministers to mighty Jove.
Hoole's "Ariosto,"

Ga'ora. A tract of land inhabited by a people without heads. Their eyes are in their shoulders, and their mouths in their breasts.—Hackluyt's "Voyages." (See BLEMYES.)

Gape (g hard). Looking for gape-seed. Gaping about and doing nothing. A corruption of "Looking a-gapesing;" gapesing is staring about with one's mouth open. A gapesing and a-trapesing are still used in Norfolk.

Seeking a gape's nest. (Devonshire.) A gape's nest is a sight which people stare at with wide-open mouth. The word "nest" was used in a much wider sense formerly than it is now. Thus we read of a "nest of shelves," a "nest of thieves," a "cozy nest." A gape's nest is the nest or place where anything stared at is to be found. (See MARE'S NEST.)

Gar'agan'tua (g hard). The giant that swallowed five pilgrims with their staves and all in a salad. From a book entitled "The History of Garagantua," 1594. Laneham, however, mentions the book of Garagantua in 1575. The giant in Rabelais is called Gargantua (q.v.).

You must borrow me Garagantua's mouth (before I can utter so long a word). . . 'tis a word too great for any mouth of this age's size.
Shakespeare, "As You Like It," iii. 2.

Garagantuan. Threatening, bullying. (See preceding.)

Garble (g hard) properly means to sift out the refuse. Thus, by the statute of 1 James, 1. 19, a penalty is imposed on the sale of drugs not garbled. We now use the word to express a mutilated extract, in which the sense of the author is perverted by what is omitted. (French, garber, to make clean; Spanish, garbilar; Chaldee, carbl; our cribble, a corn-sieve; cribbled, sifted.)

Garcí'as (g hard). The soul of Pedro Garcías. Money. It is said that two scholars of Salamanca discovered a tombstone with this inscription:—"Here lies the soul of the licentiate Pedro Garcí'as;" and on searching for this "soul," found a purse with a hundred golden ducats.—Gil Blas (Preface).

Gar'daríke (4 syl., g hard). So Russia is called in the Eddas.

Garden (g hard). The garden of Joseph of Arimathea was the spot where the rotunda of the Holy Sepulchre stands.

The Garden or Garden Sect. The disciples of Epicurus, who taught in his own private garden.

Epicurus in his garden was languid; the birds of the air have more enjoyment of their food.—Ecces Homo.

Garden of England. Worcestershire and Kent are both so called.

Garden of Europe. Italy.

Garden of France. Amboise, in the department of Indre-et-Loire.

Garden of Italy. The island of Sicily.

Garden of Spain. Andalu'cia.

Garden of the West. Illinois; Kansas is also so called.

Garden of the World. The region of the Mississippi.

Gardener (g hard). Get on, gardener! Get on, you slow and clumsy coachman. The allusion is to a man who is both gardener and coachman.

Gardener. Adam is so called by Tennyson.

From yon blue sky above us bent,

The grant old gardener and his wife (Adam and Eve)

Smile at our claims of long descent.

"Lady Clara Vere de Vere,"

Thou, old Adam's likeness,

Set to dress this garden.

Shakespeare, "Richard II.," iii. 4.

Gardening (g hard). (See ADAM'S PROFESSION.)

Garder le Mulet (To hold the mule). To be kept waiting. Till recently, persons went on mules to make calls, and the servant of the house held the mule till the caller had finished his visit. Even in the reign of Louis XIV., counsellors of state went to the palace on mules.

Gargamelle (3 syl., g hard) was the wife of Grangousier, and daughter of the king of the Parpaillous (butterflies). On the day that she gave birth to Gargantua she ate sixteen quarters, two bushels, three pecks, and a pipkin of dirt, the mere remains left in the tripe which she had for supper; for, as the proverb says—

Scrape tripe as clean as e'er you can,
A tithe of filth will still remain.

Gargamelle. Said to be meant for Anne of Brittany. She was the mother of Gargantua, in the satirical romance of "Gargantua and Pan'tagruel," by Rabelais. Motteux, who makes "Pantagruel" to be Anthony de Bourbon, and "Gargantua" to be Henri d'Albret, says "Gargamelle" is designed for Catherine de Foix, queen of Navarre.

Gargan'tua (g hard) according to Rabelais, was son of Grangousier and Gargamelle. Immediately he was born he cried out "Drink, drink!" so lustily, that the words were heard in Beauce and Bibarois; whereupon his royal father exclaimed, "Que grand tu as!" which, being the first words he uttered after the birth of the child, were accepted as its name; so it was called "Gah-gran'tu-as," corrupted into Garg'an-tu-a. It needed 17,913 cows to supply the babe with milk. When he went to Paris to finish his education, he rode on a mare as big as six elephants, and took the bells of Notre Dame to hang on his mare's neck as jingles. At the prayer of the Parisians he restored the bells, and they consented to feed his mare for nothing. On his way home, he was fired at from the castle at Vede Ford, and on reaching home combed his hair with a comb 900 feet long, when at every "rake" seven bullet-balls fell from his hair. Being desirous of a salad for dinner, he went to cut some lettuces as big as walnut-trees, and ate up six pilgrims from Sebastian, who had hidden themselves among them out of fear. Picrochole, having committed certain offences, was attacked by Gargantua in the rock Clermond, and utterly defeated, and Gargantua, in remembrance of this victory, founded and endowed the abbey of Theleme.—Gargantua and Pantagruel.

Gargantua is said to be a satire on François I., but this cannot be correct, as he was born in the kingdom of the butterflies, was sent to Paris to finish his education, and left it again to succour his own country. Motteux, perceiving these difficulties, thinks it is meant for Henri d'Albret, king of Navarre.

Gargantua's Mare. Those who make Gargantua to be François I., make his "great mare" to be Mad. d'Estampes. Motteux, who looks upon the romance as a satire on the Reform party, is at a loss how to apply this word, and merely says, "It is some lady." Rabelais says, "She was as big as six elephants, and had her feet cloven into fingers. She was of a burnt-sorel hue, with a little mixture of dapple-grey; but, above all, she had a terrible tail, for it was every whit as great as the steeple pillar of St. Mark." When the beast got to Orléans, and the wasps assaulted her, she switched about her tail so furiously that she knocked down all the trees that grew in the vicinity, and Gargantua, delighted, exclaimed, "Je trouve beau ce!" wherefore the locality has been called "Beauce" ever since. The satire shows the wilfulness and extravagance of court mistresses.—Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel," bk. i. 16.

Gargantua's Shepherds, according to Motteux, mean Lutheran preachers; but those who look upon the romance as a political satire, think the crown ministers and advisers are intended.

Gargantua's Thirst. Motteux says the "great thirst" of Gargantua, and "mighty drought" at Pantagruel's birth, refer to the withholding the cup from the laity, and the clamour raised by the Reform party for the wine as well as the bread in the eucharist.

Gargan'tuan. Enormous, inordinate, great beyond all limits. It needed 900 ells of Chateleaud linen to make the body of his shirt, and 200 more for the gussets; for his shoes 406 ells of blue and crimson velvet were required, and 1,100 cow-hides for the soles. He could play 207 different games, picked his teeth with an elephant's tusk, and did everything in the same "large way."

It sounded like a Gargantuan order for a dram.—The Standard.

A Gargantuan course of studies. A course including all languages, as well ancient as modern, all the sciences, all the ologies and onomies, together with calisthenics and athletic sports. Gargantua wrote to his son Pantagruel, commanding him to learn Greek, Latin, Chaldaic, and Arabic; all history, geometry, arithmetic, and music; astronomy and natural philosophy, so that "there be not a river in the world thou dost not know the name and nature of all its fishes; all the fowls of the air; all the several kinds of shrubs and herbs; all the metals hid in the bowels of the earth; with all gems and precious stones. I would furthermore have thee study the Talmudists and Cabalists, and get a perfect knowledge of man. In brief, I would have thee a bottomless pit of all knowledge."—Rabelais, "Pantagruel," bk. ii. 8.

Garg'ery (Joe). A kind-hearted, illiterate blacksmith, in "Great Expectations," by Dickens. Mrs. Gargery is a virago of the fiercest type.

Gargit'tios. One of the dogs that guarded the herds and flocks of Ger'yōn, and which Hercules killed. The other was the two-headed dog, named Orthos, or Orthros.

Gargouille, or Gargoil (g hard). A water-spout in church architecture. Sometimes also spelt Gurgogle. They are usually carved into some fantastic shape, such as a dragon's head, through which the water flows. Gargouille was the great dragon that lived in the Seine, ravaged Rouen, and was slain by St. Rema'nus, bishop of Rouen, in the seventh century. (See DRAGON.)

Garibaldi's Red Shirt. The red shirt is the habitual upper garment of American sailors. Any Liverpoolian will tell you that some fifteen years ago a British tar might be discerned by his blue shirt, and a Yankee "salt" by his red. Garibaldi first adopted the American shirt, when he took the command of the merchantman in Baltimore.

Garland (g hard). A head-dress, so called from Domenico Ghirlanda, an eminent goldsmith of Florence, the inventor of gold and silver ornaments of great elegance in the form of a wreath, which became in the fourteenth century the favourite head-dress of the Florentine beauties. His son was an eminent fresco painter.

Garland. A collection of ballads in "True Lovers' Garland," &c.

Nuptial Garlands are as old as the hills. The ancient Jews used them, according to Selden (Uxor Heb. iii. 655), the Greek and Roman brides did the same (Vaughan, "Golden Grove"): so did the Anglo-Saxons and Gauls.

Three ornaments principally to a wife: A rynge on hir fynger, a brooch on hir brest, and a garland on hir hede. The rynge betokeneth the true love; the brooch cleanness in herte and chastitee; the garland . . . gladness and the dignity of the sacrament of wedlock.—Leland, "Dives and Pauper." (1493.)

Garnish (g hard). Entrance-money, to be spent in drink, demanded by jailbirds of new-comers. In prison slang garnish means fetters, and garnish-money is money given for the "honour" of wearing fetters. (French, garnisaire, a bailiff's man put into a debtor's house.)

Garrat (g hard). The Mayor of Garrat. Garrat is between Wandsworth and Tooting; the first mayor of this village was elected towards the close of the eighteenth century; and his election came about thus: Garrat Common had been often encroached on, and in 1780 the inhabitants associated themselves together to defend their rights. The chairman of this association was entitled Mayor, and as it happened to be the time of a general election, the society made it a law that a new "mayor" should be chosen at every general election. The addresses of these mayors, written by Foote, Garrick, Wilks, and others, are satires on the corruption of electors and political squibs. The first Mayor of Garrat was "Sir" John Harper, a retailer of brickdust in London; and the last was "Sir" Harry Dimsdale, muffin-seller, in 1796. Foote has a farce entitled "The Mayor of Garrat."

Garrot'e (2 syl., g hard) is the Spanish garrote (a stick). The original way of garrotting in Spain was to place the victim on a chair with a cord round his neck, then to twist the cord with a stick till strangulation ensued. In 1851 General Lopez was garrotted by the Spanish authorities for attempting to gain possession of Cuba; since which time the thieves of London, &c., have adopted the method of strangling their victim by throwing their arms round his throat, while an accomplice rifles his pockets.

Garter (g hard). Knights of the Garter. The popular legend is that Joan, countess of Salisbury, accidentally slipped her garter at a court ball. It was picked up by her royal partner, Edward III., who gallantly diverted the attention of the guests from the lady by binding the blue band round his own knee, saying as he did so, "Honi soit qui mal y pense."

Wearing the garters of a pretty maiden either on the hat or knee was a common custom with our forefathers. Brides usually wore on their legs a host of gay ribbons, to be distributed after the marriage ceremony amongst the bridegroom's friends; and the piper at the wedding dance never failed to tie a piece of the bride's garter round his pipe. If there is any truth in the legend given above, the impression on the guests would be wholly different to what such an accident would produce in our days; but perhaps the "Order of the Garter," after all, may be about tantamount to "The Order of the Ladies' Champions," or "The Order of the Ladies' Favourites."

Gar'vies (2 syl., g soft). Sprats. So called from Inch Garvie, an isle in the Frith of Forth, near which they are caught.

Gascona'de (3 syl., g hard). Talk like that of a Gascon—absurd boasting, vainglorious braggadocio. It is said that a Gascon was asked what he thought of the Louvre in Paris, and replied, "Pretty well; it reminds me of the back part of my father's stables." The vainglory of this answer is more palpable when it is borne in mind that the Gascons were proverbially poor. The Dictionary of the French Academy gives us the following specimen: "A Gascon, in proof of his ancient nobility, asserted that they used in his father's castle no other fuel than the bâtons of the family marshals."

Gaston (g hard). Lord of Claros, one of Charlemagne's paladins.

Gastrol'ators. People whose god is their belly.—Rabelais, "Pantagruel," iv. 58.

Gate of Italy. That part of the valley of the Adige which is in the vicinity of Trent and Rovere'do. It is a narrow gorge between two mountain ridges.

Gate of Tears (Babelmandel). The passage into the Red Sea. So called by the Arabs from the danger of the navigation and number of shipwrecks that took place there.

Like some ill-destined bark that steers
In silence thro' the Gate of Tears.
T. Moore, "Fire Worshipers."

Gath (g hard), in Dryden's satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," means Brussels, where Charles II. long resided while he was in exile.

Had thus old David (Charles II.) . . .
Not dared, when fortune called him, to be a king,
At Gath an exile he might still remain.

Gathers (g hard). Out of gathers. In distress; in a very impoverished condition. The allusion is to a woman's gown, which certainly looks very seedy when "out of gathers"—i.e., when the cotton that kept the "pleats" together has given way.

Gat-tooth (g hard). Goat-tooth. (Saxon, gat.) Goat-toothed is having a liquorice tooth. Chaucer makes the wife of Bath say, "Gat-toothed I was, and that became me wele."

Gauch (French, the left hand). Awkward, boorish. (See ADROIT.)

Gauch'erie (3 syl., g hard). Things not comme il faut; behaviour not according to the received forms of society; awkward and untoward ways. (See above.)

Gau'difer (g hard). A champion, celebrated in the romance of "Alexander." Not unlike the Scotch Bruce.

Gaul (g hard). France.

Insulting Gaul has roused the world to war.
Thomson, "Autumn."

Shall haughty Gaul invasion threat?—Burns.

Gaunt (g hard). John of Gaunt. The third son of Edward III.; so called from Ghent, in Flanders, the place of his birth.

Gauntgrim (g hard). The wolf.

For my part (said he), I don't wonder at my cousin's refusing Bruin the bear, and Gauntgrim the wolf. . . . Bruin is always in the sulks, and Gauntgrim always in a passio n.

E. B. Lytton, "Pilgrims of the Rhine," ch. xli.

Gauntlet (g hard). To run the gauntlet. To be castigated by many.

"An author who has run the gauntlet of all the papers" is a poor wretch whom all the critics have had a fling at. The reference is to a punishment common among sailors. If a companion had disgraced himself, the crew, provided with gauntlets or ropes' ends, were drawn up in two rows facing each other, and the delinquent had to run between them, while every man dealt him, in passing, as severe a chastisement as he could.

To throw down the gauntlet. To challenge. The custom in the Middle Ages, when one knight challenged another, was for the challenger to throw his gauntlet on the ground, and if the challenge was accepted the person to whom it was thrown picked it up.

It is not for Spain, reduced as she is to the lowest degree of financial inanition, to throw the gauntlet to the right and left.—The Times.

Gauta'ma (g hard). The chief deity of Burmah, whose favourite offering is a paper umbrella.

The four sublime verities of Gauta'ma are as follows:—

1. Pain exists.

2. The cause of pain is "birth sin." The Buddhist supposes that man has passed through many previous existences, and all the heaped-up sins accumulated in these previous states constitute man's "birth sin."

3. Pain is ended only by Nirva'na (annihilation).

4. The way that leads to Nirvana is—right faith, right judgment, right language, right purpose, right practice, right obedience, right memory, and right meditation (eight in all).

Gau'tier and Garguille (French). All the world and his wife.

Se moquer de Gautier et de Garguille (to make fun of every one). Gautier-Garguille was a clown of the seventeenth century, who gave himself unbounded licence, and provoked against himself a storm of angry feeling.

Gauvain'e (2 syl., g hard). Sir Gauvain the Courteous. One of Arthur's knights, and his nephew. He challenged the Green Knight, and struck off his head; but the headless knight picked up his poll again and walked off, telling Sir Gauvaino to meet him twelve months hence. Sir Gauvaino kept his appointment, and was hospitably entertained; but, taking possession of the girdle belonging to the lady of the house, was chastised by the Green Knight, confessed his fault, and was forgiven.

The gentle Gawain's courteous lore,
Hector de Mares and Pellimore,
And Lancelot that evermore

Looked stol'nwise on the queen.

Sir W. Scott, "Bridal of Triermain," ii. 13.

Gava'ni (g hard). The pseudonym of Sulpice-Paul Chevalier, the John Leech of France. He was the great caricaturist of the Charivari, as John Leech was of Punch. (1803-1866.)

Gav'elkind (g hard). A tenure in Wales, Kent, and Northumberland, whereby land descended from the father to all his sons in equal proportions. The youngest had the homestead, and the eldest the horse and arms. The usual etymology is the Teutonic gif eal cyn (give all the kin, or children); but a better one is the Welsh gavael-cine (a family tenure).

Gawain (g hard). (See GAUVAINE.)

Gawrey (g hard). The flying woman who appeared to Peter Wilkins in his solitary cave. She was one of a race of flying women.—Robert Pullock, "Peter Wilkins."

Gay (g hard). Gay as the king's candle. A French phrase, alluding to an ancient custom observed on the 6th of January, called the "Eve or Vigil of the Kings," when a candle of divers colours was burnt. The expression is used to denote a woman who is more showily dressed than is consistent with good taste.

Gay Girl. A woman of light or extravagant habits. Lady Anne Berkeley, dissatisfied with the conduct of her daughter-in-law (lady Catherine Howard), exclaimed, "By the blessed sacrament, this gay girl will beggar my son Henry." (See above.)

What eyleth you? Some gay gurl, God it wot, Hath brought you thus upon the very trot (i.e., but you on your high horse, or into a passion).
Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales," 3767.

Gaze (1 syl., g hard). To stand at gaze. To stand in doubt what to do. A term in forestry. When a stag first hears the hounds, it stands dazed, looking all round, and in doubt what to do. Heralds call a stag which is represented full-faced, a "stag at gaze."

The American army in the central states remained wholly at gaze.—Lord Mahon (History).

As the poor frightened deer, that stands at gaze,

Wildly determining which way to fly.

Rape of Lucrece.

Gazet'te (2 syl., g hard). A newspaper. The first newspapers were issued in Venice by the Government, and came out in manuscript once a month, during the war of 1563 between the Venetians and Turks. The intelligence was read publicly in certain places, and the fee for hearing it read was one gazetta (a Venetian coin, somewhat less than a farthing in value).

Gazet'ted (g hard). Published in the Gazette, or official London newspaper, where all promotions, bankruptcies, and dissolutions of partnership are inserted. It is published every Tuesday and Saturday.

N.B.—The first English gazette was published at Oxford, in 1665. On the removal of the court to London, the title was changed to the London Gazette.

Gaz'nivides (3 syl.). A dynasty of Persia, which gave four kings and lasted fifty years (999-1049), founded by Mahmoud Gazni, who reigned from the Ganges to the Caspian Sea.

Gear (g hard) properly means "dress." In machinery the bands and wheels that communicate motion to the working part are called the gearing. (Saxon, geurwian, to dress.)

In good gear. In good working order.

Out of gear. Not in working condition, when the "gearing" does not act properly; out of health.

Gee-up (g soft) is get up or gehen up, meaning "get along," "jog on." (Horse language.)

Gee-wo (g soft), addressed to a horse, is the Italian gio (get on). (See Wo.)

Et cum sic gloriaretur, et coxitaret cum quanta gloria ducebat ad illum virum super equum, dicendo, "Gio! gio!" cepit pede percutere terram quasi pungeret equum calcitrans.—Dialogus Creaturarum, (1480.)

Geese (g hard). (See GOOSE.)

Geese save the capitol. The tradition is that when the Gauls invaded Rome, a detachment in single file clambered up the hill of the capitol so silently that the foremost man reached the top without being challenged; but while he was striding over the rampart, some sacred geese, disturbed by the noise, began to cackle and awoke the garrison. Marcus Manlius rushed to the wall and hurled the fellow over the precipice. To commemorate this event, the Romans carried a golden goose in procession to the capitol every year. (B.C. 390.)

Those consecrated geese, in orders,
That to the capitol were warders
And being then upon patrol,
With noise alone bent off the Gaul.
Butler, "Hudibras," li. 3.

All his swans are geese, or All his swans are turned to geese. All his expectations end in nothing; all his boasting ends in smoke. Like a person who fancies he sees a swan on a river, but finds it to be only a goose.

The phrase is generally reversed thus, "All his geese are swans;" meaning that everything belonging to him is to his own thinking first-rate. Commonly applied to people who think too much of the beauty and talent of their children.

The more geese the more lovers. The French newspaper called L'Europe, December, 1865, repeats this proverb, and says:—"It is customary in England for every gentleman admitted into society to send a fat goose at Christmas to the lady of the house he is in the habit of visiting. Beautiful women receive a whole magazine . . . and are thus enabled to tell the number of their lovers by the number of fat geese sent to them." The Times, 27th December, 1865:—Truly the Frenchman knows much more about us than we ever "dreamt of in our philosophy."

Geese. (See CAG MAG.)

Gefjon (Gafé-yon). Goddess of virginity, to whom all maidens go at death.—Scandinavian mythology.

Gehen'na (Hebrew, g hard). The place of eternal torment. Strictly speaking, it means simply the Valley of Hinnom (Ge-Hinnom), where sacrifices to Moloch were offered, and where refuse of all sorts was subsequently cast, for the consumption of which fires were kept constantly burning.

And made his grove
The pleasant valley of Hinnom, Tophet thence
And black Gehenna called, the type of hell.
Milton, "Paradise Lost," bk. i.

Gelert (g hard). The name of Llewellyn's dog. One day a wolf entered the room where the infant son of the Welsh prince was asleep; Gelert flew at it and killed it; but when Llewellyn returned home and saw his dog's mouth bloody, he hastily concluded that it had killed his child, and thrust it through with his sword. The howl of the dog awoke the child, and the prince saw too late his fatal rashness. Beth-gelert is the name of the place where the dog was buried. (See DOG.)

Gellatley (Davie). The idiot servant of the baron of Bradwardine.—Sir W. Scott, "Waverley."

Gema'ra (g hard), which means "complement," is applied to the second part of the Talmud, which consists of annotations, discussions, and amplifications of the Jewish Mishnah. There is the Babylonian Gema'ra and the Pales-tinensian Gema'ra. The former, which is the more complete, is by the academies of Babylon; the latter by those of Palestine.

Gend'armes (pron. zjon-darm). "Men at arms," the armed police of France. The term was first applied to those who marched in the train of knights; subsequently to the cavalry; in the time of Louis XIV. to a body of horse charged with the preservation of order; after the revolution to a military police chosen from old soldiers of good character; now it is applied to the ordinary police, whose costume is half civil and half military.

General Issue is pleading "Not guilty" to a criminal charge; "Never indebted" to a charge of debt.

Generalis'simo (g soft). Called Tagus among the ancient Thessalians, Brennus among the ancient Gauls, Pendragon among the ancient Welsh or Celts.

Gen'eros (g soft). Generous as Hatim. An Arabian expression. Hatim was a Bedouin chief famous for his warlike deeds and boundless generosity. His son was contemporary with Mahomet.

Geneu'ra (g soft). Daughter of the king of Scotland. Lurca'nio carried her off captive, and confined her in his father's castle. She loved Ariodantès, who being told that she was false, condemned her to die for incontinence, unless she found a champion to defend her. Ariodantès himself became her champion, and, having vindicated her innocence, married her. This is a satire on Arthur, whose wife intrigued with Sir Launcelot.—Orlando Furioso.

Gene'va (g soft), contracted into Gin. Originally made from malt and juniper-berries. (French, genevre, a juniper-berry.)

Gene'va Bible. The English version in use prior to the present one. So called because it was originally printed at Geneva (in 1560).

Gene'va Bull. Stephen Marshall, a preacher who roared like a bull of Bashan. Called Geneva because he was a disciple of John Calvin.

Gene'va Doctrines. Calvinism. Calvin, in 1541, was invited to take up his residence in Geneva as the public teacher of theology. From this period Geneva was for many years the centre of education for the Protestant youths of Europe.

Geneviève (St.), (pron. zjon-ve-ave). The sainted patroness of the city of Paris. (422-512.)

Ge'nîus, pl., Genii (Eastern mythology). A corruption of the Arabic Jinn, m., Jinnîgh, f. A sort of fairy, somewhat resembling the Persian Peri and Deev. They are mortal, marry and are given in marriage, and were formed out of the "smokeless fire" of the simoom several thousand years before Adam. As they paid no heed to the prophets sent to instruct them, they were driven from the earth to the "island regions." The resemblance of this word to the Latin genius, from gigno, is accidental. (See JINNS.)

Genius, Genii (Roman mythology) were attendant spirits. Every one had two of these tutelaries from his cradle to his grave. But the Roman genii differ in many respects from the Eastern. The Persian and Indian genii had a corporeal form, which they could change at pleasure. They were not guardian or attendant spirits, but fallen angels, dwelling in Ginnistan, under the dominion of Eblis. They were naturally hostile to man, though compelled sometimes to serve them as slaves. The Roman genii were tutelary spirits, very similar to the guardian angels spoken of in Scripture (St. Matt. xviii. 10). (The word is the old Latin geno, to be born, from the notion that birth and life were due to these dii genitales.)

Genius (birth-wit) is innate talent; hence propensity, nature, inner man. "Cras genium mero cura'bis" (to-morrow you shall indulge your inner man with wine), "Horace," iii. 17. "Indulgerë genio" (to give loose to one's propensity),

"Persius," v. 151. "Defrauda'rë genium suum" (to stint one's appetite, to deny one's self), Terence, "Phormio," i. 1. (See above.)

Genius. Tom Moore says that Common Sense went out one moonlight night with Genius on his rambles; Common Sense went on many wise things saying, but Genius went gazing at the stars, and fell into a river. This is told of Thalès by Plato, and Chaucer has introduced it into his "Miller's Tale."

So ferde another clerik with astronomye:
He walkèd in the feelde's for to pry
Upon the sterres, what ther shuld befall,
Til he was in a marle pit i-fall.

"Canterbury Tales," 3,457.

My evil genius (my ill-luck). The Romans maintained that two genii attended every man from birth to death—one good and the other evil. Good luck was brought about by the agency of "his good genius," and ill luck by that of his "evil genius."

Genii-King. King Solomon is supposed to preside over the whole race of genii.—D'Herbelot, "Notes to the Koran," c. 2.

Gen'itive case means the genus case, the case which shows the genus. Thus—A bird of the air, of the sea, of the marshes, &c. The part in italics shows to what genus the bird belongs. Our 's is the adjective sign, the same as the Sanskrit syâ, as udaka (water), udaka-sya (of water, or aquatic). So in Greek, demos (people), demo-sios (belonging to the people), or genitive demo-sio, softened into demo-'io. In Chaucer, &c., the genitive is written in full, as "The Clerkes Tale," "The Cokes Tale," "The Knightes Tale," "The Milleres Tale," &c.

Genna'ro (g soft). The natural son of Lucrezia Borgia (q.v.).

Gen'oa, from the Latin genu (the knee). So called from the bend made there by the Adriatic. The whole of Italy is called a man's leg, and this is his knee.

Genove'fa (g soft). Wife of count palatine Siegfried, of Brabant, in the time of Charles Martel. Being suspected of infidelity, she was driven into the forest of Ardennes, where she gave birth to a son, who was nourished by a white doe. In time Siegfried discovered his error, and restored his wife and child to their proper home.

Genre Painter. A painter of domestic, rural, or village scenes, such as "A Village Wedding," "The Young Recruit," "Blind-man's Buff," "The Village Politician," &c. It is a French term, and means, "Man: his customs, habits, and ways of life." Wilkie, Ostade, Gerard Dow, &c., belonged to this class. In the drama Victor Hugo introduced the genre system in lieu of the stilted, unnatural style of Louis XIV.'s era.

Gentle (g soft) means having the manners of genteel persons—i.e., persons of family, called gens in Latin.

We must be gentle, now we are gentlemen.
Shakespeare, "Winter's Tale," v. 2.

The gentle craft. The gentleman's trade, so called from the romance of prince Crispin, who is said to have made shoes. It is rather remarkable that the "gentle craft" should give birth to our contemptuous term snob.

The Gentle Shepherd. George Grenville, the statesman, a nickname derived from a line applied to him by Pitt, afterwards earl of Chatham. Grenville, in the course of one of his speeches, addressed the House interrogatively, "Tell me where? tell me where?" Pitt hummed a line of a song then very popular, "Gentle shepherd, tell me where?" and the House burst into laughter. (1712-1770.)

Gentleman (g soft). A translation of the French gentilhomme, one who belongs to the gens or stock. According to the Roman law, gens-men, or gentlemen, were those only who had a family name, were born of free parents, had no slave in their ancestral line, and had never been degraded to a lower rank.

A gentleman of the four outs. A vulgar upstart, with-out manners, with-out wit, with-out money, and with-out credit.

Geoffrey Crayon. The hypothetical author of the "Sketch Book." Washington Irving, of New York. (1783-1859.)

Geology (g soft). The Father of Geology. William Smith. (1769-1840.)

Geomancy (g soft). Divining by the earth. So termed because these diviners in the sixteenth century drew on the earth their magic circles, figures, and lines. (Greek, ge, the earth; manteia, prophecy.)

Geometry (g soft) means land-measuring. The first geometrician was a ploughman pacing out his field. (Greek, ge, the earth; metron, a measure.)

George (St. g soft). Gibbon, in his "Decline and Fall," ii. 323, asserts that the patron saint of England was George of Cappadocia, the turbulent Arian bishop of Alexandria, torn to pieces by the populace in 360, and revered as a saint by the opponents of Athanasius: but this assertion has been fully disproved by the Jesuit Papebroch, Milner, and others.

That St. George is a veritable character is beyond all reasonable doubt, and there seems no reason to deny that he was born in Armorica, and was beheaded in Diocletian's persecution by order of Datianus, April 23, 303. St. Jerome (331-420) mentions him in one of his martyrologies; in the next century there were many churches to his honour. St. Gregory (540-604) has in his Sacramentary a "Preface for St. George's Day;" and the Venerable Bede (672-735), in his martyrology, says, "At last St. George truly finished his martyrdom by decapitation, although the gests of his passion are numbered among the apocryphal writings."

In regard to his connection with England, Ashmole, in his "History of the Order of the Garter," says that king Arthur in the sixth century placed the picture of St. George on his banners; and Selden tells us he was patron saint of England in the Saxon times. It is quite certain that the council of Oxford in 1222 commanded his festival to be observed in England as a holiday of lesser rank; and in 1330 he was adopted as the patron of the Order of the Garter.

The dragon slain by St. George is simply a common allegory to express the triumph of the Christian hero over evil, which John the Evangelist beheld under the image of a dragon. Similarly, St. Michael, St. Margaret, St. Silvester, and St. Martha are all depicted as slaying dragons; the Saviour and the Virgin as treading them under their feet; and St. John the Evangelist as charming a winged dragon from a poisoned chalice given him to drink. Even John Bunyan avails himself of the same figure, when he makes Christian encounter Apollyon and prevail against him.

St. George's Arm. The Hellespont is so called by the Catholic Church in honour of St. George, the patron saint of England.—Papebroch, "Actes des Saints."

St. George's Channel. An arm of the Atlantic, separating Ireland from Great Britain; so called in honour of St. George, referred to above.

George (St.) the Red Cross Knight (in Spenser's "Faery Queen," bk. i.) represents "Piety." He starts with Una (Truth) on his adventures, and is driven into Wandering Wood, where he encounters Error, and passes the night with Una in Hypocrisy's cell. Being visited by a false vision, the knight abandons Una, and goes with Duessa (False-faith) to the palace of Pride. He leaves this palace clandestinely, but being overtaken by Duessa, is persuaded to drink of an enchanted fountain, when he becomes paralysed, and is taken captive by Orgoglio. Una informs Arthur of the sad event, and the prince goes to the rescue. He slays Orgoglio, and the Red Cross Knight being set free, is taken by Una to the house of Holiness to be healed. On leaving Holiness, both Una and the knight journey towards Eden. As they draw near, the dragon porter flies at the knight, and St. George has to do battle with it for three whole days before he succeeds in slaying it. The dragon being slain, the two enter Eden, and the Red Cross Knight is united to Una in the holy bonds of matrimony.

St. George and the Dragon. According to the ballad given in Percy's "Reliques," St. George was the son of Lord Albert of Coventry. His mother died in giving him birth, and the new-born babe was stolen away by the weird lady of the woods, who brought him up to deeds of arms. His body had three marks: a dragon on the breast, a garter round one of the legs, and a blood-red cross on the arm. When he grew to manhood he first fought against the Saracens, and then went to Syleñe, a city of Libya, where was a stagnant lake infested by a huge dragon, whose poisonous breath "had many a city slain," and whose hide "no spear nor sword could pierce." Every day a virgin was sacrificed to it, and at length it came to the lot of Sabra, the king's daughter, to become its victim. She was tied to the stake and left to be devoured, when St. George came up, and vowed to take her cause in hand. On came the dragon, and St. George thrusting his lance into its mouth, killed it on the spot. The king of Morocco and the king of Egypt, unwilling that Sabra should marry a Christian, sent St. George to Persia, and directed the "sophy" to kill him. He was accordingly thrust into a dungeon, but making good his escape, carried off Sabra to England, where she became his wife, and they lived happily together at Coventry till their death.

St. George he was for England, St. Denis was for France. This refers to the war-cries of the two nations—that of England was "St. George!" that of France, "Montjoye St. Denis!"

Our ancient word of courage, fair "St. George,"
Inspire us with the spleen of fiery dragons.
Shakespeare, "Richard III.," v. 3.

When St. George goes on horseback St. Ives goes on foot. In times of war lawyers have nothing to do. St. George is the patron of soldiers, and St. Ives of lawyers.

St. George's Cross is a red on a white field.

Le Chevalier de St. George (g soft). A name assumed by James the Pretender (1688-1765).

George a' Green. As good as George a' Green. Resolute-minded; one who will do his duty come what may. George a' Green was the famous pinder or pound-keeper of Wakefield, who resisted Robin Hood, Will Scarlett, and Little John single-handed when they attempted to commit a trespass in Wakefield.

Were ye boli as George-a-Green,
I shall make bold to turn again.
S. Butler, "Hudibras."

George Eliot. The literary name of Mary A. Evans (Lewes), authoress of "Adam Bede," "Mill on the Floss," "Felix Holt," &c.

George Keith. The hero of a novel by Mrs. Trafford [Riddell]. He is one who will work as long as he has breath to draw, and would die in harness. He would fight against all opposing circumstances while he had a drop of blood left in his veins, and may be called the model of untiring industry and indomitable moral courage.

George Sand. A nom de plume of Mad. Dudevant, born at Paris 1804, and descended, on the father's side, from the famous Marshal Saxe. Her maiden name was Dupin. Her best romances are "Valentine," "André," and "Consuelo," and of her minor pieces, "La Mare au Diable."

George Street (Strand, London) commences the precinct of an ancient mansion which originally belonged to the bishops of Norwich. After passing successively into the possession of Charles Brandon duke of Suffolk, the archbishops of York, and the crown, it came to George Villiers duke of Buckingham. The second duke of Buckingham pulled down the mansion and built the streets and alley called respectively "George" (street), "Villiers" (street), "Duke" (street), "Of" (alley), and "Buckingham" (street).

Geraint' (g hard). Tributary prince of Devon, and one of the knights of the Round Table. Overhearing part of Enid's words, he fancied she was faithless to him, and treated her for a time very harshly; but Enid nursed him so carefully when he was wounded that he saw his error, "nor did he doubt her more, but rested in her fealty, till he crowned a happy life with a fair death." — Tennyson, Idylls of the King, "Enid."

Geraldine (3 syl., g soft). The fair Geraldine. Lady Elizabeth Fitzgerald is so called by Surrey in his poems.

Gera'nium (g soft). The Turks say this was a common mallow metamorphosed by the touch of Mahomet's garment.

Gerda (g soft). Wife of Freyr, and daughter of the giant Gymer. She is so beautiful that the brightness of her naked arms illuminates both air and sea. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Ge'ri and Fre'ki. The two wolves of Odin. (Scandinavian mythology.)

German or Germaine (g soft). Pertaining to, related to, as Cousins-german (first cousins), German to the subject (bearing on or pertinent to the subject). This word has no connexion with German (the nation), but comes from the Latin germa'nus (of the same germ or stock). First cousins have a grandfather or grandmother in common.

Those that are germaine to him, though removed fifty times, shall all come under the hangman.

Sh. Shakespeare, "Winter's Tale," iv. 3.

German is from the Celtic ghar-mann (a war man). The French Aleman or Allemand is the same thing.

Geoffrey of Monmouth says that Ebrancus, one of the mythological descendants of Brute, King of Britain, had twenty sons and thirty daughters. All the sons, except the eldest, settled in Germany, which was, therefore, called the land of the Germans or brothers. (See above.)

[Ebrank] An happy man in his first days he was,
And happy father of fair progeny;
For all so many weeks as the year has
So many children he did multiply;
Of which were twenty sons, which did apply
Their minds to praise and ch valurous desire.
These germainus did subdue all Germany,
Of whom it hight.....
Spenser, "Faery Queen," ii. 10.

Father of German Literature. Gotthold Ephraim Lessing. (1729-1781.)

German Comb. The four fingers and thumb. "Se pygnoit du pygne d'Almaing" (Rabelais). He combed his hair with his fingers. Oudin, in his "Dictionnaire," explains pygne d'Aleman by "los dedos et la dita." The Germans were the last to adopt periwigs, and while the French were never seen without a comb in one hand, the Germans adjusted their hair by running their fingers through it.

He appareled himself according to the season, and afterwards combed his head with an Alman comb. — Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel," bk. i. 21.

German Silver is not silver at all, but white copper, or copper, zinc, and nickel mixed together. It was first made in Europe at Hildburg-hausen, in Germany, but had been used by the Chinese time out of mind.

Gerryman'der (g hard). So to divide a county or nation into representative districts as to give one special political party undue advantage over all others. The word is derived from Elbridge Gerry, who adopted the scheme in Massachusetts when he was governor.

Gerst-Monat. Barley-month. The Anglo-Saxon name for September, so called because it was the time of barley-beer making.

Ger'trude (2 syl., g hard). Hamlet's mother, who married Claudius, the murderer of her late husband. She inadvertently poisoned herself by drinking a potion prepared for her son. — Shakespeare, "Hamlet."

Gertrude of Wy'oming. The name of one of Campbell's poems.

St. Gertrude, in Christian art, is sometimes represented as surrounded with rats and mice; and sometimes as spinning, the rats and mice running about her distaff.

Geryön (g hard). A human monster with three bodies and three heads, whose oxen ate human flesh, and were guarded by a two-headed dog. Hercules slew both Geryon and the dog. This fable means simply that Geryon reigned over three kingdoms, and was defended by an ally who was at the head of two tribes.

Ges'mas (g hard). The impenitent malefactor, crucified with our Lord, according to the ancient mysteries.

Gessler (g hard). The Austrian governor of the three Forest Cantons of Switzerland. A man of most brutal nature and tyrannical disposition. He attempted to carry off the daughter of Leuthold, a Swiss herdsman; but Leuthold slew the ruffian sent to seize her, and fled. This act of injustice roused the people to rebellion, and Gessler, having put to death Melch'tal, the patriarch of the Forest Cantons, insulted the people by commanding them to bow down to his cap, hoisted on a high pole. Tell refusing so to do, was arrested with his son, and Gessler, in the refinement of cruelty, imposed on him the task of shooting with his bow and arrow an apple from the head of his own son. Tell succeeded in this dangerous skill-trial, but in his agitation dropped an arrow from his robe. The governor insolently demanded what the second arrow was for, and Tell fearlessly replied, "To shoot you with, had I failed in the task imposed upon me." Gessler now ordered him to be carried in chains across the lake, and cast into Kunsnacht castle, a prey "to the reptiles that lodged there." He was, however, rescued by the peasantry, and, having shot Gessler, freed his country from the Austrian yoke.—Rossini's opera of "Guglielmo Tell."

Gesta Romano'rum (g soft), compiled by Pierre Bercheur, prior of the Benedictine convent of St. Eloi, Paris, published by the Roxburgh Society, and edited by Sir F. Madden.

Geste or Gest (g soft). A story, romance, achievement. From the Latin gesta (exploits).

The scene of these gestes being laid in ordinary life. —Cyclopædia Britan. (Romance).

Gew'gaw (g hard). A showy trifle. (Saxon, ge-guf, a trifle; French, joujou, a toy.)

Ghe'bers or Gue'brës. The original natives of Iran (Persia), who adhered to the religion of Zoroaster, and (after the conquest of their country by the Arabs) became waifs and outlaws. The term is now applied to fire-worshippers generally. Hanway says that the ancient Ghebers wore a cushee or belt, which they never laid aside.

Ghengis Khan (King of Kings). A title assumed by Tam'ugin. (1336-1405.)

Ghillie. (See GILLIE) (g hard).

Ghoolee Beer'abau, or Spirit of the Waste. The Afghans believe each of the deserts of their country to be infested by a lonely demon, so called.

Ghoul or Ghole (g hard), a church-yard demon that feeds on the dead.

Giaffir (Djaf'fir). Pacha of Aby'dos, and father of Zule'ika. He tells her he intends to marry her to Kara Osmou Ogloo, governor of Magnesia; but Zuleika has betrothed herself to her cousin Selim. The lovers flee, Giaffir shoots Selim, Zuleika dies of grief, and the pacha lives on a heart-broken old man, ever calling to the winds, "Where is my daughter?" and echo answers, "Where?" —Byron, "Bride of Abydos."

Giall. The infernal river of Scandinavian mythology.

Gian ben Gian (g soft). King of the Ginns or Genii, and founder of the Pyramids. He was overthrown by Aza'zil or Lucifer. (Arab Superstitions.)

Giants (g soft) (1) of Greek mythology, sons of Tar'tarus and Ge. When they attempted to storm heaven, they were hurled to earth by the aid of Hercules, and buried under Mount Etna.

ii. Of Scandinavian mythology, were evil genii, dwelling in Jötunheim (giant-land), who had the power of reducing or extending their stature at will.

iii. Of Nursery mythology, are cannibals of vast stature and immense muscular power, but as stupid as they are violent and treacherous.

iv. In the romance of "Gargantua and Pantagruel," by Rabelais, giants means princes.

v. Mythical Giants. (1) ANGOULAFRE of the Broken Teeth was "twelve cubits in height, his face measured three feet across, his nose was nine inches long, his arms and legs were each six feet, his fingers six inches and two lines. His enormous mouth was armed with sharp-pointed yellow tusks. He was descended from Goliath, and assumed the title of Governor of Jerusalem. He had the strength of thirty men, and his mace was the trunk of an oak tree, 300 years old." Some say the Tower of Pisa lost its perpendicularity by the weight of Angoulafre, who one day leaned against it to rest himself. He was slain by Roland in single combat at the Fronsac. — "Croque-mitaine."

(2) ANTÆOS, said by Plutarch to have been sixty cubits (eighty-five feet.) Plutarch adds that the grave of this giant was opened by Serbo'nios.

(3) ORI'ON or Otus, according to Pliny, was forty-six cubits (sixty-six feet) in height. His bones were disclosed in Crete by an earthquake.

(4) POLYPHE'MOS, whose skeleton was supposed to have been found at Trapa'ni, in Sicily, in the fourteenth century. Accepting this as a fact, the height of this monster was 300 feet.

(5) TEUTOBOCH'US, the King, whose remains were discovered near the Rhone, in 1613, occupied a tomb thirty feet long.

The bones of another giant were exposed by the action of the Rhone in 1456. Presuming that these bones were part of a human skeleton, the height of the living giant would have been thirty feet.

Another skeleton was discovered at Lucerne in 1577. If this was a human skeleton, the height of the man would have been nineteen feet, according to Dr. Plater.

N.B. Numerous other examples are given in the body of the Dictionary.

vi. Real Giants of the Human Race.

(1) ANAK, whose real name is Joseph Brice, born at Ramonchamp in the Vosges, 1840. He was exhibited in London, 1865. Height, at the age of twenty-six years, seven feet eight inches. Sometimes called "The Giant of the Mountains."

(2) BLACKER (Henry), the British giant, born at Cuckfield, in Sussex, 1724. Height seven feet four inches, and most symmetrical.

(3) BRADLEY, born at Market Weighton, in Yorkshire. Height at death seven feet eight inches. His right hand is preserved in the museum of the College of Surgeons. (1798-1820.)

(4) CHANG, of Fychou, the Chinese giant, exhibited in London in 1866. Height seven feet six inches.

(5) COTTER (Patrick), the Irish giant, died 1802. Height eight feet seven and a half inches. A cast of his hand is preserved in the museum of the College of Surgeons.

(6) ELEIZEGUE (Jouchim), the Spanish giant. Height seven feet ten inches. Exhibited in the Cosmorama, Regent Street.

(7) EVANS (William), died 1632. Height at death eight feet.

(8) GOLIATH of Gath was about eight feet six inches.

(9) HALE (Robert), the Norfolk giant, born at Somerton. Height seven feet six inches. (1820-1862.)

(10) LOUIS, the French giant. Height seven feet four inches. His left hand is preserved in the museum of the College of Surgeons.

(11) LOUSHKIN, the Russian giant, and drum-major of the Imperial Guards. Height eight feet five inches.

(12) MAGRATH, an orphan reared by bishop Berkley. He died at the age of twenty, when he was seven feet eight inches. (1740-1760.)

(13) MELLON (Edmund), born at Port Leicester, Ireland, 1665, was, at the age of nineteen, seven feet six inches.

(14) MILLER (Maximilian-Christopher), the Saxon giant, was eight feet in height. His hand measured twelve inches, and his fore-finger was nine inches long. He died in London at the age of sixty. (1674-1734.)

(15) MURPHY, an Irish giant, died at Marseilles. He was a contemporary of O'Brien. Height eight feet ten inches.

(16) O'BRIEN, or Charles Eyne, the Irish giant, was eight feet four inches. His skeleton is preserved in the museum of the College of Surgeons. (1761-1783.)

(17) OG, King of Bashan. According to tradition, he lived 3,000 years, and walked beside the Ark during the Deluge. One of his bones formed a bridge over a river. Moses says that his iron bedstead was fifteen feet nine inches in length (Deut. iii. 13).

(18) In the museum of Trinity College, Dublin, is a human skeleton, eight feet six inches in height.

No known specimen of man has reached the height of nine feet. Murphy came the nearest to it. The bones of bigger monsters belonged to some of the antediluvian beasts.

The Giant of Literature. Dr. Samuel Johnson (1709-1783). Also called "The great moralist."

Giant's Causeway, in Ireland. A basaltic mole, said to be the commencement of a road to be constructed by the giants across the channel, reaching from Ireland to Scotland.

Giaour (jow'-er). An unbeliever, one who disbelieves the Mahometan faith. A corruption of the Arabic Kiafir. It has now become so common that it scarcely implies insult, but has about the force of the word "Gentile," meaning "not a Jew." Byron has a poetical tale so called, but he has not given the giaour a name.

Gib (g soft). The cut of his gib. (See JIB.)

To hang one's gib. To be angry, to pout. The lower lip of a horse is called its gib, and so is the beak of a male salmon.

Gib Cat. A tom-cat. The male cat used to be called Gilbert. Nares says that Tibert or Tybalt is the French form of Gilbert, and hence Chaucer in his "Romance of the Rose," renders "Thibert le Cas" by "Gibbe, our Cat," (v. 6204). (See TYBALT.)

I am as melancholy as a gib cat, or a lugged bear.
—Shakespeare, "Henry IV." i. 2.

Gibbed (g soft). As melancholy as a gibbed cat. As an emasculated or old male cat. Gibbed is a corruption of kilbed, sore. (In Devonshire kibby means sore; in Salop, kibble is to bruise pulse; kibes, chilblains.)

Gibberish (g hard). Geber, the Arabian, was by far the greatest alchemist of the eleventh century, and wrote several treatises on "the art of making gold" in the usual mystical jargon, because the ecclesiastics would have put to death any one who had openly written on the subject. Friar Bacon, in 1282, furnishes a specimen of this gibberish. He is giving the prescription for making gunpowder, and says —

Sed tamen sal s-petree.
LURU MONE CAP URBE
Et sulphuris.

The second line is merely an anagram of Carbonum pulvere (pulverised charcoal).

Gibbet (g soft). A foot-pad, who "piqued himself on being the best-behaved man on the road."—Geo. Farquhar, "Beaux' Stratagem."

To gibbet the bread (Lincolnshire) When bread turns out rropy and is supposed to be bewitched, the good dame runs a stick through it and hangs it in the cupboard. It is gibbeted in terrorem to other batches.

Gib'elins or Ghib'ellines (g hard). (See GUELFUS.)

Gib'eonite (4 syl., g hard). A slave's slave, a workman's labourer, a farmer's understrapper, or Jack-of-all-work. The Gibeonites were made "hewers of wood and drawers of water" to the Israelites. —Josh. ix. 27.

And Giles must trudge, whoever gives command,
A Gibeonite, that serves them all by turn.
Bloomfield, "Farmer's Boy."

Gibral'tar (g soft). A contraction of Gebel al Tarik (Geb' al Tar), "mountain of Tarik." This Tarik was an Arabian general, who, under the orders of Mousa, landed at Calpè in 710, and utterly defeated Roderick, the Gothic King of Spain.

Gig or Gigg (g hard). A whipping top, made like a τ .

Thou disputest like an infant. Go whip thy gig.
—Shakespeare, "Love's Labour Lost," v. 1.

Gig-lamps. Spectacles. Gig-lamps are the "spectacles" of a gig.

Giggle (g hard). Have you found a giggle's nest? A question asked in Norfolk when any one laughs immoderately and senselessly. The meaning is, Have you found a nest of romping girls that you laugh so? Giglet is still in common use in the West of England for a gidly, romping, Tom-boy girl, and in Salop a flighty person is called a "giggle." (Saxon, geagl; Dutch, gichgelen; Italian, ghignare; Irish, giglim; &c.) (See GAPE'S-NEST.)

Gil Blas (g soft). The hero of Le Sage's novel of the same name. Timid, but audacious; well-disposed, but easily led astray; shrewd, but easily gulled by practising on his vanity; good-natured, but without moral principle. The tale, according to one account, is based on Matteo Aleman's Spanish romance, called the "Life of Guzman;" others maintain that the original was the comic romance, entitled "Relaciones de la Vida del Escudero Marcos de Obregon."

Gilbertines (3 syl., g hard). A religious order founded in the twelfth century by St. Gilbert of Lincolnshire.

Gildip'pē (in Jerusalem Delivered). Wife of Edward, an English baron, who accompanied her husband to the Holy War, and performed prodigies of valour (bk. ix.). Both she and her husband were slain by Solyman (bk. xx.).

Gilderoy' (3 syl., g hard). A famous robber, who robbed Cardinal Richelieu and Oliver Cromwell. There was a Scotch robber of the same name in the reign of Queen Mary. Both were noted for their handsome persons, and both were hanged.

Giles (1 syl., g soft). The "farmer boy" in Bloomfield's poem so called.

Giles (St.). Patron saint of cripples. The tradition is that the king of France, hunting in the desert, accidentally wounded the hermit in the knee; and the hermit, that he might the better mortify the flesh, refusing to be cured, remained a cripple for life.

The symbol of this saint is a hind, in allusion to the "heaven-directed hind" which went daily to his cave near the mouth of the Rhone to give him milk. He is sometimes represented as an old man with an arrow in his knee, and a hind by his side.

Hopping or Hobbling Giles. A lame person; so called from St. Giles, the tutelary saint of cripples. (See CRIPPLE-GATE.)

Lame as St. Giles', Cripple-gate. (See above.)

Sir Giles Overreach. "A New Way to Pay Old Debts," by Massinger. The "Academy figure" of this character was Sir Giles Mompesson, a notorious usurer, banished the kingdom for his misdeeds.

Giles of Antwerp (g soft). Giles Coignet, the painter. (1530-1600.)

Gill, i.e., Giles. A contraction of Argidius.

Gill (g soft). A corruption of Jill, that is, of Julia (Jyl). A homely woman, a sweetheart.

Every Jack has got his Jill; i.e., Ilka laddie has his lassie. Burns.

Gill (Harry). A farmer struck with the curse of ever shivering with cold, because he would not allow old Goody Blake to keep a few stray sticks which she had picked up to warm herself by.

Oh! what's the matter? what's the matter?

What is't that ails young Harry Gill,

That evermore his tee h thev chatter,

Chatter, chatter, chatter, still?....

No word to any man he utters,

A-lee'd or up, to young or old;

But ever to himself he mutters—

"Poor Harry Gill is very cold."

Wordsworth, "Goody Blake and Harry Gill."

Gills (g hard). Wipe your gills, your mouth. The gills of fishes, like the mouth of man, are the organs of respiration.

Gillie (g hard). A servant or attendant; the man who leads a pony about when a child is riding. A Gillie-wet-foot is a bare-footed Highland lad.

These gillie-wet-foots, as they were called, were destined to heat the bushes.—Sir Walter Scott, "Waverley," c. xiii.

Gillies Hill. In the battle of Bannockburn (1314), king Robert Bruce ordered all the servants, drivers of carts, and camp followers, to go behind a height. When the battle seemed to favour the Scotch, these servants, or gillies, desirous of sharing in the plunder, rushed from their concealment with such arms as they could lay hands on; and the English, thinking them to be a new army, fled in panic. The height in honour was ever after called 'The Gillies' Hill.—Sir W. Scott, "Tales of a Grandfather," x.

Gillyflower (g soft), is not the July-flower, but the French girolée, from girofle (a clove), called by Chaucer "girofre." Some maintain that it is the clove pink, while others say it is the wall-flower.

'The fairest flowers of the season
Are our carnations and streaked gillyflowers.'
Shakespeare, "Winter's Tale," iv. 3.

Gilpin (John), of Cowper's famous ballad, is a caricature of Mr. Beyer, an eminent linen-draper at the end of Paternoster Row, where it joins Cheapside. He died 1791, at the age of 98. It was Lady Austin who told the adventure to our domestic poet, to divert him from his melancholy. The marriage adventure of Commodore Trunnion in "Peregrine Pickle" is very similar to the wedding-day adventure of John Gilpin.

John Gilpin was a citizen
Of credit and renown;
A train-band captain eke was he
Of famous London town.
Cowper, "John Gilpin."

Gilt (g hard). To take the gilt off the gingerbread. To destroy the illusion. The reference is to gingerbread watches, men, and other gilded toys, sold at fairs. These eatables were common even in the reign of Henry IV., but were then made of honey instead of treacle.

Giltspur Street (West Smithfield), so called because it was the route taken by the gilt-spurs, or knights, on their way to Smithfield, where tournaments were held.

Gimlet Eye (g hard). A squint-eye; strictly speaking, "an eye that wanders obliquely," jocosely called a "piercer." (Welch, gwin, a movement round; gwiniaw, to twist or move in a serpentine direction; Celtic, guimble).

Gimli. The best of the Elysian abodes. — Scandinavian Mythology.

Gimmer (g soft), or Jimmer, a jointed hinge. In Somersetshire, gimmace. We have also gemel. A gimmel is a double ring, or anything that couples, also called a gimmew. (Latin, gemellus, twins.)

Gines de Passamontë. A galley-slave and puppet-show-man in "Don Quixote."

Gin'evra (g soft). The young Italian bride, who hid in a trunk with a spring-lock. The lid fell upon her, and she was never discovered till the body had become a skeleton. — Rogers, "Italy."

Be the cause what it might, from his offer she shrunk
And, Gin'evra-like, shut herself in a trunk. Lowell.

Gingerbread (g soft). Brummagem wares, showy but worthless. The allusion is to the gilt gingerbread toys sold at fairs.

Ginnunga-Gap. The abyss between Niflheim (the region of fog) and Muspelheim (the region of heat). It existed before either land or sea, heaven or earth. — Scandinavian Mythology.

Gi'ona (g soft). A leader of the Anabaptists, once a servant of Comte d'Oberthal, but discharged from his service for theft. In the rebellion headed by the Anabaptists, Giona took the count prisoner, but John of Leyden set him free again. Giona, with the rest of the conspirators, betrayed their prophet king as soon as the emperor arrived with his army. They entered the banquet room to arrest him, but perished in the flaming palace. — Meyerbeer, "Le Prophète" (an opera).

Giovan'ni (Don). A Spanish libertine. (See JUAN.) His valet, Leporello, says his master had "in Italy 700 mistresses, in Germany 800, in Turkey and France 91, in Spain 1,003." When "the measure of his iniquity was full," the ghost of the commandant whom he had slain came with a legion of "foul fiends," and carried him off to a "dreadful gulf that opened to devour him." — Mozart, "Don Giovanni" (Libretto by Lorenzo da Ponte).

Gipsy (g soft). Said to be a corruption of Egyptian, and so called because in 1418 a band of them appeared in Europe, commanded by a leader named Duke Michael of "Little Egypt." Other appellations are:—

(2) Bohe'mians. So called by the French, because the first that ever arrived in their country came from Bohemia in 1427, and presented themselves before the gates of Paris. They were not allowed to enter the city, but were lodged at La Chapelle, St. Denis. The French nickname for gip'sies is cagoux (unsociables).

(3) Ciga'nos. So called by the Portuguese, a corruption of Zinga'nè. (See TCHINGA'NI.)

(4) Gita'nos. So called by the Spaniards, a corruption of Zinga'nè. (See TCHINGA'NI.)

(5) Heidens (heathens). So called by the Dutch, because they are heathens.

(6) Pharaoh-nepek (Pharaoh's people). So called in Hungary, from the notion that they came from Egypt.

(7) Sintë. So called by themselves, because they assert that they come from Sind, i.e., Ind (Hindustan). (See TCHINGA'NI.)

(8) Tatar. So called by the Danes and Swedes, from the notion that they came from Tartary.

(9) Tchinga'ni or Tshingani. So called by the Turks, from a tribe still existing at the mouth of the Indus (Tskin-calo, black Indian).

(10) Wala'chians. So called by the Italians, from the notion that they came from Walachia.

(11) Zigeu'ner (wanderers). So called by the Germans.

(12) Zincali and Zinga'ni. Said to be so called by the Turks, because in 1517 they were led by Zinga'neus to revolt from Sultan Selim; but more likely a mere variety of Telingani, q.v.

The Gipsy. Anthony de Sola'rio, the painter and illuminator, Il Zingaro. (1382-1455.)

Giral'da (g soft). The giantess; a statue of victory on the top of an old Moorish tower in Seville.

Gird. To gird with the sword, to create to a peerage. It was the Saxon method of investiture to an earldom, continued after the conquest. Thus Richard I. "girded with the sword" Hugh de Pudsey, the aged bishop of Durham, making (as he said) "a young earl of an old prelate."

Girdle (g hard). A good name is better than a golden girdle (Solomon); a good name is better than money. It used to be customary to carry money in the girdle, and a girdle of gold meant a "purse of gold." The French proverb, Bonne renommée vaut mieux que ceinture dorée, refers rather to the custom of wearing girdles of gold tissue, forbidden, in 1420, to women of bad character.

Children under the girdle, not yet born.

All children under the girdle at the time of marriage are held to be legitimate.—Notes and Queries.

He has a large mouth but small girdle; great expenses but small means. The girdle is the purse or purse-pocket. (See above.)

He has undone her girdle; taken her for his wedded wife. The Roman bride wore a chaplet of flowers on her head, and a girdle of sheep's wool about her waist. A part of the marriage ceremony was for the bridegroom to loose this girdle.—Vaughan, "Golden Grove."

If he be angry, he knows how to turn his girdle ("Much Ado about Nothing," v. 1). If he is angry, let him prepare himself to fight, if he likes. Before wrestlers, in ancient times, engaged in combat, they turned the buckle of their girdle behind them. Thus Sir Ralph Winwood writes to Secretary Cecil—

I said, "What I saye was not to make him angry." He replied, "If I were angry I might turn the buckle of my girdle behind me."—Dec. 17, 1602

The Persian regulation-girdle. In Persia a new sort of "Procrustes Bed" is adopted, according to Kemper. One of the officers of the king is styled the "chief holder of the girdle," and his business is to measure the ladies of the harem by a sort of regulation-girdle. If any lady has outgrown the standard, she is reduced, like a jockey, by spare diet; but if she falls short thereof, she is fattened up, like a Strasburg goose, to regulation size. (See PROCRUSTES.)

To put a girdle round the earth; to travel or go round it. Puck says, "I'll put a girdle round about the earth in forty minutes."—"Midsummer Night's Dream," ii. 2.

Girdle of Venus. (See CESTUS.)

Giron'dists (g soft). French, Giron-dins, moderate republicans in the first French Revolution. So called from the department of Gironde, which chose for the Legislative Assembly five men who greatly distinguished themselves for their oratory, and formed a political party. They were subsequently joined by Brissot, Condorcet, and the adherents of Roland. The party is called The Gironde.

Gir'ouet'te (3 syl., g soft). A turn-coat, a weathercock (French). The Dictionnaire des Girouettes contains the names of the most noted turn-coats, with their political veerings.

Gis (g soft), i.e. Jesus. A corruption of Jesus or J.H.S. Ophelia says "By Gis and by St. Charity."—"Hamlet," iv. 5.

Gis'li. Nephew of Kol, and best of the Icelandic poets, died 978.

Gita'nos. (See GIRSY.)

Gitchë Man'ito (N. Am. Ind.). The Great Spirit and Master of Life.

Give. Give the boys a holiday. When Anaxagoras was dying, and was asked what honour should be conferred upon him, he replied, "Give the boys a holiday."

Gizzard (g hard). That stuck in his gizzard. Annoyed him, was more than he could stomach or digest. The gizzard is the strong muscular stomach of a fowl.

Gjallar. Heimdall's horn, which he blows to give the gods notice when any one is approaching the bridge Bifröst, q. v.—Scandinavian Mythology.

Gladheim (Home of joy). The largest and most magnificent mansion of the Scandinavian gods. It contains twelve seats besides the throne of Odin.

Glamorgan. Geoffrey of Monmouth says that Cundah' and Morgan, the sons of Gonorill and Regan, usurped the crown at the death of Cordeilla. The former resolved to reign alone, chased his brother into Wales, and slew him at the foot of a hill, hence called Gla-Morgan or Glyn-Morgan, valley of Morgan. (We dare not even hint against this tradition the etymology of gwlad môr gan [wg], the city connected with the sea-[side], or the maritime city, synonymous with the Celtic Armorica. (See Spenser, "Faery Queen," ii. 10.)

Glasgow (Celtic, glas gowy, blue water). The town is on the bend of the Clyde, the blue water referred to. According to tradition, it receives its name from some mythical blacksmith (Gaelic, glas gow, the dark smith).

Abstracted from the bashful expression, which was that of the moment, the forehead of Henry Gow or Smith (for he was indifferently so called) was high and noble.—Sir Walter Scott, "Fair Maid of Perth," ch. 2.

Glasgow Arms. An oak tree, a bell hanging on one of the branches, a bird at the top of the tree, and a salmon with a ring in its mouth at the base.

St. Kentigern, in the seventh century, took up his abode on the banks of a little stream which falls into the Clyde, the site of the present city of Glasgow. Upon an oak in the clearing he hung a bell to summon the savages to worship, hence the oak and the bell. Now for the other two emblems: A queen having formed an illicit attachment to a soldier, gave him a precious ring which the king had given her. The king, aware of the fact, stole upon the soldier in sleep, abstracted the ring, threw it into the Clyde, and then asked the queen for it. The queen, in alarm, applied to St. Kentigern, who knew the whole affair; and the saint went to the Clyde, caught a salmon with the ring in its mouth, handed it to the queen, and was thus the means of restoring peace to the royal couple, and of reforming the repentant queen.

Glass is from the Celtic glas (bluish-green), the colour produced by the woad employed by the ancient Britons in dyeing their bodies. Pliny calls it glas-trum, and Cæsar vitrum.

Glass-eye. A blind eye, not an eye made of glass, but the Danish glas-øie (wall-eye).

Glass-houses. Those who live in glass-houses should not throw stones. When, on the union of the two crowns, London was inundated with Scotchmen, Buckingham was a chief instigator of the movement against them, and parties used nightly to go about breaking their windows. In retaliation, a party of Scotchmen smashed the windows of the duke's mansion, which stood in St. Martin's Fields, and had so many windows that it went by the name of the "Glass House." The court favourite appealed to the king, and the British Solomon replied, "Steenie, Steenie, those wha live in glass housen should be carefu' how they fling stances."

Glass-slipper (of Cinderella). A curious blunder of the translator, who has mistaken vair (sable) for verre (glass). Sable was worn only by kings and princes, so the fairy gave royal slippers to her favourite. Hamlet says he shall discard his mourning and resume "his suit of sables," iii. 2.

Glasse (Mrs.). Immortalised by a reputed saying in her cookery-book—"First catch your hare," then cook it according to the directions given. If there is any truth at all in the witticism, the direction was, probably, "First, scatch (or) scradge your hare"—i.e., skin and trim it; an East Anglian word. Or else, "first scotch your hare" before you jug it—i.e., cut it into small pieces. It must be observed that the "pithy sentence" is not to be found in any extant edition of Mrs. Glasse's work.

Glaswe'gian. Belonging to Glasgow.

Glauber Salts. So called from Johann Rudolph Glauber, a German alchemist, who discovered it in 1658 in his researches after the philosopher's stone. It is the sulphate of soda.

A Glaucus' Swop. A one-sided bargain,

Alluding to the exchange of armour between Glaucos and Diomedes. As the armour of the Lycian was of gold, and that of the Greek of brass, it was like bartering precious stones for French paste. Moses, in Goldsmith's "Vicar of Wakefield," made "a Glaucus swop" with the spectacle-seller.

Glaimore or Claymore (2 syl.). The Scottish great sword. It used to be a large two-handled sword, but was subsequently applied to the broad-sword with the basket-hilt. (Gaelic claidhamh, a sword; more, great.)

Gleek. A game at cards, sometimes called cleek. Thus, in "Epsom Wells," Dorothy says to Mrs. Bisket, "I'll make one at cleek, that's better than any two-handed game." Ben Jonson, in the "Alchemist," speaks of Gleek and Primers as "the best games for the gallantest company."

Gleek is played by three persons. Every deuce and trois is thrown out of the pack. Twelve cards are then dealt to each player, and eight are left for stock, which is offered in rotation to the players for purchase. The trumps are called Tiddy, Tumbler, Tib, Tom, and Towser. Gleek is the German gleich (like), intimating the point on which the game turns, Gleek being three cards all alike, as three aces, three kings, &c.

Glenco'e (2 syl.). The massacre of Glencoe. The Edinburgh authorities exhorted the Jacobites to submit to William and Mary, and offered pardon to all who submitted on or before the 31st of December, 1691. Mac-Ian, chief of the Macdonalds of Glencoe, was unable to do so before the 6th of January, and his excuse was sent to the Council at Edinburgh. The Master of Stair (Sir John Dalrymple) resolved to make an example of Mac-Ian, and obtained the king's permission "to extirpate the set of thieves." Accordingly, on the 1st of February, 120 soldiers, led by a Captain Campbell, marched to Glencoe, told the clan they were come as friends, and lived peaceably among them for twelve days; but on the morning of the 13th, the glenmen, to the number of thirty-eight, were scandalously murdered, their huts set on fire, and their flocks and herds driven off as plunder. Campbell has written a poem, and Talfourd a play on the subject.

Glendoveer', in Hindu Mythology, is a kind of sylph, the most lovely of the good spirits.

Glendower (Owen). A Welsh chief, one of the most active and formidable enemies of Henry IV. He was descended from Llewellyn, the last of the Welsh princes. Sir Edmund Mortimer married one of his daughters, and the husband of Mortimer's sister was Earl Percy, generally called "Hotspur," who took Douglas prisoner at Homildon Hill. Glendower, Hotspur, Douglas, and others conspired to dethrone Henry, but the coalition was ruined in the fatal battle of Shrewsbury. Shakespeare makes the Welsh nobleman a wizard of great diversity of talent, but especially conceited of the prodigies that "announced" his birth.—Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV."

Glim. Douse the glim, put out the light. Douse is do out, and glim is from the German glimmen (to burn faintly), our glimmer.

Gloria in Excelsis. The latter portion of this doxology is ascribed to Telesphorus, A.D. 139. (See GLORY.)

Gloria'na. (Queen Elizabeth considered as a sovereign.) Spenser says in his "Faëry Queen," that she kept an annual feast for twelve days, during which time adventurers appeared before her to undertake whatever tasks she chose to impose upon them. On one occasion twelve knights presented themselves before her, and their exploits form the scheme of Spenser's Allegory. The poet intended to give a separate book to each knight, but only six and a half books remain.

Glorious 1st of June. June 1st, 1791, when Lord Howe, who commanded the Channel fleet, gained a decisive victory over the French.

Glorious John. John Dryden, the poet. (1631-1701.)

Glory. Meaning speech (or) the tongue, so-called by the Psalmist, because speech is man's speciality. Other animals see, hear, smell, and feel, quite as well and often better than man, but rational speech is man's glory, or that which distinguishes the race from other animals.

I will sing and give praise even with my glory.—Ps. cviii. 1.

That my glory may sing praise to thee and not be silent.—Ps. xxx. 12.

Awake up my glory, awake psalter and harp.—Ps. lvi. 8.

Glory be to the Father, &c. The first verse of this doxology is said to be by St. Basil. During the Arian controversy, it ran thus: "Glory be to the Father, by the Son, and in the Holy Ghost." (See GLORIA.)

Glory Hand. In folk lore, a dead man's hand, supposed to possess certain magical properties.

De hand of glory is hand cut off from a dead man as he been hanged for murther, and dried vey nice in de smoke of juniper wood.—Sir W. Scott, "The Antiquary" (Dousternivel).

Glossin (Lawyer) purchases Ellan-gowan estate, and is found by Counsellor Pleydell to be implicated in carrying off Henry Bertrand, the heir of the estate. Both Glossin and Dirk Hatterick, his accomplice, are sent to prison, and in the night the lawyer contrives to enter the smuggler's cell, when a quarrel ensues, in which Hatterick strangles him, and then hangs himself.—Sir W. Scott, "Guy Mannering."

Glouces'ter (2 syl.). The ancient Britons called the town Caer Glou (bright city). The Romans Latinised Glou or Glov in Glev-um, and added coloniū (the Roman colony of Glev-um). The Saxons restored the old British word Glou, and added ceaster, to signify it had been a Roman camp. Hence the word means, "Glou, the camp city." Geoffrey of Monmouth says, when Arviragus married Genuissa, daughter of Claudius Caesar, he induced the emperor to build a city on the spot where the nuptials were solemnised; this city was called Caer-Claw, a contraction of Caer-Claud, corrupted into Caer-glou, converted by the Romans into Glou-caster, and by the Saxons into Glou-ceaster or Glou-cester. Some, continues the same "philologist," derive the name from the duke Gloius, a son of Claudius, born in Britain on the very spot.

Glove. Right as my glove. The phrase, says Sir Walter Scott, comes from the custom of pledging a glove as the signal of irrefragable faith.—"The Antiquary."

He bit his glove. He resolved on mortal revenge. On the "Border," to bite the glove was considered a pledge of deadly vengeance.

Stern Rutherford right little said,
But bit his glove and shook his head.
Sir Walter Scott, "Lay of the Last Minstrel."

Gloves are not worn in the presence of royalty, because we are to stand unarmed, with the helmet off the head and gauntlets off the hands, to show we have no hostile intention. (See SALUTATIONS.)

Gloves are worn by the clergy to indicate that their hands are clean and not open to bribes.

Gloves given to a judge in a maiden assize. In an assize without a criminal, the sheriff presents the judge with a pair of white gloves. Chambers says, anciently judges were not allowed to wear gloves on the bench (Cyclopædia). To give a judge a pair of gloves, therefore, symbolised that he need not come to the bench, but might wear gloves.

You owe me a pair of gloves. A small present. The gift of a pair of gloves was at one time a perquisite of those who performed small services, such as pleading your cause, arbitrating your quarrel, or showing you some favour which could not be charged for. As the services became more important, the glove was "lined" with money, or made to contain some coin called glove-money (q.v.). Relics of this ancient custom still remain in the presentation of gloves to those who attend weddings and funerals, and in the claim of a lady who chooses to salute a gentleman caught napping in her company. In "The Fair Maid of Perth," by Sir Walter Scott, Catharine steals from her chamber on St. Valentine's morn, and catching Henry Smith asleep, gives him a kiss. The glover says to him—

Come into the booth with me, my son, and I will furnish thee with a fitting theme. Thou knowest the maiden who ventures to kiss a sleeping man, wins of him a pair of gloves.—Ch. v.

In the next chapter Henry presents the gloves, and Catharine accepts them.

Glove Money. A bribe, a perquisite; so called from the ancient custom of presenting a pair of gloves to a person who undertook a cause for you. Mrs. Croaker presented Sir Thomas More, the Lord Chancellor, with a pair of gloves lined with forty pounds in "angels," as a "token." Sir Thomas kept the gloves, but returned the lining. (See above.)

Glubdub'drib. The land of sorcerers and magicians visited by Gulliver in his "Travels."—Swift.

Gluckists and Pici'nists. A foolish rivalry excited in Paris (1774-1780) between the admirers of Gluck and those of Pici'ni, the former a German musical composer, and the latter an Italian. Marie Antoinette was a Gluckist, and consequently Young France favoured the rival claimant. In the streets, coffee-houses, private houses, and even schools, the merits of Gluck and Picini were canvassed; and all Paris was ranged on one side or the other. This contention was as absurd as if persons were to contend about the relative merits of beef and sugar.

Glum had a sword and cloak given him by his grandfather, which brought good luck to their possessors. After this present everything prospered with him. He gave the spear to Asgrim and cloak to Gizur the White, after which everything went wrong with him. Old and blind, he retained his cunning long after he had lost his luck.—The Nials Saga.

To look glum. To look dull or dispirited. (Scotch, gloum, a frown; Dutch, loom, heavy, dull; our gloom, gloaming, &c.)

Glum-Dal'clitch. A girl, nine years old and only forty feet high, who had charge of Gulliver in Brobdingnag.—Swift, "Gulliver's Travels."

Soon as Glumdalclitch missed her pleasing care,
She wept, she blubbered, and she tore her hair,
Pope.

Gluttony. (See ADEPHAGIA, APICIUS, &c.)

Glyp'todon (Greek, carved-tooth). An extinct quadruped of the Armadillo class, about as big as an ox.

Gna'tho. A vain, boastful parasite in the "Eunuch" of Terence (Greek, gnathon, jaw, meaning "tongue-doughty.")

Gno'mes (1 syl.), according to the Rosicrucian system, are the elemental spirits of earth, and the guardians of mines and quarries. (Greek, gnoma, knowledge, meaning the knowing-ones, the wise-ones.) (See SALAMANDERS.)

The four elements are inhabited by spirits called gnathos, gnomes, nymphs and salamanders. The gnomes, or demons of the earth, delight in mischief; but the gnaths, whose habitation is in air, are the best-conditioned creatures imaginable.—Pope, Pref. Letter to the "Rape of the Lock."

Gnostics. The knowers, opposed to believers, various sects in the first ages of Christianity, who tried to accommodate Scripture to the speculations of Pythagoras, Plato, and other ancient philosophers. (Greek, Gnosticos.)

Go of Gin. A quartern. Two well-known actors met at a bar to have a wet together. "One more glass and then we'll go," was repeated over and over again, but in the end to go was no go with them.—Slang Dictionary (a correspondent).

Go it, you cripples. Keep up the fun, keep the ball flying. Mr. Hotten says it is a facetious translation of Ite capelle, in the following Virgilian line:—

Ite domum Saturne, venit Iles'erus, ite cavella.
Ecl. x., last line.

Go on all fours. Perfect in all points. We say of a pun or riddle, "It does not go on all fours," it will not hold good in every way. Lord Macaulay says, "It is not easy to make a simile go on all fours." Sir Edward Coke says, "Nullum simile quatuor pedibus currit." The metaphor is taken from a horse, which is lame if only one of its legs is injured. All four must be sound in order that it may go.

Go through fire and water to serve you. Do anything, even at personal cost and inconvenience. The reference is to the ancient ordeals by fire and water. Those condemned to these ordeals might employ a substitute.

Go-by. To give one the go-by. To pass without notice, to leave in the lurch.

Goat. Usually placed under seats in church stalls, &c., as a mark of dishonour and abhorrence, especially to ecclesiastics who take a vow of continence.

The seven little goats. So the Pleiades are vulgarly called in Spain.

Goat in Boots. A public-house sign. It was the sign of Mercury, der golen boode (the gods' messenger).

Goat and Compasses. A public-house sign in the Commonwealth; a corruption of "God en compasses [us]."

Goatsnose. A prophet born deaf and dumb, who uttered his prophecies by signs.—Rabelais, "Pantagruel," iii. 20.

Gob'bo (Launcelot). A clown in Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice."

Gob'elin Tapestry. So called from Giles Gob'elin, a French dyer in the reign of François I., who discovered the Gobelin scarlet. His house in the suburbs of St. Marcel, in Paris, is still called the Gobelins.

Goblin. A familiar demon. According to popular belief, goblins dwelt in private houses and chinks of trees. As a specimen of forced etymology, it may be mentioned that Elf and Goblin have been derived from Guelf and Ghibelline. (French gobelin, a lubber-fiend; Armoric gobylin; German kobold, the demon of mines; Greek kobalos; Russian colfy; Welsh coblyn, a "knocker;" whence the woodpecker is called in Welsh "coblyn y coed".)

Goblins. In Cardiganshire the miners attribute those strange noises heard in mines to spirits called "Knockers" (goblins). (See above.)

Goblin-cave. In Celtic called "Coir nan Uriskin" (cove of the satyrs), in Benvenue, Scotland.

After landing on the skirts of Benvenue, we reach the cave or cove of the goblins by a steep and narrow defile of one hundred yards in length. It is a deep circular amphitheatre of at least six hundred yards extent in its upper diameter, gradually narrowing towards the base, hemmed in all round by steep and towering rocks, and rendered impenetrable to the rays of the sun by a close covert of luxuriant trees. On the south and west it is bounded by the precipitous shoulder of Benvenue to the height of at least 500 feet; towards the east the rock appears at some former period to have tumbled down, strewing the white course of its tall with immense fragments, which now serve only to give shelter to foxes, wild cats, and badgers. — Dr. Graham.

God. Greek agath' (good), contracted into gath; Gothic goth (god); German gott; Saxon, god and good. (See ALLA, ADONIST, ELOHISTIC, &c.)

The Nine Gods of the Etruscans. Juno, Minerva, and Tinia (the three chief); to which add Vulcan, Mars, Saturn, Hercules, Summanus, and Vedio. (See ASIR ASYNIER.)

Chief of the Greek and Roman deities—

Gods.	GREEK.	LATIN.
God of time	Chronos	Saturn.
King of gods	Zeus	Jupiter.
God of light	Apollo	Apollo.
God of war	Ares	Mars.
God of wine	Poseidon	Neptune.
God of the infernals	Dionysus	Bacchus.
God of love	Pluton	Pluto.
The gods' messenger	Eros	Cupid.
The gods' smith	Hermes	Mercury.
	Hephaestus	Vulcan.

GODDESSES.	GREEK.	LATIN.
Rhea	Wife of Chronos	Cybele of Saturn.
He'ra	Wife of Zeus	Juno of Jupiter.
Athe'na	Of wisdom	Minerva.
Ar'temis	Of hunting	Diana.
Deme'ter	Of tillage	Ceres.
Hes'tia	Of hearth	Vesta.
Perseph'onē	Wife of Pluton	Proserpine of Pluto.
Apbro'ditē	„ of Hephaestus	Venus of Vulcan.

Among the gods. In the uppermost gallery of a theatre, which is near the ceiling, generally painted to resemble the sky. The French call this celestial region paradis.

God bless the duke of Argyle. It is said that the duke of Argyle erected a row of posts to mark his property, and these posts were used by the neighbours, when their shoulders itched, to rub against. Those who live on oatmeal porridge are very subject to cutaneous eruptions.—Hotten, "Slang Dictionary."

"God save the king." It is said by some that both the words and music of the anthem were composed by Dr. John Bull (1563-1622), on the occasion of the discovery of Gunpowder Plot. Hence the words, "Frustrate their knavish tricks." Dr. Bull was afterwards organist at Antwerp Cathedral, where the original MS. is still preserved, together with an account of the circumstance which gave rise to it.

Others attribute the anthem to Henry Carey, author of "Sally in our Alley;" and Dr. Harrington asserts that John Christopher Smith corrected the bass at the request of Mr. Carey. It is further said that it was composed in 1740, for a dinner given by the Mercers' Company in honour of George II. on his birthday. It seems to have first come into general use in 1745, three years after the death of Carey, during the threatened invasion of the young Pretender. The truth of the matter seems to be this: Dr. John Bull was the original composer; an Anthony Young, in the reign of James II., made some alteration in the score; Henry Carey reset the music and added one of the verses.

God's Acre. A churchyard or cemetery.

Like that ancient Saxon phrase, which calls The burial-ground God's Acre.—Longfellow.

Godfather. To stand godfather, to pay the reckoning, godfathers being generally chosen for the sake of the present they are expected to make the child at the christening or in their wills.

Godfathers. Jurymen, who are the sponsors of the criminal.

God'frey. The Agamemnon of Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered," chosen by God as chief of the crusaders; he is represented as calm, circumspect, and prudent; a despiser of "worldly empire, wealth, and fame."

Godliness. Cleanliness next to godliness, "as Matthew Henry says." Whether Matthew Henry used the proverb as well known, or invented it, depone-ment sayeth not.

Godmer. A British giant, son of Albion, slain by Canutus, one of the companions of Brute.

Those three monstrous stones,
Which that huge son of hideous Albion
Great God mer threw in fierce content on
At bold Canutus; but of him was slain
Spenser, "Faery Queen," ii. 10.

Godiva (lady). Patroness of Coventry. In 1040, Leofric, earl of Mercia and lord of Coventry, imposed certain exactions on his tenants, which his lady beseeched him to remove. To escape her importunity, he said he would do so if she would ride naked through the town. Lady Godiva took him at his word, and the earl faithfully kept his promise.

The legend asserts that every inhabitant of Coventry kept indoors at the time, but a certain tailor peeped through his window to see the lady pass. Some say he was struck blind, others that his eyes were put out by the indignant townsfolk, and some that he was put to death. Be this as it may, he has ever since been called "Peeping Tom of Coventry." Tennyson has a poem on the subject.

Goël. The avenger of blood, so called by the Jews.

Goe'mot or Goëm'agot. The giant who dominated over the western horn of England, slain by Corineus, one of the companions of Brute. — Geoffrey, "Chronicles," i. 16. (See CORINEUS.)

Gog and Magog. The emperor Diocletian had thirty-three infamous daughters, who murdered their husbands; and being set adrift in a ship, reached Albion, where they fell in with a number of demons. The offspring of this unnatural alliance was a race of giants, afterwards extirpated by Brute and his companions, refugees from Troy. Gog and Magog, the last two of the giant race, were brought in chains to London, then called Troy-novant, and being chained to the palace of Brute, which stood on the site of our Guildhall, did duty as porters. We cannot pledge ourselves to the truth of old Caxton's narrative; but we are quite certain that Gog and Magog had their effigies at Guildhall, in the reign of Henry V. The old giants were destroyed in the great fire, and the present ones, fourteen feet high, were carved in 1703 by Richard Saunders.

Gog'gles. A corruption of ogles, eye-shades. (Danish, oog, an eye; Spanish, ojo; or from the Welsh, gogelu, to shelter.)

Gokurakf. The paradise of Japanese mythology.

Go'jam. A province of Abyssinia (Africa). Captain Speke traced it to Lake Victoria N'Yanza, near the Mountains of the Moon (1861).

The swelling Nile.
From his two springs in Gojam's sunny realm
Pure-welling out. Thomson, "Summer."

Golcon'da, in Hindustan, famous for its diamond mines.

Gold. All that glitters is not gold. — Shakespeare, "Merchant of Venice," ii. 7.

All thing which that schineth as the gold
Is nought gold.

Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales," 12390.
Non teneas aurum totum quod splendet ut aurum
Nec pulchrum pomum quodlibet esse bonum.
Alanus de Insulis, "Parabola."

The gold of Nibelungen. Brought ill-luck to every one who possessed it. — Icelandic Edda.

He has got the gold of Tolo'sa. His ill gains will never prosper. Cæpio, the Roman consul, in his march to Gallia Narbonensis stole from Tolo'sa (Toulouse) the gold and silver consecrated by the Cimbrian Druids to their gods, and when he encountered the Cimbrians, both he and Mallius, his brother-consul, were defeated, and 112,000 of their men were left upon the field (B.C. 106).

Mosaic gold is "aurum musivum," a sulphuret of tin used by the ancients in tessellating.

Mannheim Gold, a sort of pinchbeck, made of copper and zinc, invented at Mannheim, in Germany.

Gold-purse of Spain. Andaluçia is so called because it is the city from which Spain derives its chief wealth.

Golden. The Golden ("Aura'tus"). So Jean Dorat, one of the Pleiad poets of France, was called by a complimentary pun on his name. This pun may pass muster; not so the preposterous title given to him of "The French Pindar." (1507-1588.)

Golden-tongued (Greek, "Chrysol-ogus"). So St. Peter, bishop of Ravenna, was called. (433-450.)

The golden section of a line. Its division into two such parts that the rectangle of the smaller segment and the whole line equal the square of the larger segment. —Euclid, ii. 11.

Golden Age. The best age: as the golden age of innocence, the golden age of literature. Chronologers divide the time between Creation and the birth of Christ into ages; Hesiod describes five, and Lord Byron adds a sixth, "The Age of Bronze." (See AGE, AUGUSTAN.)

i. The Golden Age of Ancient Nations:—

(1) NEW ASSYRIAN EMPIRE. From the reign of Esar-haddon or Assur Adon (Assyria's prince), third son of Sennacherib, to the end of Sarac's reign. (B.C. 691-606.)

(2) CHALDÆO-BABYLONIAN EMPIRE. From the reign of Nabopolassar or Nebopol-Assur (Nebo the great Assyrian) to that of Belshazzar or Bel-shah-Assur (Bel king of Assyria). (B.C. 606-538.)

(3) CHINA. The T'ang dynasty (626-684), and especially the reign of Ta-tsung. (618-626.)

(4) EGYPT. The reigns of Sethos I. and Ram'esos II. (B.C. 1336-1224.)

(5) MEDIA. The reign of Cyax'eres or Kai-ax-Arès (the king son-of "Mars"). (B.C. 634-594.)

(6) PERSIA. The reigns of Khosru I., II. (531-628.)

ii. The Golden Age of Modern Nations.

(1) ENGLAND. The reign of Elizabeth. (1558-1603.)

(2) FRANCE. Part of the reigns of Louis XIV. and XV. (1640-1740.)

(3) GERMANY. The reign of Charles V. (1519-1558.)

(4) PORTUGAL. From John I. to the close of Sebastian's reign (1383-1578). In 1580 the crown was seized by Felipe II. of Spain

(5) PRUSSIA. The reign of Frederick the Great. (1740-1786.) The present enlargement of the kingdom may possibly lead to an important epoch. (1866.)

(6) RUSSIA. The reign of czar Peter the Great. (1672-1725.)

(7) SPAIN. The reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, when the crowns of Castile and Aragon were united. (1474-1516.)

(8) SWEDEN. From Gustavus Vasa to the close of the reign of Gustavus Adolphus. (1523-1632.)

Golden Apple. "What female heart can gold despise?"—Gray. In allusion to the fable of Atalanta, the swiftest of all mortals. She vowed to marry only that man who could outstrip her in a race. Milan'ion threw down three golden apples, and Atalanta, stopping to pick them up, lost the race. When foul play is suspected on a race-course, we say "the race was lost by golden apples."

Golden Ass. The romance of Apule'ius, written in the second century, and called the golden because of its excellency. It contains the adventures of Lucian, a young man, who being accidentally metamorphosed into an ass while sojourning in Thessaly, fell into the hands of robbers, eunuchs, magistrates, and so on, by whom he was ill-treated; but ultimately he recovered his human form. Boccaccio has borrowed largely from this admirable romance, and the incidents of the robbers' cave in "Gil Blas" are taken from it.

Golden Bay. The bay Kieselarke is so called because the sands shine like gold or fire.—Struy.

Golden Bonds. Aurelian allowed the captive Zenobia a slave to hold up her golden fetters.

Golden Bull. An edict by the emperor Charles IV., issued at the diet of Nuremberg in 1356, for the purpose of fixing how the German emperors were to be elected. (See BULL.)

Golden Calf. According to a common local tradition, Aaron's golden calf is buried in Rook's Hill, Lavant, near Chichester.

Golden Calf. We all worship the golden calf, i.e., money. The reference is to the golden calf made by Aaron when Moses was absent on Mount Sinai.—Exod. xxxii. (See ROOK.)

Golden Cave. Contained a cistern guarded by two giants and two centaurs; the waters of the cistern were good for quenching the fire of the cave, and when this fire was quenched the inhabitants of Scobellum would return to their native forms.—“The Seven Champions,” iii. 10.

Golden Chain. “Faith is the golden chain to link the penitent sinner unto God” (Jeremy Taylor). The allusion is to a passage in Homer’s “Iliad” (i. 19—30), where Zeus says, If a golden chain were let down from heaven, and all the gods and goddesses pulled at one end, they would not be able to pull him down to earth; whereas he could lift with ease all the deities and all created things besides with his single might.

Golden Fleece. Ino persuaded her husband, Athamas, that his son Phryxos was the cause of a famine which desolated the land, and the old dotard ordered him to be sacrificed to the angry gods. Phryxos being apprised of this order, made his escape over sea on a ram which had a golden fleece. When he arrived at Colchis, he sacrificed the ram to Zeus, and gave the fleece to king Aëtes, who hung it on a sacred oak. It was afterwards stolen by Jason in his celebrated Argonautic expedition.

This rising Greece with indignation viewed,
And youthful Jason an attempt conceived
Lofty and bold : along Peneus’ banks,
Around Olympus’ brows, the Muses’ haunts,
He roused the brave to re-demand the fleece.
Dyer, “The Fleece,” ii.

Golden Fountain. The property of a wealthy Jew of Jerusalem. “In twenty-four hours it would convert any metal, as brass, copper, iron, lead, and tin, into refined gold; stony flints into pure silver; and any kind of earth into excellent metal.”—“The Seven Champions of Christendom,” ii. 4.

Golden Horn. The inlet of the Bosphorus on which Constantinople is situated. So called from its curved shape and great beauty.

Golden House. This was a palace erected by Nero in Rome. It was roofed with golden tiles, and the inside walls, which were profusely gilt, were embellished with mother-of-pearl and precious stones; the ceilings were inlaid with ivory and gold. The banquet-hall had a rotatory motion, and its vaulted ceiling showered flowers and perfumes on the guests. The Farne’së popes and princes used the materials of Nero’s house in erecting their palaces and villas.

Golden Legend. A collection of hagiology (lives of saints), made by James de Voraigue in the thirteenth century; valuable for the picture it gives of mediæval manners, customs, and thoughts. Jortin says that the young students of religious houses, for the exercise of their talents, were set to accommodate the narratives of heathen writers to Christian saints. It was a correction of these “lives” that Voraigue made, and thought deserving to be called “Legends worth their Weight in Gold.” Longfellow has a dramatic poem entitled “The Golden Legend.”

Golden Mean. Keep the golden mean. The wise saw of Cleobu’los, king of Rhodes. (B.C. 630-559.)

Distant alike from each, to neither lean,
But ever keep the happy Golden Mean.
Rowe, “The Golden Verses.”

Golden-mouthed. Chrysostom; so called for his great eloquence. (A.D. 347-407.)

Golden Ointment. Eye salve. In allusion to the ancient practice of rubbing “stynas of the eye” with a gold ring to cure them.

I have a sty here, Chilax,
I have no gold to cure it.
Beaumont and Fletcher, “Mad Lovers.”

Golden Opinions. “I have bought golden opinions of all sorts of people.”—Shakespeare, “Macbeth,” i. 7.

Golden Palace of Nero. built on the site of that part of Rome which had been burnt down. There were three galleries on three rows of marble pillars, each row a mile in length. The roof and walls were gold (gilt?), inlaid with mother-of-pearl. One of the banqueting rooms, made of glass, revolved with the sun, and distilled perfumes on the guests.

Golden Rose. A cluster of roses and rosebuds growing on one thorny stem, all of the purest gold, chiselled with exquisite workmanship. In its cup, among its petals, the pope, at every benediction he pronounces upon it, inserts a few particles of amber and musk. It is blessed on the fourth Sunday in Lent, and bestowed during the ecclesiastical year on the royal lady whose zeal for the church has most shown itself by pious deeds or pious intentions. The prince who has best deserved of the Holy See has the blessed sword and cap (lo stocco e il beretto) sent him. If no one merits the gift, it is laid up in the Vatican. In the spring of 1868, the pope gave the golden rose to Isabella of Spain, in reward of "her faith, justice, and charity," and to "foretoken the protection of God to his well-beloved daughter, whose high virtues make her a shining light amongst women." Truly the church sees with other eyes than the ordinary observer, and judges with other judgment than the ordinary politician or moralist. The empress Eugéné of France has received it, and the gift was not unworthily bestowed.

Golden Rule.

In morals—Do unto others as you would be done by.

In arithmetic—The Rule of Three.

Golden Shower or Shower of gold. A bribe, money. The allusion is to the classic tale of Jupiter and Dan'æ. Acris'ios, king of Argos, being told that his daughter's son would put him to death, resolved that Dan'æ should never marry, and accordingly locked her up in a brazen tower. Jupiter, who was in love with the princess, foiled the king, by changing himself into a shower of gold, under which guise he readily found access to the fair prisoner.

Golden State. California; so called from its gold "diggins."

Golden Stream. Joannes Damasce'nus, author of "Dogmatic Theology" (died 756).

Golden Verses. So called because they are "good as gold." They are by some attributed to Epica'r'mos, and by others to Empedoc'lës, but always go under the name of Pythag'oras, and seem quite in accordance with his excellent precepts. They are as follows:—

Ne'er suffer sleep thine eyes to close
Before thy mind hath run
O'er every act, and thought, and word,
From dawn to set of sun;
For wrong take shame, but grateful feel
If just thy course hath been;
Such effort day by day renewed
Will ward thy soul from sin.

Gol'demar (king). A German goblin, friend of Neveling von Hardenberg.

Gol'dy. The pet name given by Dr. Johnson to Oliver Goldsmith. Garrick said of him, "He wrote like an angel, and talked like poor Poll." (1728-1774.)

Gol'gotha signifies a skull, and corresponds to the French word "chaumont." Probably it designated a bare hill or rising ground, having some fanciful resemblance to the form of a bald skull.

Golgotha seems not entirely unconnected with the hill of Gareb, and the locality of Goath, mentioned in Jeremiah xxxi. 39, on the north-west of the city. I am inclined to fix the place where Jesus was crucified... on the mounds which command the valley of Hinnom, above Birket-Mamilla.—Rénan, "Life of Jesus," c. xxv.

Golgotha, at the University Church, Cambridge, is the gallery in which the "heads of the houses" sit; so called because it is the place of skulls or heads. It has been more wittily than truly said that Golgotha was the place of empty skulls.

Goli'ath. The Philistine giant, slain by the stripling David with a small stone hurled from a sling.—1 Sam. xvii. 23-54.

Golosh'. It is said that Henry VI. wore half-boots laced at the side, and about the same time was introduced the shoe or clog called the "galage" or "gologe," meaning simply a covering; to which is attributed the origin of our word golosh. This cannot be correct, as Chancer, who died twenty years before Henry VI. was born, uses the word. Without doubt the word comes to us from the Spanish golocha (wooden shoes); German, gallosche, which is the Roman word, gallice (Gaulish shoes). The word has been wittily said to be a corruption of "Goliath's shoes."

Ne werë worthy to unbocle his galoche.—Chaucer, "Squire's Tale."

Go'marists. Opponents of Armin'us. So called from Francis Gomar, their leader. (1563-1641.)

Gondula. One of the Celtic war-goddesses. Her special office was to conduct to Odin the souls of those who fell in battle.

Gone up. Put out of the way, hanged, or otherwise got rid of. In Denver (America) unruly citizens are summarily hung on a cotton tree, and when any question is asked about them, the answer is briefly given, "Gone up"—i.e., gone up the cotton tree, or suspended from one of its branches. (See "New America," by W. Hepworth Dixon, i. 11.)

Gon'eril. One of Lear's three daughters. Having received her moiety of Lear's kingdom, the unnatural daughter first abridged the old man's retinue, then gave him to understand that his company was troublesome.—Shakespeare, "King Lear."

Gon'falon or GONFANON. An ensign or standard. A gonfalonier is a magistrate that has a gonfalon. (Italian, gonfalonè; French, gonfalon; Saxon, gath fana, war-flag.) Chaucer uses the word gonfanon; Milton prefers gonfalon. Thus he says—

Ten thousand thousand ensigns high advanced
Standards and gonfalons, twist van and rear
Steam in the air, and for distinction serve
Of hierarchies (3 syl.), of orders, and degrees,
"Paradise Lost," v.

Gonfanon. The consecrated banner of the Normans. When William invaded England, his gonfanon was presented to him by the pope. It was made of purple silk, divided at the end like the banner attached to the "Cross of the Resurrection." When Harold was wounded in the eye, he was borne to the foot of this sacred standard, and the English rallied round him; but his death gave victory to the invaders. The high altar of Battle Abbey marked the spot where the gonfanon stood, but the only traces now left are a few stones recently uncovered, to show the site of this memorable place.

Gonin. Un tour de maître Gonin (a trick of Master Gonin's). A cunning trick. Gonin was a buffoon or fool of the sixteenth century, who acquired great renown for his clever tricks.

Gonnella's Horse. Gonnella, the domestic jester of the duke of Ferrara, rode on a horse all skin and bone. The jests of Gonnella are in print.

His horse was as lean as Gonnella's, which (as the duke said) "Osse atque pellis totus erat" (Plautus). —Cervantes, "Don Quixote."

Gonsal'ez (Gon-zalley). Fernan Gonsalez was a Spanish hero of the tenth century, whose life was twice saved by his wife Sancha, daughter of Garcias, king of Navarre. The adventures of Gonsal'ez have given birth to a host of ballads.

Gonville College (Cambridge). The same as Key's College, founded in 1348 by Edmund Gonville, son of Sir Nicholas Gonville, rector of Terrington, Norfolk.

Good. The Good.

Alfonso VIII. (or IX.) of Leon, "The Noble and Good." (1158-1214.)

Sir James Douglas, surnamed The Good Sir James, a friend to Bruce. (Died 1330.)

Jean II. of France, le Bon. (1319, 1350-1364.)

Jean III., duc de Bourgogne. (1286, 1312-1341.)

Jean of Brittany, "The Good and Wise." (1389-1442.)

Philippe III., duc de Bourgogne. (1396, 1419-1467.)

Réné, called The Good King Réné, titular king of Naples. (1409-1452.)

Richard II., duc de Normandie. (996-1026.)

Richard de Beauchamp, twelfth earl of Warwick, regent of France. (Died 1439.)

Good Duke Humphrey. Humphrey Plantagenet, duke of Gloucester, youngest son of Henry IV., said to have been murdered by Suffolk and cardinal Beaufort.—Shakespeare, "2 Henry VI." iii. 2.

Good-bye. A contraction of God be with you. Similar to the French adieu, which is à Dieu (I commend you to God).

Good - Cheap. The French bon marché, a good bargain. "Cheap" here means market or bargain.

Good Friday. The anniversary of the Crucifixion. "Good" means holy.

Born on Good Friday. According to ancient superstition, those born on Christmas-day or Good Friday have the power of seeing and commanding spirits.

Good-Folk (Scotch guid folk) are like the Shetland land-Trows, who inhabit the interior of green hills. (See Trows.)

Good Regent. James Stewart, earl of Murray, appointed regent of Scotland after the imprisonment of queen Mary.

Good Samaritan. One who succours the distressed. The character is from our Lord's Parable of "The Man who fell among Thieves" (St. Luke x. 30-37).

Good Time. "There is a good time coming." This has been for a long, long time a familiar saying in Scotland, and is introduced by Sir Walter Scott in his "Rob Roy." Charles Mackay has written a song so called, set to music by Henry Russell.

Good Wine needs no Bush. It was customary to hang out ivy, boughs of trees, flowers, &c., at private houses to notify to travellers that "good cheer" might be had within. This is still usual in Gloucester, at Barton Fair time, and at the three "mops."

Some ale-houses upon the road I saw,
And some with bushes showing they wine did draw.
"Poor Robin's Perambulations," 1778.

Goods. I carry all my goods with me (Omnia mea mecum porto), said by Bias, one of the seven sages, when Priene was besieged and the inhabitants were preparing for flight.

Goodfellow (Robin). Sometimes called Puck, son of Oberon, a domestic spirit, the constant attendant on the English fairy-court; full of tricks and fond of practical jokes.

That shrewd and knavish sprite
Called Robin Goodfellow.

Shakespeare, "Midsummer Night's Dream," ii. 1.

Goodluck's Close (Norfolk). A corruption of Guthlac's Close, so called from a chapel founded by Allen, son of Godfrey de Swaffham, in the reign of Henry II., and dedicated to St. Guthlac.

Goodman. A husband or master is the Saxon guma or goma (a man), which in the inflected cases becomes guman or goman. In St. Matt. xxiv. 43, "If the goodman of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched." Goman and Gommer, for the master and mistress of a house, are by no means uncommon.

There's nae luck about the house
When our gudeman's awa.

Mickle.

Goodman of Ballengeich. The assumed name of James V. of Scotland, when he made his disguised visits through the country districts around Edinburgh and Stirling, after the fashion of Haroun-al-Raschid, Louis XI., &c.

Goodman or St. Gutman. Patron saint of tailors, being himself of the same craft.

Goodwin Sands consisted at one time of about 4,000 acres of low land fenced from the sea by a wall, belonging to earl Goodwin or Godwin. William the Conqueror bestowed them on the abbey of St. Augustine, at Canterbury, and the abbot allowed the sea-wall to fall into a dilapidated state, so that the sea broke through in 1100 and inundated the whole.

Goodwood Races. So called from the park in which they are held. They begin the last Tuesday of July, and last four days; but the principal one is Thursday, called the "Cup Day." These races, being held in a private park, are very select, and admirably conducted. Goodwood Park, the property of the duke of Richmond, was purchased by Charles, the first duke, of the Compton family, then resident in East Layant, a village two miles north of Chichester.

Goody is good-wife, Chaucer's good-lefe. As goody Dobson. Good-woman means the mistress of the house, contracted sometimes into gommer, as good-man is into gomman. (See GOODMAN.)

Goody Blake. A poor old woman who was detected by Harry Gill, the farmer, picking up sticks for a wee-bit fire to warm herself by. The farmer compelled her to leave them on the field, and Goody Blake invoked on him the curse that he might never more be warm. From that moment neither blazing fire nor accumulated clothing ever made Harry Gill warm again. Do what he would, "his teeth went chatter, chatter still."—Wordsworth, "Goody Blake and Harry Gill."

Goody Two-Shoes. This tale first appeared in 1765, and is said to have been from the pen of Oliver Goldsmith. Goody is a term of endearment, as we say to a child "my little old woman."

Goose. Chaldee, auz; Hebrew, auza; by prefixing g we get the Welsh gwyg; Danish, gaus; Saxon, gos; Russian, gus; &c.

Goose. A tailor's smoothing-iron, so called because its handle resembles the neck of a goose.

Come in, taylor; here you may roast your goose.
Shakespeare, "Macbeth," ii. 3.

Ferrara geese. Celebrated for the magnitude of their livers. The French pâte de foie gras, for which Strasbourg is so noted, is not a French invention, but a mere imitation of a well-known dish of classic times.

I wish, gentlemen, it was one of the geese of Ferrara, so much celebrated among the ancients for the magnitude of their livers, one of which is said to have weighed upwards of two pounds. With this food, exquisite as it was, did Heliogabalus regale his hounds.—Smollett, "Peregrine Pickle."

A Winchester goose. An aphroditical swelling, so called because the bishop of Winchester had the licensing of the stews, &c., in Southwark.

Wayze Goose. (See WAYZE.)

He killed the goose to get the eggs. He grasped at what was more than his due, and lost an excellent customer. The Greek fable says a countryman had a goose that laid golden eggs; thinking to make himself rich, he killed the goose to get the whole stock of eggs, but lost everything. ▀

He steals a goose, and gives the giblets in alms. He amasses wealth by over-reaching, and saves his conscience by giving small sums in charity.

I'll cook your goose for you. I'll pay you out. Eric, king of Sweden, coming to a certain town with very few soldiers, the enemy, in mockery, hung out a goose for him to shoot, but finding it was no laughing matter, sent heralds to ask him what he wanted. "To cook your goose for you," he facetiously replied.

The older the goose the harder to pluck. Old men are unwilling to part with their money. The reference is to the custom of plucking live geese for the sake of their quills. Steel pens have put an end to this barbarous custom.

To get the goose. To get hissed on the stage. (Theatrical.)

What is the Latin for goose? (Answer) Brandy. The pun is on the word answer. Answer is the Latin for goose, which brandy follows as surely and quickly as an answer follows a question.

What a goose you are. In the Egyptian hieroglyphics the emblem of a vain silly fellow is a goose.

Goose at Michaelmas. One legend says that St. Martin was tormented by a goose which he killed and ate. As he died from the repast, good Christians have ever since sacrificed the goose on the day of the saint.

The popular tradition is that queen Elizabeth, on her way to Tilbury Fort (Sept. 29, 1588), dined at the ancient seat of Sir Neville Umfreville, where, among other things, two fine geese were provided for dinner. The queen, having eaten heartily, called for a bumper of Burgundy, and gave as a toast, "Destruction to the Spanish armada!" Scarcely had she spoken when a messenger announced the destruction of the fleet by a storm. The queen demanded a second bumper, and said, "Henceforth shall a goose commemorate this great victory." This tale is marred by the awkward circumstance that the thanksgiving sermon for the victory was preached at St. Paul's on the 20th August, and the fleet was dispersed by the winds in July. Gascoigne, who died 1577, refers to the custom of goose-eating at Michaelmas as common.

At Christmas a capon, at Michaelmas a goose, And somewhat else at New Year's tide, for feare the lease thies lose.

Goose and Gridiron. A public-house sign, properly a music-house, like Evans's. When it ceased to be a music-house, some facetious landlord, to turn its former use into contempt, chose for his sign a "goose stroking the bars of a gridiron with its foot," and wrote below, "The Swan and Harp."—The Tatler, with notes, vol. iv., p. 206.

Gooseberry is gorse-berry (rough berry; Saxon, gorst. Cos lettuce is also "gorse lettuce.") (See BEAR'S GARLIC.)

Gooseberry Fool. A corruption of gooseberry fowl, i.e., foulé, milled, mashed, pressed. The French have foulé des pommes; foulé des raisins; foulé des goseilles, our "gooseberry fool."

Gooseberry Picker. One who has all the toil and trouble of picking a troublesome fruit for the delectation of others.

Goose Dubbs, of Glasgow. A sort of Seven Dials, or Scottish Alsatia. The Scotch use dubbs for a filthy puddle. (Welsh, duw, mortar; Irish, doib, plaster.)

The Guse-dubs o' Glasgow: O sirs, what a huddle o' houses... the green middens o' baith liquid and solid matter, soomin' wi' dead cats and auld shoon.—"Notes Ambrosianæ."

Goose Gibbie. A half-witted lad, who first "kept the turkeys, and was afterwards advanced to the more important office of minding the cows."—Sir Walter Scott, "Old Mortality."

He played up old gooseberry with me. He took great liberties with my property, and greatly abused it; in fact, he made gooseberry fool of it. (See GOOSEBERRY FOOL.)

To do gooseberry is to go with two lovers for appearance-sake. The person "who plays propriety" is expected to hear, see, and say nothing. (See GOOSEBERRY PICKER.)

Gopy'a. Nymphs and muses of Indian mythology.

Gordian Knot. A great difficulty. Gordius, a peasant, being chosen king of Phrygia, dedicated his waggon to Jupiter, and fastened the yoke to a beam with a rope of bark so ingeniously that no one could untie it. Alexander was told that "whoever undid the knot would reign over the whole East." "Well, then," said the conqueror, "it is thus I perform the task," and, so saying, he cut the knot in twain with his sword.

To cut the knot is to evade a difficulty, or get out of it in a summary manner.

Such praise the Macedonian got
For having rudely cut the Gordian Knot.
Waller, "To the King."

Turn him to any cause of policy,
The Gordian Knot of it he will unloose,
Familiar as his garter.
Shakespeare, "Henry V.," i. 1.

Gordon Riots. Riots in 1780, headed by lord George Gordon, to compel the House of Commons to repeal the bill passed in 1778 for the relief of Roman Catholics. Gordon was of unsound mind, and died in 1793, a proselyte to Judaism. Dickens has introduced this subject in his "Barnaby Rudge."

Gor'gibus. An honest, simple-minded burgess, brought into all sorts of troubles by the love of finery and the gingerbread gentility of his niece and daughter.—Molière, "Précieuses Ridicules."

Gorgon. Anything unusually hideous. There were three Gorgons, with serpents on their heads instead of hair; Medusa was the chief of the three, and the only one that was mortal; but so hideous was her face, that whoever set eyes on it was instantly turned into stone. She was slain by Perseus, and her head placed on the shield of Minerva.

Lest Gorgon rising from the infernal lakes
With horrors armed, and curls of hissing snakes,
Should fix me, stiffened at the monstrous sight,
A stony image in eternal night.

"Odyssey," xi.

Approach the chamber, and destroy yoursight
With a new gorgon

Shakespeare, "Macbeth," ii. 3.

Gorham Controversy. This arose out of the refusal of the bishop of Exeter to institute the Rev. Cornelius Gorham to the vicarage of Brampford Speke, "because he held unsound views on the doctrine of baptism." Mr Gorham maintained that "spiritual regeneration is not conferred on children by baptism." After two years' controversy, the Privy Council decided in favour of Mr. Gorham (1851).

Gorlois, duke of Cornwall, husband of Igera, who was the mother of king Arthur by an adulterous connection with Uther, pendragon of the Britons.

Goslings. The catkins of nut-trees, pines, &c. The word is gorse-lings, little rough things.

Gospellers. Followers of Wicliffe, called the "Gospel Doctor;" any one who believes that the New Testament has in part, at least, superseded the old; the priest who reads the Gospel at the altar.

Hot Gospellers. A nickname applied to the Puritans after the Restoration.

Gossip. A sponsor at baptism, a corruption of gossib, which is God-sib, a kinsman in the lord. (Sib, Saxon for kinsman, whence sibman, he is our sib, still used.)

'Tis not a maid, for she hath had gossips (sponsors for her child); yet 'tis a maid, for she is her master's servant, and serves for wages.
Shakespeare, "Two Gentlemen of Verona," iii. 1.

Gossip. A father confessor of a good, easy, jovial frame.

Here, Andrew, carry this to my gossip, jolly father Boniface, the monk of St. Martin's.
Sir Walter Scott, "Quentin Durward."

Gossyp'ia. The cotton-plant personified.

The nymph Gossypia heads the velvet sod,
And wains with rosy smiles the watery god.
Darwin, "Loves of the Plants," canto ii.

Gotch. A large stone jug with a handle (Norfolk). Fetch the gotch, mor—i.e., fetch the great water-jug, lassie. (Wiltsh., goche; Armenian, gouzoucq; Italian, gozzo, the throat; whence our guzzle. Anglo-Saxon, geotan, to pour; whence goute, a drop; gush, gutter.)

Goth. Icelandic, got (a horseman); whence Woden—i.e., Gothen.

Without doubt, got, a horseman, good, and the sacred name of God are all to be traced to got or guth, the Teutonic idea of God being that of a mighty warrior. The Romans called valour virtue, and the French call a "good fellow" un brave homme.

Last of the Goths. Roderick, the thirty-fourth of the Visigothic line of kings (414-711). (See RODERICK.)

Gotham. Wise men of Gotham—fools. Many tales of folly have been fathered on the Gothamites, one of which is their joining hands round a thorn-bush to shut in a cuckoo. The "bush" is still shown to visitors.

It is said that king John intended to make a progress through this town with the view of purchasing a castle and grounds. The townsmen had no desire to be saddled with this expense, and therefore when the royal messengers appeared, wherever they went they saw the people occupied in some idiotic pursuit. The king being told of it, abandoned his intention, and the "wise men" of the village cunningly remarked: "We woen there are more fools pass through Gotham than remain in it." Andrew Boyde, a native of Gotham, wrote "The Merrie Tales of the Wise Men of Gotham," founded on a commission signed by Henry VIII. to the magistrates of that town to prevent poaching.

N.B. All nations have fixed upon some locality as their limbus of fools; thus we have Phrygia as the fools' home of Asia Minor, Ab'dera of the Thracians, Bœotia of the Greeks, Swabia of the modern Germans, and so on.

Gothic Architecture has nothing to do with the Goths, but is a term of contempt bestowed by the architects of the Renaissance period on mediæval architecture, which they termed Gothic or elumisy, fit for barbarians.

Gouk or Gowk. In the Teutonic the word gauh means fool; whence the Saxon gauh, a cuckoo, and the Scotch goke or gouk.

Hunting the Gowk [fool] is making one an April fool. (See APRIL.)

Goun'ja Ticquo'a. The god of gods amongst the Hottentots.

Gourd. Used in the middle ages for corks.—"Orlando Furioso," x. 106.

Gourds. Dice with a secret cavity. Those loaded with lead were called Fullams (q.v.)

Gourds and fullam holds,
And high and low beguile the rich and poor.
Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," i. 3.

Gourmand and Gourmet (French). The gourmand is one whose chief pleasure is eating; but a gourmet is a connoisseur or taster of wines. (Welsh, gor, excess; gorm, a fulness; gormod, too much; gormant; &c. (See APICIUS.)

Gourre. A debauched woman. The citizens of Paris bestowed the name on Isabella of Bavaria.

We have here...a man...who to his second wife espoused La grande t'urrie.
Rabelais, "Pantagruel," iii. 21.

Goven. St. Goven's Bell. (See INCHCAPE.)

Govern means to handle the rudder of a ship, or steer a vessel. We still speak of being "at the helm of affairs," &c. (Latin, gubern; Greek, kubern.)

Gower, called by Chaucer "The moral Gower."

O moral Gower, this book I direct
To thee, and to the philosophic Stood,
To vouchsaf there need is to correct
Of your benignities and zeales good.
Chaucer.

Gowk-thrapple (Maister). A pulpit-drumming "chosen vessel," in Scott's "Waverley."

Gowlee (Indian). A "cow-herd." One of the Hindu castes is so called.

Gown. Gown and town row. A skirmish between the students of different colleges, on one side, and the townsmen, on the other. These feuds go back to the reign of king John, when 3,000 students left Oxford for Reading, owing to a quarrel with the men of the town. What little now remains of this "ancient tenure" is confined, as far as the town is concerned, to the barges and their "tails."

Gownsmen. A student at one of the universities; so called because he wears an academical gown.

Graal. (See GREAL.)

Grab. To clutch or seize. I grabbed it; he grabbed him, i.e., the bailiff caught him. (Swedish, grabba, to grasp; Danish, griber; our grip, gripe, grope, grapple, &c.)

Grace. The sister Graces. The Romans said there were three sister Graces, bosom friends of the Muses. They are represented as embracing each other, to show that where one is the other is welcome.

Grace's Card or Grace-card. The six of hearts is so called in Kilkenny. At the Revolution in 1688, one of the family of Grace, of Courtstown, in Ireland, equipped at his own expense a regiment of foot and troop of horse, in the service of king James. William of Orange promised him high honours if he would join the new party, but the indignant baron wrote on a card, "Tell your master I despise his offer." The card was the six of hearts, and hence the name.

Grace Cup or Loving Cup. The large tankard passed round the table after grace. It is still seen at the Lord Mayor's feasts, at college, and occasionally in private banquets.

Grace Darling, daughter of William Darling, lighthouse-keeper on Longstone, one of the Farne Islands. On the morning of the 7th Sept., 1838, Grace and her father saved nine of the crew of the Forfarshire steamer, wrecked among the Farne Isles, opposite Bamborough Castle. (1815-1842.)

Grace Days or Days of Grace. The three days over and above the time stated in a commercial bill. Thus, if a bill is drawn on the 20th June, and is payable in one month, it ought to be due on the 20th of July, but three days of grace are to be added, bringing the date to the 23rd.

Gracechurch (London) is Græsschurch, or Grass-church, the church built on the site of the old grass-market. Grass at one time included all sorts of herbs.

Graceless Florin. The first issue of the English florins, so called because F.D. (fidei defensor) was omitted. The omission was not from inadvertency, but because there was not room for the letters in the circumference.

Gracio'sa. A princess beloved by Percinet, who thwarts the malicious schemes of Grognon, her step-mother. — A fairy tale.

Gracio'fo. A Spanish droll or licensed fool in pantomime. With his coxcomb cap and truncheon terminated in a fool's-head, he mingles with every event, ever and anon directing his gibes to the audience, like the clowns of our own pantomimes.

Gradas'so. A bully; so called from Gradasso, king of Serica'ua, called by Ariosto "the bravest of the Pagan knights." He went against Charlemagne with 100,000 vassals in his train, all "dis-crown'd kings," who never addressed him but on their knees. — "Orlando Furioso" and "Orlando Innamorato."

Gradely. Orderly, regularly: as, Behave yourself gradely. A gradely fine day.

Grad'grind (Thomas). A man who measures everything with rule and compass, allows nothing for the weakness of human nature, and deals with men and women as a mathematician with his figures. He shows that summum jus est suprema injura. — Dickens, "Hard Times." "The Graderinds undervalue and disparage it." — Church Review."

Graham. A charlatan who gave indecent and blasphemous addresses in the "Great Apollo Room," Adelphi. He some times made mesmerisin a medium of pandering to the prurient taste of his audience.

Grahame's Dike. The Roman wall between the friths of the Clyde and Forth, so called from the first person who leaped over it after the Romans left Britain.

This wall defended the Britons for a time, but the Scots and Picts assembled themselves in great numbers, and climbed over it. . . . A man named Grahame is said to have been the first soldier who got over, and the common people still call the remains of the wall "Grahame's Dike." — Sir Walter Scott, "Tales of a Grandfather."

Grain. A knave in grain. A knave, though a rich man, or magnate. Grain means scarlet (Latin, granum, the coccus, or scarlet dye).

A military vest of purple flowered
Livelier than Melibe'an (Thessalian), or the grain
Of Sarra (Tyre) worn by kings and heroes old
In time of truce.

"Paradise Lost," xi.

Rogue in grain. A punning application of the above phrase to millers.

To go against the grain. Against one's inclination. The allusion is to wood, which cannot be easily planed the wrong way of the grain.

Gramercy. Thank you much (the French, grand merci). Thus Shakespeare, "Be it so, Titus, and gramercy too." ("Titus Andronicus," i. 2). Again: "Gramercies, Tranio, well dost thou advise." ("Taming of the Shrew," i. 1.) When Gobbo says to Bassanio, "God bless your worship!" he replies, "Gramercy. Wouldst thou aught with me?" — "Merchant of Venice," ii. 2.

Grammar. Zenod'otos invented the terms singular, plural, and dual.

The scholars of Alexandria and of the rival academy of Pergamos were the first to distinguish language into parts of speech, and to give technical terms to the various functions of words.

The first Greek Grammar was by Dionysios Thrax, and it is still extant. He was a pupil of Aristarchos.

Julius Cæsar was the inventor of the term ablative case.

Grammarians. Prince of Grammarians. Apollon'ios of Alexandria, called by Priscian Grammaticorum princeps. (2 cent. B.C.)

Grammont. The count de Grammont's short memory. When the count left England he was followed by the brothers of la belle Hamilton, who, with drawn swords, asked him if he had not forgotten something. "True, true," said the count; "I promised to marry your sister," and instantly went back to repair the lapse by making the young lady countess of Grammont.

Granary of Europe. So Sicily used to be called.

Granby. The marquis of Granby. A public-house sign in honour of John Manners, marquis of Granby, a popular English general. (1721-1770.)

The Times says the old marquis owes his sign-board notoriety "partly to his personal bravery and partly to the baldness of his head. He still presides over eighteen public-houses in London alone."

Old Weller, in "Pickwick," married the hostess of the "Marquis of Granby" at Dorking.

Grand (French).

Le Grand Corneille. Corneille, the French dramatist. (1606-1684.)

Le Grand Dauphin. Louis, son of Louis XIV. (1661-1711.)

La Grande Mademoiselle. The duchesse de Montpensier, daughter of Gaston, duc d'Orléans, and cousin of Louis XIV.

Le Grand Monarque. Louis XIV., also called "The Baboon." (1638, 1643-1715.)

Le Grand Pan. Voltaire. (1696-1778.)

Monsieur le Grand. The Grand Equerry of France in the reign of Louis XIV., &c.

Grand Alliance. Signed May 12, 1689, between England, Germany, and the States General, subsequently also by Spain and Savoy, to prevent the union of France and Spain.

Grand Lama. The object of worship in Thibet and Mongolia. The word lama in the Tangutianese dialect means "mother of souls." It is the representative of the Shigemooni, the highest god.

Grande Jument. Meant for Diane de Poitiers.—Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel."

Grandison (Sir Charles). The union of a Christian and a gentleman. Richardson's novel so called. Sir Walter Scott calls Sir Charles "the faultless monster that the world ne'er saw." Robert Nelson, reputed author of the "Whole Duty of Man," was the prototype.

Grandison Cromwell Lafayette. Grandison Cromwell is the witty nickname given by Mirabeau to Lafayette, meaning thereby that he had all the ambition of a Cromwell in his heart, but wanted to appear before men as a Sir Charles Grandison.

Grandmother. My Grandmother's Review, the "British Review." Lord Byron said, in a sort of jest, "I bribed My Grandmother's Review." The editor of the "British" called him to account, and this gave the poet a fine opportunity of pointing the battery of his satire against the periodical.

Grane. To strangle, throttle (Anglo-Saxon, gryne).

Granë. Siegfried's horse, whose swiftness exceeded that of the winds.

Grange. Properly the granum (granary) or farm of a monastery, where the corn was kept in store. In Lincolnshire and other northern counties any lone farm is so called. These "granges" were generally moated.

"Mariana, of the Moated Grange," is the title of a poem by Tennyson, suggested by the character of Mariana in Shakespeare's "Measure for Measure."

Grangousier. King of Utopia, who married in "the vigour of his old age" Gargamelle, daughter of the king of the Parpaillons, and became the father of Gargantua, the giant. He is described as a man in his dotage, whose delight was to draw scratches on the hearth with a burnt stick while watching the broiling of his chesnuts. When told of the invasion of Picrochole, king of Lerné, he exclaimed, "Alas! alas! do I dream? can it be true?" and began calling on all the saints of the calendar. He then sent to expostulate with Picrochole, and seeing this would not do, tried what bribes by way of reparation would effect. In the meantime he sent to Paris for his son, who soon came to his rescue, utterly defeated Picrochole, and put his army to full rout. Some say he is meant for Louis XII., but this is most improbable, not only because there is very little resemblance between the two, but because he was king of Utopia, some considerable distance from Paris. Motteux thinks the academy figure of this old Priam was John d'Albret, king of Navarre. He certainly was no true Catholic, for he says in chap. 45 they called him a heretic for declaiming against the saints.—Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel."

Granite Redoubt. The grenadiers of the Consular Guard wore so called at the battle of Marengo in 1800, because when the French had given way, they formed into a square, stood like flints against the Austrians, and stopped all further advance.

Granite State. New Hampshire is so called because the mountain parts are chiefly granite.

Grannus. The Celtic Apollo.

Grantorto. A giant who withheld the inheritance of Ire'na (Ireland). He is meant for the genius of the Irish rebellion of 1580, slain by Sir Art'egal.—Spenser, "Faery Queen," v.

Grapes. The grapes are sour. You disparage it because it is beyond your reach. The allusion is to the well-known fable of the fox, which tried in vain to get at some grapes, but when he found they were beyond his reach, went away saying, "I see they are sour."

Grass. Gone to grass. Dead. The allusion is to the grass which grows over the dead. Also, "Gone to rusticate," the allusion being to a horse which is sent to grass when unfit for work.

Grass-hopper, as the sign of a grocer, is the crest of Sir Thomas Gresham, the merchant grocer. The Royal Gresham Exchange used to be profusely decorated with grass-hoppers, and the brass one on the eastern part of the present edifice is the one which escaped the fires of 1666 and 1838.

Grass-market. At one time the place of execution in Edinburgh.

"I like nane o' your sermons that ent in a psalm at the Grass-market."—Sir Walter Scott, "Old Mortality," chap. xxxv.

Grassum. A fine in money paid by a lessee for the renewal of his lease. (Anglo-Saxon, garsum, a treasure.)

Grass-widow was anciently an unmarried woman who has had a child, but now the word is used for a wife temporarily parted from her husband. The word means a grace widow, a widow by courtesy (French, grace; Italian, grasa; &c.)

A slightly different idea has been recently attached to the term. During the gold mania in California a man would not unfrequently put his wife and children to board with some family while he went to the diggin's. This he called "putting his wife to grass," as we put a horse to grass when not wanted or unfit for work.

Gratia'no. Brother of the Venetian senator, Brabantio.—Shakespeare, "Othello."

Also a character in "The Merchant of Venice," who "talks an infinite deal of nothing, more than any man in all Venice." He marries Nerissa, Portia's maid.

Grave. To carry away the meal from the grave. The Greeks and Persians used to make feasts at certain seasons (when the dead were supposed to return to their graves), and leave the fragments of their banquets on the tombs (Eleemosynam sepulcri patris).

With one foot in the grave. At the very verge of death. The expression was used by Julian, who said he would "learn something even if he had one foot in the grave." The parallel Greek phrase is "With one foot in the ferry-boat," meaning Charon's.

Grave-diggers ("Hamlet"). "If the water come to the man . . ." The legal case referred to by Shakespeare occurred in the fifth year of queen Elizabeth's reign, called Hales v. Petit, stated at length in "Notes and Queries," vol. viii. p. 123 (first series).

Grave Maurice. A public-house sign. The head of the Graaf Maurice, prince of Orange, and captain-general of the United Provinces. (1567-1625.)—Hotten, "Book of Signs."

Grave Searchers. Monkir and Nakir, so called by the Mahometans.—Ockley, vol. ii. (See MONKIR.)

Gravel. I'm regularly gravelled. In a quandary, in a muddle, confused with too many things at once. (Latin, grav'idus, laden, burthened.)

When you were gravelled for lack of matter.—Shakespeare, "As You Like It."

Gray. The authoress of Auld Robin Gray was lady Anne Lindsay, afterwards lady Barnard. (1750-1825.)

Gray Cloak. An alderman above the chair, so called because his proper costume is a cloak furred with gray amis.—Hutton, "New View of London," intr. xxxii.

Grayham's. (See GRAHAME'S DIKE.)

Gray Man's Path. A singular fissure in the greenstone precipice near Ballycastle, in Ireland.

Gray's Inn (London) was the inn or mansion of the lords Gray.

Graysteel. The sword of Kol, fatal to the owner. It passed to several hands, but always brought ill-luck.—Icelandic Edda. (See GOLD OF NIBELUNGEN.)

Greal (Grail). The St. Greal was the vessel from which our Saviour is said to have taken his last supper, and which was subsequently filled with the blood that flowed from the wounds inflicted on Calvary. It was fabled to have been preserved by Joseph of Arimathea. The quest of this is the most fertile source of adventures to the Knights of the Round Table, and Merlin, when he made the table, left a place for the Greal.

The word is immediately from the old French grasal (the sacramental cup), a corruption of Sanguis-Realis, which was contracted to San-grasal, Singraut, and corrupted into St. Greal. Menage, however, says, "Grail, un vaisseau de terre, une terrine; ce mot vient de grais, parce que ces vaisseaux sont faits de grais cuit."

Greasy Sunday. One of the chief days of the Carnival.

Great (The).

(1) Abbas I., schah of Persia. (1557, 1585-1628.)

(2) Albertus (Magnus), the schoolman. (1193-1280.)

(33) James Sforza, the Italian general. (1369-1424.)

(34) Sapor or Shah-pour, the ninth king of the Sassanides, q.v. (240, 307-379.)

(35) Sigismund, king of Poland. (1466, 1506-1548.)

(36) Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths. (454, 475-526.)

(37) Theodosius I., emperor. (346, 378-395.)

(38) Matteo Visconti, lord of Milan. (1250, 1295-1322.)

(39) Vladimir, grand duke of Russia. (*, 973-1014.)

(40) Waldemar I., of Denmark. (1131, 1157-1181.)

Great Bullet-head. George Cadoudal, leader of the Chouans, born at Breeh, in Morbihan. (1769-1804.)

Great Captain. (See CAPTAIN.)

Great Cham of Literature. So Smollett calls Dr. Johnson. (1709-1784.)

Great Cry and Little Wool. Much ado about nothing. (See CRY.)

Great Dauphin. (See GRAND.)

Great Elector. Frederiek William, elector of Brandenburg. (1620, 1640-1688.)

Great Go. A cant term for a university examination for degrees; the "previous examination" being the "Little Go."

Great Harry (The). A man-of-war built by Henry VII., the first of any size constructed in England. It was burnt in 1553. (See HENRY GRACE DE DIEU.)

Great Head. Malcolm III., of Scotland; also called Canmore, which means the same thing. (*, 1057-1093.)

Malcolm III., called Canmore or Great Head.—Sir W. Scott, "Tales of a Grandfather," I. 4.

Great-heart (Mr.). The guide of Christiana and her family to the Celestial City.—Bunyan, "Pilgrim's Progress."

Great Mogul. The title of the chief of the Mogul empire, which came to an end in 1806.

Great Mother. The earth. When Junius Brutus and the sons of Tarquin asked the Delphic Oracle who was to succeed Superbus on the throne of Rome, they received for answer, "He who shall first kiss his mother." While the two princes hastened home to fulfil what they thought was meant, Brutus fell to the earth, and exclaimed, "Thus kiss I thee, O earth, the great mother of us all."

Great Unknown. Sir Walter Scott, who published the Waverley Novels, anonymously. (1771-1832.)

Great Unwashed. The artisan class. A term first used by Sir Walter Scott.

Great Wits Jump. Think alike, tally. Thus Shakespeare says, "It jumps with my humour."—"1 Henry IV.," i. 2.

Greaves (Sir Lancelot). A sort of Don Quixote, who, in the reign of George II., wandered over England to redress wrongs, discourage moral evils not recognisable by law, degrade immodesty, punish ingratitude, and reform society. His Sancho Panza was an old sea captain.—Smollett, "Adventures of Sir Lancelot Greaves."

Grebenski Cossacks. So called from the Roman word greben (a comb). This title was conferred upon them by czar Ivan I., because, in his campaign against the Tartars of the Caucasus, they scaled a mountain fortified with sharp spurs, sloping down from its summit, and projecting horizontally, like a comb.—Duncan, "Russia."

Grecian Coffee-house, in Devereux-court, the oldest in London, was originally opened by Pasqua, a Greek slave, brought to England in 1652 by Daniel Edwards, a Turkey merchant. This Greek was the first to teach the method of roasting coffee, to introduce the drink into the island, and to call himself a "coffee-man."

Grecian Stairs. A corruption of greesing stairs. Greesings (steps) still survives in the architectural word grees, and in the compound word de-grees. There is still on the hill at Lincoln a flight of stone steps called "Grecian stairs."

Greedy (Justice). In "A New Way to Pay Old Debts," by Massinger.

Greegreens. Charms.—African superstition.

A gree-gree man. One who sells charms.

Greek (The). Manuel Alva'rez (el Griego), the Spanish sculptor. (1727-1797.)

Last of the Greeks. Philopœmen, of Megalopolis, whose great object was to infuse into the Achaëans a military spirit, and establish their independence. (B.C. 252-183.)

Un Grec (French). A cheat. Towards the close of the reign of Louis XIV., a knight of Greek origin, named Apoulos, was caught in the very act of cheating at play, even in the palace of the grand monarque. He was sent to the galleys, and the opprobrious nation which gave him birth became from that time a by-word for swindler and blackleg.

To play the Greek (Latin, græcarè). To indulge in one's cups. The Greeks have always been considered a luxurious race, fond of creature comforts. Thus Cicero, in his oration against "Verres," says: "Discumbitur; fit sermo inter eos et invitatio, ut Græco morè bibere'tur: hospēs hortat'ur, poseunt majo'ribus poc'ulis; celebra'tur omnium sermo'nē lætitiāq: conviv'ium." The law in Greek banquets was E pithi e apithi (Quaff, or be off!) (Cut in, or cut off!). In "Troilus and Cressida," Shakespeare makes Pandarus, bantering Helen for her love to Troilus, say, "I think Helen loves him better than Paris;" to which Cressida, whose wit is to parry and pervert, replies, "Then she's a merry Greek indeed," insinuating that she was a Greek, not by birth alone, but by her habits also.

When Greek joins Greek then is the tug of war. When two men or armies of undoubted courage fight the contest will be very severe. The line is a verse from the drama of "Alexander the Great," slightly altered, and the reference is to the obstinate resistance of the Greek cities to Philip and Alexander, the Macedonian kings.

When Greeks joined Greeks then was the tug of war.—Nathaniel Lee.

Greek Calends. Never. To defer anything to the Greek Calends is to defer it sine diē. There were no calends in the Greek months. The Romans used to pay rents, taxes, bills, &c., on the calends, and to defer paying them to the "Greek Calends" was virtually to repudiate them. (See ST. TIB'S EVE, LAMMAS, TWO SUNDAYS.)

Will you speak of your paltry prose doings in my presence, who-e g eat historical poem, in twenty books, with notes u proportion, has been postpone d "ad græcas kalendas?"—Sir W. Scott, "The Betrothed" (Introduction).

Greek Church. includes the church within the Ottoman empire subject to the patriarch of Constantinople, the church in the kingdom of Greece, and the Russo-Greek Church. It formally separated from the Roman Church in 1054. They dissent from the doctrine that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and the Son (Filioque), reject the papal claim to supremacy, and administer the eucharist in both kinds to the laity; but agree with the Romanists in their belief of seven sacraments, transubstantiation, the adoration of the host, confession, absolution, penance, prayers for the dead, &c.

Greek Commentator. Fernan Nunen de Guzman, the great promoter of Greek literature in Spain. (1470-1553.)

Greek Cross. Same shape as St. George's cross +.

Greek Fire. A composition of nitre, sulphur, and naphtha. Tow steeped in the mixture was hurled in a blazing state through tubes, or tied to arrows. The invention is ascribed to Callinicos, of Heliopolis, A.D. 638.

A very similar projectile was used by the Federals in the great American contest, especially at the siege of Charleston.

Greek Life. A sound mind in a sound body.

This healthy life, which was the Greek life, came from keeping the body in good tune.—Daily Telegraph.

Greek Trust. No trust at all. Plautus uses the phrase Græcè fidē merca'ri (to buy for ready money), and Græcā fidēs was with the Romans no faith at all.

Green. Young, fresh; as green cheese, i.e., cream cheese, which is eaten fresh; green goose, a young or Midsummer goose; a green-horn (q.v.)

Green. The imperial green of France is the old Merovingian colour restored, and the golden bees are the ornaments found on the tomb of Childeric, the father of Clovis, in 1653.

Green is held unlucky to particular clans and counties of Scotland. The Caithness men look on it as fatal, because their bands were clad in green at the battle of Flodden. It is disliked by all who bear the name of Ogilvy, and is especially unlucky to the Grahame clan. One day an aged man of that name was thrown from his horse in a fox chase, and he accounted for the accident from his having a green lash to his riding-whip.

The Greens of Constantinople were a political party opposed to the Blues in the reign of Justinian.

Green Backs. The bank notes issued by the United States during the civil war (1831-5). So called from the colour of the chief of them.

Green Bag. What's in the green bag? What charge is about to be proferred against me? The allusion is to the "Green Bag Inquiry" (q.v.).

Green Bag Inquiry. Certain papers of a seditious character packed in a green bag during the Regency. The contents were laid before Parliament, and the committee advised the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. (1817.)

Green Bird (The) told everything a person wished to know, and talked like an oracle. — "Fair Star and Prince Chery," by Countess D'Aulnoy.

Green Cloth. The Board of Green Cloth. A board connected with the royal household, having power to correct offenders within the verge of the palace and two hundred yards beyond the gates. A warrant from the board must be obtained before a servant of the palace can be arrested for debt. So called "because they sit with the steward of the household at a board covered with a green cloth in the counting-house, as recorders and witnesses to the truth." It existed in the reign of Henry I., and probably at a still earlier period.

Green-eyed Jealousy or Green-eyed Monster. Expressions used by Shakespeare ("Merchant of Venice," iii. 2; "Othello," iii. 3). As cats, lions, tigers, and all the green-eyed tribe "mock the meat they feed on," so jealousy mocks its victim by loving and hating it at the same time.

Greengage. Introduced into England by lord Gage from the Chartreuse Monastery, near Paris. Called by the French "Reine Claude," out of compliment to the daughter of Anne de Bretagne and Louis XII., generally called la bonne reine. (1499-1524.)

Green-horn means an ox with the horns just making their appearance; metaphorically, a lad no more accustomed to the ways of the world than a young steer to the plough. (See GREEN.)

The Greenhorn.

Louis II., emperor of Germany, Le Jeune. (822, 855-875.)

Louis VII., of France, Le Jeune. (1120, 1137-1180.)

Green Horse (The). The 5th Dragoon Guards, so called because they are a horse regiment, and have green for their regimental facings.

Green Howards (The). The 19th Foot, named from the hon. Chas. Howard, colonel from 1733 to 1748.

Green Isle or The Emerald Isle. Ireland, so called from the brilliant green hue of its grass.

Green Knight (The). A Pagan, who demanded Fezon in marriage, but being overcome by Orson, was obliged to resign his claim. — "Valentine and Orson." Greenlander. A greenhorn, one from the verdant country called the land of green ones.

Green Linnets. The 39th Foot, so called from the colour of their facings.

Green Man. This public-house sign represents the gamekeeper or squire's chief man, who used at one time to be dressed in green.

But the "Green Man" shall I pass by unsung,
Which mine own James upon his sign-post hung?
His sign, his image,—for he once was seen
A squire's attendant, clad in keeper's green.
Crabbe, "Boroughs."

Green Man and Still. This public-house sign refers to the distillation of spirits from green herbs, such as peppermint cordial, and so on. The green man is a herbalist, or green grocer of herbs, and the still is the apparatus for distillation. Ritson, in his "Life of Robin Hood," says "the green man should be represented with a bundle of peppermint and pennyroyal under his arm."

Green Sea. The Persian Gulf, so called from a remarkable strip of water of a green colour along the Arabian coast.

Greenwich is the Saxon Grenä-wic (green village), formerly called Grenawic, and in old Latin authors "Grenoviam viridis." Some think it is a compound of grian-wic (the sun city), as Greenock in Scotland is the Gaelic grian aig (the sun bay); and Granard, in Longford, is grian-ard (the sunny height or hill).

His tibi Grynei nem'oris dica'tur ori'go.

Greenwich Barbers. Retailers of sand, so called because the inhabitants of Greenwich "shave the pits" in the neighbourhood to supply London with sand.

Greg'arines (3 syl.). In 1867 the women of Europe and America, from the thrones to the maid servants, adopted the fashion of wearing a plug made of false hair behind their head, utterly destroying its natural proportions. The microscope showed that the hair employed for these "uglies" abounded in a pediculous insect called a greg'arine (or little herding animal), from the Latin grex (a herd). The nests on the filaments of hair resemble those of spiders and silkworms, and the "object" forms one of the exhibits in microscopical soirées.

Grego'rian Calendar. One which shows the new and full moon, with the time of Easter and the movable feasts depending thereon. The reformed calendar of the Church of Rome, introduced by pope Gregory XIII. in 1582, corrected the error of the civil year, according to the Julian calendar.

Grego'rian Chant. So called because it was introduced into the church service by Gregory the Great. (600.)

Grego'rian Epoch. The epoch or day on which the Gregorian calendar commenced—March, 1582.

Grego'rian Telescope. The first form of the reflecting telescope, invented by James Gregory, professor of mathematics in the university of St. Andrews. (1653.)

Grego'rian Tree. The gallows, so named from three successive hangmen—Gregory, sen., Gregory, jun., and Gregory Brandon. To the last Sir William Segar, garter knight of arms, granted a coat of arms. (See HANGMEN.)

This trembles under 'he black rod, and he Doth fear his fate from the Gregorian tree.
Mercurius Pragmaticus. 1641.

Grego'rian Water or Gringorian Water. Holy water, so called because Gregory I. was a most strenuous recommender of it.

In case they should happen to encounter with devils, by virtue of the Gringorian water they might make them disappear.—Rubelais, "Gargantua," book i. 43.

Grego'rian Year. The civil year, according to the correction introduced by pope Gregory XIII. in 1582. The equinox which occurred on the 25th of March, in the time of Julius Cæsar, fell on the 11th of March in the year 1582. This was because the Julian calculation of 365½ days to a year was 11 min. 10 sec. too much. Gregory suppressed ten days, so as to make the equinox fall on the 21st of March, as it did at the council of Nice, and, by some simple arrangements, prevented the recurrence in future of a similar error.

Greg'ories (3 syl.). Hangmen. (See GREGORIAN TREE.)

Gregory (St.). The last pope who has been canonised. Usually represented with the tiara, pastoral staff, his book of homilies, and a dove. The last is his peculiar attribute.

Grenadier' (3 syl.). Originally a soldier employed to throw the hand-grenade.

Grenadier Guards. The first regiment of Foot Guards.

Grendel. A superhuman monster slain by Cedmon, in the Anglo-Saxon romance of that title.—See Turner's abridgement.

Gresham College (London). Founded by Sir Thomas Gresham in 1575.

Greta Hall. The poet of Greta Hall. Southey, who lived at Greta Hall, in the Vale of Keswick. (1774-1843.)

Gretchen. A pet German diminutive of Margaret.

Greth'el (Gammer). The hypothetical narrator of the "Nursery Tales," edited by the Brothers Grimm.

Gretna Green Marriages. Run-away matches. In Scotland all that is required of contracting parties is a mutual declaration before witnesses of their willingness to marry, so that elopers reaching the parish of Graitney, or village of Springfield, could get legally married without licence, banns, or priest. The declaration was generally made to a blacksmith.

Crabbe has a metrical tale called "Gretna Green," in which young Belwood elopes with Clara, the daughter of Dr. Sidmere, and gets married; but Belwood was a "scrow," and Clara a silly, extravagant hussy, so they soon hated each other and parted.—"Tales of the Hall," book xv.

Greve (1 syl.). Place de Grève. The Tyburn of ancient Paris. The present Hôtel de Ville occupies part of the site. The word grève means the strand of a river or shore of the sea, and is so called from gravier (gravel or sand). The Place de Grève was on the bank of the Seine.

Who has e'er been to Paris must needs know the Grève,
The fatal retreat of th' unfortunate brave,
Where honour and justice most odd y contribute
To ease Hero's pain: by a halter or gibbet.
Prior, "The Thief and the Cordelier."

Grewnds. The servants of the Rounfis or Breton ogres.

Grey from Grief.

Ludovico Sforza became grey in a single night.

Charles I. grew grey while he was on his trial.

Marie Antoinette grew grey from grief during her imprisonment.

Greys. The Scotch Greys. The 2nd (Royal North British) Dragoons, so called because they are mounted on grey horses.

Grey Friars. Franciscan friars, so called from their grey habit.

Greyhound. A public-house sign, in honour of Henry VII., whose badge it was.

Grey Mare. The Grey Mare is the better horse. The woman is paramount. It is said that a man wished to buy a horse, but his wife took a fancy to a grey mare, and so pertinaciously insisted that the grey mare was the better horse that the man was obliged to yield the point.

The French say, when the woman is paramount, C'est le mariage d'épervier ('Tis a hawk's marriage), because the female hawk is both larger and stronger than the male bird.

As long as we have eyes, or hands, or breath,
We'll look, or write, or talk you all to dea h.
Yield, or she-Pegasus will gain her course,
And the grey mare will prove the better horse.
Prior, "Epilogue to Mrs Manley's 'Lucius.'"

Grey Mare's Tail. A cataract made by the Lock-skene, in Scotland, so called from its appearance.

Grey Wethers. Huge bolders, either embedded or not, very common in the "Valley of Stones" near Avebury, Wilts. When split or broken up they are called sarsens or sarsdens (German, sargē steins, coffin stones).

Grid'iron. Emblematic of St. Lawrence, because in his martyrdom he was broiled to death on a gridiron. In allusion thereto the church of St. Lawrence Jewry, near Guildhall, has a gilt gridiron for a vane. The gridiron is also an attribute of St. Faith, who was martyred like St. Lawrence; and St. Vincent, who was partially roasted on a gridiron covered with spikes. (See ESCURIAL.)

Griffen Horse (The), belonged to Atlantès, the magician, but was made use of by Rogéro, Astolpho, and others. It flew through the air at the bidding of the rider, and landed him where he listed. —Ariosto, "Orlando Furioso."

Griffin. A cadet newly arrived in India, an inexperienced youngster, a half-and-half (half English, half Indian). The head and legs may be English, but his body being in India, must be Indian.

Griffon, Griffen, or Griffin. Offspring of the lion and eagle. Its legs and all from the shoulder to the head is like an eagle, the rest of the body is that of a lion. This creature was sacred to the sun, and kept guard over hidden treasures. Sir Thomas Browne says it is emblematical of watchfulness, courage, perseverance, and rapidity of execution. —Vulgar Errors, iii. 2. (See ARIMASPIANS.)

Grig. Merry as a Grig. A grig is a small eel. There was also a class of vagabond dancers and toplers who visited ale-houses, so called. Hence Levi Solomon, alias Cockleput, who lived in Sweet Apple Court, being asked in his examination how he obtained his living, replied that "he went a-grigging." Many think the expression should be merry as a Greek, and have Shakespeare to back them: "Then she's a merry Greek;" and again, "Cressid 'mongst the merry Greeks" ("Troilus and Cressida," i. 2; iv. 4). Patrick Gordon also says, "No people in the world are so jovial and merry, so given to singing and dancing, as the Greeks."

Grim (Giant), in Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," pt. ii. He tried to stop the pilgrims on their way to the Celestial City, but was slain by Mr. Greatheart.

Grima'ce (2 syl.). Cotgrave says this word is from Grima'cier, a celebrated carver of fantastic heads in Gothic architecture; but probably the Saxon grim, Welsh grmaw, Dutch grimmig, may be considered the basis of the word.

Grimes (Peter). The son of a steady fisherman, was a drunkard and a thief. He had a boy whom he killed by ill-usage. Two others he made away with, but was not convicted for want of evidence. As no one would live with him, he dwelt alone, turned mad, and was lodged in the parish poor-house, confessed his crime in his delirium, and died.—Crabbe, "Borough," let. xxii.

Grimmalkin or Graymalkin. French, gris malkin. Shakespeare makes his Witch in "Macbeth" say, "I come, Graymalkin," Malkin being the name of a foul fiend. The cat, supposed to be a witch and the companion of witches, is called by the same name.

Grimm's Law. A law discovered by Jakob L. Grimm, the German philologist, to show how the mute consonants interchange as corresponding words occur in different branches of the Aryan family of languages. Thus, what is p in Greek, Latin, or Sanskrit, becomes f in Gothic, and b or v in the old High German; what is t in Greek, Latin, or Sanskrit, becomes th in Gothic, and d in old High German; &c.

Grimsby (Lincolnshire). Grim was a fisherman who rescued from a boat adrift an infant named Hablec, whom he adopted and brought up. This infant turned out to be the son of the king of Denmark, and when the boy was restored to his royal sire, Grim was laden with gifts. He now returned to Lincolnshire and built the town which he called after his own name. The ancient seal of the town contains the names of Gryme and Hablec. This is the foundation of the mediæval tales about "Havelock the Dane."

Grim's Dyke or Devil's Dyke. (Anglo-Saxon, grima, a goblin or demon.)

Grind. To work up for an examination; to grind up the subjects set, and to grind into the memory the necessary cram. The allusion is to a mill, and the analogy evident.

To take a grind is to take a constitutional work; to cram into the smallest space the greatest amount of physical exercise. This is the physical grind; the one alluded to above is the literary grind.

To take a grinder is to insult another by applying the left thumb to the nose, and revolving the right hand round it, as if working a hand-organ or coffee-mill. This insulting retort is given when some one has tried to practise on your credulity, or to impose upon your good faith.

Grinders. The double teeth which grind the food put into the mouth. The preacher speaks of old age as the time when "the grinders cease because they are few" (Ecc. xii. 3). (See ALMOND-TREE.)

Grise. A step. (Latin, gradus).

Which as a grise or step may help these lovers
Into your favour.

Shakespeare, "Othello," i. 3.

Grisilda or Griselda. The model of enduring patience and conjugal obedience. She was the daughter of Janiccola, a poor charcoal-burner, but became the wife of Walter, marquis of Saluzzo. The marquis put her humility and obedience to three severe trials, but she submitted to them all without a murmur: (1) Her infant daughter was taken from her, and secretly conveyed to the queen of Pavia to bring up, while Grisilda was made to believe that it had been murdered. (2) Four years later she had a son, who was also taken from her, and sent to be brought up with her sister. When the little girl was twelve years old, the marquis told Grisilda he intended to divorce her and marry another, so she was stripped of all her fine clothes and sent back to her father's cottage. On the "wedding day" the much-abused Grisilda was sent for to receive "her rival" and prepare her for the ceremony. When her lord saw in her no spark of jealousy, he told her the "bride" was her own daughter. The moral of the tale is this: If Grisilda submitted without a murmur to these trials of her husband, how much more ought we to submit without repining to the trials sent us by God.

This tale is the last of Boccaccio's "Decameron;" it was rendered by Petrarch into a Latin romance, entitled "De Obedientia et Fide Uxorâ Mytheologia," and forms "The Clerk's Tale" in Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales."

Grist. All grist that comes to my mill. All is appropriated that comes to me; all is made use of that comes in my way. Grist is all that quantity of corn which is to be ground or crushed at one time. The phrase means, all that is brought, good, bad, and indifferent corn, with all refuse and waste, is put into the mill and ground together. (See EMOLUMENT.)

Grizel or Grissel. Octavia, wife of Marc Antony and sister of Augustus Cæsar, is called the "patient Grizel" of Roman story. (See GRISILDA.)

For patience she will prove a second Grissel.
Shakespeare, "Taming of the Shrew," ii. 1.

Groat. From John o' Groat's house to the Land's End. From Dan to Beer-sheba, from one end of Great Britain to the other. John o' Groat was a Dutchman, who settled in the most northerly point of Scotland, in the reign of James IV., and immortalised himself by the way he settled a dispute among his nine sons respecting precedency. He had nine doors to his cottage, one for each son, so that none could go out or come in before another.

Blood without groats is nothing (North of England), meaning "family without fortune is worthless." The allusion is to black pudding, which consists chiefly of blood and groats formed into a sausage.

Not worth a groat. Of no value. A groat is a silver four-pence. The Dutch had a coin called a grote, a contraction of grote schwarë (great schwarë), so called because it was equal in value to five little schwarë. So the coin of Edward III. was the groat or great silver penny, equal to four penny-pieces. The modern groat was first issued in 1835.

Grœmes (The). A class of free-booters, who inhabited the debateable land, and were transported to Ireland at the beginning of the seventeenth century.

Grog. Rum and water cold without. Admiral Vernon was called Old Grog by his sailors, because he was accustomed to walk the deck in rough weather in a grogam cloak. As he was the first to serve water in the rum on board ship, the mixture went by the name of grog. Sea-water grog is one part rum to six parts of sea-water. This is administered sometimes by way of punishment for dirtiness and other minor offences.

Groggram. A coarse kind of taffety, stiffened with gum. A corruption of the French gros-grain.

Groined Ceiling. One in which the arches are divided or intersected. (Swedish, grenu, to divide.)

Gromet, Grunet, or Grummet. A younker on board ship. In Smith's Sea Grammar we are told that "younkers are the young men whose duty it is to take in the top-sails, or top and yard, for furling the sails, or slinging the yards. . . ." "Sailers," he says, "are the elder men." Gromet is the Flemish grom (a boy) with the diminutive. It appears in bride-groom, &c.

Grongar Hill, in South Wales, rendered famous by Dyer's poem so called.

Groom of the Stole (Grom of the Stole). Keeper of the stole or state-robe. The original duty of this officer was to invest the king in his state-robe, but he had also to hand him his shirt when he dressed. The office when a queen reigns is termed Mistress of the Robes, though queen Anne had her "Groom of the Stole." (Greek, stolē, a garment.) (See BRIDEGROOM.)

Gross. (See ADVOWSON.)

Grosted or Robert Grosseteste, bishop of Lincoln, in the reign of Henry III., the author of some 200 works. He was accused of dealings in the black arts, and the pope ordered a letter to be written to the king of England, enjoining him to disinter the bones of the too-wise bishop and burn them to powder. (Died 1253.)

None a deeper knowledge boasted,
Since Hodge, Bacon, and Bob Grosted.
Butler, "Hudibras," ii. 3

Grotes'que (2 syl.) means in "Grotto style." Classical ornaments so called were found in the thirteenth century in grottoes, that is, excavations made in the baths of Titus and in other Roman buildings. These ornaments abound in fanciful combinations, and hence any-thing outré is termed grotesque.

Grotta del Canë (Naples). The Dog's Cave, so called from the practice of sending dogs into it to show visitors how the carbonic acid gas of the cave kills them.

Grotto. Pray Remember the Grotto. July 25 new style, and August 5 old style, is the day dedicated to St. James the Greater, and the correct thing to do in days of yore was to stick a shell in your hat or cloak, and pay a visit on that day to the shrine of St. James of Compostella. Shell grottoes with an image of the saint were erected for the behoof of those who could not afford such pilgrimage, and the keeper reminded the passer-by to remember it was St. James's day, and not to forget their offering to the saint.

Groundling. One who stood in the pit, which was the ground in ancient theatres.

To split the ears of the groundlings.
Shakespeare, "Hamlet," iii. 2.

Grove. The grove for which the Jewish women wove hangings, and which the Jews were commanded to cut down and burn, was the wooden Ash'era, a sort of idol, symbolising the generative power of Nature, and placed on the stone altar of Baal. It was called Phallos by the Greeks. The Hindus have two emblems, Linga and Yoni, the former symbolising generative power, and the latter productive power.

Grub Street. Since 1830 called Milton Street, near Moorfields, London, once famous for literary hacks and inferior literary productions. The word is the Gothic graban (to dig), whence grob (a grave), and grobliä (a ditch).—See "Dunciad," i. 38, &c.

Gruel. To give him his gruel. To kill him. The allusion is to the very common practice in France, in the sixteenth century, of giving poisoned possets, an art brought to perfection by Catherine de Medicis and her Italian advisers.

Grumbo. A giant in the tale of Tom Thumb. A raven picked up Tom, thinking him to be a grain of corn, and dropped him on the flat roof of the giant's castle. Old Grumbo came to walk on the roof terrace, and Tom crept up his sleeve. The giant, annoyed, shook his sleeve, and Tom fell into the sea, where a fish swallowed him, and the fish being caught and sold for Arthur's table, was the means of introducing Tom to the British king, by whom he was knighted.—Nursery Tale, "Tom Thumb."

Grundy. What will Mrs. Grundy say? What will our rivals or neighbours say? The phrase is from Tom Morton's "Speed the Plough." In the first scene Mrs. Ashfield shows herself very jealous of neighbour Grundy, and farmer Ashfield says to her, "Be quiet, woolye? Always ding, dinging Dame Grundy into my ears. What will Mrs. Grundy say? What will Mrs. Grundy think? . . ."

Grunth. The sacred book of the Sikhs.

Gryll. Let Gryll be Gryll, and keep his hoggish mind. Don't attempt to wash a blackamoor white; the leopard will never change his spots. Gryll is from the Greek gru (the grunting of a hog). When Sir Guyon disenchanted the forms in the Bower of Bliss some were exceedingly angry, and one in particular, named Gryll, who had been metamorphosed by Acras'ia into a hog, abused him most roundly. "Come," says the palmer to Sir Guyon,

Let Gryll be Gryll, and keep his hoggish mind,
But let us hence depart while weather serves and wind.

Spenser, "Faëry Queen," book ii.

Gryphon (in "Orlando Furioso"), son of Olive'ro and Sigismunda, brother of Aquilant, in love with Origilla, who plays him false. He was called White from his armour, and his brother Black. He overthrew the eight champions of Damascus in the tournament given to celebrate the king's wedding-day. While asleep Marta'no steals his armour, and goes to the king Norandi'no to receive the meed of high deeds. In the meantime Gryphon awakes, finds his armour gone, is obliged to put on Marta'no's, and being mistaken for the coward, is hooted and hustled by the crowd. He lays about him stoutly, and kills many. The king comes up, finds out the mistake, and offers his hand, which Gryphon, like a true knight, receives. He joined the army of Charlemagne.

Gryphons. (See GRIFFON.)

Guadia'na. The squire of Durandarte. Mourning the fall of his master at Roncesvallès, he was turned into the river which bears the same name.—"Don Quixote," ii. 23.

Guaff. Victor Emmanuel is so called from his nose.

Gua'no is the Peruvian word hua'no (dung), and consists of the droppings of sea-fowls.

Guarinos (Admiral). One of Charlemagne's paladins, taken captive at the battle of Roncesvallès. He fell to the lot of Marlotès, a Moslem, who offered him his daughter in marriage if he would become a disciple of Mahomet. Guarinos refused, and was cast into a dungeon, where he lay captive for seven years. A joust was then held, and Admiral Guariños was allowed to try his hand at a target. He knelt before the Moor, stabbed him to the heart, vaulted on his grey horse Trebozond, and escaped to France.

Gubbings. Anabaptists near Brent, in Devonshire. They had no ecclesiastical order or authority, "but lived in holes, like swine; had all things in common; and multiplied without marriage. Their language was vulgar Devouian. . . They lived by pilfering sheep; were fleet as horses; held together like bees; and revenged every wrong. One of the society was always elected chief, and called King of the Gubbings" (Fuller).

N.B. Their name is from gubbings, the offal of fish (Devonshire).

Gudgeon. Gaping for gudgeons. Looking out for things extremely improbable. As a gudgeon is a bait to deceive fish, it means a lie, a deception.

To swallow a gudgeon. To be bamboozled with a most palpable lie, as silly fish are caught by gudgeons.

Make fools believe in their foreseeing
Of things before they are in being;
To swallow gudgeons ere they're caught,
And count their chickens ere they're hatched.
Butler, "Hudibras," ii. 3.

Gudrun. A model of heroic fortitude and pious resignation. She was a princess betrothed to Herwig, but the king of Norway carried her off captive. As she would not marry him, he put her to all sorts of menial work, such as washing the dirty linen. One day her brother and lover appeared on the scene, and at the end she married Herwig, pardoned the "naughty" king, and all went merry as a marriage bell. — A North-Saxon poem.

Gudule (2 syl.) or St. Gudu'la, patron saint of Brussels, was daughter of Count Witger, died 172. She is represented with a lantern, from a tradition that she was one day going to the church of St. Morgelle with a lantern, which went out, but the holy virgin lighted it again by her prayers.

St. Gudule in Christian art is represented carrying a lantern which a demon tries to put out. The legend is a repetition of that of St. Genevieve, as Brussels is Paris in miniature.

Gue'bres (Fire-Worshippers). Followers of the ancient Persian religion, reformed by Zoroaster. They are called in the Talmud Chebers, and by Origen Kabirs, a corruption of the Arabic Kafirs a non-Mahometan or infidel, a term bestowed upon them by their Arabian conquerors.

Guelder Rose is the Rose de Gueldres, i.e., of the ancient province of Guelder or Guelderland, in Holland.

Guelpho (3 syl.), son of Actius IV., Marquis d'Este and of Cunigunda, a German, king of Carynthia. He led an army of 5,000 men from Germany, but two-thirds were slain by the Persians. He was noted for his broad shoulders and ample chest. Guelpho was Renaldo's uncle, and next in command to Godfrey. — Tasso, "Jerusalem Delivered," iii.

Guelphs and Ghibellines. Two great parties, whose conflicts make up the history of Italy and Germany from the eleventh to the fourteenth century. Guelph is the Italian form of Welfe, and Ghibelline of Waiblingen, and the origin of these two words is this: At the battle of Weinsberg, in Saabia (1140), Conrad, duke of Franconia, rallied his followers with the war-cry Hie Waiblingen, while Henry the Lion, duke of Saxony, used the cry of Hie Welfe (the family names of the rival chiefs). The former were the supporters of the imperial authority in Italy, and the latter were the anti-imperialists.

Guen'dolen (3 syl.). A fairy whose mother was a human being. One day king Arthur wandered into the valley of St. John, when a fairy palace rose to view, and a train of ladies conducted him to their queen. King Arthur and Guen'dolen fell in love with each other, and the fruit of their illicit love was a daughter named Gyneth. After the lapse of three months Arthur left Guen'dolen, and the deserted fair one offered him a parting cup. As Arthur raised the cup a drop of the contents fell on his horse, and so burnt it that the horse leaped twenty feet high, and then ran in mad career up the hills till it was exhausted. Arthur dashed the cup on the ground, the contents burnt up everything they touched, the fairy palace vanished, and Guen'dolen was never more seen. This tale is told by Sir Walter Scott in "The Bridal of Triermain." It is called Lynph's Tale, from canto i. 10 to canto ii. 28. (See GYNETH.)

Her mother was of human birth,
Her sire a Genie of the earth,
In days of old deemed to provide
O'er lovers' wiles and beauty's pride.
"Bridal of Triermain," ii. 3.

Guendolœ'na, daughter of Corin'eus and wife of Loocrine, son of Brute, the legendary king of Britain. She was divorced, and Loocrine married Estrildis, by whom he already had a daughter named Sabri'na. Guendolœ'na, greatly indignant, got together a great army, and a battle was fought near the river Stour, in which Loocrine was slain. Guendolœ'na now assumed the government, and one of her first acts was to throw both Estrildis and Sabri'na into the river Severn.—Geoffrey, "Brit. Hist.," ii., c. iv., v.

Guenever. (See GUINEVER.)

Gueril'la, improperly Guerilla wars, means a petty war, a partisan conflict; and the parties are called Guerillas or Guerilla chiefs. Spanish guer'ra (war). The word is applied to the armed bands of peasants who carry on irregular war on their own account, especially when Government is occupied with invading armies.

Gueri'no Meschi'no (the Wretched). An Italian romance, half chivalric and half spiritual, first printed in Padua in 1473. Gueri'no was the son of Millon, king of Alba'nia. On the day of his birth his father was dethroned, and the child was rescued by a Greek slave, and called Meschino. When he grew up he fell in love with the princess Elize'na, sister of the Greek emperor, at Constantinople.

Guest. The Ungrateful Guest was the brand fixed by Philip of Macedon on a Macedonian soldier, who had been kindly entertained by a villager, and being asked by the king what he could give him, requested the farm and cottage of his entertainer.

Gueux. Les Gueux. The ragamuffins. A nick-name assumed by the first revolutionists of Holland. It arose thus: When the duchess of Parma made inquiry about them of count Barlamont, he told her they were "the scum and off-scouring of the people" (les gueux). This being made public, the party took the name in defiance, and from that moment dressed like beggars, substituted a fox's tail in lieu of a feather, and a wooden platter instead of a brooch. They met at a public-house which had for its sign a cock crowing these words, Vive les Gueux par tout le monde!

N.B. The revoltors of Guienne assumed the name of Eaters; those of Normandy Barre-foot; those of Beausse and Soulogne Wooden-pattens; and in the French revolution the most violent were termed Sans-culottes.

Gugner. A spear made by the dwarf Eitri, and given to Odin. It never failed to hit and slay in battle.—The Edda.

Gui. Le Gui (French). The mistletoe or Druid's plant. The Druids used to be called Guys, meaning "guides" or "leaders." (Spanish and Portuguese, guia, from guiar, to guide.) (See GUY-ROPES.)

Guide'rius. The elder son of Cymbeline, a legendary king of Britain, during the reign of Augustus Caesar. Both Guiderius and his brother Arrvir'agus were stolen in infancy by Bela'rius, a banished nobleman, out of revenge, and were brought up by him in a cave. When grown to man's estate, the Romans invaded Britain, and the two young men so distinguished themselves that they were introduced to the king, and Belarius related their history. Geoffrey of Monmouth says that Guiderius succeeded his father, and was slain by Hamo.—Shakespeare, "Cymbeline."

Guides (pron. geed). Contraction of guidons. A corps of French cavalry which carries the guidon, a standard borne by light horse-soldiers, broad at one end and nearly pointed at the other. The corps des Guides was organised in 1796 by Napoleon as a personal body guard; in 1848 several squadrons were created, but Napoleon III. has made them a part of the Imperial Guard. Great care must be taken not to confound the Guides with the Gardes, as they are totally distinct terms.

Guido, surnamed the Savage (in Orlando Furioso), son of Constantia and Amon, therefore younger brother of Rinaldo. He was also Astolpho's kinsman. Being wrecked on the coast of the Amazons, he was doomed to fight their ten male champions. He slew them all, and was then compelled to marry ten of the Amazons. He made his escape with Aleria, his favourite wife, and joined the army of Charlemagne.

Guidobal'do. Second son of Francesco Maria, duke of Urbino.

Guildenstern. (See ROSENCRANTZ.)

Guildhall. The hall of the city guilds. Here are the Court of Common Council, the Court of Aldermen, the Chamberlain's Court, the police court presided over by an alderman, &c. The ancient guilds were friendly trade societies, in which each member paid a certain fee, called a guild, from the Saxon gildan (to pay). There was a separate guild for each craft of importance.

Guillotine (3 syl.). So named from Joseph Ignace Guillotin, a French physician, who proposed its adoption to prevent unnecessary pain. (1738-1814.)

The Guillotine is not unlike the Maiden, which the regent Morton of Scotland introduced when the laird of Pennyquick was to be beheaded.

Guinea. Sir H. Holmes, in 1666, captured in Schelling Bay 160 Dutch sail, containing bullion and gold-dust from Cape Coast Castle in Guinea. This rich prize was coined into gold pieces, stamped with an elephant, and called Guineas to memorialise the valuable capture. (See Dryden, "Annus Mirabilis.")

Guinea. The legend is M. B. F. et H. Rex. F. D. B. L. D. S. R. I. A. T. et E. —Magnæ Britannie, Francie, et Hiberniæ Rex; Fidei Defensor; Brunsvicensis, Lunenburgensis Dux; Sacri Romani Imperii Archi Thesaurarius et Elector.

Guinea-dropper. A cheat. The term is about equal to thimble rig, and alludes to an ancient cheating dodge of dropping counterfeit guineas. (See Gay, "Trivia," iii.)

Guinea Fowl. So called because it was brought to us from the coast of Guinea, where it is very common.

Guinea-hen. A courtesan who is won by money. The play is on the word guinea.

Pre... I would drown myself for the love of a Guinea hen, I would change my humanity with a baboon.—Shakespeare, "Othello," 1. 3.

Guin'ever, or rather Guanhum'dra (4 syl.). Daughter of Leodegrance of Camelot, the most beautiful of women, and wife of king Arthur. She entertained a guilty passion for Sir Lancelot of the Lake, one of the knights of the Round Table, but during the absence of king Arthur in his expedition against Leo, king of the Romans, she "married" Modred, her husband's nephew, whom he had left in charge of the kingdom. Soon as Arthur heard thereof he hastened back, Guinever fled to York and took the veil in the nunnery of Julius the Martyr, and Modred set his forces in array at Cam'bula, in Cornwall. Here a desperate battle was fought, in which Modred was slain, and Arthur mortally wounded. Guinever is generally called the "grey-eyed:" she was buried at Meigle, in Strathmore, and her name has become the synonym of a wanton or adulteress.—Geoffrey, "Brit. Hist."

In the romance called "Sir Launfal," Gwennere is called the daughter of Ryon, king of Ireland.

That was a woman when queen Guinever of Britain
"was a little wench."
Shakespeare, "Love's Labour's Lost," iv. 1.

Guin'ever (3 syl.). Tennyson's "Idyll" represents her as loving Sir Lancelot, but one day, when they were bidding farewell, Modred tracked them, "and brought his creatures to the basement of the tower for testimony." Sir Lancelot hurled the fellow to the ground and instantly got to horse, and the queen fled to a nunnery at Alnecbury. When the abbess died, Guinevere was appointed her successor, and remained head of the nunnery for three years, when she died. (See GUINEVER.)

Guingelot. The boat of Wato or Wade, the father of Weland, and son of Vilkinr, in which he waded over the nine-ell deep, called Grænasund, with his son upon his shoulders.—Scandinavian mythology.

Guisan'do. The Bulls of Guisando. Five monster statues of antiquity, to mark the scene of Caesar's victory over the younger Pompey.

Guitar. Greek kithara, Latin cithara, Italian chitarra, French guitare. The Greek kithar is the Hindu cha-tar (six-strings).

Guitar. The best players on this instrument have been Guilia'ni, Sor, Zocchi, Stoll, and Horetzsky.

Gules (red). An heraldic term. The most honourable heraldic colour, signifying valour, justice, and veneration. Hence it was given to kings and princes. The royal livery of England is gules or scarlet. (Persian, ghul, rose or rose-colour; French, gueules, the mouth and throat, or the red colour thereof; Hebrew, gulude, red cloth.)

With man's blood paint the ground, gules, gules.
Shakespeare, "Timon of Athens," iv. 3.

And threw warm gules on Madeline's fair breast.
Keats, "Eve of St. Agnes."

Gulf. A man that goes in for honour at Cambridge, i.e., a mathematical degree, is sometimes too bad to be classed with the lowest of the three classes, and yet has shown sufficient merit to pass. When the list is made out a line is drawn after the classes, and one or two names are appended. These names are in the gulf, and those so honoured are gulfed. In the good old times these men were not qualified to stand for the classical tripos.

The ranks of our curatehood are supplied by youths whom, at the very best, merciful examiners have raised from the very gates of "pluck" to the comparative paradise of the "Gulf."—Saturday Review.

Gulf Stream. The stream which issues from the Gulf of Mexico, and extends over a range of 3,000 miles, raising the temperature of the water through which it passes, and of the lands against which it flows. It washes the shores of the British Isles, and runs up the coast of Norway.

Gulistan (garden of roses). The famous recueil of moral sentences by Saadi, the poet of Shiraz, who died 1291. (Persian ghul, a rose, and tan, a region.)

Gull. A dupe, one easily cheated. Wilbraham says all unfledged nestlings are called "naked gulls" from the yellow tint of their skin. (Icelandic guls, Danish gual, yellow, our gold.) (See BEJAN.)

The most notorious geck and gull
That e'er invention played on.
Shakespeare, "Twelfth Night," v. i.

Gulliver (Lemuel). The hero of Swift's famous "Travels" to Lilliput, Brobdingnag, Laputa, and the Houyhnhnms (Hoo-nims).

Gulna're (2 syl.), afterwards called Kaled, queen of the haram, and fairest of all the slaves of Seyd (Seed). She was rescued from the flaming palace by lord Conrad, the corsair, and when the corsair was imprisoned, released him and murdered the sultan. The two escaped to the Pirate's Isle, but when Conrad found that Medo'ra, his betrothed, was dead, he and Gulnare left the island secretly, and none of the pirates ever knew where they went to. The rest of the tale of Gulnare is under the new name, Kaled (q.v.).—Byron, "The Corsair."

Gummed (1 syl.). He frets like gummed velvet or gummed taffety. Velvet and taffeta were sometimes stiffened with gum to make them "sit better," but being very stiff, they fretted out quickly.

Gumption. Wit to turn things to account, capacity. In Yorkshire we hear the phrase, "I canna gaum it" (understand it, make it out), and Gaum-tion is the capacity of understanding or making out.

Gumption. A nostrum much in request by painters in search of the supposed "lost medium" of the old masters, and to which their unapproachable excellence is ascribed. The medium is made of gum mastic and linseed-oil.

Gun. Sure as a gun; quite certain. It is as certain to happen as a gun to go off if the trigger is pulled.

Son of a gun. A jovial fellow. A gun is a large flagon of ale.

He's a great gun. A man of note. The reference is not to artillery, but to the ancient flagons. (See above.)

Gunner. Kissing the Gunner's daughter; being flogged on board ship. Boys in the Royal Navy who are to be flogged are first tied to the breech of a cannon.

Gunpowder Plot. A project of a few Roman Catholics to destroy James I. with the lords and commons assembled in the Houses of Parliament, on the 5th of November, 1605. It was to be done by means of gunpowder when the king went in person to open Parliament. Robert Catesby originated the plot, and Guy Fawkes undertook to fire the gunpowder.

Gunter's Chain, for land surveying, is so named from Edmund Gunter, its inventor (1580-1626). It is sixty-six feet long, and divided into one hundred links. As ten square chains make an acre, it follows that an acre contains 100,000 square links.

Gunther, king of Burgundy and brother of Kriemhild. He resolved to wed Brunhild, the martial queen of Issland, who had made a vow that none should win her who could not surpass her in three trials of skill and strength. The first was hurling a spear, the second throwing a stone, and the third was jumping. The spear could scarcely be lifted by three men. The queen hurled it towards Günther, when Siegfried, in his invisible cloak, reversed it, hurled it back again, and the queen was knocked down. The stone took twelve brawny champions to carry, but Brunhild lifted it on high, flung it twelve fathoms, and jumped beyond it. Again the unseen Siegfried came to his friend's rescue, and flung the stone still further, and, as he leaped, bore Günther with him. The queen was overmastered, and exclaimed to her subjects, "I am no more your mistress; you are Günther's liegemen now" (Lied, vii.). After the marriage the masculine maid behaved so obstreperously that Günther had again to avail himself of his friend's aid. Siegfried entered the chamber in his cloud-cloak, and wrestled with the bride till all her strength was gone; then he drew a ring from her finger, and took away her girdle. After which he left her, and she became a submissive wife. Günther, with unpardonable ingratitude, was privy to the murder of his friend and brother-in-law, and was himself slain in the dungeon of Etzel's palace by his sister Kriemhild. In history this Burgundian king is called Guntacher.—The Nibelungen-Lied.

Gurgoils. (See GARGOUILLE.)

Gurme (2 syl.). The Celtic Cerberus. While the world lasts it is fastened at the mouth of a vast cave, but at the end of the world it will be let loose, when it will attack Tyr, the war-god, and kill him.

Gurney-Light. (See BUDE.)

Guthlac (St.), of Crowland, Lincolnshire, is represented in Christian art as a hermit punishing demons with a scourge, or consoled by angels while demons torment him.

Guthrum. Silver of Guthrum, or Silver of Guthrum's Lane. Fine silver was at one time so called, because the chief gold and silver smiths of London resided there in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. The hall of the Goldsmiths' Company is still in the same locality.—Riley, "Munimenta Gildhallæ."

Gutta Percha. Latin gutta (a drop or the juice), Percha from the island of Pulo Percha. The juice is obtained by cutting the bark of a variety of trees, of the order called Sapotaceæ.

Gutter Lane (London). A corruption of Guthurum Lane, from a Mr. Guthurum, Goderoune, or Guthrum, who, as Stowe informs us, "possessed the chief property therein." (See GUTHRUM.)

All goes down Gutter Lane. He spends everything on his stomach. The play is between Gutter Lane, London, and guttur (the throat), preserved in our word guttural (a throat letter).

Guy. The Guiser or Guisard was the ancient Scotch munimer, who played before Yule; hence our words guise, disguise, guy, &c.

Guy. The Druids were called Gays, whence the mistletoe is termed in French le gui. (See GUY-ROPES.)

Guy, earl of Warwick. An Anglo-Danish hero of wonderful puissance. He was in love with fair Phelis or Felice, who refused to listen to his suit till he had distinguished himself by knightly deeds. First, he rescued the daughter of the emperor of Germany "from many a valiant knight;" then he went to Greece to fight against the Saracens, and slew the doughty Coldran, Elmaye king of Tyre, and the soldan himself. Then returned he to England and wedded Phelis, but in forty days he returned to the Holy Land, where he redeemed earl Jonas out of prison, slew the giant Amaranant, and many others. He again returned to England, and slew at Winchester in single combat Colbronde or Colbrand, the Danish giant, and thus redeemed England from Danish tribute. At Windsor he slew a boar of "passing might and strength." On Dunsmore Heath he slew the "Dun-cow of Dunsmore, a monstrous wyld and cruell beast." In Northumberland beslew a dragon "black as any cole," with lion's paws, wings, and a hide which no sword could pierce. Having achieved all this, he became a hermit in Warwick, and hewed himself a cave a mile from the town. Daily he went to his own castle, where he was not known, and begged bread of his own wife Phelis. On his death-bed he sent Phelis a ring, by which she recognised her lord, and went to close his dying eyes. (890-958.) His combat with Colbrand is very elaborately told in Drayton's "Polyolbion."

I am not Sampson, nor Sir Guy, nor Colbrand, to mow them down before me.—Shakespeare, "Henry VIII." v. 3.

Guyon (Sir). The impersonation of Temperance or Self-government. He destroys the witch Acra'sia, and destroys her bower, called the "Bower of Bliss." His companion was Prudence.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. ii.

The word Guyon is the Spanish guar (to guide), and the word Temperance is the Latin tempero (to guide).

Guy-ropes. Guide or guiding-ropes, to steady heavy goods while a-hoisting. (Spanish and Portuguese, guia, from guar, to guide.)

Gwynn (Nell). An actress, and one of the courtesans of Charles II. of England (died 1687). Sir Walter Scott speaks of her twice in "Peveril of the Peak;" in ch. xi. he speaks of "the smart humour of Mrs. Nelly," and in ch. xl. lord Chaffinch says of "Mrs. Nelly, wit she has, let her keep herself warm with it in worse company, for the cant of strollers is not language for a prince's chamber."

Gygēs' Ring rendered the wearer invisible. Gygēs, the Lydian, is the person to whom Candaulēs showed his wife naked. According to Plato, Gygēs descended into a chasm of the earth, where he found a brazen horse; opening the sides of the animal, he found the carcase of a man, from whose finger he drew off a brazen ring, which rendered him invisible, and by means of this ring he entered the king's chamber and murdered him.

Why did you think that you had Gygēs' ring,
Or the herb that gives invisibility (fern-seed)?
Beaumont and Fletcher, "Fair Maid of the Inn," i. 1.

The wealth of Gygēs. Gygēs was a Lydian king, who married Nyssia, the young widow of Candaulēs, and reigned thirty-eight years. He amassed such wealth that his name became proverbial. (Reigned B.C. 716-678.)

Gymnas'tics. Athletic games. The word is from gymnasium, a public place set apart in Greece for athletic sports, which were done naked. (Greek, gymnos, naked.)

Gymnos'ophists. A sect of Indian philosophers who went about with naked feet and almost without clothing. They lived in woods, subsisted on roots, and never married. They believed in the transmigration of souls. Strabo divides them into Brahmins and Samans. (Greek, gymnos, naked; sophistēs, sages.)

Gyneth. Natural daughter of Guen-dolen and king Arthur. Arthur swore to Guendolen that if she brought forth a boy, he should be his heir, and if a girl, he would give her in marriage to the bravest knight of his kingdom. One pentecost a beautiful damsel presented herself to king Arthur, and claimed the promise made to Guendolen; accordingly a tournament was proclaimed, and the warder given to Gyneth. The king prayed her to drop the warder before the combat turned to earnest warfare, but Gyneth haughtily refused, and twenty knights of the Round Table fell in the tournament, amongst whom was young Vanoc, son of Merlin. Immediately Vanoc fell, the form of Merlin rose, put a stop to the fight, and caused Gyneth to fall into a trance in the Valley of St. John, from which she was never to awake till some knight came forward for her hand, as brave as those which were slain in the tourney. Five hundred years passed away before the spell was broken, and then De Vaux undertook the adventure of breaking the spell. He overcame four temptations—fear, avarice, pleasure, and ambition, when Gyneth awoke, the enchantment was dissolved, and Gyneth became the bride of the bold warrior.—Sir Walter Scott, "Bridal of Triermain," c. ii.

Gyp. A college-servant, whose office is that of a gentleman's servant, waiting on two or more collegians in the University of Cambridge. He differs from a bed-maker, inasmuch as he does not make beds; but he runs on errands, waits at table, wakes men for morning chapel, brushes their clothes, and so on. His perquisites are innumerable, and he is called a gyp (vulture, Greek) because he preys upon his employer like a vulture. At Oxford they are called scouts.

Gypsy. (See GIPSY.)

Gyrfalcon, Gerfalcon, or Jerfalcon. A native of Iceland and Norway, highest in the list of hawks for falconry. "Gyr" or "Ger" is, I think, the Dutch gier, a vulture—this species of hawk being so called because, like the vulture, it has no teeth. The common etymology from hieros, sacred, "because the Egyptians held the hawk to be sacred," is utterly worthless. Besides Ger-falcons, we have Gier-eagles, Lammer-giers, &c. (German gier, greedy.) (See HAWK.)

H

H. This letter represents a stile or hedge. It is called in Hebrew heth or cheth (a hedge).

H.B. (Mr. Doyle, father of Mr. Richard Doyle, connected with Punch), the political caricaturist, died 1868.

H.M.S. His or Her Majesty's service or ship, as H.M.S. Wellington.

Habeas Corpus. The "Habeas Corpus Act" was passed in the reign of Charles II., and defined a provision of similar character in Magna Charta, to which also it added certain details. The Act provides (1) That any man taken to prison can insist that the person who charges him with crime shall bring him bodily before a judge, and state the why and wherefore of his detention. As soon as this is done, the judge is to decide whether or not the accused is to be admitted to bail. [No one, therefore, can be imprisoned on mere suspicion, and no one can be left in prison any indefinite time at the caprice of the powers that be. Imprisonment, in fact, must be either for punishment after conviction, or for safe custody till the time of trial.]

(2) It provides that every person accused of crime shall have the question of his guilt decided by a jury of twelve men, and not by a Government agent or nominee.

(3) No prisoner can be tried a second time on the same charge.

(4) Every prisoner may insist on being examined within twenty days of his arrest, and tried by jury the next session.

(5) No defendant is to be sent to prison beyond the seas, either within or without the British dominions.

The exact meaning of the words Habeas Corpus is this: "You are to produce the body." That is, You, the accuser, are to bring before the judge the body of the accused, that he may be tried and receive the award of the court, and you (the accused) are to abide by the award of the judge.

Suspension of Habeas Corpus. When the Habeas Corpus Act is suspended the Crown can imprison persons on suspicion, without giving any reason for so doing; the person so arrested cannot insist on being brought before a judge to decide whether or not he can be admitted to bail; it is not needful to try the prisoner at the following assize; and the prisoner may be confined in any prison the Crown chooses to select for the purpose.

Haberdasher, from hapertas, a cloth the width of which was settled by Magna Charta. A "hapertas-er" is the seller of hapertas-erie.

To match this saint there was another,
As busy and pervers: a brother,
An haberdasher of small wares
In politics and state affairs
Butler, "Hudibras," lib. 2.

Habit is Second Nature. The wise saw of Diogenēs, the cynic. (B.C. 412-323.)

Habsburg is a contraction of Habichts-burg (Hawk's Tower), so called from the castle on the right bank of the Aar, built in the eleventh century by Werner, bishop of Strasburg, whose nephew (Werner II.) was the first to assume the title of "Count of Habsburg." His great-grandson, Albrecht II., assumed the title of "Landgraf of Sundgau." His grandson, Albrecht IV., in the thirteenth century, laid the foundation of the greatness of the House of Habsburg, of which the imperial family of Austria are the representatives.

Hackell's Coit. A vast stone near Stanton Drew, in Somersetshire; so called from a tradition that it was a coit thrown by Sir John Hautville. In Wiltshire three huge stones near Kennet are called the Devil's coits.

Hackney, from the French haquenée (a cob-horse), Italian acchina. The Romance word haque is a horse (Latin equus). The French were accustomed to let out their cob-horses for short journeys, and at a later period they were harnessed to a plain vehicle called coche-à-haquenie.

The knights are well horsed, and the common people and others on little hackneys and geldings. — Froissart.

Hackum (Captain). A thick-headed bully of Alsatia, impudent but cowardly. He was once a sergeant in Flanders, but ran from his colours, and took refuge in Alsatia, where he was dubbed captain. — Shudwell, "Squire of Alsatia."

Haco I. His sword was called Quern-Biter (foot-breadth).

Hada. The Juno of the Babylonians.

Haddock. According to tradition it was a haddock in whose mouth St. Peter found the stater (or piece of money), and the two marks on the fish's neck are said to be the impressions of the apostle's finger and thumb. It is a pity that the person who invented this pretty story forgot that salt-water haddocks cannot live in the fresh water of the lake Genesaret.

O superstitious dainty, Peter's fish,
How com'st thou here to make so goodly dish?
Metellus, "Dialogues," (1693.)

Hadēs. Either the god of the infernal regions, or the infernal regions themselves. The word means Unseen (Greek, aidēs).

Ha'dith (a legend). The traditions about Mahomet the Prophet's sayings and doings. This compilation forms a supplement to the Koran, as the Talmud to the Jewish Scriptures. Like the Jewish Gem'ara, the "Ha'dith" was not allowed originally to be committed to writing, but the danger of the traditions being perverted or forgotten led to their being placed on record.

Hadj. The pilgrimage to Kaa'ba (temple of Mecca), which every Mahometan feels bound to make once at least before death. Those who neglect to do so "might as well die Jews or Christians." (Hebrew hag, the festival of Jewish pilgrimages to Jerusalem.)

Hadji. A pilgrim, a Mahometan who has made the Hadj or pilgrimage to the Prophet's tomb at Mecca. Every Hadji is entitled to wear a green turban.

Hæmony. Milton, in his "Comus," says hæmony is of "sovereign use 'gainst all enchantments, mildew, blast, or damp." Coleridge says the word is hæmo-iinos (blood-wine), and refers to the blood of Jesus Christ, which destroys all evil. The leaf, says Milton, "had prickles on it," but "it bore a bright golden flower." The prickles are the crown of thorns, the flower the fruits of salvation.

This interpretation is so in accordance with the spirit of Milton, that it is far preferable to the suggestions that the plant ag'rimony or allysum was intended, for why should Milton have changed the name?

Dioscorides ascribes similar powers to the herb allysum, which, as he says,

"keepeth man and beast from enchantments and witching."

Hæmos. A range of mountains separating Thrace and Mœsia, called by the classic writers Cold Hæmos. (Greek cheimon, winter; Latin hiems, Sanskrit hima.)

O'er high Pier'ia thence her course she bore,
O'er fair Emath'ia's ever-pleasing shore;
O'er Hæmus' hills with snows eternal crown'd,
Nor once her flying foot approached the ground.
Pope, "Iliad," xiv.

Hafed. A Gheber or Fire-worshipper, in love with Hinda, the Arabian emir's daughter, whom he first saw when he entered the palace under the hope of being able to slay her father, the tyrant usurper of Persia. He was the leader of a band sworn to free their country or die, and his name was a terror to the Arab, who looked upon him as superhuman. His rendezvous was betrayed by a traitor comrade, but when the Moslem army came to take him he threw himself into the sacred fire, and was burnt to death.—Thomas Moore.

Hafiz, the great Persian lyricist, called the "Persian Anacreon" (fourteenth century). His odes are called ghazels, and are both sweet and graceful. The word hafiz (retainer) is a degree given to those who know by heart the Koran and Hadith (traditions).

Hag. So called from hak (a species of snake), whence hag-worms (snakes).

How now, you secret, black, and midnight hags?
Shakespeare, "Macbeth," iv. 1.

Hagan of Trony or Haco of Norway, son of Aldrian, liegeman of Günther, king of Burgundy. Günther invited Siegfried to a hunt of wild beasts, but while the king of Netherland stooped to drink from a brook, Hagan stabbed him between the shoulders, the only vulnerable point in his whole body. He then deposited the dead body at the door of Kriemhild's chamber, that she might stumble on it when she went to matins, and suppose that he had been murdered by assassins. When Kriemhild sent to Worms for the "Nibelung Hoard," Hagan seized it, and buried it secretly somewhere beneath the Rhine, intending himself to enjoy it. Kriemhild, with a view of vengeance, married Etzel, king of the Huns, and after the lapse of seven years, invited the king of Burgundy, with Hagan and many others, to the court of her husband, but the invitation was a mere snare. A terrible broil was stirred up in the banquet hall, which ended in the slaughter of all the Burgundians but two (Günther and Hagan), who were taken prisoners and given to Kriemhild, who cut off both their heads. Hagan lost an eye when he fell upon Walter of Spain as he was dining on the chine of a wild boar. Walter pelted him with the bones, one of which struck him in the eye. His person is thus described in the great German epic:—

Well-grown and well-compacted was that redoubted guest;
 Long were his legs and sinewy, and deep and broad his chest;
 His hair, that once was sable, with grey was dashed of late;
 Most terrible his visage, and lordly was his gait.
The "Nibelungen-Lied." Stanza 1789.

Hag'gada. The free rabbinical interpretation of Scripture. (Hebrew haggad, to relate.)

Hag-knots. Tangles in the manes of wild ponies, supposed to be used by witches for stirrups. The term is common in the New Forest. Seamen use the word hay's-teeth to express those parts of a matting, &c., which spoil its general uniformity.

Hagring. The Fata Morgana.—(Scandinavian).

Hahnemann (Samuel). A German physician, who set forth in his "Organon of Medicine" the system which he called "homœopathy," the principles of which are these: (1) that diseases are cured by those medicines which would produce the disease in healthy bodies; (2) that medicines are to be simple and not compounded; (3) that doses are to be exceedingly minute. (1755-1843.)

Haidee. A beautiful Greek girl, who found Don Juan when he was cast ashore, and restored him to animation. "Her hair was auburn, and her eyes were black as death." Her mother, a Moorish woman from Fez, was dead, and her father, Lambro, a rich Greek pirate, was living on one of the Cyclades. She and Juan fell in love with each other during the absence of Lambro from the island. On his return Juan was arrested, placed in a galliot, and sent from the island. Haidee went mad, and after a lingering illness, died.—Eyron, "Don Juan," can. ii., iii., iv.

Hail. Health, an exclamation of welcome, like the Latin Salvè (Saxon, hael).

All hail, Macbeth! Hail to thee,thane of Gl'a'mis!
Shakespeare, "Macbeth," i. 3.

He was Hail-fellow well-met with every one; on easy, familiar terms. Hailing every one with courtesy, and making every one believe that it was well they had met together. (See JOCKEY.)

Hail fellow well met, all dirty and wet;
 Find out, if you can, who's master, who's man.
Swift, "My Lady's Lamentation."

Hair. One single tuft is left on the shaven crown of a Mussulman, for the angel to grasp hold of when conveying the deceased to Paradise.

The scalp-lock of the North American Indians, left on the otherwise bald head for a conquering enemy to seize when he tears off the scalp, is somewhat analogous.

A hair of the dog that bit you (similia similibus curantur). In Scotland it is a popular belief that a few hairs of the dog that bit you applied to the wound will prevent evil consequences.

Take the hair, it's well written,
 Or the dog by which you're bitten;
 Work off one wine by his brother,
 And one labour with another.
 Cook with cook, and strife with strife;
 Business with business, wife with wife.
Athenæus (ascribed to Aristophanes).

Hair of a dissembling colour. Red hair is so called, from the notion that Judas had red hair.

Rosalind. His very hair is of the dissembling colour (red).
Celia. Somewhat browner than Judas's.
Shakespeare, "As You Like It," iii. 4.

Against the hair. Against the grain, contrary to its nature.

If you should fight you go against the hair of your professions.—Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," ii. 3.

Hair by hair, you will pull out the horse's tail. Plutarch says that Sertorius, in order to teach his soldiers that perseverance and wit are better than brute force, had two horses brought before them, and set two men to pull out their tails. One of the men was a burly Hercules, who tugged and tugged, but all to no purpose; the other was a sharp, weasen-faced tailor, who plucked one hair at a time, amidst roars of laughter, and soon left the tail quite bare.

The three hairs. When Reynard wanted to get talked about, he told Miss Magpie, under the promise of secrecy, that "the lion king had given him three hairs from the fifth leg of the a'moronthol'ogos'phorus . . . a beast that lives on the other side of the river Cylinx; it has five legs, and on the fifth leg there are three hairs, and whoever has these three hairs will be young and beautiful for ever." They had effect only on the fair sex, and could be given only to the lady whom the donor married.—Sir E. B. Lytton, "Pilgrims of the Rhine," xii.

Hair-breadth 'scape. A very narrow escape from some evil. In measurement the forty-eighth part of an inch is called a "hair-breadth."

Wherein I spake of most disastrous chances,
Of moving accidents by flood and field,
Of hair-breadth 'scapes i' th' imminent deadly breach.
Shakespeare, "Othello," i. 3.

Hair Stane (Celtic) means boundary stone; a monolith sometimes, but erroneously termed a Druidical stone. (Scotland.)

Haiz'um (3 syl.). The horse on which the archangel Gabriel was mounted when he led a squadron of 3,000 against the Koreishites (3 syl.), in the famous battle of Bedr.

Hajj. (See HADJ.)

Hake. We lose in hake, but gain in herring. Lose one way, but gain in another. Herrings are persecuted by the hakes, which are therefore driven away from a herring fishery.

Halacha (rule). The Jewish oral law. (See GEM'ARA, MISHNA.)

Halberjeets or Haubergets. A coarse thick cloth used for the habits of monks. Thomson says it is the German al-bergen (cover-all) or Hals-bergen (neck-cover).—Essay on Magna Charta.

Halcyon Days. A time of happiness and prosperity. Halcyon is the Greek for a king-fisher, compounded of hals (the sea) and kuo (to brood on). The ancient Sicilians believed that the king-fisher laid its eggs and incubated for fourteen days, before the winter solstice, on the surface of the sea, during which time the waves of the sea were always unruffled.

Amidst our arms as quiet you shall be
As halcyon brooding on a winter's sea,
Dryden.

The peaceful king-fishers are met together
About the deck, and prophesie calm weather.
Ward, "Her Boreas"

Half. Half is more than the whole. (πλέον ἡμῶν παντός). This is what Hesiod said to his brother Perseus, when he wished him to settle a dispute without going to law. He meant "half of the estate without the expense of law will be better than the whole after the lawyers have had their pickings." The remark, however, has a very wide signification. Thus an embarras de richesse is far less profitable than a sufficiency. A large estate to one who cannot manage it is impoverishing. A man of small income will be poorer with a large house and garden to keep up than if he lived in a smaller tenement. Increase of wealth, if expenditure is more in proportion, tendeth to poverty.

Unhappy they to whom God has not revealed,
By a strong light which must th'ir sense control,
That half a gr-at e-tate's more than the whole.
Cowley, "Essays in Verse and Prose," No. 17.

Half Done. Half done, as Elgin was burnt. In the wars between James II. of Scotland and the Douglasses in 1452, the earl of Huntly burnt one-half of the town of Elgin, being the side which belonged to the Douglasses, but left the other side standing, because it belonged to his own family.—Sir Walter Scott, "Tales of a Grandfather," xxi.

Half-seas over. Almost up with one. Now applied to a person almost dead drunk. The phrase seems to be a corruption of the Dutch op-zee zober, "over-sea beer," a strong heady beverage introduced into Holland from England (Gijford). "Up-zee Freeze" is Frieze-land beer. The German zauber means "strong-beer" and "bewitchment."

I am half-seas o'er to death.
Dryden.

I do not like the dullness of your eye,
It hath a heavy cast, 'tis upsee Dutch.
Ben Jonson, "Alchemist," iv. 2.

Halgaver. Summoned before the Mayor of Halgaver. The mayor of Halgaver is an imaginary person, and the threat is given to those who have committed no offence against the laws, but are simply untidy and slovenly. Halgaver is a moor in Cornwall, near Bodmin, famous for an annual carnival held there in the middle of July. Charles II. was so pleased with the diversions when he passed through the place on his way to Scilly, that he became a member of the "self-constituted" corporation. The Mayor of Garratt (q. v.) is a similar "mag-nate."

Halifax. The name of this Yorkshire town is derived from Saxon halig, holy, and feax, hair, from the sacred hair of a certain virgin who was murdered because she would not surrender her virtue, and was afterwards canonised.

Halifax (in Nova Scotia). So called by the Hon. Edward Cornwallis, the governor, in compliment to his patron, the Earl of Halifax. (1749.)

Halifax Law. By this law whoever commits theft in the liberty of Halifax is to be executed on the Halifax gibbet, a kind of guillotine.

At Halifax the law so sharpe doth deale,
That who so more than thirte[n] pence doth steale,
They have a jyn that wondrous quick and well
Send theves all heedless into he ven or hell.
Taylor (the Water poet), " Works," ii. (1630).

Hall Mark. The mark on gold or silver articles after they have been assayed. Every article in gold is compared with a given standard of pure gold. This standard is supposed to be divided into twenty-four parts called carats; gold equal to the standard is said to be twenty-four carats fine. Manufactured articles are never made of pure gold, but the quantity of alloy used is restricted. Thus sovereigns and wedding rings contain two parts of alloy to every twenty-two of gold; and are said to be twenty-two carats fine. Gold watch-cases contain six parts of silver or copper to eighteen of gold, and are therefore eighteen carats fine. Other articles may contain nine, twelve, or fifteen parts of alloy, and only fifteen, twelve, or nine of gold. The Mint price of standard gold is £3 17s. 10½d. per ounce, or £46 11s. 6d. per pound.

Standard silver consists of thirty-seven parts of pure silver and three of copper. The Mint price is 5s. 6d. an ounce, but silver to be melted is worth sixpence an ounce less.

Suppose the article to be marked is taken to the assay office for the hall mark. It will receive a leopard's head for London; an anchor for Birmingham; three wheat sheaves or a dagger for Chester; a castle with two wings for Exeter; five lions and a cross for York; a crown for Sheffield; three castles for Newcastle-on-Tyne; a thistle or castle and lion for Edinburgh; a tree and a salmon with a ring in its mouth for Glasgow; a harp or Hibernia for Dublin, &c. The specific mark shows at once where the article was assayed.

Besides the hall mark, there is also the standard mark, which for England is a lion passant; for Edinburgh a thistle; for Glasgow a lion rampant; and for Ireland a crowned harp. If the article stamped contains less pure metal than the standard coin of the realm, the number of carats is marked on it, as eighteen, fifteen, twelve, or nine carats fine.

Besides the hall mark, the standard mark, and the figure, there is a letter called the date mark. Only twenty letters are used, beginning with A, omitting J, and ending with V; one year they are in Roman characters, another year in Italian, another in Gothic, another in Old English; sometimes they are all capitals, sometimes all small letters; so by seeing the letter and referring to a table, the exact year of the mark can be discovered.

Lastly, the head of the reigning sovereign completes the marks.

Hall' Sunday. The Sunday preceding Shrove Tuesday; the next day is called Hal' Monday, and Shrove Tuesday eve is called Hall' Night. The Tuesday is also called pancake-day, and the day preceding callop Monday, from the special foods popularly prepared for those days. All three were days of merrymaking. Hall' or Halle is a contraction of Hallow or Haloghe, meaning holy or festival.

Hall of Odin. The rocks, such as Halleberg and Hunneberg, from which the Hyperboreans, when tired of life, used to cast themselves into the sea; so called because they were the vestibule of the Scandinavian Elysium.

Hallelujah Victory. A victory gained by some newly-baptised Bretons, led by Germainus, bishop of Auxerre (A.D. 429). The conquerors commenced the battle with loud shouts of "Hallelujah!"

Hallifax. (See HALIFAX.)

Halloween, according to Scotch superstition, is the time when witches, devils, fairies, and other imps of earth and air hold annual holiday. Robert Burns, in his poem called "Halloween," has recorded the chief customs observed and credulities entertained by his countrymen on this high festival.

Haltios. In Laplandic mythology, the guardian spirits of mount Nie'mi.

From this height (Nie'mi, in Lapland) we had opportunity several times to see those vapours rise from the lake, which the people of the country call Haltios, and which they deem to be the guardian spirits of the mountain.—M. de Mompertuis.

Ham and Heyd. Storm-demons or weather-sprites.—Scandinavian mythology.

Though valour never should be scorned,
Yet now the storm rules wide;
By now again to life returned
I'll wager Ham and Heyd.
Frithiof Saga, "Lay zi."

Hameh. In Arabian mythology, a bird formed from the blood near the brains of a murdered man. This bird cries "Iskoo'nee!" (Give me drink!), meaning drink of the murderer's blood; and this it cries incessantly till the death is avenged, when it flies away.

Hamet. The Cid Hamet Benengi'li. The hypothetical Moorish chronicler from whom Cervantès professes to derive his adventures of Don Quixote.

Of the two had cussocks I am worth . . . I would have given the latter of them as freely as even Cid Hamet offered his . . . to have stood by.—Sterne.

Hamilton. The reik of Mr. Patrick Hamilton has infected as many as it did blow upon, i.e., all who came under his influence were converted to his way of thinking. Patrick Hamilton was one of the most influential precursors of the Scotch Reformation. (1504-1528.)

Hamilto'nian System. A method of teaching foreign languages by inter-linear translations, suggested by James Hamilton, a merchant. (1769-1831.)

Hamlet. A daft person (Icelandic amloð'), one who is irresolute and can do nothing fully. Shakespeare's play is based on the Danish story of Amleth' recorded in Saxo-Grammaticus.

Hammer.

(1) Pierre d'Ailly, Le Marteau des Hérétiques, president of the council that condemned John Huss. (1350-1425.)

(2) Judas Asmonæus, surnamed Macabæus, "the hammer." (B.C. 166-161.)

(3) St. Augustine is called by Hake-well "That renowned pillar of truth and hammer of heresies." (395-430.)

(4) John Faber, surnamed Malleus

(5) St. Hilary, bishop of Poitiers, Malleus Ariano'rum. (350-367.)

(6) Charles Martel. (689-741.)

On prétend qu'on lui donna le surnom de Martel, parcequ'il avoit écrasé comme avec un marteau les Sarrasins, qui, sous la conduite d'Abdérarn, avoient envahi la France.—Bouillet, "Dictionnaire Universel," &c.

Hammer of the Scotch. Edward I. On his tomb in Westminster Abbey is the inscription, "Edwardus longus Scotorum Malleus hic est" (Here is long Edward, the hammer of the Scots).

Gone to the hammer; applied to goods sent to a sale by auction; the auctioneer giving a rap with a small hammer when a lot is sold, to intimate that there is an end to the bidding.

They live hammer and tongs; are always quarrelling. They beat each other like hammers, and are as "cross as the tongs."

Hammer Cloth. The cloth that covers the coach-box, in which hammer, nails, bolts, &c., used to be carried in case of accident. Another etymology is from the Icelandic hamr (a skin), skin being used for the purpose. Our "yellow-hammer" means yellow-skin. A third suggestion is that the word hammer is a corruption of "hammock," the seat which the cloth covers being formed of straps or webbing stretched between two crutches like a sailor's hammock.

Hampton Court Conference. A conference held at Hampton Court in January, 1604, to settle the disputes between the Church party and the Puritans. It lasted three days, and its result was a few slight alterations in the Book of Common Prayer.

Hamshackle. A barum-scarum, a wild sort of a fellow, one who is very irregular. To hamshackle a horse is to shackle his head to one of his fore-legs.

Hamull. The guardian angel of the Guebres.—Persian mythology.

Han. Sons of Hân. The Chinese are so called from Hân the founder of the twenty-sixth dynasty, with which modern history commences. (206-220.)

Hanap. The cup out of which our Lord drank at the last supper, afterwards called the "San-greal." (See GREAL.)

Han'aper. Exchequer. "Hanaper-office," an office where all writs relating to the public were formerly kept in a hamper (in hanaper'io). Hanaper is Norman for "a hamper."

Hand. The whole deal of cards given to a single player. The cards which he holds in his hand.

A saint in heaven would grieve to see such "hand"
Cut up by one who will not understand.
Crabbe, "Borough."

Hand. Previous to the twelfth century the Supreme Being was represented by a hand extended from the clouds; sometimes the hand is open, with rays issuing from the fingers, but generally it is in the act of benediction, i.e., with two fingers raised.

Hand of Justice. The allusion is to the sceptre or bâton anciently used by kings, which had an ivory hand at the top of it.

An empty hand is no lure for an hawk. You must not expect to receive anything without giving a return. The Germans say Wer schmeert der fuhert. The Latin proverb is Da, si vis accipere, or Pro nihilo, nihil fit.

Putting the hand under the thigh. An ancient ceremony used in swearing.

And Abraham said unto his eldest servant . . .
Put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh, and I will make thee swear . . . that thou shalt not take a wife unto my son of the daughters of the Canaanites.—Genesis xxiv. 2, 3.

And the time drew nigh that Israel must die; and he called his son Jos ph and said unto him . . .
Put . . . thy hand under my thigh, and deal . . .
truly with me: bury me not . . . in Egypt.—
Genesis xlvii. 29.

To kiss the hand (Job xxxi. 27). To worship false gods. Cicero ("In Verrem," lib. iv. 43) speaks of a statue of Herculës, the chin and lips of which were considerably worn by the kisses of his worshippers. Hosea (xiii. 2) says, "Let the men that sacrifice kiss the calves." (See ADORE.)

I have left me seven thousand in Israel . . .
which have not bowed unto Baal, and . . . which [have] not kissed [their hand to] him.—1 Kings
xix. 18.

To strike hands (Prov. xvii. 18). To make a contract, to become surety for another. (See also Prov. vii. 1 and xxii. 26.) The English custom of shaking hands in confirmation of a bargain has been common to all nations and all ages. In feudal times the vassal put his hands in the hands of his overlord on taking the oath of fidelity and homage.

The open red hand, forming part of the arms of the Province of Ulster, commemorates the daring of O'Neile, a bold adventurer, who vowed to be first to touch the shore of Ireland. Finding the boat in which he was rowed outstripped by others, he cut off his hand and flung it to the shore, to touch it before those in advance could land.

The open red hand in the armorial coat of baronets arose thus:—James I. in 1611 created 200 baronets on the payment of £1,000 each, ostensibly "for the amelioration of Ulster," and from this connection with Ulster they were allowed to place on their coat armour the "open red hand," up to that time borne by the O'Neiles. The O'Neile whose estates were made forfeit by king James was surnamed Lamb-dery Eirin (red-hand of Erin).

The red or bloody hand in coat armour is generally connected with some traditional tale of blood, and the badge was never to be expunged till the bearer had passed, by way of penance, seven years in a cave, without companion, without shaving, and without uttering a single word.

In Aston Church, near Birmingham, is a coat-armorial of the Holts, the "bloody hand" of which is thus accounted for:—It is said that Sir Thomas Holt, some 200 years ago, murdered his cook in a cellar with a spit, and when pardoned for the offence, the king enjoined him, by way of penalty, to wear ever after a "bloody hand" in his family coat.

In the church of Stoke d'Abernon, Surrey, there is a red hand upon a monument, the legend of which is, that a gentleman shooting with a friend, was so mortified at meeting with no game, that he swore he would shoot the first live thing he met. A miller was the victim of this rash vow, and the "bloody hand" was placed in his family coat to keep up a perpetual memorial of the crime.

Similar legends are told of the red hand in Wateringbury Church, Kent; of the red hand on a table in the hall of Church-Gresly, in Derbyshire; and of many others.

Hand-book. Spelman says that king Alfred used to carry in his bosom memorandum leaves, in which he made observations, and took so much pleasure therein that he called it his hand-book, because it was always in his hand.

Handfasting. A sort of marriage. A fair was at one time held in Dumfriesshire, at which a young man was allowed to pick out a female companion to live with him. They lived together for twelve months, and if they both liked the arrangement, were man and wife. This was called hand-fasting or hand-fustening.

This sort of contract was common among the Romans and Jews, and is not unusual in the East even to the present hour.

Hand Paper. A particular sort of paper well known in the Record office, and so called from its water-mark, which goes back to the fifteenth century. *

Handicap. A game at cards not unlike Loo, but with this difference—the winner of one trick has to put in a double stake, the winner of two tricks a triple stake, and so on. Thus: if six persons are playing, and the general stake is 1s., and A gains three tricks, he gains 6s., and has to “hand i’ the cap” or pool 3s. for the next deal. Suppose A gains two tricks and B one, then A gains 4s. and B 2s., and A has to stake 3s. and B 2s. for the next deal.

To the Mitre Tavern in Wood Street, a house of the earliest note in London. Here some of us fell to handicap, a spot I never knew before, which was very good. — Pepys, “His Diary,” Sept. 18, 1660.

Handicap, in racing, is the adjudging of various weights to horses differing in age, power, or speed, in order to place them all, as far as possible, on an equality. If two unequal players challenge each other at chess, the superior gives up a piece, and this is his handicap. So called from the ancient game referred to by Pepys.

The Winner's Handicap. The winning horses of previous races being pitted together in a race royal are first handicapped according to their respective merits: the horse that has won three races has to carry a greater weight than the horse that has won only two, and this latter more than its competitor who is winner of a single race only.

Handkerchief. “The committee was at a loss to know whom next to throw the handkerchief to” (The Times). The meaning is that the committee did not know whom they were to ask next to make a speech for them; and the allusion is to the game called in Norfolk “Stir up the dumplings,” and by girls “Kiss in the ring.”

Handle. He has a handle to his name. Some title, as “lord,” “sir,” “doctor.” The French say Monsieur sans queue, a man without a tail (handle to his name).

Handycuffs. Cuffs or blows given by the hand. “Fisticuffs” is now more common.

Hang. To hang in the bell ropes. To be asked at church, and then defer the marriage so that the bells hang fire.

Hanged or Strangled. Examples from the ancient classic writers:—

(1) ACHILUS, king of Lydia, endeavoured to raise a new tribute from his subjects, and was hanged by the enraged populace, who threw the dead body into the river Pactolus.

(2) AMATA, wife of king Latinus, promised her daughter Lavinia to king Turnus; when, however, she was given in marriage to Aeneas, Amata hanged herself that she might not see the hated stranger. — Virgil, “Aeneid,” vii.

(3) ARACHNE, the most skilful of needlewomen, hanged herself because she was outdone in a trial of skill by Minerva. — Ovid, “Metamorphoses,” vi., fab. 1.

(4) AUTOLYCA, mother of Ulysses, hanged herself in despair on receiving false news of her son's death.

(5) BONOSUS, a Spaniard by birth, was strangled by the emperor Probus for assuming the imperial purple in Gaul. (A.D. 280.)

(6) IPHIS, a beautiful youth of Salamis, of mean birth, hanged himself because his addresses were rejected by Anaxaretē, a girl of Salamis of similar rank in life. — Ovid, “Metamorphoses,” xiv. 708, &c.

(7) LATINUS, wife of. (See AMATA, above.)

(8) LYCAMBES, father of Neobula, who betrothed her to Archilochos, the poet. He broke his promise, and gave her in marriage to a wealthier man. Archilochos so scourged them by his satires that both father and daughter hanged themselves.

(9) NEOBULA. (See above.)

(10) PHYLLIS, queen of Thrace, the accepted of Demophoön, who stopped on her coasts on his return from Troy. Demophoön was called away to Athens, and promised to return; but failing so to do Phyllis hanged herself.

Hanger. Properly the fringed loop or strap hung to the girdle by which the dagger was suspended, but applied by a common figure of speech to the sword or dagger itself.

Men's swords in hangers hang fast by their side.
Taylor. (1633.)

Hanging. Hanging gardens of Babylon. Four acres of garden raised on a base supported by pillars, and towering in terraces one above another, 300 feet in height. At a distance they looked like a vast pyramid covered with trees. This mound was constructed by Nebuchadnezzar to gratify his wife Amytis, who felt weary of the flat plains of Babylon, and longed for something to remind her of her native Median hills.

Hangmen and Executioners.

(1) BULL is the earliest hangman whose name survives.

(2) JOCK SUTHERLAND.

(3) DERRICK, who cut off the head of Essex in 1601.

(4) GREGORY. Father and son, mentioned by Sir Walter Scott.

(5) GREGORY BRANDON, about 1648.

(6) RICHARD BRANDON, his son, who executed Charles I.

(7) SQUIRE DUN, mentioned by Hudibras.

(8) JACK KETCH (1678) executed Lord Russell and the duke of Monmouth.

(9) ROSE, the butcher (1686), but Jack Ketch was restored to office the same year.

(10) EDWARD DENNIS (1780), introduced as a character in Dickens's "Barnaby Rudge."

(11) THOMAS CHESHIRE, nicknamed "Old Cheese."

(12) JOHN CALCRAFT.

(13) Of foreign executioners the most celebrated are Little John; Capeluche, headsman of Paris during the terrible days of the Armagnacs and Burgundians; and Sanson, who officiated on the guillotine during the first French Revolution.

Hangmen's Gains (London), in the liberty of St. Catharine. This is a curious corruption of Hammes and Gynes, two places in France, refugees from which places settled in this locality.

Hangman's Wages. 13½d. The fee given to the executioner at Tyburn, with 1½d. for the rope. This was the value of a Scotch merk, and therefore points to the reign of James, who decreed that "the coin of silver called the mark-piece shall be current within the kingdom at the value of 13½d." Whatever the ancient fee might be, the present price is 14s. 6d., of which 7s. 6d. is the fee, 4s. 6d. for stripping the body, and 2s. 6d. for the use of the shell. Noblemen who were to be beheaded were expected to give the executioner from £7 to £10 for cutting off their head.

Hang-nail is a corruption of the Saxon ange-nail (pain-nail). Our word anguish is from ange. The older word is ag-nail.

Hanoverian Shield. This escutcheon used to be added to the arms of England; it was placed in the centre of the shield to show that the House of Hanover came to the crown by election, and not by conquest. Conquerors strike out arms of a conquered country, and place their own in lieu.

Hans von Rippach (rip-pak). Jack of Rippach, a Monsieur Nong-tong-pas, i.e. some one asked-for who does not exist. A gay German spark calls at a house and asks for Herr Hans von Rippach. An English spark asks for Monsieur Nong-tong-pas. Rippach is a village near Lei-sig.

Hansard. The British parliamentary records and debates, printed and published by the Messrs. Hansard. The present firm print only the bills before parliament, the reports of committees, and some of the accounts; the other parliamentary records are printed by other firms. Luke Hansard, the founder of the present family, came from Norwich in 1752.

Hanse Towns. The maritime cities of Germany, which belonged to the Hanseatic League (q.v.).

Hanseatic League. The first trade union; it was established in the thirteenth century by certain cities of Northern Germany for their mutual prosperity and protection. The diet which used to be held every three years was called the Hansa, and the members of it Hansards. The league was virtually broken up in 1630. (German, am-see, on the sea. The league was originally called the Am-see-stenon, cities on the sea).

Hansel. A gift or bribe, the first money received in a day. Hence Hansel-Monday, the first Monday of the year. To "hansel our swords" is to use them for the first time. In Norfolk we hear of hanselling a coat, i.e., wearing it for the first time. Lemon tells us that superstitious people will spit on the first money taken at market for luck, and Misson says "Ils le baisent en le recevant, craschent dessus, et le mettent dans une poche apart."—" Travels in England," p. 192.

Hansel Monday. The first Monday of the new year. (See above.)

Happy Arabia. A mistranslation of the Latin Arabia felix, which means simply on the right hand, i.e., Arabia on the "felix" side of Mecca; the sinister city is Al-Shan.

Happy Valley, in Dr. Johnson's tale of Rasselas, is placed in the kingdom of Amhara, and was inaccessible except in one spot through a cave in a rock. It was a garden of Paradise where resided the princes of Abyssinia.

Hapsburg. (See HABSBURG.)

Har. The second person of the Indian Trinity. He has already passed his ninth incarnation; in his tenth he will take the form of a peacock, and then of a horse, when all the followers of Mahomet will be destroyed.

Ha'ram or Ha'rem, means in Arabic sacred or not to be violated; a name given by Mahometans to those apartments which are appropriated exclusively to the female members of a family.

Har'apha. A descendant of Og and Anak, a giant of Gath, who went to mock Samson in prison, but durst not venture within his reach. Rapha in Hebrew means a giant, and Arapha was father of the giants of Rephaim.—Milton, "Samson Agonistes."

Harbinger. One who looks out for lodgings or a harbour, hence a forerunner, a messenger.

I'll be myself the harbinger, and make joyful
The hearing of my wife with your approach.
Shakespeare, "Macbeth," i. 4.

Hard by. Near; a corruption of the German hierbei (here-by).

Hardouin (2 syl.). E'en Hardouin would not object. Said in apology of an historical or chronological incident introduced into a treatise against which some captious persons take exception. Jean Hardouin, the learned jesuit, was librarian to Louis le Grand. He was so fastidious that he doubted the truth of all received history, denied the authenticity of the "Æneid" of Virgil, the "Odes" of Horace, &c.; placed no faith in medals and coins, regarded all councils before that of Trent as chimerical, and looked on Descartes, Malebranche, Pascal, and all Jansenists as infidels. (1646-1729.)

Even père Hardouin would not enter his protest against such a collection.—Dr. A. Clarke, "Essay."

Hardy (Letitia). Heroine of the "Belle's Stratagem," by Mrs. Cowley. She is a young lady of fortune destined to marry Doricourt. She first assumes the air of a raw country hoyden and disgusts the fastidious man of fashion; then she appears at a masquerade, and wins him. The marriage is performed at midnight, and Doricourt does not know that the masquerader and hoyden are the same Miss Hardy till after the ceremony is over.

The Hardy, i.e., brave or daring; hence the phrase hardi comme un lion.

(1) William Douglas, defender of Berwick. (Died 1302.)

(2) Philippe III. of France, le Hardi. (1245, 1270-1285.)

(3) Philippe II. duc de Bourgogne, le Hardi. (1342, 1363-1382.)

Hare. It is unlucky for a hare to cross your path, because witches were said to transform themselves into hares.

Nor did we meet, with nimble feet,
(One little fearful lepus;
That certain sign, as some divine,
Of fortune bade to keep us.
Ellison, "Trip to Benwell," ix.

Hold with the hare and run with the hounds. To play a double and deceitful game, to be a traitor in the camp. To run with the hounds as if intent to catch the hare, but all the while being the secret friend of poor Wat. In the American war these double dealers were called Copperheads (q.v.).

Mad as a March hare. Hares are unusually shy and wild in March, which is their rutting season.

Melancholy as a hare (Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV.," i. 2). According to medical quackery the flesh of hare was supposed to generate melancholy, and all foods imparted their own speciality.

The quaking hare, in Dryden's "Hind and Panther," means the Quakers.

Among the timorous kind, the quaking hare
Professed neutrality, but would not swear.
Part i.

Hare-bell. A corruption of Ayr-bell, from the Welsh awyr-bel, a balloon or distended globe.

Hare-brained. Mad as a March hare, giddy, fool-hardy.

Let's leave this town, for they (the English) are hair-brained slaves.
And hunger will enforce them to be more eager.
Shakespeare, "1 Henry VI.," i. 2.

Harefoot. Swift of foot as a hare. The surname given to Harold I., youngest son of Canute. (1035-1040.)

To kiss the hare's foot. To be too late for anything, to be a day after the fair. The hare has gone by, and left its foot-print for you to salute. A similar phrase is To kiss the pot.

Hare-lip. A cleft lip. So called from its supposed resemblance to the upper lip of a hare. It was said to be the mischievous act of an elf or malicious fairy.

This is the foul fiend Flibbertigibbet. He begins at curfew, and walks till the first cock. He . . . squints the eye and makes the hare-lip.—Shakespeare, "King Lear," iii. 4.

Hare-stone. Boundary-stone in the parish of Sancred (Cornwall), with a heap of stones round it. It is thought that these stones were set up for a similar purpose as the column set up by Laban (Genesis, xxxi. 51, 52). "Behold this heap, and behold this pillar," said Laban to Jacob, "which I have cast betwixt me and thee. This heap be witness, and this pillar be witness, that I will not pass over this heap to thee, and that thou shalt not pass over this heap unto me, for harm."

Haricot Mutton. A ragout made with hashed mutton and turnips. In old French harigot, harligot, and haligote are found meaning a "morsel," a "piece."

Et li chevalier tuit monté,
Detaillie et dehaizetée.
Chaucer, "Les Tournois," p. 138.

Har'idi. A serpent honoured in upper Egypt.

Harlequin means a species of drama in two parts, the introduction and the harlequinade, acted in dumb show. The prototype is the Roman atellina, but our Christmas pantomime or harlequinade is essentially a British entertainment, first introduced by Mr. Weaver, a dancing-master of Shrewsbury, in 1702. (See below.)

What Mornus was of old to Jove,
The same a harlequin is now
The former was buffoon above,
The latter is a Punch below.
Swift, "The Puppet Show."

Harlequin, in the British pantomime, is a sprite supposed to be invisible to all eyes but those of his faithful Columbine. His office is to dance through the world and frustrate all the knavish tricks of the Clown, who is supposed to be in love with Columbine. In Armoric Harlequin means "a juggler," and Harlequin metamorphoses everything he touches with his magic wand.

In the Italian drama, Arlecchino is the mischievous and tricky low comedian, almost answering to the Clown of our pantomime.

Menage derives the word from Achille de Harlay, a comedian of Paris (1536-1616); and Francisque Michel from the old French word "harligot." (See HARCOT.)

Harlequin. So Charles Quint was called by Francois I. of France.

Harlot is said to be derived from Harlotta, the mother of William the Conqueror, but it is more likely to be a corruption of horelet (a little hireling), "hore" being the past participle of hyran (to hire). It was once applied to males as well as females. Hence Chaucer speaks of "a sturdy harlot . . . that was her hostes man." The word varlet is another form of it.

He was a gentil harlot, and a kinde;
A better felaw shulde man no wher finde.
Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales," prol. 649.

The harlot kinz is quite beyond mine arm.
Shakespeare, "Winter's Tale," ii. 3.

Harlowe (Clarissa). The heroine of Richardson's novel of that name. In order to avoid a marriage urged upon her by her parents, she casts herself on the protection of a lover, who grossly abuses the confidence thus reposed in him. He subsequently proposes to marry her, but Clarissa rejects the offer, and retires from the world to cover her shame and die.

Harm. Harm set, harm get. Those who lay traps for others get caught themselves. Hannan was hanged on his own gallows. Our Lord says, "They that take the sword shall perish with the sword."—Matt. xxvi. 52.

Harmo'nia's Necklace. An unlucky possession, something that brings evil to all who possess it. Harmonia was the daughter of Mars and Venus. On the day of her marriage with king Cadmos she received a necklace, which proved fatal to all who possessed it.

Harmo'nia's Robe. On the marriage of Harmonia, Vulcan, to avenge the infidelity of her mother, made the bride a present of a robe dyed in all sorts of crimes, which infused wickedness and impiety into all her offspring. Both Harmonia and Cadmos, after having suffered many misfortunes, and seen their children a sorrow to them, were changed into serpents.—“Pausanias,” 9, 10.

Haro. To cry out haro to any one. To denounce his misdeeds, to follow him with hue and cry. Haro was the ancient Norman hue and cry, and the exclamation made by those who wanted assistance, their person or property being in danger. Similar to our cry of “Police!” but it is to be hoped that the cry was more effectual. Probably our halloo is the same word.

Haroë'ris. The elder Herus. His eyes are the Sun and Moon, which illuminate the world.—Egyptian mythology.

Harold the DAUNTLESS, son of Witi-kind, the Dane. “He was rocked on a buckler, and fed from a blade” He became a Christian, like his father, and married Eivir, a Danish maid, who had been his page.—Sir W. Scott, “Harold the Dauntless.”

Harold's Stones at Trelech (Monmouthshire). Three stones, one of which is fourteen feet above the ground, evidently no part of a Druidical circle. Probably boundary stones. (See HARE-STONE.)

Haroot and Maroot. Two angels who, in consequence of their want of compassion to man, are susceptible of human passions, and are sent upon earth to be tempted. They were at one time kings of Babel, and are still the teachers of magic and the black arts.

Haroun al Raschid. Calif of the East, of the Abbasside race. (765-809.) His adventures form a part of the “Arabian Nights' Entertainments.”

Harp. The arms of Ireland. According to tradition, one of the early kings of Ireland was named David, and this king took for arms the harp of Israel's sweet psalmist. Probably the harp is altogether a blunder arising from the triangle invented in the reign of John to distinguish his Irish coins from the English. The reason why a triangle was chosen may have been in allusion to St. Patrick's explanation of the trinity, or more likely to signify that he was king of England, Ireland, and France. Henry VIII. was the first to assume the harp positive as the Irish device, and James I. to place it in the third quarter of the royal achievement of Great Britain.

To harp for ever on the same string. To be for ever teasing one about the same subject. There is a Latin proverb (Eandem cantile'nam recin'eré). I once heard a man with a clarionet play the first half of “In my cottage near a wood” for more than an hour without cessation or change. It was in a crowded market-place, and the annoyance became at last so unbearable that he collected a rich harvest to move on.

Still harping on my daughter.

Har'pagon (A). A miser. Harpagon is the name of the miser in Molière's comedy called “L'Avare.”

Harpal'icé. A Thracian virago, who liberated her father Harpal'icos when he was taken prisoner by the Getæ.

With such array Harpalicé bestrode
Her Thracian courser. Dryden.

Harpe (2 syl.). The cutlass with which Mercury killed Argus, and Perseus subsequently cut off the head of Medusa.

Harpies (2 syl.). Vultures with the head and breasts of a woman, very fierce and loathsome, living in an atmosphere of filth and stench, and contaminating everything which they came near. Homer mentions but one harpy. He'siod gives two, and later writers three. The names indicate that these monsters were personifications of whirlwinds and storms. Their names were Ocyp'eta (rapid), Celo'no (blackness), and Aëll'o (storm).

He is a regular harpy. One who wants to appropriate everything, one who sponges on another without mercy.

I will . . . do you any embassy . . . rather than hold three words conference with this harpy.
Shakespeare, “Much Ado About Nothing,” ii. 1.

Harpocratēs. The Greek form of the Egyptian god Har-pi-kruti (Horus the Child), made by the Greeks and Romans the god of silence. This arose from a pure misapprehension. It is an Egyptian god, and was represented with its "finger on its mouth," to indicate youth, but the Greeks thought it was a symbol of silence.

Har'ridan. A haggard old beldame. So called from the French haridelle, a worn-out jade of a horse.

Har'rier (3 syl.). A dog for hare-hunting, whence the name.

Harri-kari (happy despatch). Official suicides of Japan. All persons in Japan holding civil appointments are bound to kill themselves when commanded by the Government. This they do by ripping themselves up with two gashes crosswise, called harri-kari.

Harrington. A farthing. So called from lord Harrington, to whom James I. granted a patent for making them of brass. Drunken Barnaby says—

Thence to Harrington be it spoken,
For name-sake I crave a token
To a beggar that did crave it.

Harris. Mrs. Harris. An hypothetical lady, to whom Sarah Gamp referred for the corroboration of all her statements, and the bank on which she might draw to any extent for self-praise.—Dickens, "Martin Chuzzlewit."

Not Mrs. Harris in the immortal narrative was more quoted and more mythical.—Lord Lytton.

Harry. Old Harry. Old Scratch. To harry (Saxon) is to tear in pieces, whence our harrow. There is an ancient pamphlet entitled "The Harrowing of Hell." I do not think it is a corruption of "Old Hairy," although the Hebrew Seirim (hairy ones) is translated devils in Lev. xvii. 7, and no doubt alludes to the he-goat, an object of worship with the Egyptians. Moses says the children of Israel are no longer to sacrifice to devils (seirim), as they did in Egypt.

Harry Soph. A student at Cambridge who has "declared" for Law or Physic, and wears a full-sleeve gown. The word is a corruption of the Greek Heri-sophos (more than a Soph or common second-year student).—Cambridge Calendar.

The tale goes that at the destruction of the monasteries, in the reign of Henry

VIII., certain students waited to see how matters would turn out before they committed themselves by taking a clerical degree, and that these men were called Sophistæ Henricia'ni or "Henry Sophisters."

Hart. In Christian art, the emblem of solitude and purity of life. It was the attribute of St. Hubert, St. Julian, and St. Eustace. It was also the type of piety and religious aspiration.—Psalm xlii. 1. (See HIND.)

The White Hart or hind, with a golden chain, in public-house signs, is the badge of Richard II., which was worn by all his courtiers and adherents. It was adopted from his mother, whose cognizance was a white hind.

Hart Royal. A male red deer, when the crown of the antler has made its appearance, and the creature has been hunted by a king.

Hartnet. The daughter of Rukenaw, the ape in the tale of "Reynard the Fox." The word in old German means hard or strong strife.

Harum Scarum. A hare-brained person who scares quiet folk. Some derive it from the French clameur de Haro (hue and cry), as if the mad-cap were one against whom the hue and cry is raised, but probably it is simply a gingle-word having allusion to the "madness of a March hare," and the "scaring" of honest folks from their properties.

Who's there? I s'pose young harum-scarum.
Cambridge Facetiae, "Collegian and Porter."

Haruspex (pl. haruspices). Persons who interpreted the will of the gods by inspecting the entrails of animals offered in sacrifice (old Latin hara'uga, a victim; specto, I inspect). Cato said, "I wonder how one haruspex can keep from laughing when he sees another."

Harvard College, in the United States, founded by the Rev. John Harvard in 1639.

Harvest Goose. A corruption of Arceyst Gos (a stubble goose). (See WAYZ-GOOSE.)

A young wife and an arcyet gos.
Mocho gail [chatter] with both.
"Reliquiæ Antiquæ," ii. 113.

Harvest Moon. The full moon nearest the autumnal equinox. The peculiarity of this moon is that it rises for several days nearly at sunset, and about the same time, instead of fifty-two minutes later each successive day as usual.

Hassan. Caliph of the Ottoman empire; noted for his hospitality and splendour. His palace was daily thronged with guests, and in his seraglio was a beautiful young slave named Leila (2 syl.), who had formed an unfortunate attachment to a Christian called the Giaour. She is put to death by an emir, and Hassan is slain by the Giaour near Mount Parnassus.—Byron, "The Giaour."

Al Hassan. The Arabian emir of Persia, father of Hinda, in Moore's "Fire-Worshippers." He won the battle of Cadessia, and thus became master of Persia.

Hassan-Ben-Sabah (the Old Man of the Mountain), founder of the sect of the Assassins. In Rymer's Fœdera are two letters by this sheik.

Hassock. A doss or footstool made of hêsg (sedge or rushes).

Hassocks should be gotten in the fens, and laid at the foot of the said bank . . . where need required.—Dugdale, "Imbanking," p. 322.

The knees and hassocks are well-nigh divorced.
Copper.

Hat. How lord Kingsale acquired the right of wearing his hat in the royal presence is this: King John and Philippe II. of France agreed to settle a dispute respecting the duchy of Normandy by single combat. John de Courcy, earl of Ulster, was the English champion, and no sooner put in his appearance than the French champion put spurs to his horse and fled. The king asked the earl what reward should be given him, and he replied, "Titles and lands I want not, of these I have enough; but in remembrance of this day I beg the boon for myself and successors to remain covered in the presence of your highness, and all future sovereigns of the realm."

Cockle hat. A pilgrim's hat. So called from the custom of putting cockle-shells upon their hats, to indicate their intention or performance of a pilgrimage.

How should I your true love know
From another one?

By his cockle-hat and staff
And his sandal shoon.

Shakespeare, "Hamlet," iv. 5.

You are only fit to wear a steeple-crowned hat. To be burnt as a heretic. The victims of the Autos-da-Fé of the "Holy"

Inquisition were always decorated with such a head-gear.

Never wear a brown hat in Friesland. Do as Rome does. If people have a strong prejudice do not run counter to it. Friesland is a province of the Netherlands, where they cut their hair short, and cover the head first with a knitted cap, then a high silk skull-cap, then a metal turban, and lastly a huge flaunting bonnet. Four or five dresses always constitute the ordinary head-gear. A traveller once passed through the province with a common brown chimney-hat or wide-awake, but was hustled by the workmen, jeered at by the women, pelted by the boys, and sneered at by the magnates as a regular guy. If, therefore, you would pass quietly through this "enlightened" province never wear there a brown hat.

Hats and Caps. Two political factions of Sweden of the eighteenth century, the former favourable to France, and the latter to Russia. Carlyle says the latter were called caps, meaning night-caps, because they were averse to action and war; but the fact is that the French partisans wore a French chapeau as their badge, and the Russian partisans a Russian cap.

Hat Money. A small gratuity paid to the master of a ship for his care and trouble, originally collected in a hat at the end of a good voyage.

Hatchet. Greek axinë, Latin ascia, Italian accetta, French hachette, our hatchet and axe.

To throw the hatchet. To tell falsehoods. In allusion to an ancient game where hatchets were thrown at a mark, like quoits. Same as drawing the long-bow (q. v.).

Bury the Hatchet. (See BURY.)

Hatchway. Lieutenant Jack Hatchway. A retired naval officer, the companion of Commodore Truncheon, in Smollett's "Peregrine Pickle."

Hatef (the deadly). One of Mahomet's swords, confiscated from the Jews when they were exiled from Medina.

Hat'temists. An ecclesiastical sect in Holland, so called from Pontian von Hatton, of Zealand (seventeenth century). They denied the expiatory sacrifice of Christ, and the corruption of human nature.

Hatteraick (Dirk). Also called "Jans Janson." A Dutch smuggler and thorough villain, but faithful to his employers. Being an accomplice of lawyer Glossin's in carrying off Henry Bertrand, both he and the lawyer were put into prison. During the night Glossin contrived to enter the smuggler's cell, when a quarrel ensued, and Hatteraick strangled Glossin, and then hanged himself.

Hatto. Archbishop of Mentz, according to tradition, was devoured by mice. The story says that in 914 there was a great famine in Germany, and Hatto, that there might be better store for the rich, assembled the poor in a barn, and burnt them to death, saying, "They are like mice, only good to devour the corn." By and by an army of mice came against the archbishop, and the abbot, to escape the plague, removed to a tower on the Rhine, but hither came the mouse-army by hundreds and thousands, and eat the bishop up. The tower is still called Mouse-tower. Senthay has a ballad on the subject, but makes the invaders an army of rats. (See MOUSE TOWER.)

A very similar legend is told of count Graaf, a wicked and powerful chief, who raised a tower in the midst of the Rhine for the purpose of exacting tolls. If any boat or barge attempted to evade the exaction, the warders of the tower shot the crew with cross-bows. Amongst other ways of making himself rich was buying up corn. One year a sad famine prevailed, and the count made a harvest of the distress; but an army of rats, pressed by hunger, invaded his tower, and falling on the old baron, worried him to death, and then devoured him.—Legends of the Rhine.

And in at the windows, and in at the door,
And through the walls by thousands they pour,
And down through the ceiling, and up through the floor,

From the right and the left, from behind and before,
From within and without, from above and below,
And all at once to the bishop they go.

They have whetted their teeth against the stones
And now they are picking the bishop's bones;
They gnawed the flesh from every limb,
For they were sent to do judgment on him.
Senthay, "Bishop Hatto."

Hatton. The dancing chancellor. Sir Christopher Hatton was brought up to the law, but became a courtier, and attracted the attention of queen Elizabeth by his very graceful dancing at a masque. The queen took him into favour, and soon made him both chancellor and knight of the garter. (*, —1591.)

His bushy beard, and shoestrings green,
His rich-crowned hat and tall rounnet,
Moved the stout heart of England's queen,
Though pope and Spaniard could not trouble it.
Gray.

Hatton Gardens (London). The place of Sir Christopher Hatton, the dancing chancellor. (See above.)

Haul over the Coals. Take to task. Jamieson thinks it refers to the ordeal by fire, a suggestion which is favoured by the French corresponding phrase, mettre sur la sellette (to put on the culprit's stool).

Hauss'manniza'tion. The pulling down and building up anew of streets and cities, as baron Haussmann remodelled Paris, at the expense of some 100 millions sterling. In 1868 he had saddled Paris with a debt of about twenty-eight millions.

Hautboy. A strawberry. So called either from the haut bois (high woods) of Bohemia whence it was imported, or from its haut-bois (long-stalk). The latter is the more probable, and furnishes the etymology of the musical instrument also, which has a long mouth-reed.

Havelok (3 syl.), the orphan son of Burkabegn, king of Denmark, was exposed at sea through the treachery of his guardians, and the raft drifted to the coast of Lincolnshire. Here a fisherman named Grim found the young prince, and brought him up as his own son. In time it so happened that an English princess stood in the way of certain ambitious nobles, who resolved to degrade her by uniting her to a peasant, and selected the young foundling for the purpose; but Havelok having learnt the story of his birth, obtained the aid of the king his father to recover his wife's possessions, and became in due time king of Denmark and part of England.—"Havelok the Dane" (by the Trouvairs).

Haver-cakes. Oaten cakes (Scandinavian hafre, oats).

Haveril (3 syl.). A simpleton, April-fool. French poisson d'Avril (Islandic gifr, foolish talk).

Havering (Essex). The legend says that while Edward the Confessor was dwelling in this locality an old pilgrim asked alms, and the king replied, "I have no money, but I have-a-ring," and drawing it from his fore-finger, gave it to the beggar. Some time after certain English pilgrims in Jewry met the same man, who drew the ring from his finger, and said, "Give this to your king, and say within six months he shall die." The request was complied with, and the prediction fulfilled. The shrine of Edward the Confessor in Westminster Abbey gives colour to this legend.

Havior, Heavier, Haiver, or Hevor. Ox-deer, wilder than either hart or hind. Colquhoun says they are so called from the French hiver (winter) because they are in season all the winter. Jamieson says the derivation is averie (live stock generally).

Havock. A military cry to general massacre without quarter. This cry was forbidden in the ninth year of Richard II. on pain of death. Probably it was originally used in hunting wild beasts, such as wolves, lions, &c., that fell on sheep-folds, and Shakespeare favours this suggestion in his "Julius Caesar," where he says Até shall "cry havock! and let slip the dogs of war." (Welsh, havog, devastation; Irish, arvach.)

Hawk, from havock (q.v.). The falcon is so called from the devastation it commits among small birds.

Hawks are thus distinguished:—

Gerfalcon: a Tercell of a Gerfalcon are due to a king.

Falcon gentle and a Tercel gentle, for a prince.

Falcon of the rock, for a duke.

Falcon peregrine, for an earl.

Bastard hawk, for a baron.

Sacre and a Sacrit, for a knight.

Lanare and Lanrell, for a squire.

Merlyn, for a lady.

Hoby, for a young man.

Goshawk, for a yeoman.

Tercel, for a poor man.

Sparehawk, for a priest.

Murkyte, for a holy-water clerk.

Kesterel, for a knave or servant.

Dame Juliana Barnes.

The "Sore-hawk" is a hawk of the first year, so called from the French sor or saure, brownish yellow.

The "Spar" or "Sparrow" hawk is a small, ignoble hawk (Saxon, speara; Goth, sparwa; our spare, spar, spur, spear, spire, sparing, sparse, &c.; Latin, sparsus; all referring to minuteness).

The Hawk was the avatar of Ra or Horus, the sun-god of the Egyptians.

I know a hawk from a handsaw. Handsaw is a corruption of heronshaw (a heron). I know a hawk from a heron, the bird of prey from the game flown at. The proverb means, I know one thing from another. (See "Hamlet," ii. 2.)

Hawse-holes. He has crept through the hawse-holes. Has risen from the ranks. A naval phrase. The hawse-holes are those in the bow of a ship through which the cables pass.

Hawthorn was chosen by Henry VII. for his device, because the crown of Richard III. was discovered in a hawthorn bush at Bosworth.

Hay. A bottle of hay. (French "botte de foyne," bundle of hay.)

Methinks I have a great desire to a bottle of hay, good hay; sweet hay hath no fellow.—Shakespeare, "Midsummer Night's Dream," iv. 1.

Hayston (Frank). The laird of Bucklaw, afterwards laird of Girnington. —Sir Walter Scott, "Eride of Lammermoor."

Hayward. A keeper of the cattle or common herd of a village or parish. The word hay means "hedge," and this herdsman was so called because he had "ward" of the "hedges" also.

Hazel. Used for discovering metals and water. It must be forked like a Y, and the diviner walks with the rod slowly over the places where he suspects mines or springs to be concealed; when he passes over the place, the rod makes a dip or inclination. This is a relic of the virgula divina superstition, mentioned more than once in the Old Testament.

My people ask counsel at their stocks, and their staff declareth unto them.—Hosea, iv. 12.
he Berjans seek to learn beforehand the issue of an enterprise by consulting their staff like the ancient Jews.—Lichtenstein, "Travels in South Africa."

Hazis. The war-god of the Syrians. The word means "terrible in battle."

Head. Latin, caput; Saxon, heafod; Scotch, hafet; contracted into head.

Men without heads. (See BEMMYES.)

Men with heads beneath the shoulders. (See CAORA.)

Better be the head of an ass than the tail of a horse. Better be foremost amongst commoners than the lowest of the aristocracy; better be the head of the yeomanry than the tail of the gentry. The Italians say, "E meglio esser testa di luccio che coda di sturione."

I'll bundle you out head and heels. "Sans cérémonie," altogether. The allusion is to a custom at one time far too frequent in cottages, for a whole family to sleep together in one bed head to heels or pednam'enē, as it was termed in Cornwall; to bundle the whole lot out of bed, was to turn them out head and heels.

You have hit the nail on the head. You have guessed aright, you have done the right thing. The allusion is obvious. The French say, "Vous avez frappé au but" (You have hit the mark); the Italians have the phrase, "Haveate dato in brocca" (You have hit the pitcher), alluding to a game where a pitcher stood in the place of Aunt Sally (q.v.). The Latin, "Rem acu tetigisti" (You have touched the thing with a needle), refers to the custom of probing sores.

Heads or tails. Guess whether the coin tossed up will come down with head-side uppermost or not. The side not bearing the head has various devices, sometimes Britannia, sometimes George and the Dragon, sometimes a harp, sometimes the royal arms, sometimes an inscription, &c. These devices are all included in the word tail, meaning opposite to the head. The ancient Romans used to play this game, but said, "Heads or ships."

Cum pueri denarios in sublimē iactantes, "capita aut navia," lusu recte vetustatis exelamant.—Macrobius, "Saturnalia," l. 7.

Headlands. A corruption of hag-lands, the parts against the hedge, which at one time were left uncultivated.

Headrigg (Cuddie). A ploughman in lady Bellenden's service.—Sir Walter Scott, "Old Mortality."

Heady, wilful, is the German heftig, violent, self-willed.

Healing Gold. Gold given to a king for "healing" the king's evil, which was done by a touch.

Health. Your health. The story is that Vortigern was invited to dine at the house of Hengist, when Rowena, the host's daughter, brought a cup of wine which she presented to their royal guest, saying, "Wass heal, liever kyning" (Your health, dear king). (See WASSAIL.)

William of Malmesbury says, the custom took its rise from the death of young king Edward the Martyr, who was traitorously stabbed in the back while drinking a cup of wine presented to him by his mother Elfrida

Drinking healths. The Romans adopted a curious fashion of drinking the health of their lady-loves, and that was to drink a bumper to each letter of her name. Hudibras satirises this custom, which he calls "spelling names with beer-glasses" (pt. xi. l.).

Nævina sex cynthias, septem Justina bibatur, Quinque Lycas, Lyde quatuor, I in tribus.
"Martial," l. 72.

Three cups to Amy, four to Kate be given,
To Susan five, six Rachel, Bidget seven.

Hear as hog in harvest. In at one ear and out at the other, hear without paying attention. Giles Firmin says, "If you call hogs out of the harvest stubble, they will just lift up their heads to listen, and fall to their shack again.—"Real Christian." (1670.)

Hearse (1 syl.) means simply a harrow. Those harrows used in Roman Catholic churches (or frames with spikes) for holding candles are called in France *herse*s. These frames at a later period were covered with a canopy, and lastly were mounted on wheels.

Heart. A variety of the word core, (Latin, cord, the heart; Greek, kard; Sanskrit, herd; Saxon, heart.)

Heart (in Christian art), the attribute of St. Theresa.

A heart pierced with arrows (in Christian art) indicates the wounds of sorrow. The heart of the Virgin Mary is frequently represented as pierced with seven arrows or daggers, indicative of her seven sorrows (q.v.).

Yea, an arrow shall pierce through thine own soul (heart).—St. Luke, ii. 35.

A bloody heart. Since the time of Good lord James the Douglasses have carried upon their shields a bloody heart with a crown upon it, in memory of the expedition of lord James to Spain with the heart of king Robert Bruce. King Robert commissioned his friend to carry his heart to the Holy Land, and lord James had it enclosed in a silver casket, which he wore round his neck. On his way to the Holy Land, he stopped to aid Alphonso of Castile against Osmyn the Moor, and was slain. Sir Simon Lockhard of Lee was commissioned to carry the heart back to Scotland.—“Tales of a Grandfather,” xi.

The flaming heart (in Christian art), the symbol of charity. An attribute of St. Augustine, denoting the fervency of his devotion. The heart of the Saviour is frequently so represented.

Heart of Mid-Lothian. The old jail, the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, taken down in 1817. Sir Walter Scott has a novel so called.

Heat. One course in a race. So called because the horses must be allowed to cool down before they run again.

Feigned Zeal, you saw, set out with speedier pace,
But the last heat, Plain Dealing won the race.
Dryden.

Heathen. A dweller on a heath or common. Christian doctrines would not reach these remote people till long after it had been accepted in towns, and even villages. (See PAGAN.)

Heaven. The first heaven, says Mahomet, is of pure silver, and here the stars are hung out like lamps on golden chains. Each star has an angel for warder. In this heaven “the prophet” found Adam and Eve.

The second heaven, says Mahomet, is of polished steel and dazzling splendour. Here “the prophet” found Noah.

The third heaven, says Mahomet, is studded with precious stones too brilliant for the eye of man. Here Azra’el, the angel of death is stationed, and is for ever writing in a large book, or blotting words out. The former are the names of persons born, the latter those of the newly dead. (See below “Heaven of Heavens.”)

The fourth heaven, he says, is of the finest silver. Here dwells the Angel of Tears, whose height is “500 days’ journey,” and he sheds ceaseless tears for the sins of man.

The fifth heaven is of purest gold, and here dwells the Avenging Angel, who presides over elemental fire. Here “the prophet” met Aaron. (See below.)

The sixth heaven is composed of Has’ala, a sort of carbuncle. Here dwells the Guardian Angel of heaven and earth, half snow and half fire. It was here that Mahomet saw Moses, who wept with envy.

The seventh heaven, says the same veritable authority, is formed of divine light beyond the power of tongue to describe. Each inhabitant is bigger than the whole earth, and has 70,000 heads, each head 70,000 mouths, each mouth 70,000 tongues, and each tongue speaks 70,000 languages, all for ever employed in chanting the praises of the Most High. Here he met Abraham. (See below.)

¶ The fifth heaven. According to Ptolemy there are five heavens: (1) The planetary heaven; (2) the sphere of the fixed stars; (3) the crystalline, which vibrates; (4) the primum mobile, which communicates motion to the lower spheres; (5) the empyrean or seat of deity and angels. (See above.)

Sometimes she deemed that Mars had from above Left his fifth heaven, the powers of men to prove.
Hoole, “Orlando Furioso,” bk. xiii.

¶ To be in the seventh heaven. Supremely happy. The Cabbalists maintained that there are seven heavens, each rising in happiness above the other, the seventh being the abode of God and the highest class of angels. (See above.)

¶ The ninth heaven. The term heaven was used anciently to denote the orb or sphere in which a celestial body was supposed to move, hence the number of heavens varied. According to one system, the first heaven was that of the Moon, the second that of Venus, the third that of Mercury, the fourth that of the Sun, the fifth that of Mars, the sixth that of Jupiter, the seventh that of Saturn, the eighth that of the fixed stars, and the ninth that of the primum mobile.

The heaven of heavens. The Hebrews acknowledged three heavens: the air, the starry firmament, and the residence of God. Thus “the fowls of heaven,” “the dew of heaven,” “the clouds of heaven,” mean of the air. “Let there be lights in the firmament of heaven” (Genesis i. 14) means the starry vault. “Heaven is my throne” (Isa. lvi. 1 and Matt. v. 34), is the residence of God and the angels. “Heaven of heavens” is a Hebrew superlative meaning the highest of the heavens.

In modern phraseology the word heaven is used for the starry firmament, and the residence of God and angels.

He’bē. Goddess of youth, and cup-bearer to the celestial gods. She had the power of restoring the aged to youth and beauty.—Greek mythology.

Wreathed smiles
Such as hang on Hebe's cheek,
And love to live in dimpled sleep,
Milton, "L'Allegro,"

Hebe Vases. Small vases like a cotyliscos. So termed because Hebe is represented as bearing one containing nectar for the gods.

Hébertistes (3 syl.). The partisans of the vile demagogue, Jacques René Hébert, chief of the Cordeliers, a revolutionary club which boasted of such names as Anacharsis Clootz, Ronsin, Vincent, and Momoro, in the great French Revolution.

Heb'ron, in the satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," in the first part stands for Holland, but in the second part for Scotland. Heb'ronite (3 syl.), a native of Holland, or Scotland.

Hec'ate (3 syl. in Greek, 2 in Eng.). A triple deity, called Phœbè or the Moon in heaven, Diana on the earth, and Hecate or Proserpine in hell. She is described as having three heads—one of a horse, one of a dog, and one of a lion. Her offerings consisted of dogs, honey, and black lambs. She was sometimes called "Tri'via," because offerings were presented to her at cross-roads. Shakespeare refers to the triple character of this goddess.

And we fairies that do run
By the triple Hecate's team.
"Midsummer Night's Dream," v. 2.

Hecate, daughter of Perses the Titan, is a very different person to the "Triple Hecate," who, according to Hesiod, was daughter of Zeus and Demeter. This latter was a benevolent goddess, for whom Zeus had more regard than for any other deity; the latter was a Titan who poisoned her father, raised a temple to Diana in which she immolated strangers, and was mother of Medea and Circe. She presided over magic and enchantments, taught sorcery and witchcraft. She is represented with a lighted torch and a sword, and is attended with two black dogs.

Now witchcraft celebrates
Pale Hecate's offerings.
Shakespeare, "Macbeth," ii. 1.

Hector. Eldest son of Priam, the noblest and most magnanimous of all the chieftains in Homer's "Iliad" (a Greek epic). After holding out for ten years, he was slain by Achilles, who lashed him to his chariot, and dragged the dead body in triumph thrice round the walls of Troy. The "Iliad" concludes with the funeral obsequies of Hector and Patroclus.

The Hector of Germany. Joachim II., elector of Brandenburg. (1514-1571.)

Hector. A leader; so called from the son of Priam and generalissimo of the Trojans.

Hector. To bully, or play the bully. It is hard to conceive how the brave, modest, noble-minded patriot came to be made the synonym of a braggart and blusterer like Ajax.

You wear Hector's cloak. You are paid off for trying to deceive another. You are paid in your own coin. When Thomas Percy, earl of Northumberland, in 1569, was routed, he hid himself in the house of Hector Armstrong, of Harlaw. This villain betrayed him for the reward offered, but never after did anything go well with him; he went down, down, down, till at last he died a beggar in rags on the road-side.

Hec'uba. Second wife of Priam, and mother of nineteen children. When Troy was taken by the Greeks, she fell to the lot of Ulysses. She was afterwards metamorphosed into a dog, and threw herself into the sea. The place where she perished was afterwards called the Dog's-grave (cynos-se'ma).—Homer, "Iliad," &c.

On to Hecuba. To the point or main incident. The story of Hecuba has furnished a host of Greek tragedies.

Hedge. To hedge in betting is to defend oneself from loss by cross-bets. As a hedge is a defence, so betters defend themselves by hedging.

Hedge Lane (London) includes that whole line of streets (Dorset, Whitcomb, Prince's, and Wardour) stretching from Pall Mall East to Oxford Street.

Hedge-Priest. A poor or vagabond parson. The use of hedge for vagabond or very inferior is common: as hedge-mustard, hedge-writer (a Grub-street author), hedge-marriage (a clandestine one), &c. Shakespeare uses the phrase, "hedge-born swain" as the very opposite of "gentle blood."—"1 Henry VI.," iv. 1.

Heels. Out at heels. In a sad plight, in decayed circumstances, like a beggar whose stockings are worn out at the heels.

A good man's fortune may grow out at heels.
Shakespeare, "King Lear," ii. 2.

Heel-tap. Bumpers all round, and no heel-taps, i.e., the bumpers are to be drained to the bottom of the glass. A heel-tap is the peg in the heel of a shoe, which is taken out when the shoe is finished; metaphorically the wine left in a glass when the drinker sets it down as "empty" or finished.

Heenan. In Heenan style. "By apostolic blows and knocks." Heenan, the Bernicia boy of North America, disputed for the champion's belt against Sayers, the British champion. His build and muscle were the admiration of the ring.

Heep (Ur'ah). An abject toady, malignant as he is base; always boasting of his 'umble birth, 'umble position, 'umble abode, and 'umble calling. — Dickens, "David Copperfield."

Hegemony (4 syl.). The hegemony of nations. The leadership. (Greek, hegemon'ia, from ago, to lead.)

Hegi'ra. The epoch of the flight of Mahomet from Mecca, when he was expelled by the magistrates, July 16, 622. From this event the Mahometans begin their dates (Arabic, haga'ra, to remove).

He'il (2 syl.). An idol of the ancient Saxons, worshipped in Devonshire.

Heimdall (2 syl.). In Celtic mythology, son of the nine virgins, all sisters. He is called the god with the golden tooth, or with golden teeth. He is said to live at the further extremity of the bridge Bifrost (q.v.), and keep the keys of heaven. He is watchman or sentinel of Asgard (q.v.), sleeps less than a bird, sees even in sleep, can hear the grass grow, and even the wool on a lamb's back. Heimdall, at the end of the world, will wake the gods with his trumpet, when the sons of Muspell will go against them, with Lokë, the wolf Fenrir, and the great serpent Jormundgand.

Heimdaller. The learned humbugs in the court of king Dinu'bë of Hlisisburg. — "Grimm's Goblins."

Heimskringla. The universe. — Scandinavian.

Heims-Kringla (The). A prose legend of historic foundation found in the Snorra Edda.

Heir Apparent. The person who is heir if he survives. At the death of his predecessor the heir-apparent becomes heir-at-law.

Heir Presumptive. One who will be heir, if no one is born having a prior claim. Thus the princess royal was heir-presumptive till the prince of Wales was born, and if the prince of Wales had been king before any family had been born to him, his brother prince Alfred would have been heir-presumptive.

Hel or Hela (in Scandinavian mythology) is goddess of the ninth earth or nether world. She dwelt beneath the roots of the sacred ash (Yggdrasil), and was the daughter of Loki or Lokë. The All-father sent her into Nifheim, where she was given dominion over nine worlds, and to one or other of these nine worlds she sends all who die of sickness or old age. Her dwelling is Elind'nir (dark clouds), her dish Hungr (hunger), her knife Sullt (starvation), her servants Gangla'ti (tardy-feet), her bed Kôr (sickness), and her bed-curtains Blikian'daböl (splendid misery).

Down the yawning steep he rode
That led to Hela's drear abode.
Gray, "Descent of Odin,"

Hel Keplein. A mantle of invisibility belonging to the dwarf-king Laurin. (German, hehlen, to conceal). — The "Heldenbuch."

Heldenbuch (Book of Heroes). A German compilation of all the romances pertaining to Diderick and his champions, by Wolfram von Eschenbach.

Helen. The type of female beauty, more especially in those who have reached womanhood. She was the daughter of Zeus and Leda, and the wife of Menela'us, king of Sparta.

She moves a goddess and she looks a queen.
Pope, "Æneid," iii.

The Helen of Spain. Cava or Florinda, daughter of count Julian. (See CAVA.)

St. Helen. Represented in royal robes, wearing an imperial crown, because she was empress. Sometimes she carries in her hand a model of the Holy Sepulchre, an edifice raised by her in the East; sometimes she bears a large cross, typical of her alleged discovery of that upon which the Saviour was crucified; sometimes she also bears the three nails by which he was affixed to the cross.

St. Helen's fire (feu d'Hélène); also called Feu St. Hermé (St. Helme's or St. Elmo's fire); and by the Italians "the fires of St. Peter and St. Nicholas." Meteoric fires seen occasionally on the masts of ships, &c. If the flame is single, foul and tempestuous weather is said to be at hand; but if two or more flames appear, the weather will improve. (See CASTOR.)

Hel'ena. The type of a lovely woman, patient and hopeful, strong in feeling, and sustained through trials by her enduring and heroic faith.—Shakespeare, "All's Well that Ends Well."

Hel'enos. The prophet, the only son of Priam that survived the fall of Troy. He fell to the share of Pyrrhus when the captives were awarded; and because he saved the life of the young Grecian, was allowed to marry Androm'acha, his brother Hector's widow.—Virgil, "Æneid."

Hel'icon. The Muses' Grove. It is part of the Parnassos, a mountain range in Greece.

Helicon's harmonious stream is the stream which flowed from the mountains to the fountains of the Muses, called Aganippë and Hip'pocrene (3 syl.).

Heligh-Monat (Holy-month). The name given by the Anglo-Saxons to the month of December, in allusion to Christmas-day.

Hel'ios. The Greek Sun-god, who rode to his palace in Colehis every night in a golden boat furnished with wings.

Hel'iotrope (4 syl.). Apollo loved Clyt'ia, but forsook her for her sister Leucoth'oë. On discovering this, Clyt'ia pined away, and Apollo changed her at death to a flower, which, always turning towards the sun, is called heliotrope (Greek, "sun-turn").

Hell. In the Buddhist system there are 135 places of punishment after death, where the dead are sent according to their degree of demerit. (See EUPHEMISMS.)

Descended into hell (Creed) means the place of the dead. Anglo-Saxon helen, to cover or conceal, like the Greek "Hādēs," the abode of the dead, from the verb a-eido, not to see. In both cases it means "the unseen world" or "the world concealed from sight." The god of this nether world was called "Hādēs" by the Greeks, and "Hel" or "Hella" by the Scandinavians. In some counties of England to cover in with a roof is "to hell the building," and thatchers or tilers are termed "helliars."

Lead apes in hell. Die an old maid. As an old maid would not lead a husband in this world, she will be doomed to lead or marry an ape in the realms infernal. Beatrice says—

He that is more than youth is not for me, and he that is less than man I am not for him; therefore I will . . . even lead his apes into hell.

Shakespeare, "Much Ado About Nothing," ii. 1.

But 'tis an old proverb, and you know it well,

That women, dying maids, lead apes in hell.
"The London Prodigal," ii.

Hell Gate. A dangerous pass between Great Barn Island and Long Island (North America). The Dutch settlers of New York gave it this name because its navigation was very dangerous.

Hell-gates, according to Milton, are nine-fold—three of brass, three of iron, and three of adamant; the keepers are Sin and Death. This allegory is one of the most celebrated passages of "Paradise Lost." (See Book ii., 643-676.)

Hell Kettles. Cavities three miles long at Oxen-le-field, in Durham.

Hell Shoe. In Icelandic mythology, indispensable for the journey to Valhalla as the obolus for crossing the Styx.

Hellanod'icæ. Umpires of the public games in Greece. They might chastise with a stick any one who created a disturbance. Lichas, a Spartan nobleman, was so punished by them.

Helle'nēs (3 syl.). "This word had in Palestine three several meanings: Sometimes it designated the pagans; sometimes the Jews, speaking Greek, and dwelling among the pagans; and sometimes men of pagan origin converted to Judaism" (John, vii. 35, xii. 20; Acts, xiv. 1, xvii. 4, xviii. 4, xxi. 28).—Rénan, "Life of Jesus," xiv.

N.B.—The present Greeks call themselves "Helle'nēs," and the king is termed "King of the Helle'nēs." The ancient Greeks called their country "Hellas;" it was the Romans who misnamed it "Græcia."

Helle'nic. The common dialect of the Greek writers after the age of Alexander. It was based on the Attic.

Hellenis'tic. The dialect of the Greek language used by the Jews. It was full of Oriental idioms and metaphors.

Hell'enists. Those Jews who used the Greek or Helle'nic language. (All these four words are derived from Hellas, in Thessaly, the cradle of the race.)

Hellëspont (3 syl.), now called the Dardanelles, means the "sea of Hellë," and was so called because Hellë, the sister of Phryxos, was drowned there while seeking to escape from Ino, her mother-in-law, who most cruelly oppressed her. Both Hellë and Phryxos were transported through the air on a golden ram, but Hellë, turning giddy, fell into the sea, which was accordingly called after her name.

Helmets. Those of Saragossa were most in repute in the days of chivalry.

Close helmet. The complete head-piece, having in front two moveable parts, which could be lifted up or let down at pleasure.

Visor. One of the moveable parts; it was to look through.

Beer or drinking-piece. One of the moveable parts, which was lifted up when the wearer ate or drank. It comes from the Italian verb beverë (to drink).

Morion. A low iron cap, worn only by infantry.

Mahomet's Helmet. Mahomet wore a double helmet; the exterior one was called al mawshak (the wreathed garland).

The helmet of Perseus, which rendered the wearer invisible. This was the "Helmet of Ha'dës," which, with the winged sandals and magic wallet, he took from certain nymphs who held them in possession; but after he had slain Medusa he restored them again, and presented the gorgon's head to Athëna [Minerva], who placed it in the middle of her agis.

Helon, in the satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," by Dryden and Tate, is meant for the earl of Feversham.

Helter Skelter. In a confused rout. Helter is connected with the Saxon heolster, and bears reference to the fallen angels driven out of heaven to the bottomless pit. Skelter is skelder-lic, in a disorderly manner, and the two words may be paraphrased thus: "In a disorderly manner, like the angels when they were driven out of Paradise."

The two Latin words hilariter, celeriter (joyously and quickly) do not support the use.

Helve. To throw the helve after the hatchet. To be reckless, to throw away what remains because your losses have been so great. The allusion is to the fable of the wood-cutter who lost the head of his axe in a river, and threw the handle in after it.

Helve'tia. Switzerland. So called from the Helve'tii, a powerful Celtic people who dwelt thereabouts.

See from the ashes of Helvetia's pile
The whitened skull of old Servetus smile.
Holmes.

Hemp. To have some hemp in your pocket. To have luck on your side in the most adverse circumstances. The phrase is French (Avoir de la corde-de-pendu dans sa poche), referring to the popular notion that hemp brings good luck.

Hempe (1 syl.). When Hempe is spun England is done. Lord Bacon says he heard the prophecy when he was a child, and he interpreted it thus: Hempe is composed of the initial letters of Henry, Edward, Mary, Philip, and Elizabeth. At the close of the last reign "England was done," for the sovereign no longer styled himself "King of England," but "King of Great Britain and Ireland." (See NOTARICA.)

Hempen Caudle. A hangman's rope.

Ye shall have a hempen caudle then, and the help of a hatchet.—Shakespeare, "2 Henry VI.," iv. 7.

Hempen Fever. Death on the gallows, the rope being made of hemp.

Hempen Widow. The widow of a man who has been hanged. (See above.)

Of a hempen widow the kid forlorn.
Ainsworth, "Jack Sheppard."

Hemph'ta. The Egyptian Jupiter.—Trismegistus, "Pimandre."

He'mus or Hæmus. A chain of mountains in Thrace. According to mythology, Hæmos, son of Bo'reas, was changed into a mountain for aspiring to divine honours.

Hen and Chickens (in Christian art), emblematical of God's providence. (See "St. Matthew," xxiii. 37.)

A whistling maid and crowing hen is neither fit for God nor men. A whistling maid means a witch, who whistles like the Lapland witches to call up the winds; they were supposed to be in league with the devil. The crowing of a hen was supposed to forbode a death. The usual interpretation is that masculine qualities in females are undesirable, but admitting the truth of the dictum, it would be the grossest exaggeration to say that masculine women are unfit for heaven.

Hen-pecked. A man who submits to be snubbed by his wife. It is a fact that cocks, though very brave at large, are frequently under hen-government in coops.

Henchman. Henchboy. The Saxon hinc is a servant or page.

I do but bea a little changeling boy
To be my henchman
Shakespeare, "Midsummer Night's Dream," ii. 1.

Hengist and Horsa. German hengst (a stallion), and Horsa is connected with our Anglo-Saxon word hors (horse). If the names of two brothers, probably they were given them from the devices borne on their arms.

According to tradition, they landed in Pegwell Bay, Kent.

Henna. The Persian ladies tinge the tips of their fingers scarlet with henna, to make them look like coral.

Hennil. Idol of the Vandals. It was represented as a stick surmounted with a hand holding an iron ring.

Hen'ricans or Henricians. A religious sect. So called from Henri'cus, its founder, an Italian monk, who, in the twelfth century, undertook to reform the vices of the clergy. He rejected infant baptism, festivals, and ceremonies. He was imprisoned by pope Eugene III. in 1148.

Henriette (3 syl.), in the French language, means "a perfect woman." The character is from Molière's "Femmes Savantes."

Henry Grace de Dieu. The largest ship built by Henry VIII.; it carried 72 guns, 700 men, and was 1,000 tons burthen. (See GREAT HARRY.)

Hephæstos. The Greek Vulcan.

Heptarchy (Greek for seven governments). The Saxon Heptarchy is the division of England into seven parts, each of which had a separate ruler: as Kent, Sussex, Wessex, Essex, East Anglia, Mercia, and Northumbria.

He'ra. The Greek Juno, and wife of Zeus. (The word means mistress; German, herr.)

Heraclei'dæ (4 syl.). The descendants of Herac'lēs (Latin, Herculēs).

Heralds.

The coat of arms represents the knight himself from whom the bearer is descended.

The shield represents his body, and the helmet his head.

The flourish is his mantle.

The motto is the ground or moral pretension on which he stands.

The supporters are the pages, designated by the emblems of bears, lions, and so on.

Herald's College consists of three kings-at-arms, six heralds, and four pursuivants.

The three kings-at-arms are Garter, Clarenceux, and Norroy.

The six heralds are styled Windsor, Chester, Lancaster, Somerset, York, and Richmond.

The four pursuivants are Portcullis, Rouge Dragon, Blue Mantle, and Rouge Croix.

GARTER KING-AT-ARMS is so called because of his special duty to attend at the solemnities of election, investiture, and installation of the Knights of the Garter.

CLARENCEUX KING-AT-ARMS. So called from the duke of Clarence, brother of Edward IV. His duty is to marshal and dispose the funerals of knights on the south side of the Trent.

NORROY KING-AT-ARMS has similar jurisdiction to Clarenceux, only on the north side of the Trent.

¶ In Scotland the heraldic college consists of the LYON KING-AT-ARMS, six heralds, and five pursuivants.

¶ In Ireland it consists of the ULSTER KING-AT-ARMS, two heralds, and two pursuivants.

Herbs. Many herbs are used for curative purposes simply because of their form or marks : thus Wood-sorrel, being shaped like a heart, is used as a cordial ; liver-wort for the liver ; the celandine, which has yellow juice, for the jaundice ; herb-dragon, which is speckled like a dragon, to counteract the poison of serpents, &c.

Her'culēs (3 syl.). A Grecian hero, possessed of the utmost amount of physical strength and vigour that the human frame is capable of. He is represented as brawny, muscular, short-necked, and of huge proportions. The Pythian told him if he would serve Eurys'theus for twelve years he should become immortal ; accordingly he bound himself to the Argive king, who imposed upon him twelve tasks of great difficulty and danger :

- 1st. To slay the Nem'ean lion.
- 2nd. To kill the Ler'nean hydra.
- 3rd. To catch and retain the Arca'dian stag.
- 4th. To destroy the Eryman'thian boar.
- 5th. To cleanse the stables of king Au'geas.
- 6th. To destroy the cannibal birds of the lake Stymph'alīs.
- 7th. To take captive the Cretan bull.
- 8th. To catch the horses of the Thracian Diome'dēs.
- 9th. To get possession of the girdle of Hippol'y'tē, queen of the Am'azons.
- 10th. To take captive the oxen of the monster Ger'yōn.
- 11th. To get possession of the apples of the Hesper'idēs.
- 12th. To bring up from the infernal regions the three-headed dog Cer'beros.

The Nem'ean lion first he killed, then Lernē's hydra ^{slaw} ; then a dian stag and monster bear before Eurys'theus drew ; Cleanse Au'geas' stalls, and mātē the birds from lake Stymph'alī-fīe ; The Cretan bull, and Thracian mares, first seized and then set free ; Took prize the Amazonian belt, and Ger'yōn's kine as well ; Fetched apples from th' Hesperidēs, and Cer'beros from hell.

Attic Herculēs. Theseus, who went about, like Herculēs, his great contemporary, destroying robbers and achieving wondrous exploits.

Egyptian Herculēs. Sesostris. (Flourished B.C. 1500.)

Jewish Herculēs. Samson. (Died B.C. 1113.)

Herculēs Secundus. Com'modus, the Roman emperor, gave himself this title.

He was a gigantic idiot, of whom it is said that he killed 100 lions in the amphitheatre, and gave none of them more than one blow. He also overthrew 1,000 gladiators. (161, 180-192.)

The Farnesū Herculēs. A celebrated work of art, copied by Glykon from an original by Lysippos. It exhibits the hero, exhausted by toil, leaning upon his club ; his left hand rests upon his back, and grasps one of the apples of the Hesper'idēs. A copy of this famous statue stands in the gardens of the Tuileries, Paris ; but Glykon's statue is in the Farnesū Palace at Rome. A beautiful description of this statue is given by Thomson ("Liberty," iv.).

Herculēs' Club. A stick of unusual size and formidable appearance.

Herculēs' Horse. Ari'on, given him by Adras'tos. It had the power of speech, and its feet on the right side were those of a man.

Herculēs' Pillars. Calpē and Aby'la, one at Gibraltar and one at Cēuta, torn asunder by Herculēs that he might get to Gadēs (Cádiz). Macro'bīus ascribes these pillars to Sesostris (the Egyptian Herculēs), and Lucan follows the same tradition.

Venit ad occasum, mundique extrema Sesostris.
"Phars'alia," x.

I will follow you even to the pillars of Herculēs. To the end of the world. The ancients supposed that these rocks marked the utmost limits of the habitable globe. (See above "Herculēs' Pillars.")

Herculēan Knot. A snaky complication on the rod or caducēus of Mercury, adopted by the Grecian brides as the fastening of their woollen girdles, which only the bridegroom was allowed to untie when the bride retired for the night. As he did so, he invoked Juno to render his marriage as fecund as that of Herculēs, who had a vast number of wives, all of whom had families, amongst others the fifty daughters of Thestius, each of whom conceived in one night. (See KNOT.)

Hereford (3 syl.). Saxon, herē-forda (army ford).

Herefordshire Kindness. A good turn rendered for a good turn received. Latin proverbs, Fricantem refri'ca ; Manus manum lavat. Fuller says the people of Herefordshire "drink back to him who drinks to them."

Heretic means "one who chooses," and heresy means simply "a choice." A heretic is one who chooses his own creed, and does not adopt the creed authorised by the national church. (Greek, hairēsis, choice.)

HERETICS OF THE FIRST CENTURY were the Simonians (so called from Simon Magus), Cerinthians (Cerinthus), Ebionites (Eb'ion), and Nicodaitans (Nicholas, deacon of Antioch).

SECOND CENTURY: The Basilidians (Basil'idēs), Carpocratians (Carpoc'rātēs), Valentinians (Valenti'nus), Gnostics (Knowing Ones), Nazarenes, Millenarians, Cainites (Cain), Sethians (Seth), Quartodecimans (who kept Easter on the fourteenth day of the first month), Cerdonians (Cerdon), Mar'cionites (Mar'cion), Montanists (Montanus), Tatianists (Tatian), Alogians (who denied the "Word"), Artotyrites (q.v.), and Angelics (who worshipped angels).

THIRD CENTURY: The Pat'ri-passians, Arabaci, Aquarians, Novatians, Origenists (followers of Origen), Melchisedechians (who believed Melchisedech was the Messiah), Sabellians (from Sabel'lius), and Manicheans (followers of Manēs).

FOURTH CENTURY: The Arians (from Arius), Colluthians (Collu'thus), Macedonians, Agoete, Appollinarians (Apollina'ris), Timotheans (Timothy, the apostle), Collyridians (who offered cakes to the Virgin Mary), Seleucians (Seleu'cus), Priscillians (Priscillian), Anthropomorphites (who ascribed to God a human form), Jovinianists (Jovin'ian), Messalians, and Bonosians (Bono'sus).

FIFTH CENTURY: The Pelagians (Pela'gius), Nestorians (Nesto'rius), Eutychians (Eu'tychus), Theo-paschites (who said all the three persons of the Trinity suffered on the cross).

SIXTH CENTURY: The Predestinarians, Incorruptibles (who maintained that the body of Christ was incorruptible), the new Agoete (who maintained that Christ did not know when the day of judgment would take place), and the Monothelites (who maintained that Christ had but one will).

Her'iot. A right of the lord of a manor to the best jewel, beast, or chattel of a deceased copyhold tenant. The word is compounded of the Saxon herē (army), geat (tribute), because originally it was military furniture, such as armour, arms, and horses paid to the lord of the fee.—Canute, c. 69.

Hermæ. Busts of the god Hermēs affixed to a quadrangular stone pillar, diminishing towards the base, and between five and six feet in height. They were set up to mark the boundaries of lands, at the junction of roads, at the corners of streets, and so on. The Romans used them also for garden decorations. In later times the block was more or less chiselled into legs and arms.

Hermaphrodite (4 syl.). A human body having both sexes; a vehicle combining the structure of a wagon and cart; a flower containing both the male and female organs of reproduction. The word is derived from the fable of Hermaphroditus, son of Hermēs and Aph'rodite. The nymph Sal'macis became enamoured of him, and prayed that she might be so closely united that "the twain might become one flesh." Her prayer being heard, the nymph and boy became one body.—Ovid, "Metamorphoses," iv. 347.

Her'megyld or Hermyngyld. The wife of the constable of Northumberland, converted to Christianity by Cunstance, by whose bidding she restored sight to a blind Briton.—Chaucer, "Man of Lawes Tale."

Her'mensul or Ermensul. A Saxon deity, worshipped in Westphalia. Charlemagne broke the idol, and converted its temple into a Christian church. The statue stood on a column, holding a standard in one hand, and a balance in the other. On its breast was the figure of a bear, and on its shield a lion. Probably it was a war-god.

Her'mes (2 syl.). The Greek Mercury; either the god or the metal.

So when we see the liquid metal fall
Which chemists by the name of Hermes call.
Hocle, "Ariosto," bk. vi.i.

Milton ("Paradise Lost," iii. 603) calls quicksilver "Volatil Hermēs."

Hermetic Art. The art or science of alchemy; so called from the Chaldean philosopher, Hermēs Trismegistus, its hypothetical founder.

Hermetic Books. Egyptian books written under the dictation of Thoth (the Egyptian Hermēs), the scribe of the gods. Jamblichus gives their number as 20,000, but Man'etho raises it to 36,525. These books state that the world was made out of fluid; that the soul is the union of light and life; that nothing is destructible; that the soul transmigrates; and that suffering is the result of motion.

Hermetic Philosophy. A system which acknowledges only three chemical principles—viz., salt, sulphur, and mercury—from which it explains every phenomenon of nature. (See HERMES.)

Hermetic Powder. The sympathetic powder, supposed to possess a healing influence from a distance. The mediæval philosophers were very fond of calling books, drugs, &c., connected with alchemy and astronomy by the term hermetic, out of compliment to Hermès Trismegistus.—Sir Keelm Digby, "Discourse concerning the Cure of Wounds by Sympathy."

For by his side a pouch he wore
Replete with strange hermetic powder,
That wounds nine miles' dint-blank would solder.
Butler, "Hudibras," i. 2.

Hermetically Sealed. Closed securely. Thus we say, "My lips are hermetically sealed," meaning so as not to utter a word of what has been imparted. The French say close-fitting doors and windows shut hermetically. When chemists want to preserve anything from the air, they heat the neck of the vessel till it is soft, and then twist it till the aperture is closed up. This is called sealing the vessel hermetically, or like a chemist. (From Hermès, called "Trismegistus," or thrice-great, the supposed inventor of chemistry.)

Her'mia. Daughter of E'geus, who betrothed her to Deme'trius; but she refused to marry him, as she was in love with Lysander.—Shakespeare, "Midsummer Night's Dream."

Hermi'one (4 syl.). Wife of Leont's, king of Sicilia. Being suspected of infidelity, she is thrown into jail, swoons, and is reported to be dead. She is kept concealed till her infant Per lita is of marriageable age, when Leont's discovers his mistake, and is reconciled.—Shakespeare, "Winter's Tale."

Hermit. Peter the Hermit. Preacher of the first crusade. (1050-1115.)

Hermite (2 syl.). Tristrem l' Hermite or Sir Tristan l' Ermite. Provost-marshal of Louis XI. He was the main instrument in carrying into effect the nefarious schemes of his wily master, who used to call him his gossip. (1405-1493.) Sir Walter Scott introduces him in "Anne of Geierstein," and again in "Quentin Durward."

Hermothr or Hermode (2 syl.). The deity who, with Bragi, receives and welcomes to Valhalla all heroes who fall in battle.—Scandinavian mythology.

He'ro. Daughter of Leona'to, governor of Messina. Her attachment to Beatrice is very beautiful, and she serves as a foil to show off the more brilliant qualities of her cousin.—Shakespeare, "Much Ado about Nothing."

He'ro and Leän'der. The tale is that Hero, a priestess of Venus, fell in love with Leander, who swam across the Hellespont every night to visit her. One night he was drowned in so doing, and Hero in grief threw herself into the same sea.

Her'od. A child-killer; from Herod the Great, who ordered the massacre of the babes in Bethlehem. (Matt. ii. 16.)

To out-herod Herod. To out-do in wickedness, violence, or rant, the worst of tyrants. Herod, who destroyed the babes of Bethlehem, was made (in the ancient mysteries) a ranting, roaring tyrant; the extravagance of his rant being the measure of his bloody-mindedness. (See PILATE.)

Oh, it often's me to the soul to hear a robbustious, perrwig-pated fellow tear a passion to tatters, to very rags, to split the ears of the groundlin.s . . . it out-herods tierod.—Shakespeare, "Hamlet," iii. 2.

Heroic Age. That age of a nation which comes between the purely mythical period and the historic. This is the age when the sons of the gods take unto themselves the daughters of men, and the offspring partake of the twofold character.

Heroic Medicines. Those which produce serious or even fatal results, when administered too freely, as calomel, quinine, &c.

Heroic Size in sculpture denotes a stature superior to ordinary life, but not colossal.

Heroic Verse. That verse in which epic poetry is generally written. In Greek and Latin it is hexameter verse, in English it is ten-syllable verse, either in rhymes or not. So called because it is employed for the celebration of heroic exploits.

Her'on-crests. The Uzbek Tartars wear a plume of white heron feathers in their turbans.

Heros'tratos or Erostratos, an Ephesian who set fire to the temple of Ephesus in order that his name might be perpetuated. The Ephesians made it penal to mention the name, but their law effectually defeated its object. (B.C. 356.)

Herring. Dead as a shotten herring. The shotten herring is one that has shot off or ejected its spawn. This fish dies the very moment it quits the water, from want of air. Indeed, all the herring tribe die very soon after they are taken from their native element.

By gar de herring is no dead so as I will kill him.
Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," ii. 3.

Herrings. (See BATTLE.)

Herring-bone in building. Courses of stone laid angularly, thus: . Also applied to strutting placed between thin joists to increase their strength.

Also a peculiar stitch in needlework, chiefly used in working flannel.

Hertford. Saxon, heort-forda (the hart's ferd). The arms of the city are "a hart couchant in water."

Hertford, invoked by Thomson in his "Spring," was Frances Thynne, who married Algernon Seymour, earl of Hertford, afterwards duke of Somerset.

Hertha. Mother earth. Worshipped by all the Scandinavian tribes with orgies and mysterious rites, celebrated in the dark. Her veiled statue was transported from district to district by cows which no hand but the priest's was allowed to touch. Tacitus calls this goddess Cyb'elë.

Her Trippa. Henry Cornelius Agrippa of Nettesheim, a philosopher and physician. One of the characters in the romance of "Gargantua and Pantagruel," by Rabelais.

Hesi'onë. Daughter of Laom'edon, king of Troy, exposed to a sea-monster, but rescued by Hercules.

Hesperia. Italy was so called by the Greeks, because it was to them the "Western Land;" but the Romans, for a similar reason, transferred the name to Spain.

Hesper'idës. Three sisters who guarded the golden apples which He'ra (Juno) received as a marriage gift. They were assisted by the dragon La'don. Many English poets call the place where these golden apples grew the "garden of the Hesperidës." Shakespeare ("Love's Labour's Lost," iv. 3) speaks of "climbing trees in the Hesperidës."

Shew thee the tree, leaved with refin'd gold,
Whereon the fearful dragon held his seat,
That watched the garden called Hesperidës.
Robert Greene, "Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay," (1598.)

Hes'perus. The evening star.

Ere twice in muck and occidental damp
Moist Hesperus hath quenched his sleepy lamp.
Shakespeare, "All's Well that Ends Well," ii. 1.

He'sus or E'sus. A Gaulish war-god corresponding to Mars.

He'sychasts (He'-se-kasts). The "quietists" of the East in the fourteenth century. They placed perfection in contemplation. (Greek, hesu'chia, quiet.) (See Gibbon, "Roman Empire," lxi.) Milton well expresses their belief in his "Comus:"—

Till oft converse with heavenly habitants
Begin to cast a beam on the outward shape, . . .
And turns it by degrees to the soul's essence
Till all be made immortal.

Heta'irism (3 syl.). Prostitution.

The Greek hetaira (a mistress). According to Plato, "meretrix, speciosio nomine rem odiosam denotante."—Plut. et Athen. (See SCAPULA.)

Hetman. The Chief of the Cossacks of the Don used to be so called. He was elected by the people, and the mode of choice was this: The voters threw their fur caps at the candidate they voted for, and he who had the most caps at his feet was the successful candidate. The last Hetman was count Platoff. (1812-1814.)

Heu-Monat' or Hey-Monat. Hay-month, the Anglo-Saxon name for July.

Hewson. Old Hewson the cobbler. Colonel John Hewson, who (as Hume says) "rose from the profession of a cobbler to a high rank in Cromwell's army."

Heyday of Youth. The prime of youth. (Saxon, heah-dæg or heg-day, high day, mid-day.)

Hexap'la. A book containing the text of the Bible in Hebrew and Greek, with four translations, viz : the Sep'tuagint, with those of Aquila, Theodo'tion, and Symmachus. The whole is printed in six columns on the page. Other translations of certain parts were subsequently added.

Hext. When bale is hext, boot is next. When things come to the worst they must soon mend. Bale means misery, hurt, misfortune; hext is highest, as next is highest; boot means help, profit.

Hiawath'a. Son of Mudjeeke'wis (the west wind) and Weno'nah. His mother died in his infancy, and Hiawatha was brought up by his grandmother, Noko'mis, daughter of the Moon. He represents the progress of civilisation among the American Indians. He first wrestled with Monda'min (Indian maize), whom he subdued, and gave to man bread-corn. He then taught man navigation; then he subdued the Mishe-Nahma or sturgeon, and told the people to "bring all their pots and kettles and make oil for winter." His next adventure was against Megissog'won, the magician, "who sent the fiery fever on man; sent the white fog from the fen-lands; sent disease and death among us;" he slew the terrible monster, and taught man the science of medicine. He next married "Laughing Water," setting the people an example to follow. Lastly, he taught the people picture-writing. When the white men landed and taught the Indians the faith of Jesus, Hiawatha exhorted them to receive the words of wisdom, to reverence the missionaries who had come so far to see them, and departed "to the kingdom of Pone'mah, the land of the Hereafter."

Longfellow's song of Hiawath'a may be termed the "Edda" of the North American Indians.

Hiawatha's mittens. "Magic mittens made of deer-skin; when upon his hands he wore them, he could smite the rocks asunder."—Longfellow, "Hiawatha," iv.

Hiawatha's moc'casins. Enchanted shoes made of deer-skin. "When he bound them round his ankles, at each stride a mile he measured."—Longfellow, "Hiawatha," iv.

Hibernia. A variety of Iernë (Ireland). Pliny says the Irish mothers feed their babes with swords instead of spoons.

While in Hibernia's fields the labouring swain
Shall pass the plough o'er skulls of warriors slain,
And turn up bones and broken spears,
Amazed, he'll show his fellows of the plain
The relics of victorious years,
And tell how swift thy arms that kingdom did regain.

Hughes, "House of Nassau."

Hic Ja'cets. Tombstones, so called from the first two words of their inscriptions: "Here Lies . . ."

By the cold Hic Jacets of the dead.
Tennyson, "Idylls of the King" (Vivien).

Hick'athrift (Tom or Jack). A poor labourer in the time of the Conquest, of such enormous strength that, armed with an axletree and cartwheel only, he killed a giant who dwelt in a marsh at Tylney, Norfolk. He was knighted and made governor of Thanet. He is sometimes called Hickafrie.

Hick'ory. Old Hickory. General Andrew Jackson. Parton says he was first called "tough," from his pedestrian powers; then "tough as hickory;" and, lastly, "old hickory."

Hidal'go. The title in Spain of the lower nobility. (According to bishop St. Vincent, the word is compounded of hijo del Goto, son of a Goth; but more probably it is hijo d'algo, son of somebody). In Portuguese it is "Fidalgo."

Hieroclean Legacy. The legacy of jokes. Hierocles, in the fifth Christian century, was the first person who hunted up and compiled jokes; after a life-long labour he mustered together as many as twenty-one, which he has left to the world as his legacy.

Higgledy-Piggledy. In great confusion; at sixes and sevens. A higgler is a pedlar whose stores are all huddled together. Higgledy means after the fashion of a higgler's basket. Piggledy is probably a mere expletive, as Handy-pandy, where Handy means "little-hand," but pandy is simply a jingle. Of course piggledy may be a playful corruption of pig-sty-like, and pandy may be a corruption of pando (to open), meaning expanded, but this I think is to scan the thing too far.

Highgate has its name from a gate set up there about 400 years ago, to receive tolls for the bishop of London, when the old miry road from Gray's Inn

Lane to Barnet was turned through the bishop's park. The village being in a high or elevated situation explains the first part of the name.

Sworn at Highgate. Grose says that a custom anciently prevailed at the public-houses in Highgate to administer a ludicrous oath to all travellers who stopped there. The party was sworn on a pair of horns fastened to a stick—

(1) Never to kiss the maid when he can kiss the mistress.

(2) Never to eat brown bread when he can get white.

(3) Never to drink small beer when he can get strong—unless he prefers it.

High Heels and Low Heels. The High and Low Church party. The names of two factions in Swift's tale of Lilliput ("Gulliver's Travels").

High Jinks. He is at his high jinks. Stilted in manner; on his high horse.

The frolicsome company had begun to practise the ancient and now forgotten pastime of High Jinks. The game was played in several different ways. Most frequently the dice were thrown by the company, and those upon whom the lot fell were obliged to assume and maintain for a time a certain fictitious character, or to repeat a certain number of facetious verses in a particular order. If they departed from the characters assigned . . . they incurred forfeits, which were compounded for by swallowing an additional bumper.—Sir W. Scott, "Guy Mannering," xxxvi.

High Places (Scripture). Places of illicit worship among the Jews, who, in common with other nations, selected elevated spots for their altars.

High Seas. All the sea which is not the property of a particular country. The sea three miles out belongs to the adjacent coast, and is called mare clausum. High seas, like High-ways, means for the public use. In both cases the word high means "chief," "principal," "high or elevated in rank or degree." High Steward, High-treason.

Highland Mary. A name immortalised by Burns, generally thought to be Mary Campbell, but more probably Mary Morison. In 1792 we have three songs to Mary: "Will ye go to the Indies, my Mary?" "Highland Mary" ("Ye banks and braes of Bonnie Doon"), and "To Mary in Heaven" ("Thou lingering star," &c.). These were all written some time after the consummation of his marriage with Jean Armour (1788), for the recollection of "one of the most interesting passages of his youthful days." Four months after he had sent to Mr. Thomson the song called "Highland Mary" he sent that entitled "Mary Morison," which he calls "one of his juvenile works." Thus all the four songs refer to some youthful passion, and three of them at least were sent in letters addressed to Mr. Thomson, so that little doubt can exist that the Mary of all the four is one and the same person, called by the author Mary Morison.

How blythely wad I bide the stoure,
A weary slave frae sun to sun,
Could I the rich reward secure—
The lovely Mary Morison.

Highlanders of At'tica. The operative class, who had their dwellings on the hills (Diacrii).

High'ness. The Viceroy of Egypt is styled "Your Highness."

The children of kings and queens, "Your Royal Highness."

The children of emperors, "Your Imperial Highness."

Till the reign of Henry VIII. the kings of England were styled "Your Highness," "Your Grace," "Your Excellent Grace," &c.

Hil'ary Term, in the Law courts, is from the 11th to the end of January, so called in honour of St. Hilary, whose day occurs on the 13th.

Hil'debrand (Meister). The Nestor of German romance, a magician as well as champion, like Maugis among the heroes of Charlemagne.

Hil'debrand. Pope Gregory VII. (1073-1085.)

A Hil'debrand. A violent, mischievous person. So called from pope Gregory VII., noted for subjugating the power of the German emperors; and specially detested by the early reformers for his ultra-pontifical views. (See above.)

Hil'debrod (Dick). President of the Alsatian club.—Sir W. Scott, "Fortunes of Nigel."

Hildur. Goddess of war, the Bello'na of Scandinavian mythology.

Hill-People or Hill-folk. A class of beings in Scandinavian tradition between the elves and the human race. They are supposed to dwell in caves and small hills, and are bent on receiving the benefits of man's redemption.

Hill Tribes. The barbarous tribes dwelling in remote parts of the Deccan or plateau of Central India.

Hil'pa. A Chinese antediluvian princess, one of the 150 daughters of Zilpah, of the race of Cohu (Cain). Her lover is Shallum (q.v.).—Spectator, vol. viii. 584-585.

Himiltrude (3 syl.). Wife of Charlemagne, who surpassed all other women in nobleness of mien.

Her neck was tinted with a delicate rose, like that of a Roman matron in former ages. Her locks were bound about her temples with gold and purple bands. Her dress was looped up with ruby clasps. Her coronet and her purple robes gave her an air of surpassing majesty.—"Croqueantaine," iii.

Himinsbiorg. A city fortified by Heimdall. It was situate under the extremity of the rainbow or bridge Bifrost, and commanded a view of 100 leagues in every direction.—Celtic mythology.

Hind. Emblematic of St. Giles, because "a heaven-directed hind went daily to give him milk in the desert, near the mouth of the Rhone." (See HART.)

The hind of Sertorius. Serto'rius was invited by the Lusit'anians to defend them against the Romans. He had a tame white hind, which he taught to follow him, and from which he pretended to receive the instructions of Dian'a. By this artifice, says Plutarch, he imposed on the superstition of the people.

He feigned a demon (in a hind concealed)
To him the counsels of the gods revealed.
Camæns, "Lusiad," i.

The milk-white hind, in Dryden's poem, "The Hind and the Panther," means the Roman Catholic Church, milk-white because "infallible." The panther, full of the spots of error, is the Church of England.

Without unspotted, innocent within.
She feared no danger, for she knew no sin.
Pt. I.

Hind and Panther. A satire by Dryden. The "noble buzzard" is bishop Burnet, who censured Dryden for the great immorality of his dramas.

Hin'da. Daughter of Al Hassan, the Arabian ameer of Persia. Her lover, Hafed, was a Gheber or Fire-worshipper, the sworn enemy of Al Hassan and all his race. Al Hassan sent her away for safety, but she was taken captive by Hafed's party, and when her lover (betrayed to Al Hassan) burnt himself to death in the sacred fire, Hinda cast herself headlong into the sea.—T. Moore, "The Fire-Worshippers."

Hinda. One of the idols of the Madianites.

Hin'der is to hold one behind; whereas pre-vent is to go before, and thus stop one's progress.

Hindustan'. Hind (Persic), Sind (Sanskrit), means "black," and u or oo is the common adjunct, about equal to our ey. Hence "Hindoo" or "Hindu" means blackey or negro. "Tan" means territory in all the A'ryan family of languages, and therefore "Hindus-tan" means Negroes-territory.

Tan appears in Koordistan, Afganistan, Mauritania, Farsistan, &c., country of the Koords, the Afgans, the Maurs or Moors, Fars, &c. Kohistan (high-country), Kafiristan (infidel country), &c.

Hindustan Regiment. The 76th. So called because it first distinguished itself in Hindustan. It is also called the Seven and Sixpennies, from its number.

Hinzelmann. The most famous house-spirit or kobold of German legend. He lived four years in the old castle of Hudemühlen, where he had a room set apart for him; at the end of the fourth year (1588) he went away of his own accord, and never again returned.

Hip! Hip! Hurrah! Hip is said to be a notarica, composed of the initial letters of Hierosolyma Est Per'dita. Henri van Laun says, in Notes and Queries, that whenever the German knights headed a Jew-hunt, in the middle ages, they ran shouting "Hip! Hip!" as much as to say "Jerusalem is destroyed." (See NOTARICA.)

Timbs derives Hurrah from the Sclavonic ku-raj (to Paradise), so that Hip! hip! hurrah! would mean "Jerusalem is lost to the infidel, and we are on the road to Paradise." These etymons may be taken for what they are worth.

"Now, infidel, I have thee on the hip" ("Merchant of Venice"); and again, "I'll have our Michael Cassio on the hip" ("Othello"), to have the whip hand of one. The term is derived from wrestlers, who seize the adversary by the hip and throw him.

In fine he doth apply one speciall drift,
Which was to set the pagan on the hip,
And having caught him right, he doth him lift
By nimble sleight, and in such wise doth trip,
That down he threw him. Sir J. Harrington.

Hipper-Switches. Coarse willow withs. A hipper is a coarse osier used in basket-making, and an osier field is a hipper-holm.

Hippo. Bishop of Hippo. A title by which St. Augustine is designated. (354-430.)

Hippocampus, pl. HIPPOCAMPES (4 syl.). A sea-horse, having the head and fore-quarters of a horse, with the tail and hind-quarters of a fish or dolphin.

Hippocras. A cordial made of Lisbon and Canary wines, bruised spices, and sugar; so called from the strainer through which it is passed, called by apothecaries Hippocratēs' sleeve. Hippocratēs in the middle ages was called "Yppocras" or "Hippocras." Thus Chaucer:

Well knew he the old Esculapine,
And Deiscordes, and eek Rufus,
Old Yppocras, Italy, and Galien.
"Canterbury Tales" (Prologue, 431).

Hippocratēan School. A school of medicine, so called from Hippocrates. (See DOGMATIC.)

Hippocratēs' Sleeve. A woollen bag of a square piece of flannel, having the opposite corners joined, so as to make it triangular. Used by chemists for straining syrups, &c., and for decoctions.

Hippocrene (3 syl.). The fountain of the Muses, produced by a stroke of the hoof of Peg'asos (Greek, horse-fountain).

Hippogryph or Hippogrif. The winged horse, whose father was a griffin and mother a filly (Greek, hippos, a horse, and gryphos, a griffin). A symbol of love.—"Orlando Furioso," iv. 18, 19.

So saying, he caught him up, and without wing
Of hippogrif, bore through the air subtime,
Over the wilderness and o'er the plain.
Milton, "Paradise Regained," iv.

(See SIMURGH.)

Hippolyta. Queen of the Am'azons, and daughter of Mars. Shakespeare has introduced the character in his "Midsummer Night's Dream," where he betroths her to Theseus, duke of Athens. In classic fable it is her sister An'tiopë who married Theseus, although some writers justify Shakespeare's account. Hippolyta was famous for a girdle given her by her father, and it was one of the twelve labours of Hercules to possess himself of this prize.

Hippolytus. Son of Theseus, king of Athens. He was dragged to death by wild horses, and restored to life by Esculap'ios.

(1) Hippolytus, the cardinal to whom Ariosto dedicated his "Orlando Furioso."

(2) Hippolytus, son of Alfonso, duke of Ferrara; a cardinal also.

(3) Hippolytus, of the family of Medicis; a cardinal; killed by poison.

Hippom'enes (4 syl.). A Grecian prince, who ran a race with Atalanta for her hand in marriage. He had three golden apples, which he dropped one by one, and which the lady stopped to pick up. By this delay she lost the race.

Hippopodes (3 syl.). A Scandinavian tribe far north, who had horses' feet.—Plung.

Hir'en. A sword, a swaggerer, a fighting man. It is the Greek Ire'nē, goddess of peace, called by the Romans Pax.

"Have we got Hir'en here? We'll have no swaggering youngsters."—Sir W. Scott, "The Antiquary."

Hiren. A strumpet. She is the fair Greek in Peele's drama called "The Turkish Spy." (See "2 Hen. IV.," ii. 4.)

Hispania. Spain. So called from the Punic word Span (a rabbit), on account of the vast number of rabbits which the Carthaginians found in the peninsula. Others derive it from the Basque Espana (a border).

History. Our oldest historian is the Venerable Bede, who wrote in Latin an "Ecclesiastical History" of very great merit (672-735). Of secular historians, William of Poitiers, who wrote in Latin "The Gestes or Deeds of William, Duke of Normandy and King of the English" (1020-1088). His contemporary was Ingulphus, who wrote a history of Croyland Abbey (1030-1109). The oldest prose work in Early English is Sir John Mandeville's account of his Eastern travels in 1356.

The father of History. Herod'otos, the Greek historian. (B.C. 484-408.) So called by Cicero.

Father of French History. André Duchesne. (1584-1640.)

Father of Historic Painting. Polyg'notos of Thäus. (Flourished B.C. 463-435.)

History of Croyland Abbey, by Ingulphus, and its continuation to 1118 by Peter of Blois, proved to be literary impositions by Sir Francis Palgrave in the Quarterly Review, vol. xxxiv., No. 67.

Histrionic is from the Etruscan word hister (a dancer), histriones (ballet-dancer). Hence histrion in Latin means a stage-player, and our word histrionic, pertaining to the drama.

Hit. A great hit. A piece of good luck. From the game hit and miss, or the game of back-gammon, where "three hits equal a gammon."

Hitch. There is some hitch. Some impediment. A horse is said to have a hitch in his gait when it is lame. (Welsh, hecian, to halt or limp.)

Hoang. The ancient title of the Chinese kings, meaning "sovereign lord." (See KING.)

Hoax. Welsh, haced, a trick or juggle; Saxon, hucx, derision. (See CANARD.)

Hob of a stove is the Anglo-Saxon hope (the ledge of a hill), a word which enters into a number of proper names, as Hopton (the town placed at the ledge of the hill).

Hob and Nob together. To drink as cronies, to clink glasses, to drink tête-à-tête. In the old English houses there was a hob at each corner of the hearth for heating the beer, or holding what one wished to keep hot. This was from the Saxon habban (to hold). The little round table set at the elbow was called a nob; hence to hob-nob was to drink snugly and cosily in the chimney corner, with the beer hobbled, and a little nob-table set in the snugery. (See HOB NOB.)

Hobal. An idol in the Caa'ba, before the time of Mahomet; supposed to have the power of giving rain.

Hob'bema.

The Scotch Hobbema. P. Nasmyth, a Scotch landscape painter. (Born 1831.)

The English Hobbema. John Crombe, the elder (of Norwich), whose last words were "O Hobbema, Hobbema, how I do love thee!"

Hob'bididance (4 syl.). The prince of dumbness, and one of the five fiends that possessed "poor Tom."—Shakespeare, "King Lear," iv. 1.

Hobbinol. The shepherd (Gabriel

Harvey, the poet, 1545-1630) who relates a song in praise of Eliza, queen of shepherds (queen Elizabeth).—Spenser, "Shepherds' Calendar."

Hobbler or Clopinel. Jean de Meung, the poet, who wrote the sequel to the "Romance of the Rose." (1260-1320.)

Tyrtæus, the Greek elegiac poet, was called Hobbler because he introduced the alternate pentameter verse, which is one foot short of the old heroic metre.

Hobby or Hobby-horse. A favourite pursuit. The hobby is a falcon trained to fly at pigeons and partridges. As hawks were universal pets in the days of falconry, and hawking the favourite pursuit, it is quite evident how the word hobby got its present meaning. Hobby-horse is a corruption of Hobby-hause (hawk-tossing), or throwing off the hawk from the wrist. Hobby is applied to a little pet riding-horse by the same natural transposition, as a mews for hawks is now a place for horses.

Hobby-horse. A child's plaything, so called from the hobby-horse of the ancient morris-dance; a light frame of wicker-work, in which some one was placed, who performed ridiculous gambols. (See above.)

The hobby-horse doth hither prance,
Maid Marrian and the Morris dance.
(1221.)

Hob'edy-hoy. Between a man and a boy. Spanish, hombre de hoja (a man of lath), a man beaten out thin. Hoja is anything very thin, as gold leaf, a sword-blade, sheet iron, &c. Tusser says the third age of seven years is to be kept "under Sir Hobbard de Hoy." I fancy hobedy is connected with hob, a clownish lout, a word which appears in hob-nail, hobgoblin; if so, the word may be the diminutive adjective hobeden joined to the Welsh hoiden (a tom-boy, male or female), Hobeden hoiden contracted into hobedy-hoy, a clownish tom-boy.

Hobgoblin. Puck or Robin Goodfellow. Keightley thinks it a corruption of Rob-Goblin, i.e., the goblin Robin, just as Hodge is the nickname of Roger; but I fancy the first syllable is a contraction of Hobby, a pet wee thing, and that Robin Goodfellow is termed the "little pet goblin."

Those that Hobgoblin call you, and sweet Puck,
You do their work, and they shall have good luck.
Shakespeare, "Midsummer Night's Dream," ii. 1.

Hob-hole. North Riding of Yorkshire, where the giant Hob used to live. The fishermen still regard it with superstitious terror. The Syrians worshipped Hobal under the form of a huge red stone.

Hob'inol. (See HOBBINOL.)

Hoblers or Hovellers. Men who keep a light nag that they may give instant information of threatened invasion, or ugly customers at sea. (Old French hober, to move up and down; our hobby, q. v.)

Sentinels who kept watch at beacons in the Isle of Wight, and ran to the governor when they had any intelligence to communicate, were called noblers.—MS. Lansd. (1633)

Hob-nail. When the London sheriff is sworn in, the tenants of a manor in Shropshire are directed to come forth and do service, whereupon the senior alderman below the chair steps forward and chops a stick, in token that the tenants of this county supplied their feudal lord with fuel.

The owners of a forge in St. Clements are then called forth to do suit and service, when an officer of the court produces six horse-shoes and sixty-one hob-nails, which he used to count before the cursitor baron till that office was abolished in 1857.

Hob Nob. A corruption of hab nab, meaning "have or not," hence hit or miss, at random; and, secondarily, give or take, whence also an open defiance. A similar construction to willy nilly. (Saxon, habban, to have; n'habban, not to have.)

The citizens in their rage shot habbe or nabbe (hit or miss), at random—Holinshed, "History of Ireland."

He writes of the weather hab nab (at random), and as the toy (fancy) takes him, chequers the year with foul and fair.—"Quia Astrologer." (1673.)

He is a devil in private brawls . . . hob nob is his word, give 't or take 't.—Shakespeare, "Twelfth Night," iii. 4.

Not of Jack Straw, with his rebellious crew.
That set king, realm, and laws, at hab or nab (defiance). Sir J. Harrington, "Epigram," iv.

Hob'omokko. An evil spirit among the North American Indians.

Hobson's Choice. This or none. Tobias Hobson was a carrier and inn-keeper at Cambridge, who erected the handsome conduit there, and settled "seven lays" of pasture ground towards its maintenance. "He kept a stable of forty good cattle, always ready and fit for travelling; but when a man came for a horse he was led into the stable, where there was great choice, but was obliged to take the horse which stood nearest to the stable-door; so that every customer was alike well served, according to his chance, and every horse ridden with the same justice."—Spectator, No. 509.

Milton wrote two quibbling epitaphs upon this eccentric character.

Why is the greatest of free communities reduced to Hobson's choice?—The Times.

Hock. So called from Hockheim, on the Maine, where the best is supposed to be made. It used to be called hockamore (3 syl.).

As unfit to bottle as old hockamore.—Mortimer.

Hock Cart. The high cart, the last cart-load of harvest.

Hock-Day, Hock-Tide, or Hock-Tuesday. The day when the English surprised and slew the Danes, who had annoyed them for 255 years. This Tuesday was long held as a festival in England, and landlords received an annual tribute called Hock-money, for allowing their tenants and serfs to commemorate Hock-day, which was the second Tuesday after Easter-day.

Hock'ey. A game in which each player has a hooked stick or bandy with which to strike the ball. Hockey is simply the diminutive of hook.

Hockley-i'-the-Hole. Public gardens near Clerkenwell Green, famous for bear and bull-baiting, dog and cock-fights, &c. The earliest record of this garden is a little subsequent to the Restoration.

Ho'cus Po'cus. The words uttered by a conjuror when he performs a trick, to cheat or take surreptitiously. Tillotson affirms it to be a perversion of the words Hoc est Corpus said by the priest when he consecrates the elements in the Eucharist, but there seems no sufficient reason for this assertion. The Welsh hocoed pwca (a devil's trick, our hoax) seems a more probable etymology (Danish pokker, a hobgoblin). Probably hoax-poking is not far from the mark. We still speak of "poking fun."

Höd'eken (3 syl.) means Little-hat, a German goblin or domestic fairy, so called because he always wore a little felt hat over his face.

Hodge (1 syl.). The "Goodman" of Gammer Gurton, in the old play called "Gammer Gurton's Needle."

Hodge-podge (2 syl.). A medley. A corruption of Hotch-pot, i.e., various fragments mixed together in the "pot-au-feu." (See HOTCH-POT.)

Hö'dur or Höder. God of Darkness, the blind god who killed Balder, at the instigation of Loki, with an arrow made of mistletoe. Höder typifies night, as Baldertypifies day.—Scandinavian mythology.

And Balder's pile, of the glowing sun
A symbol true, blazed forth;
But soon it's splendour sinketh down
When Höder rules the earth.
Fritiof-saga, "Balder's Bale-Fire."

Hog. A hog in armour. A person of awkward manners dressed so fine that he cannot move easily. A corruption of "A hodge in armour," a rustic in the armour of a knight.

To go the whole hog. An American expression, meaning unmixed democratical principles. It is used in England to signify a "thorough goer" of any kind. In Virginia the dealer asks the retail butcher if "he means to go the whole hog, or to take only certain joints," and he regulates his price accordingly.—"Men and Manners of America."

Another explanation is this: A hog is an Irish expression for "a shilling," as a tester is for "sixpence." To go the whole hog means to spend the whole shilling.

N.B. in England a hog is a five-shilling piece.

¶ Johnian Hogs. A Cambridge cant term for the students of St. John's College, the velvet bars on the sleeve of their gowns being called crackle, in allusion to the scored rind of roast pork. The bridge which connects the grounds with one of the courts is termed "the Bridge of Grunts," in playful allusion to the Bridge of Sighs at Venice; it is also called the "Isthmus of Suez" (a pun upon suez), meaning the isthmus of swine.

To drive hogs. To snore, or make a noise like hogs driven to market.

Ho'garth. The Scottish Hogarth David Allan. (1744-1796.)

Ho'gen Mo'gen. Holland or the Netherlands, so called from Hoogē en Mogendē (high and mighty), the Dutch style of addressing the States-General.

But I have sent him for a token
To your Low-country Hogen-Mogen.
Butler, "Hudibras."

Hogg. (See under the word BREWER.)

Hogmanay', Hogmena', or Hagmen'a. Holy month. December is so called because our Lord was born on the 25th thereof. (Saxon, halig monath, holy month.)

New Year's eve is called hogmanay'-night or hogg-night, and it is still customary in parts of Scotland for persons to go from door to door on that night asking in rude rhymes for cakes or money.

King Haco, of Norway, fixed the feast of Yule on Christmas Day, the eve of which used to be called hogg-night, but the Scotch were taught by the French to transfer the feast of Yule to the feast of Noel, and hogg-night has ever since been the last of December.

Hoist. Hoist with his own petard, Beaten with his own weapon, caught in his own trap. The petard was a sort of box made of wood or iron, filled with gunpowder, and fastened to a plank. When the powder was lighted the plank was driven against a gate (like a ram) to force it open. "Hoist" means hoisted or lifted up—i.e., blown up.

Let it work;
For 'tis the sport to have the engineer
Hoist with his own petard; and it shall go hard
But I will delve one yard below their mines,
And blow them at the moon.

Shakespeare, "Hamlet," iii. 4.

Hoity-toity. An exclamation implying "You are on your high horse, I see, but that will not do for me." The most probable derivation I know is this: What we call see-saw used to be called Hoity Toity. Hoity being connected with hoit (to leap up), our high, height; and Toity being Tother hoit—i.e., first one side hoits, then the other side. I do not think it comes from the French hoite comme toite (high as the roof).

Hoky or Hockey Cake. Harvest cake. The cake given out to the harvesters when the Hock cart reached home. (See HOCK CART.)

Holborn is not a corruption of Old Bourne, as Stow asserts; but of Holeburne, the burne or stream in the hole or hollow. It is spelt Holeburne in "Domesday Book," i. 127a, and in documents temp. Richard I. connected with the nunnery of St. Mary, Clerkenwell, it is eight times spelt in the same way.—The Times (J. G. Waller).

He rode backwards up Holborn Hill. He went to be hanged. The way to Tyburn from Newgate was up Holborn Hill, and criminals in ancient times rode backwards to the place of execution.

Hold of a ship is between the lowest deck and the keel. In merchant-vessels it holds the main part of the cargo. In men-of-war it holds the provisions, water for drinking, &c., stores, and berths. The after hold is aft the main-mast; the fore hold is before the mast; and the main hold is contiguous to the main mast.

He is not fit to hold the candle to him. He is very inferior. The allusion is to link-boys who held candles in theatres and other places of night amusement. The French say Le jeu ne vaut pas la chandelle, referring to the same custom.

Others say that Mr. Handel
To Bonocini can't hold a candle.

Swift.

To hold one in hand. To amuse in order to get some advantage. The allusion is to horses held in hand or under command of the driver.

To cry hold. Stop. The allusion is to the old military tournaments; when the umpires wished to stop the contest, they cried out "Hold."

Lay on, Macduff;
And damn'd be him that first cries "Hold, enough!"
Shakespeare, "Macbeth," v. 5.

Hold-fast. Brag is a good dog, but Holdfast is a better. Promises are all very good, but acts are far better.

Holdfast is the only dog, my duck.
Shakespeare, "Henry V.," ii. 3.

Hole. Pick a hole in his coat. To find out some cause of blame. The allusion is to the Roman custom of dressing criminals in an old ragged gown (Liv. ii. 61). Hence a holey coat is a synonym for guilt.

Holopher'nes (4 syl.), called English Henry (in "Jerusalem Delivered"), one of the Christian knights in the first crusade, was slain by Dragutës.—Bk. ix.

Holland. The country of paradoxes. The "houses are built on the sand;" the sea is higher than the shore; the keels of the ships are above the chimney-tops of the houses; and the cow's tail does not "grow downward," but is tied up to a ring in the roof of the stable. Voltaire took leave of the land and people in these words, "Adieu! canaux, canards, canaille." And Butler calls it—

A land that rides at anchor, and is moored,
In which they do not live, but go aboard.
"Description of Holland,"

Holland. A particular kind of cloth, so called because it used to be sent to Hollan^d to be bleached. Lawn is cloth bleached on a lawn; and grass-lawn is lawn bleached on a grass-plat. Bleaching is now performed by artificial processes.

Hollow. I beat him hollow. A corruption of "I beat him wholly."

Holly used to be employed by the early Christians at Rome to decorate churches and dwellings at Christmas; it had been previously used in the great festival of the Saturnalia, which occurred at the same season of the year. The pagan Romans used to send to their friends holly-sprigs, during the Saturnalia, with wishes for their health and well-being. According to tradition it is the bush in which Jehovah appeared to Moses.

Hollyhock is the Greek tholos-alk'ea, the towering marsh-mallow. It is a mistake to derive it from Holy-oak.

Holman (Lieutenant James). The blind traveller. (1787-1857.)

Holopher'nes (4 syl.). Master Tubal Holopher'nës. The great sophister-doctor, who, in the course of five years and three months, taught Gargantua to say his A B C backward.—Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel," bk. i. 14.

Holofernës, in "Love's Labour's Lost." Shakespeare satirises in this character the pedantry and literary affectations of the Lyly school.

Holy Alliance. A league formed by Russia, Austria, and Prussia to regulate the affairs of Europe "by the principles of Christian charity," meaning that each of the contracting parties was to keep all that the league assigned them. (1816.)

Holy City. That city which the religious consider most especially connected with their religious faith, thus:

All'ahabad' is the Holy City of the Indian Mahometans.

Bena'rës of the Hindus.

Cuzco of the ancient Incas.

Jerusalem of the Jews and Christians.

Mecca and Medi'na of the Mahometans.

Moscow is so called by the Russians.

Holy Coat of Treves, said to be the seamless coat of our Saviour, deposited at Treves by the empress Hele'na, who discovered it in the fourth century.

Holy Family. The infant Saviour and his attendants, as Joseph, Mary, Elizabeth, Anna, and John the Baptist. All the five figures are not always introduced in pictures of the "Holy Family."

Holy Land.

(1) Christians call Palestine the Holy Land, because it was the site of Christ's birth, ministry, and death.

(2) Mahometans call Mecca the Holy Land, because Mahomet was born there.

(3) The Chinese Buddhists call India the Holy Land, because it was the native land of Sakya-muni, the Buddha (q.v.).

(4) The Greek considered Elis as Holy Land, from the temple of Olympian Zeus, and the sacred festival held there every four years.

(5) In America each of the strange politico-religious sects calls its own settlement the Holy Land, or something implying pretty much the same thing.

Holy League. A combination formed by pope Julius II. with Louis XII. of France, Maximilian of Germany, Ferdinand III. of Spain, and various Italian princes, against the republic of Venice in 1508.

There was another league so called in the reign of Henri III. of France, in 1576, under the auspices of Henri de Guise, "for the defence of the Holy Catholic Church against the encroachments of the reformers." The pope gave it his sanction, but its true strength lay in Felipe II. of Spain.

Holy Maid of Kent. Elizabeth Barton, who incited the Roman Catholics to resist the progress of the Reformation, and pretended to act under direct inspiration. She was hanged at Tyburn in 1534.

Holy Orders. The minorum ordinum or first four in the Roman Catholic Church, are Ostia'rius, Lector, Exorcista, and Acoly'tus.

Holy Places. Places in which the chief events of our Saviour's life occurred, such as the Sepulchre, Gethsemane, the Supper-room, the Church of the Ascension, the tomb of the Virgin, and so on.

Holy Thursday. The day of our Lord's ascension.

Holy Water. Water blessed by a priest or bishop for holy uses.

The devil hates holy water. Johannes

Beli'thus says that holy water is "very unpopular with the demons," and is used in sepulchral rites "to keep them away from the corpse."

"I love him as the devil loves holy water."

Holy Water Sprinkle. A military club set with spikes. So called jocularly because it makes the blood to flow as water sprinkled by an aspergillum.

Holywell Street (London). Fitzstephens, in his description of London, in the reign of Henry II., speaks of "the excellent springs at a small distance from the city," whose waters are most sweet, salubrious, and clear, and whose runnels murmur over the shining stones. "Among these are Holywell, Clerkenwell, and St. Clement's well."

Home (1 syl.). Who goes home? When the House of Commons breaks up at night the door-keeper asks this question of the members. In bygone days all members going in the direction of the Speaker's residence went in a body to see him safe home. The question is still asked, but is a mere relic of antiquity.

Homer.

The Celtic Homer. Ossian, son of Fingal, king of Morven.

Homer of the Franks. Charlemagne, called Angilbert his Homer. (Died 814.)

Homer of Ferra'ra ("Omero Ferraresè"). Ariosto is so called by Tasso. (1474-1533.)

The Scottish Homer. William Wilkie, author of "The Epigoniad." (1721-1772.)

On Gray's monument in Westminster Abbey, Milton is called the British Homer.

No more the Grecian muse unrivalled reigns,
To Br tain let the nations homage pay:
She felt a Homer's fire in Milton's strains,
A Pindar's rapture in the lyre of Gray.

The prose Homer of human nature. So Byron called Henry Fielding, the novelist. (1707-1754.)

Good Homer sometimes nods. We are all apt to make mistakes sometimes. The phrase is from Horace, "Ars Poetica."

Quando quæ bonus dormitat Homerus. (359.)

The Casket Homer. An edition corrected by Aristotle, which Alexander the Great always carried about with him, and laid under his pillow at night with his sword. After the battle of Arbela, a golden casket richly studded with gems was found in the tent of Darius; and Alexander being asked to what purpose it should be assigned, replied, "There is but one thing in the world worthy of so costly a depository;" saying which he placed therein his edition of Homer.

Homer'ic Verse. Hexameter verse, so called because Homer adopted it in his two great epics.

Homœop'athy (5 syl.). The plan of curing a disease by very minute doses of a medicine which would in healthy persons produce the very same disease. The principle of vaccination is a sort of homœopathy, only it is producing in a healthy person a mitigated form of the disease guarded against. You impart a mild form of small-pox to prevent the patient from taking the virulent disease. (Greek, homoiois pathos, like disease.) (See HAH-NEMANN.)

Tut, man! one fire burns out another's burning;
One pain is lessened by another's anguish . . .
Take thou some new infection to the eye,
And the rank poison of the old will die.

Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet," l. 2.

Hon'est (h silent). Honest Jack Ban- nister. An actor in London for thirty-six years. (1760-1836.)

After his retirement he was once accosted by Sir George Ross, when Honest Jack, being on the opposite side of the street, cried out, "Stop a moment, Sir George, and I will come over to you." "No, no," replied his friend, "I never yet made you cross and will not begin now."—Grin-dee, "Relics of Genius."

Honeycomb. The hexagonal shape of the bees' cells is generally ascribed to the instinctive skill of the bee, but is simply the ordinary result of mechanical laws. Solitary bees always make circular cells; and without doubt those of hive bees are made cylindrical, but acquire their hexagonal form by mechanical pressure. Dr. Wollaston says all cylinders made of soft pliable materials become hexagonal under such circumstances. The cells of trees are circular towards the extremity, but hexagonal in the centre of the substance; and the cellular membranes of all vegetables are hexagonal also. (See ANT.)

Honeycomb Will. A fine gentleman. One of the members of the imaginary club from which the Spectator issued.

Honey-dew. A sweet substance found on lime-trees and some other plants. Bees and ants are fond of it. It is a curious misnomer, as it is the excretion of the aphid or vine-fretter. The way it is excreted is this: the ant beats with its antennæ the abdomen of the aphid, which lifts up the part beaten, and excretes a limpid drop of sweet juice called honey-dew.

Honey Madness. There is a rhododendron about Trebizond, the flowers of which the bees are fond of, but if any one eats the honey he becomes mad.—Tourneford.

Honey-moon. The month after marriage, or so much of it as is spent away from home; so called from the practice of the ancient Tentons of drinking honey-wine (hydromel) for thirty days after marriage. Attila, the Hun, indulged so freely in hydromel at his wedding-feast that he died.

Honey Soap contains no portion of honey. Some is made from the finest yellow soap, and some is a mixture of palm-oil soap, olive-soap, and curd-soap. It is scented with oil of verbena, rose-geranium, ginger-grass, bergamot, &c.

Honeywood. A yea-nay type, illustrative of what Dr. Young says: "What is mere good nature but a fool?"—Goldsmith, "The Good-natured Man."

Hong Merchants. Those merchants who were alone permitted by the government of China to trade with China, till the restriction was abolished in 1842. The Chinese applied the word hong to the foreign factories situated at Canton.

Hon'i. Honi soit qui mal y pense (Evil be [to him] who thinks evil of this). The tradition is that Edward III. gave a grand court ball, and one of the ladies present was the beautiful countess of Salisbury, whose garter of blue ribbon accidentally fell off. The king saw a significant smile among the guests, and gallantly came to the rescue. "Honi soit qui mal y pense" (Shame to him who thinks shame of this accident), cried the monarch. Then, binding the ribbon round his own knee, he added, "I will bring it about that the proudest noble in the land shall think it an honour to wear this band." The incident determined him to abandon his plan of forming an order of the Round Table, and be formed instead the order of the "Garter."—Tighe and Davis, "Annals of Windsor."

Honour (h silent). A superior seignior, on which other lordships or manors depend by the performance of customary service.

An affair of honour. A dispute to be settled by a duel. Duels were generally provoked by offences against the arbitrary rules of etiquette, courtesy, or feeling, called the "laws of honour," and as these offences were not recognisable in the law courts, they were settled by private combat.

Debts of honour. Debts contracted by betting, gambling, or verbal promise. As these debts cannot be enforced by law, but depend solely on good faith, they are called debts of honour.

Laws of honour. Certain arbitrary rules which the fashionable world tacitly admits; they wholly regard deportment, and have nothing to do with moral offences. Breaches of this code are punished by duels, expulsion from society, or suspension called "sending to Coventry" (q.v.).

Point of honour. An obligation which is binding because its violation would offend some conscientious scruple or notion of self-respect.

Word of honour. A gage which cannot be violated without placing the breaker of it beyond the pale of respectability and good society.

Honours (h silent). Crushed by his honours. The allusion is to the Sabine damsel who agreed to open the gates of Rome to king T'atius, provided his soldiers would give her the ornaments which they wore on their arms. As they entered they threw their shields on her and crushed her, saying as they did so, "These are the ornaments worn by Sabines on their arms." Roman story says the maid was named Tarpe'ia, and that she was the daughter of Tarpeius, the governor of the citadel.

Draco, the Athenian legislator, was crushed to death in the theatre of Æg'ina, by the number of caps and cloaks showered on him by the audience, as a mark of their high appreciation of his merits.

Elagabalus, the Roman emperor, invited the leading men of Rome to a banquet, and under the pretence of showing them honour rained roses upon them; but the shower continued till they were all buried and smothered by the flowers.

Two or four by honours. A term in whist. If two "partners" hold three court cards, they score two points; if they hold four court cards, they score four points. These are honour points, or points not won by the merit of play, but by courtesy and laws of honour. The phrases are, "I score or claim two points by right of honours," and "I score or claim four points by right of four court or honour cards."

Honours of war. The privilege allowed to an honoured enemy, on capitulation, of being permitted to retain their offensive arms. This is the highest honour a victor can pay a vanquished foe. Sometimes the soldiers so honoured are required to pile arms, in other cases they are allowed to march with all their arms, drums beating, and colours flying.

Hood (Robin). Introduced by Sir W. Scott in "The Talisman."

'Tis not the hood that makes the monk (Cucullus non facit monachum). We must not be deceived by appearances, or take for granted that things and persons are what they seem to be.

They should be good men; their affairs are righteous;
But all hoods make not monks.

Shakespeare, "Henry VIII.," iii. 1.

Hook. With a hook at the end. You suppose I assent, but my assent is not likely to be given. The subject has a hook or note of interrogation to denote that it is dubious(?).

He is off the hooks. Done for, laid on the shelf, superseded, dead. The bent pieces of iron on which the hinges of a gate rest and turn are called hooks; if a gate is off the hooks it is in a bad way, and cannot readily be opened and shut.

To drop off the hooks. To die. In allusion to the ancient practice of suspending the quarters of felons on hooks till they dropped off.

Hook or Crook. Somehow; in one way or another; by foul means or by just measures. Many suggestions have been ventured in explanation of this phrase, but none are satisfactory. I am inclined to think it means "foully, like a thief, or holily, like a bishop," the hook being the instrument used by footpads, and the "crook" being the bishop's crosier

"for catching men." The French phrase is "A droit ou à tort." (See below.)

Their work was by hook or crook to rap and bring all under the emperor's power.—Thomas Rymer, "On Parliaments."

Hook and crook. Formerly the poor of a manor were allowed to go into the forests with a hook and crook to get wood. What they could not reach they might pull down with their crook. This sort of living was very precarious, but eagerly sought. Boundary stones, beyond which the "hook and crook folk" might not pass, exist still. This custom does not satisfy our use of the preceding phrase, which does not mean "in a precarious manner," but at all hazards, ill or well.

Dynmure Wood was ever open and common to the . . . inhabitants of Bodmin . . . to bear away upon their backs a burden of lop, crop, hook, crook, and bag wood.—Bodmin Register. (1525.)

Hookey Walker. (See WALKER.)

Hooped Pots. Drinking pots at one time were made with hoops, that when two or more drank from the same tankard no one of them should take more than his share. Jack Cade promises his followers that "seven half-penny loaves shall be sold for a penny; the three-hooped pot shall have ten hoops; and I will make it felony to drink small beer."—Shakespeare, "Henry VI.," iv. 2.

Hoopoo. A bird revered by all the ancient Egyptians, and placed on the sceptre of Horus, to symbolise joy and filial affection.

Hop. One of queen Mab's maids of honour.—Drayton.

To hop the twig. To run away from one's creditors, as a bird eludes a fowler, "hopping from spray to spray."

Hop-o'-my-Thumb. A very little fellow, sometimes confounded with Tom Thumb.

You Stump o'-the-gutter, you Hop-o'-my-thumb,
Your husband must from Lilliput come.
Kame O'Hara, "Midas."

Hope. Before Alexander set out for Asia he divided his kingdom among his friends. "My lord," said Perdicas, "what have you left for yourself?" "Hope," replied Alexander. Whereupon Perdicas rejoined, "If hope is enough for Perdicas," and declined to accept any bounty from the king.

The Bard of Hope or The Author of the Pleasures of Hope. Thomas Campbell. (1777-1844.) The entire profits on this poem were £900.

Hopeful. The companion of Christian after the death of Faithful.—Bunyan, "Pilgrim's Progress."

Hope-on-High Bomby. A puritanical character drawn by Beaumont and Fletcher.

"Well," said Wildrake, "I think I can make a 'Hope-on-High Bomby' as well as thou canst."—Sir W. Scott, "Woodstock," c. vii.

Hopkins (Matthew). of Manningtree, Essex, the witch-finder of the associated counties of Essex, Suffolk, Norfolk, and Huntingdonshire. In one year he hanged sixty reputed witches in Essex alone. Dr. Z. Grey says that between three and four thousand persons suffered death for witchcraft between 1643 and 1661.

Nicholas Hopkins. A Chartreux friar, confessor of the duke of Buckingham, who prophesied "that neither the king (Henry VIII.) nor his heirs should prosper, but that the duke should govern England."—Shakespeare, "Henry VIII.," i. 2.

1 Gent. That devil-monk

Hopkins that made this mischief.

2 Gent. That was he

That fed him with his prophecies.

II. 1.

Hopkin'sians. Those who adopt the theological opinions of Dr. Samuel Hopkins, of Connecticut. These sectarians hold most of the Calvinistic doctrines, but entirely reject the doctrines of imputed sin and imputed righteousness. The speciality of the system is that true holiness consists in disinterested benevolence, and that all sin is selfishness.

Hopping Giles. A lame person. So called from St. Giles, the tutelar saint of cripples, who was himself lame.

HORACE. The Roman lyric poet.

The Horace of England. George, duke of Buckingham, preposterously declared Cowley to be the Pindar, Horace, and Virgil of England. (1618-1667.)

The French Horace. Jean Macrinus or Salmon. (1490-1557.)

The Horace of France or the French Burns. Pierre Jean de Beranger. (1780-1857.)

Spanish Horaces. The brothers Argensola, whose Christian names were Lupericio and Bartolome.

Hora'tio. Hamlet's intimate friend. —Shakespeare, "Hamlet, Prince of Denmark."

Horn ("Orlando Furioso"). Logistilla gave Astolpho at parting a horn that had the virtue to appall and put to flight the boldest knight or most savage beast. (Bk. viii.)

Horn. Drinking cups used to be made of the rhinoceros's horn, from an Oriental belief that "it sweats at the approach of poison." —Calmet, "Biblical Dictionary."

To put to the horn. To denounce as a rebel, or pronounce a person an outlaw, for not answering to a summons. In Scotland the messenger-at-arms goes to the cross of Edinburgh and gives three blasts with a horn before he heralds the judgment of outlawry.

King Horn. The hero of a French metrical romance, and the original of our "Horne Childe," generally called "The Geste of Kyng Horn." The nominal author of the French romance is Mestre Thomas. Dr. Percy ascribes the English romance of "King Horne" to the twelfth century, but this is probably a century too early. (See Ritson's "Ancient Romances.")

Horn of Fidelity. Morgan la Faye sent a horn to king Arthur, which had the following "virtue:" — "No lady could drink out of it who was not 'to her husband true;' all others who attempted to drink were sure to spill what it contained. This horn was carried to king Marke, and "his queene with a hundred ladies more" tried the experiment, but only four managed to drinke cleane." Arthur's queen was not among the number. Ariosto's enchanted cup possessed a similar spell.

Horn of Plenty (Cornu-co'pia). Emblem of plenty.

Cer'es is drawn with a ram's horn in her left arm, filled with fruits and flowers. Sometimes they are being poured on the earth from "the full horn," and sometimes they are held in it as in a basket. Diodorus (iii. 68) says the horn is one from the head of the goat by which Jupiter was suckled. He explains the fable thus: "In Libya," he says, "there is a strip of land shaped like a horn, bestowed by king Ammon on his bride Amalthæa, who nursed Jupiter with goat's milk.

When Amalthæa's horn
O'er hill and dale the rose-crown'd Flora pours,
And scatters corn and wine, and fruits and flowers.
Camoens, "Luclid," bk. ii.

Horn of Power. When Tam'ugin assumed the title of Ghengis Khan, he commanded that a white horn should be thenceforward the standard of his troops. So the great Mogul "lifted up his horn on high," and was exalted to great power.

My horn hath he exalted (1 Sam. ii. 10; Ps. lxxxix. 24, &c.). Mr. Buckingham says of a Tyrian lady, "She wore on her head a hollow silver horn, rearing itself upwards obliquely from the forehead. It was some four inches in diameter at the root, and pointed at its extremity. This peculiarity reminded me forcibly of the expression of the Psalmist, 'Lift not up your horn on high: speak not with a stiff neck. All the horns of the wicked also will I cut off; but the horns of the righteous shall be exalted' (Ps. lxxv. 5, 10)." Bruce found in Abyssinia the silver horns of warriors and distinguished men. In the reign of Henry V. the "horned head-gear" was introduced into England, and from the effigy of Beatrice, countess of Arundel, at Arundel Church, who is represented with two horns outspread to a great extent, we may infer that the length of the head-horn, like the length of the shoe-point in the reign of Henry VI., &c., marked the degree of rank. "To cut off" such horns would be to degrade, and to exalt or extend such horns would be to add honour and dignity to the wearer.

Horns of a dilemma. A difficulty of such a nature that whatever way you attack it you encounter an equal amount of disagreeables. Macbeth, after the murder of Duncan, was in a strait between two evils: If he allowed Banquo to live, he had reason to believe that Banquo would supplant him; if, on the other hand, he resolved to keep the crown for which "he had 'filed his hands," he must "step further in blood," and cut Banquo off.

Lemma is something that has been proved, and being so is assumed as an axiom. It is from the Greek word λαμβάνω (I assume or take for granted). Di-lemma is a double lemma, or two-edged sword which strikes either way. The horns of a dilemma is a figure of speech taken from a bull, which tosses with either of his horns.

"Teach me to plead," said a young rhetorician to a sophist, "and I will pay you when I gain a cause." The master sued for payment at once, and the scholar pleaded, "If I gain my cause you must pay me, and if I lose it I am not bound to pay you by the terms of our contract." The master pleaded, "If you gain you must pay me by the terms of the agreement, and if you lose the court will compel you to pay me."

The horns of Moses' face. This is a mere blunder. The Hebrew karan means "to shoot out beams of light," but has by mistake been translated in some versions "to wear horns." Thus the conventional statues of Moses represent him with horns. "Moses wist not that the skin of his face shone."—Exod. xxxiv. 29; compare 2 Cor. iii. 7—13: "The children of Israel could not steadfastly behold the face of Moses for the glory of his countenance."

To wear the horns. To be a cuckold. In the rutting season, the stags associate with the fawns; one stag selects several females who constitute his harem, till another stag comes who contests the prize with him. If beaten in the combat, he yields up his harem to the victor, and is without associates till he finds a stag feebler than himself, who is made to submit to similar terms. As stags are horned, and made cuckolds of by their fellows, the application is palpable. (See CORNETTE.)

Horn-Book. The Alphabet book, which was a thin board of oak about nine inches long and five or six wide, on which was printed the alphabet, the nine digits, and sometimes the Lord's Prayer. It had a handle, and was covered in front with a sheet of thin horn to prevent its being soiled, and the back-board was ornamented with a rude sketch of St. George and the Dragon. The board and its horn cover were held together by a narrow frame or border of brass.

These will I sing, in comely wainscot bound,
And golden verse inclosing thee around;
The faithful horn before, from age to age
Preserving thy invulnerable page;
Behind, thy patron saint in armour shines,
With sword and lance to guard the sacred lines...
Th' instructive handles at the bottom fixed,
Lest wrangling critics should pervert the text.

Tickell, "The Horn Book."

Their books of stature small they took in hand,
Which with pellucid horn secured are,
To save from finger wet the letters fair.

Shenstone, "Schoolmistress."

Horn-gate. One of the two gates of "Dreams;" the other is of ivory. Visions which issue from the former come true. This whim depends upon two Greek puns: the Greek for horn is keras, and the verb kraino or kranō means "to bring to an issue," "to fulfil;" so again elephas is ivory, and the verb elephairo means "to cheat," "to deceive." The verb kraino, however, is derived from kra, "the head," and means "to bring to a head;" and the verb elephairo is akin to elākus, "small."

Anchi'ses dismisses Æne'as through the ivory gate, on quitting the infernal regions, to indicate the unreality of his vision.

Sunt gemine somni portæ, quarum altera fertur
Cornua, qua veris facilis datur exitus umbris;
Alterâ, candenti perfecta nitens elephanto,
Sed falsa ad cœum mittunt insomnia Manes.

Virgîl, "Æneid," vi. 893, &c.

Horn Mad. Quite mad. Madness in cattle was supposed to arise from a distemper in the internal substance of their horns, and furious or mad cattle had their horns bound with straw.

"Why, mistress, sure my master is horn-mad."—Shakespeare, "Comedy of Errors," ii. 1.

Hornet's Nest. To poke your head into a hornet's nest. To get into trouble by meddling and making. The bear is very fond of honey, and often gets stung by poking its snout by mistake into a hornet's nest in search of its favourite dainty.

Hor'nie (2 syl.). Auld Hornie. The devil, so called in Scotland. The allusion is to the horns with which Satan is generally represented.

Horn'pipe (2 syl.). The dance is so called because it used to be danced in the west of England to the pib-corn or horn-pipe, an instrument consisting of a pipe with a horn at each end.

Hor'oscope (3 syl.). The scheme of the twelve houses by which astrologers tell your fortune. The word means the "hour-scrutinised," because it is the hour of birth only which is examined in these star-naps. (Hora-scope'o, Greek.)

Hors de Combat (French). Out of battle. Incapable of taking any further part in the fight.

Horse (1 syl.). The standard of the ancient Saxons was a white horse, which was preserved in the royal shield of the House of Hanover.

Ar'undel. The horse of Bevis, of Southampton. The word means "swift as a swallow." (French, hirondelle, "a swallow.") Arva'kur. One of the horses of the Sun. The word means "splendid."—Scandinavian mythology.

Bu'lios (Greek). One of the horses given by Neptune to Peleus. It afterwards belonged to Achilles. Like Xanthos, its sire was the West-wind, and its dam Swift-foot the harpy. The word means "swift."

Bavi'ca. The Cid's horse. He survived his master two years and a half, during which time no one was allowed to mount him, and when he died he was buried before the gate of the monastery at Valencia, and two elms were planted to mark the site. The word means "an ignorant creature."

Bayard. The horse of the four sons of Aymon, which grew larger or smaller as one or more of the four sons mounted it. According to tradition, one of the foot-prints may still be seen in the forest of Soignes, and another on a rock near Dinant. The word means "bright bay colour."

Bayar'do. Rinaldo's horse, of a bright bay colour, once the property of Am'adis of Gaul. It was found by Malagi'gi, the wizard, in a cave guarded by a dragon, which the wizard slew. According to tradition, it is still alive, but flees at the approach of man, so that no one can ever hope to catch him.—"Orlando Furioso." (See above.)

Be'vis. The horse of lord Mar'mion. The word is Norse, and means "swift."—Sir W. Scott.

Black Bess. The famous mare of Dick Turpin, which carried him from London to York.

Borak (Al). The horse which conveyed Mahomet from earth to the seventh heaven. It was milk-white, had the wings of an eagle, and a human face, with horse's cheeks. Every pace she took was equal to the furthest range of human sight. The word is Arabic for "the lightning."

Brigliado'rè (Bril - yar - do're). Sir Guyon's horse. The word means "golden-bridle."—Spenser, "Faëry Queen."

Brigliado'ro (Bril-yar-do-ro). Orlando's famous charger, second only to Bayardo in swiftness and wonderful powers. The word means "golden-bridle."—"Orlando Furioso," &c.

Bronzomartè (4 syl.). The horse of Sir Launcelot Greaves. The word means "a mettlesome sorrel."

Buceph'alos (Greek). The celebrated charger of Alexander the Great. Alexander was the only person who could mount him, and he always knelt down to take up his master. He was thirty years old at death, and Alexander built a city for his mausoleum, which he called Buceph'ala. The word means "ox-head."

Ce'ler. The horse of the Roman emperor Ve'rus. It was fed on almonds and raisins, covered with royal purple, and stalled in the imperial palace. At death a mausoleum in the Vatican was raised to its honour. (Latin for "swift.")

Comrade. Fortunio's fairy horse.

Cyl'luros (Greek). Castor's horse. Virgil calls him the horse of Pollux. So called from Cylla in Troas. (See Har-pagos.)

Dapple. Sancho Panza's ass. So called from its colour.

Di'nos (Greek). Diomed's horse. The word means "the marvel." (See Lampon.)

Dhaldul. Ali's famous horse.

Ethon (Greek). One of the horses of Hector. The word means "fiery." (See Galathea, Podarge.)

Ferrant d'Espagne. The horse of Oliver. The word means "the Spanish traveller."

Fiddle-back. Oliver Goldsmith's unfortunate pony.

Frontaletto. Scarapant's charger. The word means "little head."—"Orlando Furioso."

Front'no or Frontin. Once called "Balisarda." Rogero's or Rugiero's horse. The word means "little head."—"Orlando Furioso," &c.

Gal'athë (3 syl.). One of Hector's horses. The word means "cream-coloured."

Granë (2 syl.). Siegfried's horse, of marvellous swiftness. The word means "grey-coloured."

Grizzle. Dr. Syntax's horse, all skin and bone. The word means "grey-coloured."

Haiz'um. The horse of the archangel Gabriel.—"Koran."

Har'pagos (Greek). One of the horses of Castor and Pollux. The word means "one that carries off rapidly." (See CYLLAROS.)

Hip'pocampës (4 syl.). One of Neptune's horses. It had only two legs, the hinder quarter being that of a dragon's tail or fish. The word means "coiling horse."

Hrimfaxi. The horse of Night, from whose bit fall the "rime-drops" which every night bedew the earth.—Scandinavian mythology.

Incitatus. The horse of the Roman emperor Caligula, made priest and consul. It had an ivory manger, and drank wine out of a golden pail. The word means "spurred-on."

Kelpy or Kelpie. The water-horse of fairy mythology. The word means "of the colour of kelp or sea-weed."

Lampon (Greek). One of the horses of Diomed. The word means "the bright one." (See DINOS.)

Lampas (Greek). One of the steeds of the Sun at noon. The word means "shining like a lamp."

Morocco. Banks' famous horse. Its shoes were of silver, and one of its exploits was to mount the steeple of St. Paul's.

Nobbs. The steed of Southey's doctor.

Nonios. One of the horses of Pluto.

Ore'lia. The charger of Roderick, last of the Goths, noted for its speed and symmetry.—Southey.

Passetreul (4 syl.). Sir Tristram's charger.

Pegasos. The winged horse of Apollo and the Muses. (Greek, "born near the pēgē or source of the ocean.")

Pha'eton (Greek). One of the steeds of Auro'ra. The word means "the shining one." (See ABRAXAS.)

Phallas. The horse of Heracles. The word means "stallion."

Phre'nicos. The horse of Hiero, of Syracuse, that won the Olympic prize for single horses in the seventy-third Olympiad. The word means "mind-like."

Podar'gë (3 syl.). One of the horses of Hector. The word means "swift-foot." (See Ethon.)

Rabica'no or Rab'ican. Argali's horse in "Orlando Innamorato;" and Astolpho's horse in "Orlando Furioso." Its dam was Fire, and its sire Wind; it fed on unearthly food. The word means "short-tailed."

Reksh. Sir Rustram's horse.

Roan Barbary. The favourite horse of king Richard II.

Rosinantë (4 syl.). Don Quixote's horse, all skin and bone. The word means "formerly a hack."

Sheb'iz. The Persian Bucephalos, belonging to the shah Kosroes Parviz.

Sleipnir. Odin's grey horse, which had eight legs, and could traverse either land or sea. The horse typifies the wind which blows over land and water from eight principal points.

Trebizonul. The grey horse of admiral Guari'nos, one of the French knights taken at Roncesvallës.

Vegliant'no (Vail-yan-te'-no). The famous steed of Orlando, called in French romance Veillantif, Orlando being called Roland. The word means "the little vigilant one."

White Surrey. The favourite horse of king Richard III.

Xanthos. One of the horses of Achilles, who announced to the hero his approaching death when unjustly chidden by him. Its sire was Zephyros, and dam Podargë (q.v.). The word means "chestnut-coloured."

Bracehorse. (See CAMBUSCAN: see also ARCOS-BARBS, BAT-HORSES, DOBBIN.)

§ Shakespeare has "bay Curtal," the horse of lord Lafew ("All's Well that Ends Well," ii. 3); "grey Capilet," the horse of Sir Andrew Aguecheek ("Twelfth Night," iii. 4).

Banks' bay horse was called Morocco. Among the entries of Stationers' Hall is "A ballad shewing the strange qualities of a young nagg called Morocco" (Nov. 14, 1595). When exhibiting at Rome both Banks and his horse were burnt to death for magicians, by order of the pope. "Don Zara del Fogo," p. 114. (1650.)

The consular horse. Incitatus. (q.v.). O'Donohue's white horse. Those waves which come on a windy day, crested with foam. The spirit of the hero re-appears every May-day, and is seen gliding, to sweet but unearthly music, over the lakes of Killarney, on his favourite white horse. It is preceded by groups of young men and maidens, who fling spring-flowers in his path.—"Derrick's Letters."

T. Moore has a poem on the subject in his "Irish Melodies." No. VI.; it is entitled "O'Donohue's Mistress," and refers to a tradition that a young and beautiful girl became enamoured of the visionary chieftain, and threw herself into the lake that he might carry her off for his bride.

¶ Horse. The public-house sign.

(1) The White Horse. The standard of the Saxons, and therefore impressed on hop pockets and bags as the ensign of Kent. On Uffington Hill, Berks, there is formed in the chalk an enormous white horse, supposed to have been cut there after the battle in which Ethelred and Alfred defeated the Danes (871). This rude ensign is about 374 feet long, and 1,000 feet above the sea-level. It may be seen at the distance of twelve miles.

(2) The galloping white horse is the device of the house of Hanover.

(3) The rampant white horse. The device of the house of Savoy, descended from the Saxons.

¶ 'Tis a Trojan horse (Latin proverb). A deception, a concealed danger. Thus Cicero says "Intus, intus, inquam, est equus Trojānus" ("Pro Muren.," 78). Of course the allusion is to the wooden horse which deceived the Trojans to their destruction.

To get upon your high horse. To give oneself airs. The comte de Montbrison says: The four principal families of Lorraine are called the high horses, the descendants by the female line from the little horses or second class of chivalry. The "high horses" are D'Haraucourt, Le'nonecourt, Ligneville, and Du Châtelet.—"Mémoire de la Baronne d'Oberkirche."

¶ Horse (in the Catacombs). Emblem of the swiftness of life. Sometimes a palm-wreath is placed above its head to denote that "the race is not to the swift."

Horse (in Christian art). Emblem of courage and generosity. The attribute of St. Martin, St. Maurice, St. George, and St. Victor, all of whom are represented on horseback. St. Léon is represented on horseback, in pontifical robes, blessing the people.

¶ The Royal Horse Guards or Oxford Blues are the three heavy cavalry regiments of the Household Brigade, first raised in 1661.

Horses. At one time great culprits were fastened to four horses, a limb to each horse, and the horses being urged different ways, pulled limb from limb. The last person who so suffered in Europe was Robert François Damiens, for an attempt on the life of Louis XV. in 1757. Before that Poltrot de Méré was executed by four wild horses for the murder of the duc de Guise, 1563; Salcède, for conspiring against the duc d'Alençon, 1582; Brilland, for poisoning the prince de Condé, 1588; Ravallac, for the murder of Henri IV. in 1610.

Horses. It is said that Diomed, tyrant of Thrace, fed his horses with the strangers who visited his coast. Hercules vanquished him, and gave him to his own horses for food. (See STRANGERS.)

Here such dire welcome is for thee prepared
As Diomed's unhappy strangers shared;
His hapless guests at silent midnight bled,
On their torn limbs his suor inc courses fed.
Camoëns, "Lusiad."

Horses. The first person that drove a four-in-hand was Erichtho'nus, according to Virgil:

Primus Erichthonius curras et quatuor ausus
Jugare equos. Geor. iii. 113.

Erichthon was the first who dared command
A chariot yoked with horses four-in-hand.

¶ Horse or Gorse. A corruption of the Welsh gures (hot, fierce, pungent). Saxon, gorst, curs, cos, course, gross, &c.; German, kraus, crisp.

Horse-chestnut. The curs or pungent chestnut, in opposition to the mild, sweet one.

Horse-laugh. A coarse, vulgar laugh.

Horse-mint. The pungent mint.

Horse-radish. The pungent radish.

Horse-play. Rough play.

Similarly hoarse, having a rough voice from inflammation of the throat; gorse, a rough, prickly plant; goose-berry, a rough berry; goose-grass, the grass whose leaves are rough with hair, &c.

Horse and his Rider. One of Æsop's fables, to show that nations crave the assistance of others when they are aggrieved, but become the tools or slaves of those who rendered them assistance. Thus the Celtic Britons asked aid of the Saxons, and the Danish Duchies of the Germans, but in both cases the rider made the horse a mere tool.

Horse-bean. The bean usually given to horses for food.

Horse Latitudes. A region of calms between 30° and 35° North; so called because ships laden with horses bound to America or the West Indies were often obliged to lighten their freight by casting the horses overboard, when calm-bound in these latitudes.

Horse-milliner. A horse-soldier more fit for the toilet than the battlefield. The expression was first used by Rowley in his "Ballads of Charitie," but Sir Walter Scott revived it:

One comes in foreign trashery
Of tinkling chain and spur,
A walking haberdashery
Of feathers, lace, and fur;
In Rowley's antiquated phrase,
Horse-milliner of modern days.
"Bridal of Triermain," il. 3.

Horse Power. A measure of force. Watt estimated the "force" of a London dray-horse, working eight hours a day, at 33,000 foot-pounds (q.v.) per minute. In calculating the horse-power of a steam-engine the following is the formula:—

$$\frac{P \times A \times L \times N}{33,000} \text{ deduct } \frac{1}{10} \text{ for friction.}$$

P, pressure (in lbs.) per sq. inch on the piston.
A, area (in inches) of the piston.
L, length (in feet) of the stroke.
N, number of strokes per minute.

Horse Protestant. As good a Protestant as Oliver Cromwell's horse. This expression arises in a comparison made by Cromwell respecting some person who had less discernment than his horse in the moot points of the Protestant controversy.

Horse-shoes were at one time nailed up over doors as a protection against witches. Aubrey says "Most houses at the west-end of London have a horse-shoe on the threshold." In Monmouth Street there were seventeen in 1813, and seven so late as 1855.

Straws laid across my path retard;
The horse-shoe's nailed, each threshold's guard.
Gay, "Fable" xxii. pt. 1.

It is lucky to pick up a horse-shoe. This is from the notion that a horse-shoe was a protection against witches. For the same reason our superstitious forefathers loved to nail a horse-shoe on their house door. Lord Nelson had one nailed to the mast of the ship "Victory."

Horse-shoes and Nails. In 1251 some lands in the Strand, held of the crown by a farrier, were made over to the corporation of London, and from this time the sheriffs tendered the annual rent of six horse-shoes and nails. (Hen. III.)

Horse-vetch. The vetch which has pods shaped like a horse-shoe; sometimes called the "horse-shoe vetch."

Hortus Siccus. (Latin, a dry garden). A collection of plants dried and arranged in a book.

Ho'rus. The Egyptian day-god, represented in hieroglyphics by a sparrow-hawk, which bird was sacred to him. He was son of Osiris and Isis, but his birth being premature, he was weak in the lower limbs. As a child he is seen carried in his mother's arms, wearing the pschent or atf, and seated on a lotus-flower with his finger on his lips. As an adult he is represented hawk-headed. (Egyptian, har or hor, "the day" or "sun's path.")

Hospital. From the Latin hospes (a guest), being originally an inn or house of entertainment of pilgrims; hence our words host (one who entertains), hospitality (the entertainment given), and hospitalier (the keeper of the house). In process of time these receptacles were resorted to by the sick and infirm only, and the house of entertainment became an asylum for the sick and wounded. In 1399 Katherine de la Court held a "hospital" at the bottom of the court called Robert de

Paris; after the lapse of four years, her landlord died, and the tavern or hospital fell to his heirs Jehan de Chevreuse and William Cholet. A lawsuit between these parties is thus stated in the "Plaidoiries," matinées reg. coté x. 4785, fo. 75:—

L'amiral Jehan de Chevreuse et la veuve de feu Guillaume Cholet dient que Katherine, sans autorité du roy ne du prévost de Paris, a voulu créer un hospital d'hommes et de femmes en la maison dessus dicte, où il avoit femmes et hommes couchans souz un tect et souz une couverture, qui faisoient leurs matines des vespres jusques au matin; et criaient tellement qu'il sembloit que ce fust un motet de Berusse, et y avoit souvent amusses données et coffes, et estoient de la parroisse S. Merry; et y avoit distribution de mercaulx et merelles, et estoient puez tout sec, et pour quittance avoient signes manueulz; et y estoient donnez horions, tellement que lon ne pavoit dormir en la rue jusques en Bailliehoe. Si se trahirent Jehan de Chevreuse et plusieurs autres de vers le Prevost, pour ce qu'ilz avoient le ressort de Glatigny, Tiron, et plusieurs autres; [et] y avoit aucuns pour faire le guet en la ville, autres eux portes de Paris, comme de S. Anthoine, de S. Victor, et autres. Si fut, in formation precedant, dit à Katherine, que elle se partist et alast tenir son college ailleurs."—Mardi, 15 Fev. 14^{vo}.

Hosp'itallers. First applied to those whose duty it was to provide hospitium (lodging and entertainment) for pilgrims. The most noted institution of the kind was at Jerusalem, which gave its name to an order called the Knights Hospitalers. This order was first called that of the Knights of St. John at Jerusalem; afterwards they were styled the Knights of Rhodes, and then Knights of Malta, because Rhodes and Malta were conferred on them by different monarchs.

Host. A victim. The consecrated bread of the Eucharist is so called in the Latin Church, because it is believed to be a real victim consisting of flesh, blood, and spirit, offered up in sacrifice. (Latin, hostia.) It is shown to the laity in a transparent vessel called a "monstrance." (Latin, monstro, to show.)

Host. An army. At the breaking up of the Roman empire, the first duty of every subject was to follow his lord into the field, and the proclamation was bannire in hostem (to order out against the foe), which soon came to signify "to order out for military service," and hostem facere came to mean, "to perform military service." Hostis (military service) next came to mean the army that went against the foe, whence our word host.

To reckon without your host. To reckon from your own standpoint, without taking in certain considerations which another standpoint would make evident. Guests who calculate what their expenses at an hotel will come to, always leave out certain items which the host contrives to foist into the account.

Hostage (2 syl.) is the Latin obses, through the French otage or ostage, Italian ostaggio.

Hostler is properly the keeper of an hotel or inn. Wittily derived from oat-stealer.

Hot. Hot cross buns. Fosbroke says these buns were made of the dough kneaded for the host, and were marked with the cross accordingly. As in the Roman belief the host is supposed to be divine, and therefore imperishable, and the Good Friday buns are said to keep for twelve months without turning mouldy, some persons still hang up one or more in their house as a "charm against evil." (See CROSS.)

I'll make the place too hot to hold him. The allusion is to Talos, the brazen man who guarded Crete. When a stranger approached, Talos made himself red-hot, and went to embrace the stranger as soon as he set foot on the island.

Hotch-pot or Hotch-potch. Blackstone says hotch-pot is a pudding made of several things mixed together. Lands given in frank-marriage or descending in fee-simple are to be mixed, like the ingredients of a pudding, and then cut up in equal slices amongst all the daughters.—Bk. ii. 12.

As to personality: Hotch-pot may be explained thus: Suppose a father has advanced money to one child, at the decease of the father this child receives a sum in addition enough to make his share equal to the rest of the family. If not content, he must bring into hotch-pot the money advanced, and the whole is then divided amongst all the children according to the terms of the will.

French, hochepot, from hocher, to shake or jumble together; or from the German hoch-pot, the huge pot or family caldron. Wharton says it is haché en poche.

Hotspur. A fiery person who has no control over his temper. Harry Percy was so called. Lord Derby is sometimes called the "Hotspur of Debate," probably a misquotation from Macaulay, who terms him the "Rupert of Debate." (See Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV.")

Hou'goumont is said to be a corruption of Château Goumont; but Victor Hugo says it is Hugo-mons, and that the house was built by Hugo, sire de Sommeril, the same person that endowed the sixth chapelry of the abbey of Villers.

Hound. To hound a person is to persecute him, or rather to set on persons to annoy him, as hounds are let from the slips at a hare or stag.

As he who only lets loose a greyhound out of the slip is said to hound him at the hare.—Bramhall.

Hou'qua. A superior quality of tea. So called from Hoqua, the celebrated Hong-Kong tea merchant, who died 1846.

Hou'ri, pl. Houris. The large black-eyed damsels of Paradise, possessed of perpetual youth and beauty, whose virginity is renewable at pleasure. Every believer will have seventy-two of these houris in Paradise, and his intercourse with them will be fruitful or otherwise according to his wish. If an offspring is desired, it will grow to full estate in an hour. (Arabic, hâr al oyân, the black-eyed.)—The Koran.

House (1 syl.). In astrology the whole heaven is divided into twelve portions, called "houses," through which the heavenly bodies pass every twenty-four hours. In casting a man's fortune by the stars, the whole host is divided into two parts (beginning from the east), six above and six below the horizon. The eastern ones are called the ascendant, because they are about to rise; the other six are the descendant, because they have already passed the zenith. The twelve houses are thus awarded:

(1) House of life; (2) House of fortune and riches; (3) House of brethren; (4) House of relatives; (5) House of children; (6) House of health.

(7) House of marriage; (8) House of death (the upper portal); (9) House of religion; (10) House of dignities; (11) House of friends and benefactors; (12) House of enemies.

House and Home. He hath eaten me out of house and home (Shakespeare, "2 Henry IV." ii. 1). It is the complaint of hostess Quickly to the lord chief justice when he asks for "what sum" she had arrested Sir John Falstaff. She explains the phrase by "he hath put all my substance into that fat belly of his;" "I am undone by his going."

House of Correction. A gaol governed by a keeper. Originally it was a place where vagrants were made to work, and small offenders were kept in ward for the correction of their offences.

Household Gods. Domestic pets, and all those things which help to endear home. The Romans had household gods called pe-na'-tes, who were supposed to preside over their private houses. Of these pe-na'-tes some were called la'-res, the special genti or angels of the family. One was Vest'a, whose office was to preserve domestic unity. Jupiter and Juno were also among the pe-na'-tes. The modern use of the term is a playful adaptation.

Bearing a nation with all its household gods into exile.—Longfellow, "Evangeline."

Household Troops. Those troops whose special duty it is to attend the sovereign and guard the Metropolis. They consist of the 1st and 2nd Life-guards, the Royal Horse-guards, and the three regiments of Foot-guards called the Grenadier, Coldstream, and Scots Fusilier Guards.

House-leek used to be grown on house-roofs, from the notion that it warded off lightning.

If the herb house-leek or syngreen do grow on the house-top, the same house is never stricken with lightning or thunder.—Thomas Hill, "Natural and Art, Conclusion."

Housel. To give or receive the eucharist. (Saxon, hus'ian, to give the hunsa or host.)

Children were christened, and men houseled and anointed through all the land, except such as were in the bill of excommunication by name expressed.—Holinshead, "Chronicle."

Houssain (Prince), brother of prince Ahmed. He possessed a piece of carpet or tapestry of such wonderful power that any one had only to sit upon it, and it would transport him in a moment to any place he desired to go to.

If prince Houssain's flying tapestry or Astolpho's hippogriff had been shown, he would have judged them by the ordinary rules, and preferred a well-lunged chariot.—Sir Walter Scott.

Houyhnhnms (hoo'hims). A race of horses endowed with reason, who bear rule over the race of man. Gulliver, in his "Travels," tells us what he "saw" among them.—Swift.

Nay, would kind Jove my organ so dispose
To hymn harmonious Houyhnhnms through the nose.

I'd call thee Houyhnhnm, that high-sounding name;
Thy children's noses all should twang the same.

Pope.

Howard. A philanthropist. John Howard is immortalised by his efforts to improve the condition of prisoners. "He visited all Europe," says Burke, "not to survey the sumptuousness of palaces or the stateliness of temples; not to make accurate measurements of the remains of ancient grandeur, nor to form a scale of the curiosity of modern art; not to collect manuscripts; but to dive into the depths of dungeons; to plunge into the infection of hospitals; to survey the mansions of sorrow and pain; to take the dimensions of misery, depression, and contempt; to remember the forgotten, to attend to the neglected, to visit the forsaken, and to compare the distress of all men in all countries. His plan is original, and it is as full of genius as it is of humanity. It was a voyage of discovery; a circumnavigation of charity."

The radiant path that Howard trod to heaven.
Bloomfield, "Farmer's Boy."

The female Howard. Mrs. Elizabeth Fry. (1780-1844.)

All the blood of all the Howards. All the nobility of our best aristocracy. The ducal house of Norfolk stands at the head of the English peerage, and is interwoven in all our history.

What could ennoble sots, or slaves, or cowards?
Alas! not all the blood of all the Howards.
Pope, "Essay on Man," Ep. iv.

Howard. Mr. Bugg, of Thorpe, near Norwich, first changed his name into Norfolk Howard, and then into Coaks, from property left him.

How'die (2 syl.). A midwife. As an example of tortured etymology this word has been derived from the word hodie in the line "Jesus hodie natus est de virgine." Truly we may say the word brethren comes from the word tabernacle because we breathe therein.

Howleglass (2 syl.). A clever rascal. So called from the hero of an old German jest-book, popular in England in the time of queen Elizabeth.

Hrimfax'i. The horse of night, from whose bit fall the rime-drops that every morning bedew the earth.—Scandinavian mythology.

Hu'bal. An Arab idol brought from Bulka, in Syria, by Amr' Ibn-Lohei, who asserted that it would procure rain when wanted. It was the statue of a man in red agate; one hand being lost, a golden one was supplied. He held in his hand seven arrows without wings or feathers, such as the Arabians use in divination. This idol was destroyed in the eighth year of "the flight."

Hub'ard (Old Mother). The famous dame of nursery mythology, who went to the cupboard to fetch her poor dog a bone; but when she got there the cupboard was bare, so the poor dog had none. She then goes upon divers errands on her dog's behoof, and on her return finds the dog engaged in some marvellous feat. Having finished her wanderings to and fro, she makes a curtsy to the dog, and the dog, not to be outdone in politeness, makes the dame a profound bow.

Hubert (h silent), in Shakespeare's "King John," is Hubert de Burgh, justice of England, created earl of Kent. He died 1243.

St. Hubert. Patron saint of huntsmen. He was son of Bertrand, duc d'Aquitaine, and cousin of king Pepin. Hubert was so fond of the chase that he neglected his religious duties for his favourite amusement, till one day a stag bearing a crucifix menaced him with eternal perdition unless he reformed. Upon this the merry huntsman entered a cloister, became in time bishop of Liège, and the apostle of Ardennes and Brabant. Those who were descended of his race were supposed to possess the power of curing the bite of mad dogs.

St. Hubert in Christian art is represented sometimes as a bishop with a miniature stag resting on the book in his hand, and sometimes as a noble huntsman kneeling to the miraculous crucifix borne by the stag.

Hu'dibras. Said to be a caricature of Sir Samuel Luke, a patron of Samuel Butler. The Grub-street Journal (1731) maintains it was colouel Rolle, of Devonshire, with whom the poet lodged for some time, and adds that the name is derived from Hugh de Bras, the patron saint of the county. He represents the Presbyterian party, and his squire the Independents.

"Tis sung there's a valiant Mameluke
In foreign lands yclep'd [Sir Luke].
Butler, "Hu'dibras," i. 1.

Sir Hudibras. The cavalier of Elissa or Parsimony.—Spenser, "Faëry Queene," bk. ii.

Hudibras'tic Verse. A doggerel eight-syllable rhyming verse, after the style of Butler's "Hudibras."

Hud'son (Sir Jeffrey). The famous dwarf, at one time page to queen Henrietta Maria. Sir Walter Scott has introduced him in his "Peveril of the Peak," ch. xxxiv. Vandyke has immortalised him by his brush; and his clothes are said to be preserved in Sir Hans Sloane's museum.

Hugger-mugger. The primary meaning is clandestinely, in a smuggled manner. The secondary meaning is disorderly, meanly, in a slovenly and muddled manner. Hugger means "like a squatter," and mugger means "secretly," "in an underhand manner." (Of the first we have Danish huger, to squat; German hocken; Dutch hakken, &c. Of the latter we have Danish smug, clandestinely; Dutch smuig; Welsh mug, smoke; muccan, cloud; our smuggle, smuggler, muddle, &c.)

The King in "Hamlet" says of Polo'nus, "We have done but greenly in hugger-mugger to inter him," i.e., to smuggle him into the grave clandestinely and without ceremony.

Sir T. North, in his "Plutarch," says:—"Antonius thought that his body should be honourably buried, and not in hugger-mugger" (clandestinely).

Ralph says:—

While I, in hugger-mugger hid,
Have noted all they said and did,
Butler, "Hudibras," iii. 3.

Under the secondary idea we have the following expressions:—

He lives in a hugger-mugger sort of way.
The rooms were all hugger-mugger (disorderly).

Huggins and Muggins. Mr. and Mrs. Vulgarly, of Pretension Hall. The best etymology I know for these two words is the Dutch Hooge en Mogende (high and mighty), the style of addressing the States-General of Holland, much ridiculed in the seventeenth century.

Hugh Lloyd's Pulpit (Merionethshire). A natural production of stone. One pile resembles the Kilmarth Rocks. There is a platform stone with a back in stone. (Hugh pron. You.)

Hugh of Lincoln. It is said that the Jews in 1255 stole a boy named Hugh, whom they tortured for ten days and then crucified. Eighteen of the richest Jews of Lincoln were hanged for taking part in this affair, and the boy was buried in state. This is the subject of "The Prioress's Tale" of Chaucer, which Wordsworth has modernised. In Rymer's "Fœdera" are several documents relating to this event.

Hu'gin and Mu'gin (mind and memory). The two ravens that sit on the shoulders of Odin or Alfader.

Perhaps the nursery saying, "A little bird told me that," is a corruption of Hugo and Mumin, and so we have the old Northern superstition lingering among us without our being aware of it.—Julia Goddard, "Joyce Dormer's Story," ii. 11. (See BIRD.)

Hu'go (h soft), in "Jerusalem Delivered," count of Vermandois, brother of Philippe I. of France, leader of the Franks. He died before Godfrey was appointed leader of the united armies (bk. i.), but his spirit is seen by Godfrey amongst the angels who came to aid in taking Jerusalem (bk. xviii.).

Hugo, official son of Azo, marquis of Estè, who fell in love with Parisi'na, his father's young wife. Azo discovered the intrigue, and condemned Hugo to be beheaded.—Byron, "Parisina."

Hu'gon (King). The great hobgoblin of France.

Hu'guenot (U-gñe-no). First applied to the Reformed Church party in the Amboise Plot (1560). From the German eidgenossen (confederates).

Huguenot Pope (Le pape des Huguenots). Philippe de Mornay, the great supporter of the French Protestants. (1549-1623.)

Hul'da (the Benignant). Goddess of marriage and fecundity, who sent bridegrooms to maidens and children to the married. (German.) (See BERCHTA.)

Hulda is making her bed. It snows. (See above.)

Hulk. An old ship unfit for service. (Saxon.)

Hulking. A great hulking fellow. A great overgrown one. The monster sausage brought in on Christmas-day was called a haulkin or haukin.

Hull Cheese. Strong ale, or rather intoxicating cake, like "tipsy cake," thus described by Taylor, the water poet: "It is much like a loafe out of a brewer's basket; it is composed of two simples, malt and water, . . . and is cousingermane to the mightiest ale in England." (See vol. ii. of "Taylor's Works.")

Hull'abaloo. Uproar. Irish name for the coranach or crying together at funerals. The word is sometimes written hululu or hul'ululoo, and is what Max Müller calls a bow-wow word (? sound-spell).

Hul'seän Lectures. Instituted by the Rev. John Hulse, of Cheshire, in 1777. Every year some four or six sermons are preached at Great St. Mary's, Cambridge, by what is now called the Hulsean Lecturer, who, till 1860, was entitled the Christian Advocate. Originally, twenty sermons a year were preached and printed under this benefaction.

Hu'man Race (h soft). Father of the human race. Adam.

Human Sacrifice. A custom still subsisting seems to prove that the Egyptians formerly sacrificed a young virgin to the god of the Nile, for they now make a statue of clay in shape of a girl, which they call the "betrothed bride," and throw it into the river.—Savary.

Humanita'rians. Those who believe that Jesus Christ was only man. The disciples of St. Simon are so called also, because they maintain the perfectibility of human nature without the aid of grace.

Human'ities or Humanity Studies. Grammar, rhetoric, and poetry, with Greek and Latin; in contradistinction to the study of chemistry, natural philosophy, and science generally. (Latin, humanitas, refinement of education and taste, mental culture, humaniorēs literæ.)

Humber. Chief of the Huns, defeated by Loerin, king of England, and drowned in the river Abus, ever since called the Humber.—Geoffrey of Monmouth, "Chronicles."

Their chieftain Humber namēl was a right
Unto the mighty stream he him to betake,
Where he an end of battall and of life did make.
Spenser, "Faery Queene," ii. 10.

Humble Bee. A corruption of the French double-doré (double-gilt), and called in the West of England dumble-door.

Humble Pie. To eat humble pie. To come down from a position you have assumed, to be obliged to take "a lower room." "Umbles" are the heart, liver, and entrails of the deer, the huntsman's perquisites. When the lord and his household dined the venison patty was served on the dais, but the umbles were made into a pie for the huntsman and his fellows.

N.B.—Pie and patty are both diminutives of pasty. Pasty and patty are limited to venison, veal, and some few other meats; pie is of far wider signification, including fruit, mince, &c.

Hum'bug. Mr. F. Crossley suggests the Irish uim bog (pronounced um-bug), meaning "soft copper" or "worthless money." James II. issued from the Dublin Mint a mixture of lead, copper, and brass, so worthless that a sovereign was intrinsically worth only 2d., and might have been bought after the revolution for a halfpenny. Sterling and umbug were therefore expressive of real and fictitious worth, merit and humbug. Churchill uses the word in 1750. Crossley's suggestion is very ingenious, but probably the mystery lies nearer the surface. To "hum" used to signify "to applaud," to "express admiration," hence "to flatter," to "cajole for an end;" the noun signified "sugar'd words," "worthless rumours," &c.

"Gentlemen, this humming [expression of applause] is not at all becoming the gravity of this court."—State Trials. (1690.)

Hume (David), the historian, takes the lead among modern philosophical sceptics. His great argument is this: It is more likely that testimony should be false than that miracles should be true. (1711-1776.)

Humma. Chief deity of the Kaffirs.

Humma. A bird peculiar to the East. Every head that it overshadows will wear a crown (Richardson). The splendid little bird suspended over the throne of Tippoo Saib at Seringapatam represented this poetical fancy.

Humming Ale. Strong liquor that froths well. A corruption of spuming. French, espuma, froth; Latin, spuma. Major Dalgetty wishes prison water were "humming Lubeck beer."

Hummums, in Covent Garden. So called from an Eastern word, signifying baths.

Hu'mour. As good humour, ill or bad humour, &c. According to an ancient theory, there are four principal humours in the body:—phlegm, blood, choler, and melancholy. As any one of these predominated, it determined the temper of the mind and body; hence the expressions choleric humour, melancholic humour. A just balance made a good compound called "good humour;" a preponderance of any one of the four made a bad compound called an ill or evil humour.—See Ben Jonson, "Every Man Out of his Humour" (Prologue).

Humpback (The).

Gero'nimo Amelunghi, Il Gobo di Pisa. (16th century.)

Andre'a Sola'ri, the Italian painter, Del Gobbo. (1470-1527.)

Humphrey (Master). The imaginary collector of the tales in "Master Humphrey's Clock," by Charles Dickens.

The good duke Humphrey. Humphrey Plantagenet, duke of Gloucester, youngest son of Henry IV. (murdered 1446).

To dine with duke Humphrey. To have no dinner to go to. Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, uncle to Henry VII., was renowned for his hospitality. At death it was reported that a monument would be erected to him in St. Paul's, but his body was interred at St. Albans. When the promenaders left for dinner, the poor stay-behinds who had no dinner used to say to the gay sparks who asked if they were going, that they would stay a little longer and look for the monument of the "good duke."

Humpty Dumpty. An egg, a little deformed dwarf. Dumpty is a corruption of dumpy (short and thick). A dump is a piece of lead used in chuck-farthing. Humpty is having a hump or hunch. The two mean short, thick, and round-shouldered.

Hunchback. Styled My Lord. Grose says this was done in the reign of Richard III., when many deformed men were made peers; but probably the word is the Greek lordos (crooked).

Hundred. Hero of the hundred fights or battles.

Lord Nelson. (1758-1805.)

Con, a celebrated Irish hero, is so called by O'Gnive, the bard of O'Niel: "Con, of the hundred fights, sleep in thy grass-grown tomb."

Hundred Days. The days between March 20, 1815, when Napoleon quitted

Elba, and June 22, of the same year, when he abdicated, and was sent to St. Hele'na.

Hunga'rian. One half-starved; a pun on the word hunger.

Hun'gary Water. Made of rosemary, sage, and spices; so called because the receipt was given by a hermit to the queen of Hungary.

Hungr (hunger). The dish out of which the goddess Hel (q.v.) was wont to feed.

Hun'iades, Hunniades, or Hunyady (4 syl.). One of the greatest captains of the fourteenth century. Called Corv'anus from the crow in his escutcheon. The Turks so much feared him that they used his name for scaring children. (1400-1456.) (See BOGIE.)

The Turks employed this name to frighten their perverse children. He was corruptly denominated "Jancus Lain."—Gibbon, "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," xii. 164.

Hunks. An old hunks. A screw, a mean, sordid fellow. Icelandic, hunskur, sordid.

Hunneberg and Halleberg (holy mountain). West Gothland. (See HALL OF ODIN.)

Hunooman. In Hindu mythology, the monkey god.

Hunt. Like Hunt's dog, he would never go to church, nor stay at home. One Hunt, a labouring man in Shropshire, kept a mastiff, which, on being shut up while his master went to church, howled and barked so terribly as to disturb the whole congregation; whereupon Hunt thought he would take his Lycisca with him the next Sunday; but on reaching the churchyard, the dog positively refused to enter. The proverb is applied to a tricky, self-willed person, who will neither lead nor drive.

Hunter. Mr. and Mrs. Leo Hunter. Two lion hunters, or persons who hunt up all the celebrities of London to grace their parties. — Dickens, "Pickwick Papers."

The mighty hunter. Nimrod is so called (Gen. x. 9). The meaning seems to be a conqueror. Jeremiah says, "I (the Lord) will send for many hunters (warriors), and they shall hunt (chase) them (the Jews) from every mountain . . . and out of the holes of the rocks" (xvi. 16. See 13).

Proud Nimrod first the bloody chase began—
A mighty hunter, and his prey was man.
Pep., " Windsor."

Hunting of the Hare. A comic romance, published in Weber's collection. A yeoman informs the inhabitants of a village that he has seen a hare, and invites them to join him in hunting it. They attend with their curs and mastiffs, pugs, and house-dogs, and the fun turns on the truly unsportsman-like manner of giving puss the chase.

Huntingdon means the county famous for hunts. It was once a deer forest.

Huon de Bordeaux encounters in Syria an old follower of the family named Gerasmes (2 syl.), whom he asks the way to Babylon. Gerasmes told him the shortest and best way was through a wood sixteen leagues long, and full of fairies; that few could go that way because king O'beron was sure to encounter them, and whoever spoke to this fay was lost for ever. If a traveller, on the other hand, refused to answer him, he raised a most horrible storm of wind and rain, and made the forest seem one great river. "But," says the vassal, "the river is a mere delusion, through which any one can wade without wetting the soles of his shoes." Huon for a time followed the advice of Gerasmes, but afterwards addressed Oberon, who told him the history of his birth. They became great friends, and when Oberon went to Paradise he left Huon his successor as lord and king of Mommur. He married Esclairmond, and was crowned "King of all Faerie."—"Huon de Bordeaux" (a romance).

Hurlo-thrumbo. A ridiculous burlesque, which in 1730 had an extraordinary run at the Haymarket Theatre. So great was its popularity that a club called "The Hurlo-thrumbo Society" was formed. The author was Samuel Johnson, a half-mad dancing master, who put this motto on the title-page when the burlesque was printed:—

Ye sons of fire, read my "Hurlo-thrumbo,"
Turn it betwixt your finger and your thumb,
And being quite undone, be quite struck dumb.

Hurly-burly. Uproar, tumult, especially of battle. Dr. Johnson says,

"I have been told that this word owes its origin to two neighbouring families named Hurleigh and Burleigh, which filled their part of the kingdom with contests and violence." Without stopping to examine the worth of this hearsay derivation, it may be stated that hurly is probably derived from the verb hurl, and refers to the confusion arising from the hurling of missiles in battle. Burly is from burl (noisy); Russian, burlyu (turbulent), our burly meaning boisterous, powerful. The Dutch have hurl-om-burl (topsy-turvy). In the "Garden of Eloquence" (1577) the word is given as a specimen of onomatopœia.

When the burly-burly's done,
When the battle's lost and won.
Watches of "Macbeth."

Hurrah' or Huzza'. The word is common to many nations. Jewish, hosanna; Old French, kuzzer (to shout aloud); Dutch, husschen; Russian, hoera and hoezee. (See below.)

Hur'rar'. A corruption of Tur aie (Thor aid), a battle cry of the Northmen.—Wace, "Chronicle."

Hurry. The Mahouts cheer on their elephants by repeating ur-rê, the Arabs their camels by shouting ar-ré, the French their hounds by shouts of hare, the Germans their horses by the word hurs, the herdsmen of Ireland their cattle by shouting hurrish. Whence our words to harry, harass, hurry; Welsh, gyru (to drive); Armenian, haura (to hasten); Latin, curro (to run); &c.

Don't hurry, Hopkins. A satirical reproof to those who are not prompt in their payments. It is said that one Hopkins, of Kentucky, gave his creditor a promissory note on which was this memorandum: "The said Hopkins is not to be hurried in paying the above."

Husband is the house farmer. Bonde is Norwegian for a "farmer," hence bondé-by (a village where farmers dwell); and hus means "house." Hus-band-man is the man-of-the-house farmer. The husband, therefore, is the master farmer, and the husband-man the servant or labourer. Old Tusser was in error when he derived the word from "house-band," as in the following distich:—

The name of the husband, what is it to say?
Of wife and of house-hold the band and the stay.
"Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry."

Hush'ai (2 syl.), in Dryden's satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," is Hyde, earl of Rochester. Hushai was David's friend, who counteracted the counsels of Achitophel, and caused the plot of Absalom to miscarry; so Rochester defeated the schemes of Shaftesbury, and brought to nought the rebellion of the duke of Monmouth.

N.B. This was not John Wilmot, earl of Rochester, the wit.

Hussar'. A Hungarian word (husz, twenty, ar, pay). When Mathias Corvinus succeeded to the crown of Hungary, Mohammed III. and Frederick III. conspired to dethrone "the boy king," but Mathias was equal to the emergency. In order to have a regular and powerful cavalry, he decreed that one man out of every twenty families should be enrolled, and share the expense among themselves. This cavalry went by the name of "the twenty-paid soldiers" or "Hussars."

Hus'sites (2 syl.). Followers of John Huss, the Bohemian reformer, in the fourteenth century. (See BETHLEME-NITES.)

Hussy. A little hussy. A word of slight contempt, though in some counties it seems to mean simply girl, as "Come hither, hussy." Of course the word is a corruption of housewife or hussif. In Swedish hustru means woman in general. It is rather remarkable that mother in Norfolk has given rise to a similar sort of word, morther, as "Come hither, morther," i.e., girl. Neither hussy nor morther is applied to married women. In Norfolk they also say mor for lass or girl, and bor for the other sex. Moer is Dutch for woman in general, and boer for peasant, whence our boor.

Hus'tab'. One of the idols of the ancient Ninevites.

Hus'terlooe. A wood in Flanders, where Reynard declared his vast treasures were concealed.—"Reynard the Fox."

Hus'tings. House-things or city courts. London has still its court of Hustings in Guildhall, in which are elected the lord mayor, the aldermen, and city members. The hustings of elections are so called because, like the court of Hustings, they are the places of elective assemblies.

Hutchinso'nians. Followers of Anne Hutchinson, who retired to Rhode Island. Anne and fifteen of her children were subsequently murdered by the Indians. (Died 1643.)

Hu'tin. Louis le Hutin. Louis X. Mazerai says he received the name because he was tongue-doughty. The hutin was a mallet used by coopers which made great noise, but did not give severe blows; as we should say, the barker or barking dog. It is my belief that he was so named because he was sent by his father against the "Hutins," a seditious people of Navarre and Lyons. (1289, 1314-1316.)

Hutkin. A cover for a sore finger, made by cutting off the finger of an old glove. The word hut in this instance is from the German huten (to guard or protect). It is employed in the German noun finger-hut (a thimble to protect the finger), and in the word huth or hut. (See HODEKEN.)

Hvergel'mer. A deep pit in Nifheim, whence issues twelve poisonous springs, which generate ice, snow, wind, and rain.—Scandinavian mythology.

Hy'acinth, according to Grecian fable, was the son of Amyclas, a Spartan king. The lad was beloved by Apollo and Zephyr, and as he preferred the sun-god, Zephyr drove Apollo's quoit at his head, and killed him. The blood became a flower, and the petals are inscribed with the boy's name.—Virgil, "Ecl.," iii. 106.

The hyacinth bewrays the doleful "AI,"
And culls the tribute of Apollo's sigh.
Still on its bloom the mournful flower retains
The lovely blue that dyes the stripling's veins.
Camœns, "Lusiad," ix.

Hy'ades (3 syl.). Seven nymphs placed among the stars, in the constellation Taurus, which threaten rain when they rise with the sun. The chief of them is by the Arabs called Aldebaran.

Hy'dra. A monster of the Lernean marshes, in Argolis. It had nine heads, and Hercules was sent to kill it. As soon as he struck off one of its heads, two shot up in its place.

Hydra-headed. Having as many heads as the hydra (q.v.); a difficulty which goes on increasing as it is combated.

Hydra-headed Multitude. The rabble, which not only is many-headed numerically, but seems to grow more numerous the more it is attacked and resisted.

Hye'na was worshipped by the ancient Egyptians. Pliny says that a certain stone, called the "hyenia," found in the eye of the creature, being placed under the tongue, imparts the gift of prophecy.—xxxvii. 60.

Hyge'ia (3 syl.). Goddess of health and daughter of Æsculapios. Her symbol was a serpent drinking from a cup in her hand.

Hyksos. A tribe of Cuthites (2 syl.) driven out of Assyria by Ara'tius and the Shemites, founded in Egypt a dynasty called Hyksos (shepherd kings), a title assumed by all the Cuthite chiefs. This dynasty, which gave Egypt six or eight kings, lasted 259 years, when the whole horde was driven from Egypt, and retired to Palestine. It is from these refugees that the lords of the Philistines arose. The word is compounded of hyk (king) and sôs (shepherd).

Hylæo-saurus or Hylæo-saur (Greek for forest-lizard). A large fossil pre-Adamite reptile. Specimens have been discovered in the Wealden of Kent and Sussex.

Hyl'as. A boy beloved by Hercu'lës, carried off by the nymphs while drawing water from a fountain in Mys'ia.

Hy'men. God of marriage, a sort of overgrown Cupid. His symbols are a bridal-torch and veil in his hand.

Hy'mer. The giant in Celtic mythology, who took Thor in his boat when that god went to kill the serpent; for which service he was flung by the ears into the sea.

Hyperbo'reans (5 syl.). The most northern people, who dwell beyond Bo'reas (the seat of the north wind), placed by Virgil under the North Pole. They are said to be the oldest of the human race, the most virtuous, and the most happy; to dwell for some thousand years under a cloudless sky, in fields yielding double harvests, and in the enjoyment of perpetual spring. When sated of life they crown their heads with flowers, and plunge headlong from the mountain Hunneberg or Halleberg into the sea, and enter at once the paradise of Odin.—Scandinavian mythology.

The Hyperbo'reans, it is said, have not an atmosphere like our own, but one consisting wholly of feathers. Both Herod'o-tos and Pliny mention this fiction, which they say was suggested by the quantity of snow observed to fall in those regions.—Herodotos, iv. 31.

Hyper'ion. Apollo, a model of manly beauty. The proper pronunciation is Hyper'ion. Thus Ovid—

Placat equo Persis radiis Hyper'ione cinctum.
"Fasti," l. 355.

So excellent a king, that was to this Hyper'ion to a satyr.
Shakespeare, "Hamlet," i. 2.

Hypocho'n'dria (Greek, hypo chondros, under the cartilage), i.e., the spaces on each side of the epigastric region, supposed to be the seat of melancholy as a disease.

Hypoc'risy. L'hypocrisie est un hommage que le vice rend à la vertu.—Roche-foucauld.

Hyp'ocrite (3 syl.). Prince of Hypocrites. Tibe'rius Cæsar was so called, because he affected a great regard for decency, but indulged in the most detestable lust and cruelty. (B.C. 42, 14 to A.D. 37.)

Abdallah Ibn Obba and his partisans were called The Hypocrites by Mahomet, because they feigned to be friends, but were in reality disguised foes.

Hyp'ocrites' Isle, called by Rabelais Chuneph, which is the Hebrew for "hypocrisy." Rabelais says it is wholly inhabited by sham saints, spiritual comedians, bead-tumblers, mumblers of ave-mari'as, and such like sorry rogues, who lived on the alms of passengers, like the hermit of Lormout.—"Pantagruel," iv. 63.

Hyposta'tic Union. The union of two or more persons into one undivided unity, as, for example, the three persons of the eternal Godhead. The Greek hypostas corresponds to the Latin persôna. The three persons of the God and three hypostas of the Godhead mean one and the same thing.

Hyped (hipt). Melancholy, low-spirited. Hyp is a contraction of hypocho'n'dria.

Hy'son. One of the varieties of green tea. "Ainsi nommé d'un mot chinois qui veut dire printemps, parce que c'est au commencement de cette saison qu'on le cueille."—M. N. Bouillet.

I

I. This letter represents a finger, and is called in Hebrew yod or jod (a hand).

I.H.S. or I.H.S. A Latin corruption of the Greek $\text{IH}\Sigma$, meaning $\text{IH}\Sigma\text{o}\text{u}\text{s}$ (Jesus), the long e (H) being mistaken for a capital H, and the dash perverted into a cross. The letters being thus obtained, St. Bernardine of Sienna, in 1347, hit upon a suitable representative in the words, Jesus Hom'inum Salvator (Jesus, Saviour of Men). (See AGNUS CASTUS.)

I.O.U. The memorandum of a debt given by the borrower to the lender. It must not contain a promise to pay. The letters mean, "I owe You."

I. R. B. Irish Rebellion Brotherhood (? Irish Republican Brotherhood), meaning the Fenian conspiracy.

Iach'imo (Yak-e-mo). An Italian libertine, in Shakespeare's "Cymbeline."

Iago (Yar'go or E-ar'-go). Othello's ensign or ancient. He hated the Moor both because Cassio, a Florentine, was preferred to the lieutenantancy instead of himself, and also from a suspicion that the Moor had tampered with his wife; but he concealed his hatred so well that Othello wholly trusted him. Iago persuaded Othello that Desdemona intrigued with Cassio, and urged him on till he murdered his bride. His chief argument was that Desdemona had given Cassio a pocket-handkerchief, the fact being that Iago had set on his wife to purloin it. After the death of Desdemona, Emilia (Iago's wife) revealed the fact, and Iago was arrested.

Shakespeare generally makes three syllables of the name, as—

Let it not gall your patience, good I-a-go. } ii. 1.
Left in the conduct of the hold I-a-go.
'Tis one I-a-go, ancient to the general.

Iämbic. Father of Iambic verse. Archilochos of Paros. (B.C. 714-676.)

Iän'the (3 syl.), to whom Lord Byron dedicated his "Childe Harold," was lady Charlotte Harley, born 1809, and only eleven years old at the time.

Iäp'etos. The father of Atlas and ancestor of the human race, called genus Iäp'eti, the progeny of Iapetus (Greek mythology). By many considered the same as Japheth, one of the sons of Noah.

Iätraleip'tes (5 syl.). One who cured diseases by friction and anointing. (Greek iatros aleipho, a physician who anoints.)

Ibe'ria. Spain; the country of the Iberus or Ebro. (See Rowe "On the Late Glorious Successes.")

Ibis or Nile-bird. The Egyptians call the sacred Ibis Father John. It is the avatar of the god Thoth, who in the guise of an Ibis escaped the pursuit of Typhon. The Egyptians say its plumage symbolises the light of the sun and shadow of the moon, its body a heart, and its legs a triangle. It was said to drink only the purest of water, and its feathers to scare or even kill the crocodile. It is also said that the bird is so fond of Egypt that it would pine to death if transported elsewhere. It appears at the rise of the Nile, but disappears at its inundation. If indeed it devours crocodiles' eggs, scares away the crocodiles themselves, devours serpents and all sorts of noxious reptiles and insects, no wonder it should be held in veneration, and that it is made a crime to kill so useful a creature.

Ibis. The Nile-bird, says Solinus, "rummages in the mud of the Nile for serpents' eggs, her most favourite food."

Ib'lis or Iblees. Satan, and the father of the Sheytans or devils.—Arabian mythology.

Ib'raham. The Abraham of the Koran.

Icar'ian. Soaring, adventurous. (See ICAROS.)

Ice'aros. Son of Dædalos, who flew with his father from Crete, but the sun melted the wax with which his wings were fastened on, and he fell into the sea, hence called the Icar'ian. (See Shakespeare, "3 Henry VI.," v. 6.)

Ice (1 syl.). To break the ice. To broach a disagreeable subject, to open the way. In allusion to breaking ice for bathers. (Latin, scin'derë glaciem; Italian, romper il ghiaccio.)

[We] An' if you break the ice, and do this feat....
Will not so graceless be, to be inurate
Shakespeare, "Taming of the Shrew," i. 2.

Ice-brook. A sword of ice-brook temper. Of the very best quality. The Spaniards used to plunge their swords and other weapons, while hot from the forge, into the brook Salo [Xalon], near Bilbilis, in Celtiberia, to harden them. The water of this brook is very cold.

It is a sword of Spain the ice-brook temper.
Shakespeare, "Othello," v. 2.

Særo Bilbilin optum metallo
Et ferro Placuit summa manu
Quam fluctu tenui sed inquit
Arno rum Salo tempera tor ambit.

Martial.

Ich Dien. According to a Welsh tradition, Edward I. promised to provide Wales with a prince "who could speak no word of English," and when his son Edward of Carnarvon was born he presented him to the assembly, saying in Welsh, Eich dyn (behold the man).

The more general belief is that it was the motto under the plume of John, king of Bohemia, slain by the Black Prince at Cressy in 1346, and that the Black Prince who slew the Bohemian assumed it out of modesty, to indicate that "he served under the king his father."

Ichneu'mon. An animal resembling a weasel, and well worthy of being defended by priest and prince in Egypt, as it feeds on serpents, mice, and other vermin; and is especially fond of crocodiles' eggs, which it scratches out of the sand. According to legend, it steals into the mouth of crocodiles when they gape, and eats out their bowels.

Ichnobate (Ik-no-ba'te). One of Actæon's dogs. The word means "track follower."

Ichor (I'-kor). The colourless blood of the heathen deities.

Ichthyosaurus or Ichthyosaur (Greek, fish-lizard). A fossil reptile, remains of which have been found in the lias of Lyme Regis. (Pronounce Ik'-the-o-saw'-rus or Ik'-the-o-saw'.)

Iconoclasts (Greek, image-breakers). Reformers who rose in the eighth century, especially averse to the employment of pictures, statues, emblems, and all visible representations of sacred objects. The crusade against these things began in 726 with the emperor Leo III. and continued for 120 years.

Iethus for Ie'sous Christos, Thieou Uios, Soter. This notarica is found on many seals, rings, urns, and tombstones belonging to the early times of Christianity, and was supposed to be a "charm" of mystical efficacy.

Idæ'an Mother. Cyb'elë, who had a temple on mount Ida, in Asia Minor.

Ides (1 syl.). In the Roman calendar the 15th of March, May, July, and October, and the 13th of all the other months. So called because they always fell eight days after the Nones. (Welsh, wyth; Saxon, ahta; French, huit; Swedish, otta; Greek, octo; in Ide we have the substitution of d for t.)

Remember March; the ides of March remember.
Shakespeare, "Julius Cæsar," iv. 3.

Idiom. A mode of expression peculiar to a language, as a Latin idiom, a French idiom. (Greek, idios, peculiar to oneself.)

Idiosyncrasy. A crotchet or peculiar one-sided view of a subject, a monomania. Properly a peculiar effect produced by medicines or foods, as when coffee acts as an aperient, the electrical current as an emetic. (Greek, idios sun krasis, something peculiar to a person's temperament.)

Idiot means simply a private person, one not engaged in any public office. Hence Jeremy Taylor says, "Humility is a duty in great ones, as well as in idiots" (private persons). The Greeks have the expressions "a priest or an idiot" (layman), "a poet or an idiot" (prose-writer). As idiots were not employed in public offices, the term became synonymous with incompetency to fulfil the duties thereof. (Greek, idiôtēs.) (See BARON.)

Idle Lake. The lake on which Phædria or Wantonness cruised in her gondola. It led to Wandering Island.—Spenser, "Faëry Queene," bk. ii.

Idle Worms. It was once supposed that little worms were bred in the fingers of idle servants. To this Shakespeare alludes:

A round little worm,
Pricked from the lazy finger of a maid,
"Romeo and Juliet," i. 4.

Idleness. The Lake of Idleness. Spenser says whoever drank of this lake grew "instantly faint and weary." The Red Cross Knight drank of it, and was made captive by Orgoglio.—Spenser, "Faëry Queene," bk. i.

Idom'eneus (4 syl.). King of Crete, and ally of the Greeks in the siege of Troy. After the city was burnt he made a vow to sacrifice whatever he first encountered, if the gods granted him a safe return to his kingdom. It was his own son that he first met, and when he offered him up to fulfil his vow he was banished from Crete as a murderer. — Homer, "Iliad."

Compare the story of Jephthah in Judges xi.

Idu'na or Idun'. Daughter of the dwarf Svald, and wife of Bragi. She kept in a box the apples which the gods tasted as often as they wished to renew their youth. Loki on one occasion exchanged her into a nut. — Scandinavian mythology.

Ifa'kins. A corruption of In good faith. I' fa' kin, where kin is equivalent to dear or good.

Ifreet or 'Efriet. A powerful evil jin or spirit of Arabian mythology.

Ifurin. The Hadēs of the ancient Gauls. A dark region infested by serpents and savage beasts. Here the wicked are chained in loathsome caverns, plunged into the lairs of dragons, or subjected to a ceaseless distillation of poison. — Celtic mythology.

Iger'na, IGERNE, or IGRAYNE. Wife of Gorlois, duke of Tintagel, in Cornwall, and mother of king Arthur. His father was Uther, pendragon of the Britons, who married Iger'na thirteen days after her husband was slain.

Ignaro. Foster-father of Orgoglio. Whatever question Arthur asked, the old dotard answered, "He could not tell." Spenser says this old man walks one way and looks another, because ignorance is always "wrong-headed." — Spenser, "Faery Queen," bk. i.

Ignatius (St.) is represented in Christian art accompanied by lions, or chained and exposed to them, in allusion to his martyrdom. The legend is that he was brought before the emperor Trajan, who condemned him to be made the food of lions and other wild beasts for the delectation of the people. According to tradition, St. Ignatius was the little child whom our Saviour set in the midst of his disciples for their example. (About 30-115.)

Ignatius Loyola, founder of the order of Jesuits, is depicted in art sometimes with the sacred monogram I.H.S. on his breast; and sometimes as contemplating it, surrounded by glory in the skies, in allusion to his boast that he had a miraculous knowledge of the mystery of the Trinity vouchsafed to him. He is so represented in Rubens' famous picture in Warwick Castle.

Brother Ignatius. The Rev. James Leicester Lyne, for some time head of the English Benedictines at the Norwich Protestant monastery.

Father Ignatius. The Hon. and Very Rev. Geo. Spencer, formerly a clergyman of the Church of England, who joined the Roman communion, and became Superior of the order of Passionists. (1799-1864.)

Igneous Rocks. Those which have been produced by the agency of fire, as the granitic, the trappean, and the volcanic, the last of which belong to the Tertiary strata.

Ignis Fat'uūs means strictly a fatuous fire; also called "Jack o' Lantern," "Spunkie," "Will o' the Wisp," "Walking Fire," and "The Fair Maid of Ireland." Milton calls it Friar's lantern, and Sir Walter Scott Friar Rush with a lantern. Morally speaking, a Uto'pian scheme, no more reducible to practice than the mete'or so called can be turned to any useful end. (See FRIAR'S LANTHERN.)

"When thou ran'st up Gadshill in the night to catch my horse, if I did not think thou hadst been an ignis fatuus or a ball of wild fire, there's no purchase in money." — Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV." iii. 3.

Ignora'mus. One who ignores the knowledge of something; one really unacquainted with it. It is an ancient law term. The grand jury used to write Ignoramus on the back of indictments "not found" or not to be sent into court. Hence ignore.

Ignoran'tines (4 syl.). A religious association founded by the abbé de la Salle in 1724, for educating gratuitously the children of the poor.

Igrayne. (See IGERNA.)

Iguan'odon. An extinct gigantic reptile, with the tooth of the iguan'a.

Ihram. The pilgrim garb of Mahometans. For men, two scarfs, without seams or ornament of any kind, of any material except silk; one scarf is folded round the loins, and the other is thrown over the neck and shoulders, leaving the right arm free; the head is uncovered. For women, an ample cloak, enveloping the whole person.

Il Bibbie'na. Cardinal Bernardo, who resided at Bibbiena, in Tuscany; author of "Calandra," a comedy. (1470-1520.)

Il Passato'rè. A title assumed by Bell'no, a notorious bandit chief of Italy, who died 1851.

Il Pastor Fi'do (the Faithful Swain). This standard of elegant pastoral composition is by Giovanni Battista Guarini, of Ferrara. (1537-1612.)

Il May-day. The 1st of May, 1517, when the London apprentices rose up against the resident foreigners, and did great mischief. More commonly known as Evil May-day.

Il Omens averted.

When Julius Cæsar landed at Adrume'tum, in Africa, he happened to trip and fall on his face. This would have been considered a fatal omen by his army, but, with admirable presence of mind, he exclaimed, "Thus I take possession of thee, O Africa."

When William the Conqueror leaped upon the shore at Pevensey he fell on his face, and a great cry went forth that it was an ill-omen; but the duke exclaimed, "I have taken seisin of this land with both my hands."

Ill-starred. Unlucky; fated to be unfortunate. Othello says of Desdemona, "(O ill-starred wench!" Of course the allusion is to the astrological dogma that the stars influence the lot of men for good and evil.

Il'iad (3 syl.). The tale of the siege of Troy, an epic poem by Homer. Menela'os, king of Sparta, received as his guest Paris, a son of Priam (king of Troy), who ran away with Helen, his hostess. Menela'os induced the Greeks to lay siege to Troy to avenge the perfidy, and the siege lasted ten years. The poem begins in the tenth year with a quarrel between Agamemnon commander-in-chief of the allied Greeks, and Achilles the hero who retires from the army in ill-temper. The Trojans now prevail, and Achilles sends his friend Patroc'los to oppose them, but Patroc'los is slain. Achilles, in a desperate rage, rushes into the battle, and slays Hector, the commander of the Trojan army. The poem ends with the funeral rites of Hector. (Greek, Il'ion aïdo, I sing of Il'ium or Troy.)

The "Il'iad" in a nutshell. Pliny, vii. 21, tells us that the "Il'iad" was copied in so small a hand that the whole work could lie in a walnut-shell. Pliny's authority is Cicero ("Apud Gellium," ix. 421). Huet, bishop of Avranches, demonstrated the possibility of this achievement by writing eighty verses of the "Il'iad" on a single line of a page similar to this "Dictionary." This would be 19,000 verses to the page, or 2,000 more than the "Il'iad" contains.

Whilst they (as Homer's "Il'iad" in a nut)
A world of wonders in one closet shut.

The French Iliad. "The Romance of the Rose," begun by Guillaume de Lorris in the latter half of the thirteenth century, and continued by Jean de Meung in the early part of the fourteenth. The poem is supposed to be a dream. The poet in his dream is accosted by dame Idleness, who conducts him to the palace of Pleasure, where he meets Love, accompanied by Sweet-looks, Riches, Jollity, Courtesy, Liberality, and Youth, who spend their time in dancing, singing, and other amusements. By this retinue the poet is conducted to a bed of roses, where he singles out one and attempts to pluck it, when an arrow from Cupid's bow stretches him fainting on the ground, and he is carried far away from the flower of his choice. As soon as he recovers, he finds himself alone, and resolves to return to his rose. Welcome goes with him; but Danger, Shame-face, Fear, and Slander obstruct him at every turn. Reason advises him to abandon the pursuit, but this he will not do; whereupon Pity and Liberality aid him in reaching the rose of his choice, and Venus permits him to touch it with his lips. Meanwhile, Slander rouses up Jealousy, who seizes Welcome, whom he casts into a strong castle, and gives the key of the castle door to an old hag. Here the poet is left to mourn over his fate, and the original poem ends. Meung added 18,000 lines as a sequel.

The German Iliad. "The Nibelungenlied," put into its present form in 1210 by a wandering minstrel of Austria. It consists of twenty parts. (See NIBELUNG.)

The Portuguese Iliad. "The Lusiad" (q.v.), by Camoens.

The Scotch Iliad. "The Epigo'niad," by William Wilkie, called The Scottish Homer (1721-1772). The Epigo'niad is the tale of the Epig'oni, or seven Grecian heroes who laid siege to Thebes, with the view of placing Pol'yni'cēs on the throne which his brother unlawfully held from him. E'dipos devised that his two sons should reign alternately for a year, but at the close of the first year, Ete'ocles refused to retire. Whereupon his younger brother, aided by the four Argives named Adras'tos, Am'phira'os, Kap'aneus (3 syl.), and Hippom'edon, the Arcadian Parthenop'ce'os, and Tydeus (2 syl.), ex-king of Calydon, led an expedition against Thebes. The Greek tragic poets Æschy'los and Eurip'idēs have dramatised this subject.

An Il'iad of ills (a punning translation of the Latin Il'ias malo'rum). A number of evils falling simultaneously; there is scarce a calamity in the whole catalogue of human ills that finds not mention in the "Iliad," hence the Homeric poem was the fountain of classic tragedy.

Ilk (Saxon). The same; as Macleod of that ilk, i.e., "Macleod of Macleod." All of that ilk, i.e., of that name, character, or class.

Illumina'ted Doctor. Raymond Lully. (1235-1315.)

John Tauler, the German mystic. (1294-1361.)

Illumina'ti. There have been four societies so called:—

(1) The Alombra'dos of Spain in the sixteenth century.

(2) The Guerinets of France in the seventeenth century.

(3) The Mystics of Belgium in the eighteenth century.

(4) The order of the Illumina'ti of Germany founded at Ingoldstadt in 1776, and having for its object the establishment of a religion consistent with "sound reason." (See ROSICRUCIANS.)

Illuminations. Characteristics of Anglo-Saxon illuminations from the eighth to the eleventh century. Extreme intricacy of pattern.

Interlacings of knots in a diagonal or square form, sometimes interwoven with animals and terminating with heads of serpents or birds.—Sir F. Madden.

The "Durham Book," the work of Eadfrid, bishop of Landisfarne, who died 721, is a most splendid specimen of illumination.

The "Benedictional of St. Ethelwold," an illuminated MS. by Godemann, in the duke of Devonshire's library, is worthy of Raphael or Michael Angelo. It was executed between 963 and 984, and is full of miniatures and designs in the highest style of art. Beautiful engravings of it may be seen in the "Archæologia."

Illuminator. Gregory, the apostle of Christianity among the Armenians. (257-331.)

Illustrious (The).

Albert V., duke and second emperor of Austria. (1398-1439.)

Nicomédēs II. Epipha'nēs. (149-191.)

Ptolemy V. Epiphanēs. (210, 205-181, B.C.)

Jam-sheid (Jam the Illustrious), nephew of Tah Omurs, fifth king of the Paisadian dynasty of Persia. (B.C. 840-800.)

Kien-lông, fourth of the Manchoo dynasty of China. (1736-1796.)

Il'o'go. A spirit whose house is the moon. Hers are the forests, rivers, and heavenly host.—(Equatorial Africa.)

Im'ailites (3 syl.). A secret society of the Caliphate.

Im'aum (2 syl.). One of the Ule'ma or priestly body of the Mahometans. Im'aums wear a high turban. The sultan as "head of the Moslems" is an Imaum. The word means teacher.

Ima'us (3 syl.). The Him'alay'a. The word means snow hills (hima, snow).

The huge incumbrance of horrid woods
From Asian Taurus, from Imaus stretched
Athwart the roving Tartar's sullen bounds.
Thomson, "Autumn."

Im'becile (3 syl.). One who leans "on a stick." (Latin, in-bacillum.)

Imbroca'do, in fencing, is a thrust over the arm. (Italian.)

Imbro'glio (Italian). A complicated plot, a misunderstanding between nations and persons of a complicated nature.

Immac'ulate Conception. That the Virgin Mary was conceived without "Original Sin." This dogma was first broached by St. Bernard, and was stoutly maintained by Duns Scotus and his disciples, but was never received by the Roman Church as an article of faith till 1854.

Im'molate (3 syl.). To "put meal on one." The reference is to the ancient custom of sprinkling meal and salt on the head of a victim to be offered in sacrifice. (Latin, in-molo.)

In the picture of the immolation of Isaac, or Abraham sacrificing his son, Isaac is described as a little boy.—Brown.

Immor'tal. The immortal. Yōng-Tching, third of the Manchoo dynasty of China, assumed the title. (1723-1736.)

The immortal tinker. John Bunyan, a tinker by trade. (1628-1688.)

Immortals. A regiment of 10,000 choice foot-soldiers, which constituted the body-guard of the Persian kings. There was also an army so named at Constantinople, according to Ducange, first embodied by major Ducas.

Immu'ring (Latin). Burying in a wall. The Vestal virgins among the Romans, and the nuns among the Roman Catholics, who broke their religious vows, were buried in a niche sufficiently large to contain their body with a small pittance of bread and water. The sentence of immuring was Vade in pace, or more correctly, Vade in pacem (Go into peace—i.e., eternal rest). Some years ago the remains of an immured nun were discovered in the wall of Coldingham abbey.

The immuring of Constance, a nun who had broken her vows, forms a leading incident in Scott's poem of "Marmion."

Im'ogen. Daughter of Cymbeline, the "most tender and artless of all Shakespeare's characters."—"Cymbeline."

Imogen'. The lady who broke her vow and was carried off by the ghost of her former lover, in the ballad of "Alonzo the Brave," by Matthew Gregory Lewis, generally called Monk Lewis.

Alonzo the brave was the name of the knight,
The maid was the fair Imogen.

Imp (Saxon). A graft; whence also a child, as "You little imp." In hawking, "to imp a feather" is to engraft or add a new feather for a broken one. The needles employed for the purpose were called "imping needles." Lord Cromwell, writing to Henry VIII., speaks of "that noble imp your son."

Let us pray for . . . the king's most excellent majesty and for . . . his beloved son Edward, our prince, that most angelic imp.—"Pathway to Prayer."

Imp of darkness is probably the Latin impus.

Impana'tion. The dogma of Luther that the body and soul of Christ are infused into the eucharistic elements after consecration, and that the bread and wine are united with the body and soul of Christ in much the same way as the body and soul of man are united. The word means putting into the bread.

Impanna'ta. The Madonna del Impannata, by Raphael, takes its distinctive name from the oiled paper window in the back-ground. (Italian, impannata, oiled paper.)

Impertinence (1 syl.). A legal term, meaning matter introduced into an affidavit, &c., not pertinent to the case.

Impon'derables (Latin, things without weight). The "matter" of light, heat, electricity, and magnetism. If indeed there is such matter, it is without appreciable weight.

Imposition. A task given for punishment. Of course the word is taken from the verb impose, as the task is imposed; it is an imposition, or thing imposed. The term is common in schools, colleges, and universities. In the sense of a deception it means to "put a trick on a person," hence the expressions "to put on one," "to lay it on thick," &c.

Imposition of Hands. The bishop laying his hand on persons confirmed or ordained.—Acts vi., viii., xix.

Impropria'tion. Profits of ecclesiastical property in the hands of a layman. Appropriation is when the profits of a benefice are in the hands of a college.

Impro'priator. A layman who has church lands or ecclesiastical preferment. (Latin, in-proprius, belonging to.)

Improvis'ator (Italian). One who utters verses impromptu. It was introduced by Petrarch, and is still a favourite amusement with Italians. The most celebrated improvisatori or male improvisators are—

(1) Serafino d'Aquila. (*-1500.)

(2) Metastasio. (1698-1781.)

(3) Bernardino Perfetti, of Sienna (1681-1747), who received a laurel crown in the Capitol, an honour conferred only upon Petrarch and Tasso.

(4) Mare-Antony Zucco, of Vero'na. (*-1764.)

(5) Serio, beheaded at Naples, 1799.

(6) Rossi, beheaded at Naples, 1799.

(7) Gianni, pensioned by Bonaparte. (1759-1822.)

(8) Tommaso Sgricci. (1788-1836.)

Improvīs'atrix or IMPROVISATRICE. The most famous improvisatriciēs or female improvisators are—

Maria Magdale'na Moralli, surnamed the Olympic Corilla Fernandez, crowned at Rome for improvisation. (1740-1800.)
Tere'sa Bandetti'ni. (1756-*)

Rosa Taddei. (1801-*)

Signora Mazzei, the most talented of all.

In Germany, Anna Louisa Karsch.

In Cæna Dom'ini. A papal bull, containing a collection of extracts from different constitutions of the popes, with anathemas against those who violate them. So called because it was annually read "at the Lord's Supper" on Holy Thursday.

In Commen'dam (Latin). The holding of church preferment for a time, on the recommendation of the Crown, till a suitable person can be provided. Thus a clergyman elevated to the bench retains for a time his "living" in comen'dam.

In Essë (Latin). In actual existence. Thus a child living is "in essë," but before birth is only "in possë."

In Exten'so (Latin). At full length, word for word without abridgment.

In Forma Pau'peris. A person who will swear he is not worth £5 has writs, &c., gratis, and is supplied gratuitously with attorney and counsel (Henry VII., c. 12).

In Lim'inë (Latin). At the outset, at the threshold.

In Perpet'uam (Latin). In perpetuity.

In Petto (Italian). Held in reserve, kept back, something done privately, but not announced to the general public. (In pectore, Latin, in the breast.)

In Possë (Latin). What may be considered probable, but has not yet any real existence.

In Pro'pria Perso'na (Latin). Personally, and not by deputy or agents.

In Prospect'u (Latin). What is intended or in contemplation to be done at some future time.

In Re (Latin). In the matter of, as In Re Jones v. Robinson.

In Si'tu (Latin). In its original place.

In Stat'u Quo or "In statu quo antë" (Latin). In the condition things were before the change took place. Thus, two nations arming for war may agree to lay down arms on condition that all things be restored to the same state as they were before they took up arms.

In Terro'rem (Latin). As a warning, to deter others by terrifying them.

In To'to (Latin). Entirely, altogether.

In Vac'uo (Latin). In a vacuum, i.e., where all the air has been taken away.

Inau'gurate (4 syl.) means to be led in by augurs. The Roman augurs met at their college doors the high officials about to be invested, and led them up to the altar; hence to install.

Inca. A king or royal prince of the ancient Peruvians. The empire of the Incas was founded by Mânco Capac.

Incanta'tion. A singing against, that is, singing a set form of words in order to bring Divine wrath upon persons or nations.

Inchcape Rock. Twelve miles from land, in the German Sea. It is dangerous for navigators, and therefore the abbot of Aberbrothlok fixed a bell on a float, which gave notice to sailors of its whereabouts. Ralph the Rover, a sea pirate, cut the bell from the float, and was wrecked on his return home on the very rock. Southey has a ballad on the subject.

Precisely the same tale is told of St. Goven's bell, in Pembrokeshire. In the chapel was a silver bell, which was stolen one summer evening by pirates, but no sooner had the boat put to sea, than all the crew was wrecked. The silver bell was carried by sea nymphs to the brink of a well, and whenever the stone of that well is struck the bell is heard to moan.

N.B. Inch or Inis means island.

Incog, i.e., Incognito (Italian). Without wishing to have your rank recognised.

When a royal person travels, and does not wish to be treated with royal ceremony, he assumes some inferior title for the nonce, and travels incog.

In'cubus. A nightmare, anything that weighs heavily on the mind. (Latin, in cubo, to lie on.)

Incul'cate (3 syl.). To stamp into with the heel. (Latin, calx, the heel.)

Incum'bent. (See CLERICAL TITLES.)

Indepen'dence. The Declaration of Independence. A declaration made July 4, 1776, by the American States, declaring the colonies free and independent, absolved from all allegiance to Great Britain.

Indepen'dents. Certain Dissenters are so called, because it is a fundamental principle with them that every congregation is an independent church, and has a right to choose its own minister and make its own laws.

Index (The), or The Roman Index, or the Index Librorum Prohibitorum, or the Index Expurgatorius. A list of books prohibited by the church of Rome, and published every year by a board of cardinals called the "Congregation of the Index."

Indian Arrow-root. The root which the Indians apply to arrow-wounds to neutralise the venom of the arrow. They mash the meal, and apply it as a poultice.—Miller.

Indian Ink. So called because it was first brought from China. It is now made at home of lampblack and glue.

Indian Red. Red hæmatite (peroxide of iron) found abundantly in the forest of Dean, Gloucestershire. It is of a deep lakey hue, used for flesh tints.

The Persian Red, which is of a darker hue with a sparkling lustre, is imported from the island of Ormuz in the Persian Gulf.

The Romans obtained this pigment from the island of Elba. "Insulam ex-haustis chalybdum generosa metallis."—Ovid.

Indians. American Indians. When Columbus landed at Cat Island, he thought that he had landed on one of the Indian islands, and in this belief gave the natives the name of Indians.

India proper is so named from Indus (the river), in Sanskrit Sindhu, in Persic Hind, whence the Greek Hindus. Hindustan is the tan or "country" of the river Hindus.

Indra. A Hindu deity of the Vedic period, noted for having slain the demon Vri'tra. As god of the firmament he corresponds with the Latin Jupiter. In works of art he is represented as a youthful god mounted on a gigantic elephant.

Indracit'tran. A famous giant in Indian mythology, the ally of Shrirama.

Indrant. Wife of the god Indra, the god who presides over the air, winds, and thunder.—Hindu mythology.

Induc'tion (Latin, the act of leading in). When a clergyman is inducted to a living he is led to the church door, and the ring which forms the handle is placed in his hand. The door being opened, he is next led into the church, and the fact is announced to the parish by tolling the bell.

Indul'gence (3 syl.), in the Roman Catholic church, is the entire or partial pardon of sins granted by the pope, to save or relax the punishment thereof in this world or in purgatory.

Iner'tia (Latin, powerlessness). That want of power in matter to change its state, either from rest to motion, or from motion to rest. Kepler calls it Vis inertie. (Ars in Latin is the Greek ar'etē, power or inherent force; In-ars is the absence of this power.)

Infallibility (of the church of Rome) is the doctrine that the church of Rome cannot at any time cease to be orthodox in her doctrine, and that what she declares ex cathedra is substantially true. The doctrine is based on the Divine promise to the disciples, "Howbeit when the Spirit of Truth is come, he will guide you into all truth."—John xvi. 13.

Infamous means not allowed to speak or give witness in a court of justice. (Latin, in, negative, fari, to speak; Greek, phēmi or phāmi.)

Infant. Infant of Lubeck. Christian Henry Heineken. (1721-1725.) At one year old he knew the chief events of the Pentateuch; at thirteen months he knew the history of the Old Testament; at fourteen months he knew the history of the New Testament; at two and a-half years he could answer any ordinary question of history or geography; at three years he knew well both French and Latin.

Infanta. Any princess of the blood royal, except an heiress of the crown, is so called in Spain and Portugal.

Infan'te (3 syl.). All the sons of the sovereigns of Spain and Portugal bear this title, except the crown prince, who is called in Spain the prince of Astu'rias. In the middle ages the word childe was used as a title of honour in England, France, and Germany: hence Childe Harold, Childe-ric, Childe-bert, &c.

Infernal Column. So the corps of Latour d'Anvergne was called, from its terrible charges with the bayonette. (1743-1800.)

Infer'no. We have Dante's notion of the infernal regions in his "Inferno;" Homer's in the "Odyssey," book xi.; Virgil's in the "Æneid," book vi.; Spenser's in the "Faëry Queen," book ii. canto 7; Ariosto's in the "Orlando Furio'so," book xvii.; Tasso's in "Jerusalem Delivered," bk. iv.; Milton's in "Paradise Lost;" and Beckford's in his romance of "Vathek."

Infra Dig. (dignita'tem). Not in accordance with one's position and character. Latin for "beneath one's rank or status in society."

Infra-Lapsa'rians. A sect which hold that God has created some men to condemnation, without the possibility of being saved. They are called Infra-lapsarian, because they suppose that these ill-fated beings are justly treated, as they have fallen in Adam.

Ingoldsby. The Rev. Richard Harris Barham, author of "Ingoldsby Legends." (1788-1845.)

Injunc'tion A writ forbidding a person to do a specified meditated wrong. The wrong specified does not amount to a crime. Injunctions are of two sorts—temporary and perpetual. The first is limited "till the coming on of the defendant's answer;" the latter is based on the merits of the case, and is of perpetual force.

Ink. Pancirollus says the emperors used a fluid for writing called encaustum. (Italian, inchiestro; French, encre; Dutch, inkt.)

Inkle and Yar'ico. The hero and heroine of a drama so called by George Colman. The story is from the "Spectator," No. 11. Inkle is a young Englishman who is lost in the Spanish main; he falls in love with Yarico, an Indian maiden, whom he lives with as his wife; but no sooner does he find a vessel to take him to Barbadoes, than he sells her for a slave.

Inland Navigation. Francis Egerton, duke of Bridgewater, is called the Father of British Inland Navigation. (1729-1803.) A title certainly due to James Brindley. (1716-1772.)

Inn (Saxon). Chamber; originally applied to a mansion, like the French hôtel. Hence Clifford's Inn, once the mansion of De Clifford; Lincoln's Inn, the mansion of the Earls of Lincoln; Gray's Inn, that of the Lords Gray, &c.

Now, when as Phœbus, with his fiery waine,
Unto his inne began to draw apace.
Spenser, "Faëry Queen," vi. 3.

Inns of Court. The four voluntary societies which have the exclusive right of calling to the bar. They are the Inner Temple, the Middle Temple, Lincoln's Inn, and Gray's Inn. Each is governed by a board of benchers.

Innings. He has had a long innings. A good long run of luck. A term in cricket for the time that the eleven are in, or not out as scouts. The innings of an individual is the time he has the bat. The field or scouts are outers.

Innocents. Feast of the Holy Innocents. The 28th December, to commemorate Herod's butchery of the children of Bethlehem from two years old and upward, with the design of cutting off the infant Jesus.

Innuen'do. An implied or covert hint of blame. It is a law term, meaning the person nodded to (Latin, in-nuo), and is thus used: A defendant or his pleader speaking of the plaintiff would say, "He, innuendo, did so and so," i.e., He, the person I nod to or refer to (viz., the plaintiff) did so and so.

Inoc'ulate (4 syl.) is to put in an eye (Latin, in oculus). The allusion is to a plan adopted by gardeners who insert the "eye" or small bud of a superior plant into the stock of an inferior one, in order to produce flowers or fruits of better quality.

In'ogene or IG'NOGE (3 syl.). Wife of Brute, the mythological king of Britain.

Thus Brute this realm unto his rule subdewd,
And reign'd long in great felicity.

Loved of his friends, and of his foes eschewd.

He left three sons, his famous progeny,

Born of fayre Inogene of Italy.

Spenser, "Faëry Queen," ii. 10.

Inquisition. A court instituted to inquire into offences against the Roman Catholic religion. The first was established in the south of France in the thirteenth century. (Latin, inquisitio, a searching into.)

Inspired. The inspired idiot. So Walpole called Oliver Goldsmith. (1723-1774.)

Instantia Crucis. (See CRUCIAL.)

Instinct. Something pricked or punctured into one. Distinguish is of the same root, and means to prick or puncture separately. Extinguish means to prick or puncture out. In all cases the allusion is to marking by a puncture. At college the "markers" at the chapel doors still hold a pin in one hand, and prick with it the name of each "man" that enters.

Insu'bri. The district of Lombardy, which contained Milan, Como, Pavia, Lodi, Nova'ra, and Vercelli.

Insult. To leap on the prostrate body of a foe.

Insultor. One who leaps upon you or against you. Thus Terence says, "insulta'rè forësal'cibus" (Eun. 2. 2. 54). It will be remembered that the priests of Baal, to show their indignation against their gods, "leaped upon the altar which they had made" (1 Kgs. xviii. 26). Zephaniah (i. 9) says that God will "punish all those that leap on the threshold." (See DESULTORY.)

Intaglio (Italian). A design cut in a gem, like a crest or initials in a stamp. The design does not stand out in relief, as in cameos, but is hollowed in.

Intellect. The power of reading mentally. (Latin, intus lego, I read within me.)

Inter alia (Latin). Among other things or matters.

Intercal'ary (Latin). Called between. Thus, an intercalary day is a day foisted in between two others, as the 29th February in leap-year. (See CALENDAR.)

Interdict and Excommunicate. The pope or some ecclesiastic interdicts a kingdom, province, county, or town, but excommunicates an individual. This sentence excludes the place or individual from partaking in certain sacraments, public worship, and the burial service. The most remarkable instances are the following:—

1081. Poland was laid under an interdict by pope Gregory VII., because Boleslas II. had murdered Stanislaus at the altar.

1180. Scotland was put under a similar ban by pope Alexander III.

1200. France was interdicted by Innocent III. because Philippe Auguste refused to marry Ingelburge, who had been betrothed to him.

1209. England was laid under similar sentence by Innocent III., and continued so for six years, in the reign of king John.

In France, Robert the Pious, Philippe I., Louis VII., Philippe Auguste, Philippe IV., and Napoleon I., have all been subjected to the papal thunder. In England, Henry II. and John. Victor Emmanuel of Italy has been excommunicated by Pius IX. for despoiling the papacy of a large portion of its temporal dominions.

In'terest (Latin). Something that is between the parties concerned. The interest of money is the sum which the borrower agrees to pay the lender for its use. To take an interest in anything is to feel there is something between it and you which may affect your happiness.

Interlard (French). To put lard or fat between layers of meat. Metaphorically, to mix what is the solid part of a discourse with fulsome and irrelevant matter. Thus we say, "To interlard with oaths," to "interlard with compliments," &c.

Interlo'per. One who runs between traders. One who sets up business, and by so doing interferes with the actual or supposed rights of others. (Dutch, loopen, to run.)

Inter'polate (4 syl.). For two or more persons to polish up something between them; spurious emendations. (Latin, inter polio.)

Inter'preter (Mr.). The impersonation of the Holy Spirit in "Pilgrim's Progress," by John Bunyan.

Interpreter really means the Holy Spirit. In "Pilgrim's Progress" he is lord of a house a little way beyond the Wicket Gate. Here Christian was kindly entertained and shown many wonderful sights of an allegorical character. Christiana and her party stopped here also, and were entertained in a similar manner. —Bunyan.

Inter Rex (Latin). A person appointed to hold the office of king pro tem.

Into'ne (2 syl.). To thunder out; intonation, the thundering of the voice. (Latin, tonare, to thunder). The Romans said that Cicero and Demosthenes "thundered out their orations." It is instructive to notice how thunder symbolises the human voice even in its musical character.

Intrigue (2 syl.) comes from the Greek thrix, hair, whence the Latin trix, trifles or hairs; the German trug, a deception carried on by false hair.

Inure (2 syl.) is to burn in, as colours used to be in encaustic painting, or as a brand was burnt on the skin of a criminal. To inure oneself to labour is to burn it into the body by habit till it can be no more separated than a brand, or the colour of encaustic tiles.

Invalide (French). A four-sou piece, so called because it was debased to the value of three sous and a-half.

Tien, prens cet invalide. à ma santé va boire.
"Deux Arlequins." (1691.)

Inveigle (3 syl.). To lead blindfold. (Norman French, enveugler; French, aveugler; Italian, invogliare.)

Invention of the Cross (discovery of the cross). A festival held on May 3rd, in commemoration of the discovery of the cross by the agents of St. Helena, mother of Constantine the emperor (316). (Latin, inven'io, to discover.)

Inventors punished by their own inventions :—

(a) Perillos, who invented the Brazen Bull for Phalaris, tyrant of Agrigentum, was the first person baked to death in the monster.

(b) The regent Morton of Scotland, who invented or adopted the Maiden, a sort of guillotine, was the first to be executed by his own machine (in the reign of queen Elizabeth).

(c) Hugues Aubriot, provost of Paris, who built the Bastile, was the first person confined in his own strong castle. The charge against him was heresy.

(d) The bishop of Verdun who invented the iron cages, too small to allow the person confined in them to stand upright or lie at full length, was the first to be shut up in one; and cardinal La Balue, who recommended them to Louis XI., was himself confined in one for ten years.

(e) Ludivico Sforza, who invented the Iron Shroud, was the first to suffer death by the horrible torture.

(f) Haman, son of Hammedatha, the Amalekite, of the race of Agag, devised a gallows fifty cubits high, on which to hang Mordecai, by way of commencing the extirpation of the Jews; but the favourite of Ahasuerus was himself hanged on his gigantic gallows. In modern history we have a repetition of this incident in the case of Euguerand de Marigni, Minister of Finance to Philippe the Fair, who was hung on the gibbet which he had caused to be erected at Montfaucon, for the execution of certain felons; and four of his successors in office underwent the same fate.

Inves'tigate (4 syl.) is to track step by step. (Latin, vestigium.)

Inves'titure. (Latin, clothing in or putting on canonicals.) The admission to office is generally made by investiture: Thus a pair of gloves is given to a Freemason in France; a cap is given to a graduate; a crown, &c., to a sovereign, &c. A crosier and ring used to be given to a church dignitary. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries the kings of Europe and the pope were perpetually at variance about the right of investiture; the question was, should the sovereigns or should the pope invest clergymen or appoint them to their livings and dignities?

Invin'ible Doctor. William of Occam or Ockham (a village in Surrey), also called Doctor Singularis. (1270-1347.)

Invis'ibles. (1) The Rosicrucians were so called, because they never dared to appear in public.

(2) The disciples of Osiander, Flaccius, Iliricus, &c., who denied the perpetual visibility of the church.

Iol (pron. Yol). The Danish word for Christmas; the same as Yule.

The savage Dane
At Iol more deep the mead did drain.
Sir Walter Scott, "Marmion."

Io'nian Mode. A species of church music in the key of C major, in imitation of the ancient Greek mode so called.

Ionic Accomplishments. Gesture and dress.

Ion'ic Architecture. So called from Io'nia where it took its rise. The capitals are decorated with volutes, and the cornice with dentils.

The people of Ionia formed their order of architecture on the model of a young woman dressed in her hair, and of an easy elegant shape; whereas the Doric had been formed on the model of a robust, strong man. — Vitruvius.

Ion'ic School or Ionic Philosophers. Thal'es, Anaximander, Anaxime'n'es, Heracl'i'tos, and Anaxag'oras were all natives of Ionia, and were the earliest of the Greek philosophers. They tried to prove that all created things spring from one principle; Thal'es said it was water, Anaximene's thought it was air or gas, Anaxagoras that it was atoms, Heraclitos maintained that it was fire or caloric, while Anaximander insisted that the elements of all things are eternal, for ex nihilo nihil fit.

Iormungan'dur. The serpent that encompasses the whole earth, according to Scandinavian mythology.

Io'ta or Jot. A very little, the least quantity possible. The iöta is the smallest letter of the Greek alphabet, called the Lacedemonian letter.

This bond doth give thee here no jot of blood.
Shakespeare, "Merchant of Venice," iv. 1.

Io'thun. A generic name for the giants of Celtic mythology.

Io'thunheim or Iotunheim (4 syl.). The home of the Iothun, somewhere on the pinnacles of the Scandinavian mountains.

Iphigeni'a. Daughter of Agamemnon. Her father having offended Ar'temis (Diana), vowed to sacrifice to the angry goddess the most beautiful thing that came into his possession in the next twelve months; this was an infant daughter. The father deferred the sacrifice till the fleet of the combined Greeks reached Aulis and Iphigenia had grown to womanhood. Then Calchas told him that the fleet would be wind-bound till he had fulfilled his vow; accordingly the king prepared to sacrifice his daughter, but Ar'temis snatched her from the altar and carried her to heaven, substituting a hind in her place.

The similarity of this legend to the Scripture stories of Jephtha's vow, and Abraham's offering of his son Isaac, is noticeable. (See IDOMENEUS.)

Ipse-dixit (Latin). A mere assertion, wholly unsupported. We say it is "your ipse-dixit," "his ipse-dixit," "their ipse-dixit," and so on.

Ipswich. A corruption of Gypes-wick, the town on the river "Gyppen," now called the Orwell.

Iram'. The pilgrim's garb is so called by the Arabs.

Iran. The empire of Persia.

Avenge the shame
His race hath brought on Iran's name.
Thomas Moore, "Fire Worshipers."

Ireland or Erin is Celtic; from Eri or Iar (western). Lloyd ("State Worthies," article Grandison), with a gravity which cannot but excite laughter, says the island is called the land of Ire because of the broils there, which have extended over 400 years. Wormius derives the word from the Runic Ir, a bow. (See below.)

Ireland.

Called by the natives "Erin," i.e., Eri-innis, or Iar-innis (west island).

By the Welsh "Yver-den" (west valley).

By Apule'ius, Hibernia, which is Iernia, a corruption of Iar-inni-a.

By Juvenal (ii. 260) Juverna or Ju-berna, the same as Ierna or Iernia.

By Claudian, Ouernia, the same.

By moderns, Ireland, which is Iar-en-land (land of the west).

"The three great saints of Ireland are St. Patrick, St. Columba, and St. Bridget.

The fair maid of Ireland. Ignis fatuus (q.v.).

He had read in former times of a Going Fire, called "Ignis Fatuus," the fire of destiny; by some, "Will with the Whisp," or "Jack with the lantern;" and likewise, by some simple country people, "The Fair Maid of Ireland," which used to lead wandering travellers out of their way.—"The Seven Champions of Christendom," i. 7.

The three tragic stories of the Irish. (1) The death of the children of Touran;

(2) The death of the children of Lir; (3) The death of the children of Usnach.—O'Flanagan, vol. i., "Transactions of the Gaelic Society of Dublin."

Ire'na. The impersonation of Ireland, whose inheritance was withheld by the tyrant Grantorto. Sir Artegal (Justice) is sent by the Faëry Queen to succour the distressed lady. Grantorto, or the rebellion of 1580, being slain, she is restored to her throne and reigns in peace.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," v.

Iris. Goddess of the rainbow, or the rainbow itself. In classic mythology she is called the messenger of the gods when they intended discord, and the rainbow is the bridge or road let down from heaven for her accommodation. When the gods meant peace they sent Mercury.

I'll have an Iris that shall find thee out.
Shakespeare, "2 Henry VI.," iii. 2.

Irish Agita'tor. Daniel O'Connell. (1775-1847.)

Irish Beauty. A woman with two black eyes—no uncommon "decoration" among the low Irish.

Irish Legs. Thick and clumsy ones. Grose says that "the Irish women have a dispensation from the pope to wear the thick end of their legs downwards."

Irish Wedding. When a person has a black eye we sometimes say to him, "You have been to an Irish wedding, I see," because the Irish are more famous for giving their guests on these occasions black eyes than white favours.

Iron. The hieroglyphic for iron is ♂, which denotes "gold at the bottom (O), only its upper part is too sharp, volatile, and half corrosive (I); this being taken away, iron would become gold. Iron is called Mars.

The iron enters into his soul. The anguish or annoyance is felt most keenly. The allusion is to the ancient custom of torturing the flesh with instruments of iron.

I saw the iron enter into his soul, and felt what sort of pain it was that ariseth from hope deferred.—Sterne.

Iron Age. The era between the death of Charlemagne and the close of the Carolingian dynasty is so called from its almost ceaseless wars. It is sometimes called the leaden age for its worthlessness, and the dark age for its barrenness of learned men.

Iron Age. The age of cruelty and hard-heartedness. When Hubert tells Prince Arthur he must burn his eyes out, the young prince replies, "Ah, none but in this iron age would do it."—Shakespeare, "King John," iv. 1.

Iron-arm. Francis de la Noue, the Huguenot soldier, Bras de Fer. (1531-1591.)

Iron Crown of Lombardy is so called from a narrow band of iron within it, said to be beaten out of one of the nails used at the Crucifixion. This band is about three-eighths of an inch broad, and one-tenth of an inch in thickness. According to tradition, the nail was first given to Constantine by his mother, who discovered the cross. The outer circlet of the crown is of beaten gold, and set with precious stones. The crown is preserved with great care at Monza, near Milan, and Napoleon, like his predecessor Charlemagne, was crowned with it.

After the war between Austria and Italy, the Iron Crown was delivered by the former power to Victor Emmanuel.

Iron-hand or The Iron-hander. Goetz von Berlichingen (Godfrey of Berlichingen), who lost his right hand at the siege of Landshut, and had one made of iron to supply its place. (1480-1562.)

Iron Mask. The man in the iron mask was count Er'colo Antonio Matthioli, a senator of Mantua, and private agent of Ferdinand Charles, duke of Mantua. He suffered his long and strange imprisonment of twenty-four years for having deceived Louis XIV. in a secret treaty for the purchase of the fortress of Casal, the key of Italy. The agents of Spain and Austria bribed him by outbidding the Grand Monarque. The secrecy observed by all parties was inviolate, because the infamy of the transaction would not bear daylight.—H. G. A. Ellis, "True History of the Iron Mask."

There are several others "identified" as the veritable Iron Mask, g.e.—

(1) Louis, duc de Vermandois, natural son of Louis XIV. by De la Vallière, who was imprisoned for life, because he gave the Dauphin a box on the ears. ("Mémoires Secrets pour servir à l'Histoire de Perse.") This cannot be, as the duke died in camp, 1683.

(2) A young foreign nobleman, chamberlain of Queen Anne, and real father of Louis XIV.—A Dutch story.

(3) Duc de Beaufort, King of the Markets. (Legrange-Chancel, "L'Année Littéraire, 1759.") This supposition is worthless, as the duke was slain by the Turks at the siege of Candia.

(4) An elder brother of Louis XIV., some say by the Duke of Buckingham, others by Cardinal Mazarin. (See Voltaire, "Dictionnaire Philosophique" (Anna), and Linguet, "Bastille Dévoilée,"

(5) Abbé Soulavie asserts it was a twin brother of Louis XIV., Maréchal Richelieu. This tale forms the basis of Zochokke's German tragedy, and Fournier's drama.

(6) Some maintain that it was Fouquet, the disgraced Minister of Finance to Louis XIV.

(7) Some that it was an Arminian patriarch.

(8) Some that it was the duke of Monmouth; but he was executed on Tower Hill in 1685.

Ironsides. Edmund II., king of the Anglo-Saxons, was so called, from his iron armour. (989, 1016-1017.)

Nestor Ironside. Sir Richard Steel, who assumed the nom de plume in "The Guardian." (1671-1729.)

Ironsides. The soldiers that served under Cromwell were so called, especially after the battle of Marston Moor, where they displayed an iron resolution.

Iron-tooth (Dent de Fer). Frederick II., elector of Brandenburg. (1657, 1688-1713.)

Irony. A dissembling. (Greek, etron, a dissembler.)

So grave a body upon so solemn an occasion should not deal in irony, or explain their meaning by contraries.—Swift.

Irrefragable Doctor. Alexander of Hales, an English friar, founder of the scholastic theology. (13th cent.)

Irrel'evant is not to relieve, not to lighten. Irrelevant matter is that which does not help to bear the burden or make it lighter. (Latin, in releva'rē; levis, light.)

Irresistible. When Alexander went to consult the Delphic oracle before his Persian invasion, he arrived on a day when no responses were made. Nothing daunted, he went in search of the Pythia, and when she refused to attend, took her to the temple by force. "Son," said the priestess, "thou art irresistible." "Enough!" cried Alexander; "I accept your words as my response," and returned to Macedon.

Irspilles Felles. Skins having bristly hair like that of goats. (Hircipilus, i.e., "goat's hair."—Festus.) A fell is Saxon for "skin," like the Latin pell-is, English peel. Thus we say still a "wool-fell." Shakespeare speaks of "a fell of hair."—"Macbeth," v. 5.

Irus. The beggar of gigantic stature who kept watch over the suitors of Penelope. His real name was Arneus, but the suitors nicknamed him Iros because he carried their messages for them. Ulysses, on his return, felled him to the ground with a single blow, and flung him out of doors.

Poorer than Irus. A Greek proverb, adopted by the Romans (see Ovid), and existing in the French language (plus pauvre qu'Irus), alluding to the beggar referred to above.

Ir'vingites (3 syl.). The self-styled Apostolic Catholic Church, founded by the Rev. Edward Irving in 1829.

Isaac. A hedge-sparrow, a corruption of Chaucer's word heiswagge. (Saxon, heag, hedge; sugge, a bird.)

Isaac of York. The Jew in "Ivanhoe," and father of Rebecca.—Sir Walter Scott.

Isabel, called She-wolf of France. The adulterous queen of Edward II., daughter of Philippe IV. (le Bel) of France. According to tradition, she murdered her royal husband by thrusting a hot iron into his bowels.

Mark the year and mark the night
When yestern shall re-echo with affright
The shrieks of death through Berkeley's roofs that ring,
Shrieks of an agonising king.
She-wolf of France, with unrelenting fangs,
That tearst the bowels of thy mangled mate!
Gray, "The Bard."

Is'abel. The Spanish form of Elizabeth. The French form is Isabelle.

Isabella, princess of Sicily, in love with Robert le Diable, but promised in marriage to the prince of Grana'da, who challenged Robert to mortal combat. Robert is allured from the combat by his fiend-father, but when Alice tells him that Isabella "the princess is waiting for him at the altar," a struggle takes place between Bertram and Alice, the one trying to drag the duke to the infernal regions, and the other trying to win him to the ways of virtue. Alice prevails, but the audience is not informed whether Robert marries Isabella or not.—Mayer-beer's opera, "Roberto il Diavolo."

Isabella, daughter of Hercules, duke of Ferrara, sister of Alfonso and Ippolito, and wife of Francisco Gonzaga, lord of Mantua.

Isabelle or Isabella (in "Orlando Furioso"), daughter of the king of Galicia, in love with Zerbiño; but being a pagan, Zerbiño could not marry her. Zerbiño induces her to quit her native land, and gives Odorico charge of her. She is wrecked, and Odorico escapes with her to Rochelle. Here Odorico assails her virtue, but is alarmed by a vessel which he sees approaching, and flees. She is kept captive by the crew for nine months, but Orlando slays or hangs all the crew, and Isabella being free, accompanies her rescuer. Her lament at the death of Zerbiño is one of the best parts of the poem (bk. xii.). She retires to a chapel to bury Zerbiño, and is there slain by Rodomont.

Isabelle. The colour so called is the yellow of soiled calico. A yellow-dun horse is called in France un cheval Isabelle. The origin of the term is as follows:—In the Spanish wars queen Isabel made a vow to the Virgin never to change her linen till Granada fell into her hands. The siege lasted much longer than she had anticipated, and her body-linen acquired a tint which the French still call Isabelle.

Bright-Sun was mounted on a black horse, that of Felix was a grey, Chery's was white as milk, and the princess's an Isabelle.—Countess D'Anois, "Fair-Star and Prince Chery."

Isaf. An Arabian idol in the form of a man, brought from Syria, and placed in Es-Safa, near the temple of Mecca. Some say Isaf was a man converted into stone for impiety, and that Mahomet suffered this one "idol" to remain as a warning to his disciples.

Isenbras or Sir Isunbras. A hero of mediæval romance, first proud and presumptuous, when he was visited by all sorts of punishments; afterwards penitent and humble, when his afflictions were turned into blessings. It was in this latter stage that he one day carried on his horse two children of a poor woodman across a ford. (See YSAMBRAS.)

I warne you first at the begynnynge
That I will make no vain carpage (talk)
Of deeds of armes ne of amours,
As dus mynstrelles and jest urs,
That akys carpage in many a place
Of Octoriane and Isembra-
"William of Nassington."

I'sengrin or Sir Isgrim, the wolf, afterwards created earl of Pitwood, in the beast-epic of "Reynard the Fox." Isengrin typifies the barons, and Reynard the church, and the gist of the tale is to show how Reynard bamboozles his uncle Wolf. (German, Isegrim, a wolf, a surly fellow.)

Isfen'diar. The angel which guards the chastity of women, and preserves domestic peace.—Mohometan mythology.

Isha'ni. The personification of the active power of Isa or Iswara. It is represented under the form of a woman, and regarded as the goddess of nature and protectress of water. Her chief fête is called Durgotsava.

Ishban, in the satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," by Dryden and Tate, is Sir Robert Clayton, who'd "o'en turn loyal to be made a peer" (pt. ii.).

Ish'bosheth, in Dryden's satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," is meant for Richard Cromwell. His father Oliver is called Saul. At the death of Saul, Ishbosheth was acknowledged king by a party, and reigned two years, when he was assassinated.

They wh. when Saul was dead, without a blow,
Made foolish Ishbosheth the crown forego.

Ish'monie'. The petrified city in Upper Egypt, full of men and women turned to stone.—Perry, "View of the Levant."

Marryatt has borrowed the idea in his "Pacha of Many Tales."

I'siac Table. A spurious Egyptian monument sold by a soldier to cardinal Bembo in 1527, and preserved at Turin. It is of copper, and on it are represented most of the Egyptian deities in the mysteries of Isis. It was said to have been found at the siege of Rome in 1525. The word Isiac is an adjective formed from Isis.

Isido'rian Decree'tals. Also called Pseudo or False Decretals. A spurious compilation of fifty-nine decretals by Mentz, who lived in the ninth century, and fraudulently ascribed them to Isidore of Seville, who died in the sixth century. Prior to the ninth century the only authentic collection of decretals or letters of the popes in reply to questions proposed to them by bishops, ecclesiastical judges, and others, was that of Dionysius the Little [Exiguus], a Roman monk, who lived in the middle of the sixth century. He commences with pope Siricius (fourth century). The Isidorian decretals contain fifty-nine letters ascribed to persons living between Clement and Siricius, and forty others not contained in the Dionysian collection. The object of these forged letters is either to exalt the papacy or enforce some law assuming the existence of such exaltation. Amongst these spurious letters are the decretal of St. Anacletus, the decretal of St. Alexander, the letter of Julius to the Easterns, the synodical letter of St. Athanasius, the decretal of St. Fabian instituting the rite of the chrism, and so on.

La réforme pseudo-Isidorienne, adoptée par S. Nicolas, en 845, par le huitième concile oecuménique en 879, confirmée par le concile de Trent en 1564, elle est depuis neuf siècles le droit commun dans l'Eglise catholique. ... ce qu'il est impossible de justifier et même d'excuser, c'est le moyen employé par le pseudo-Isidore pour arriver à ses fins.—Études Religieuses, N. 47, p. 392.

Isinglass. A corruption of the Dutch hyzenblas (an air-bladder), being prepared from the bladders and sounds of sturgeon.

Isis. Wife of Osiris, and mother of Horus. The cow was sacred to her. She is said to have invented spinning and weaving.—Egyptian mythology.

Inventress of the woof, fair Liua (flax) flings
The flying shuttle thro' the dancing strings . . .
Taught by her labours, from the fertile soil
Immortal Isis clothed the banks of Nile.

Darwin, "Loves of the Plants," c. ii.

Milton, in "Paradise Lost," names Osiris, Isis, and Orus amongst the fallen angels (bk. i. 478).

Isis, Herodotus thinks, is Deme'ter (Ce'rēs).

Diodorus confounds her with the Moon, Demeter, and Juno.

Plutarch confounds her with Athēna (Minerva), Persēphōnē (Proserpine), the Moon, and Tē'thus.

Apuleius calls her the mother of the gods, Minerva, Venus, Diana, Proserpine, Ce'rēs, Juno, Bello'na, Hecate, and Rhamnu'sia [Nem'esis].

Isis. Some maintain that Isis was at one time the protectress of Paris, and that the word Paris is a contraction of the Greek Para Isidos (near the temple of Isis), the temple referred to being the Pantheon or Church of St. Geneviève. We are told, moreover, that a statue of Isis was for a long time preserved in the church of St. Germain-des-Prés, but was broken to pieces by cardinal Briçonnet because he saw certain women offering candles to it as to the Virgin.

The Young Isis. Cleopatra. (69-30 B.C.)

Islam or ISLAMISM. The true faith, according to the Mahometan notion. The Moslems say every child is born in Islam, and would continue in the true faith if not led astray into Magism, Judaism, or Christianity. The word means resignation or submission to the will of God.

Islamite (3 syl.). A follower of Mahomet or believer in Islamism.

Island of Saints. So Ireland was called in the Middle Ages.

Island of St. Brandan. The flying island, the supposed retreat of king Rodri'go. So called from St. Brandan, who went in search of the Islands of Paradise in the sixth century.

Islands of the Blest. Islands to which the favourites of the gods were conveyed at death.—Classic mythology.

Isle of Dogs. So called from being the receptacle of the greyhounds of Edward III. Some say it is a corruption of the Isle of Ducks, and that it is so called in ancient records, from the number of wild fowl inhabiting the marshes.

Isma'elians (4 syl.). A Mahometan sect, which maintained that Isma'el, and not Moussa, ought to be Imaum'. In the tenth century they formed a secret society, from which sprang the Assassins.

Isme'nē (3 syl.). Daughter of Ce'dippus and Jocasta. Antig'onē was buried alive by the order of king Creon, for burying her brother Polyne'cēs, slain in combat by his brother Ete'oclē's. Isme'nē declared that she had aided her sister, and requested to be allowed to share the same punishment.

Isme'nē. The lady-love of Isme'nas, in the erotic romance of Eustathius or Eumathius, entitled "Ismene and Ismenias" (twelfth century).

Isménias. A Theban musician of whom Ath'eas, king of the Scythians, declared, "I liked the music of Ismenias better than the braying of an ass."—Plutarch.

Ismé'no (in "Jerusalem Delivered"). A magician who could "call spirits from the vasty deep." He was once a Christian, but became Mahometan. He was killed by a stone hurled at him by an engine (bk. xviii.).

Isoc'rátēs. The French Isocrates. Flechier, bishop of Nismes. (1632-1710.)

Is'olde (2 syl.). Wife of king Mark, of Cornwall, who had an illicit affection for Sir Tristram, her nephew. Called Isolde the Fair.

Isothermal Lines. Lines laid down in maps to show the places which have the same mean temperature. (Greek, isos thermos, equal heat.)

Isparetta. Supreme god of the people of Malabar. She converted herself into an egg, from which was hatched heaven and earth with all that they contain. She has three eyes and eight hands. (See LEDA.)

Is'rael, in Dryden's satire of "Ab-salom and Achitophel," stands for England.

Is'rafil'. The angel of music, who possessed the most melodious voice of all God's creatures. This is the angel who is to sound the Resurrection Trump, and will ravish the ears of the saints in paradise. Israfil, Gabriel, and Michael were the three angels that warned Abraham of Sodom's destruction.—Sale, "Koran."

A winged band, commanded by Israfil, the angel of the resurrection, came to meet Roland.—"Croque-mitaine," ii. 9.

Issa. Jesus.

Iss'achar, in Dryden's satire of "Ab-salom and Achitophel," means Thomas Thynne, of Longleat Hill, a friend of the duke of Monmouth. He was assassinated in his carriage, in Pall Mall, by ruffians hired by count Koningsmark. The cause of this murder was jealousy; both Mr. Thynne and the count were in love with lady Elizabeth Percy, the widow of the earl of Ogle. Her friends contracted her to the rich commoner, but before the marriage was consummated Mr. Thynne was murdered. Within three months the lady married the duke of Somerset. (See MOHUN.)

Issachar's Ears. Ass's ears. The allusion is to Gen. xlix. 14:—"Issachar is a strong ass crouching down between two burdens."

Is't possible that you, whose ears
Are of the tribe of Issachar's....
Should yet be deaf against a noise
So roaring as the public voice?

S. Butler, Hudibras to Sidrophel.

Issland. The kingdom of Brunhild is identified by Von der Hagen with Iceland, but Wackernagel says it means Amazonian-land, and derives it from the Old German itis (a woman).—The "Nibelungen-Lied."

Isth'mian Games. Epsom races were styled "Our Isthmian Games" by lord Palmerston, in allusion to the famous games, consisting of chariot races, running, wrestling, boxing, &c., held by the Greeks in the Isthmus of Corinth every alternate spring, the first and third of each Olympiad.

Isthmus of Suëz. The covered bridge of St. John's College, Cambridge, is so called, because it connects the college with the grounds on the other side of the river. Suez in this case is a pun on the word sus (a hog), the Johnians being nicknamed hogs in University slang, whether because they are "porci literarum" or "Epicuri de gregē porci," I shall leave others to determine.

Italian Architecture. The Roman architecture revived in the fifteenth century, and in vogue during that and the two succeeding ones. It is divided into three schools: the Florentine, Roman, and Venetian.

Italic School of Philosophy. The Pythagorean, so called because Pythagoras taught in Italy.

Italic Version. A version of the Bible from the Septuagint, which preceded the Vulgate, or the version by St. Jerome.

Italics. The type first used by Aldo Manuzio in printing the Aldine classics. It was called by him Corsi'vi. Virgil was the first author printed in this type (1501). Francesco of Bologna cast it.

The words italicised in the Bible have no corresponding words in the original. The translators supplied these words to render the sense of the passage more full and clear. In some cases they are manifestly in error, as 1 Cor. i. 26, "not many wise men after the flesh . . . are called," should be call ye. The whole gist of the chapter is to show that men are called by the foolishness of preaching.

Italy. The champion of Italy was St. Anthony. — Seven Champions of Christendom, pt. i. 6.

Ithu'riel. One of the angels commissioned by Gabriel to search for Satan, who had effected his entrance into Paradise. The other angel who accompanied him was Zephon. (Ithuriel means "the discovery of God.") — Milton, "Paradise Lost," iv.

Itiha'sas. The Ramaya'na and Maha-Bharata, the two great heroic poems of the Hindus.

I'van. The Russian form of John, called Juan in Spain, Giovanni in Italian.

Ivan the Terrible. Ivan IV. of Russia, infamous for his cruelties, but a man of great energy. He first adopted the title of czar. (1529-1584.)

I'vanhoe (3 syl.) Sir Wilfred, knight of Ivanhoe, is the disinherited son of Cedric of Rotherwood. He is first introduced as a pilgrim, in which guise he enters his father's hall, where he meets Rowena. He next appears as Desdichado, the "Disinherited Knight," in the grand tournament where he vanquishes all opponents. At the intercession of King Richard he is reconciled to his father, and ultimately marries Rowena, his father's ward. Rebecca, the Jew's daughter, to whom he had shown many acts of kindness, was in love with him.

Sir Walter Scott took the name from the village of Ivanhoe, or Ivinghoe, in Bucks, a line in an old rhymed proverb — "Tring, King, and Ivanhoe" — having attracted his attention.

Ivanovitch. A lazy, good-natured person, the national impersonation of the Russians as a people, as John Bull is of the English, Brother Jonathan of the Americans, Jean Crapeau of the French, and Cousin Michael of the Germans.

Ivory Gate. One of the two gates of dreams. The dreams that pass through this gate are false and delusive. (See HORN GATE.)

Ivy (in Christian art), symbol of everlasting life, from its remaining continually green. An ivy wreath was the prize of the Isthmian games, till it was superseded by a pine garland. The plant was sacred to Bacchus and Osiris.

Ivy Lane (London). So called from the houses of the prebends of St. Paul, overgrown with ivy, which once stood there.

Ixi'on. A king of the Lapithæ, bound to a revolving wheel of fire in the Infernal regions, for his impious presumption in trying to imitate the thunder of heaven. — Greek mythology.

J

Jaafer. At the battle of Muta, Jaafer carried the sacred banner of "the Prophet." One hand being lopped off, he held it with the other; the other being struck off, he embraced it with his two stumps; his head being cleft in twain, he flung himself on the banner staff, and the banner was detained thus till Abdallah seized it and handed it to Khaled. A similar tale is told of Cynægeros (q.v.). (See BENBOW.)

Jaca. The devil in the mythology of Ceylon.

Ja'chin. The parish clerk in Crabbe's "Borough." He appropriated the sacramental money, and died disgraced.

Jachin. (See BOAZ.)

Jack and James. Jewish, Jacob; French, Jacques; our "Jack," and Jacquemes, our "James." Jacques used to be the commonest name of France, hence the insurrection of the common people was termed the insurrection of the Jacques, or the Jacquerie; and a rustic used to be called a Jacques bon homme. The Scotch call Jack Jock.

Jack. (1.) APPLIED TO MEN, but always depreciatingly; personally or morally little. (See TOM.)

(1) Jack-a-dandy (q.v.).

(2) Jack-a-dreams. A man of inaction, a mere dreamer. Hamlet calls himself "a Jack-a-dreams."

(3) Jack-a-drognes. A good-natured, lazy fool. (Dutch, druielen, to be listless; our drawl.)

(4) Jack-a-lent. A half-starved, sheepish booby. Hence Shakespeare says: "You little Jack-a-lent, have you been true to us. (See below, 4 b.)

(5) Jack-a-napes (q.v.).

(6) Jack-at-a-pinch. One who lends a hand in an emergency; an itinerant clergyman who has no cure, but officiates for a fee in any church where his assistance is required.

(7) Jack Brag. (See BRAG.)

(8) Jack-fool. More generally Tom Fool (q.v.).

(9) Jack Ketch (q.v.).

(10) Jack Pudding (q.v.).

(11) Jack-sauce. An insolent sauce-box, "the worst Jack of the pack." Fluellen says one who challenges another and refuses to fight is a "Jack-sauce."—"Henry V." iv. 7.

(12) Jack-snip. A botching tailor.

(13) Jack-slave. "Every Jack-slave hath his belly full of fighting."—Shakespeare, "Cymbeline," ii. 1.

(14) Jack-straw. A peasant rebel.

(15) Jack-sprat (q.v.).

(16) Jack-tar (q.v.).

(17) Jack-in-office. A conceited official, or upstart, who presumes on his official appointment to give himself airs.

(18) Jack-in-the-green. A chimney-sweep boy in the midst of boughs, on May-day.

(19) Jack-in-the-water. An attendant at the waterman's stairs, &c., willing to wet his feet, if needs be, for "a few coppers."

(20) Jack-of-all-trades. One who can turn his hand to anything, but excels in nothing.

(21) Jack-of-both-sides. One who tries to favour two antagonistic parties, either from fear or for profit.

(22) Jack-out-of-office. "But long I will not be Jack-out-of-office."—Shakespeare, "1 Henry VI." i. 1.

(23) Cheap Jack. (See CHEAP.)

(24) Jack will never be a gentleman. A mere parvenu will never be like a well-bred gentleman.

(25) Every-man-Jack of them. All without exception, even the most insignificant.

(26) Remember poor Jack. Throw a copper to the boys paddling about the jetty or pier, or performing tricks under the hope of getting a small bounty.

(27) All fellows, Jockey and the laird. Man and master, base-born and high-born, are boon companions. (See JEAN.)

II. APPLIED TO BOYS WHO ACT THE PART OF MEN.

(1a) Jack Frost. Frost personified as a mischievous boy.

(2a) Jack Sprat. Who bears the same relation to a man, as a sprat does to a mackerel or herring.

(3a) Jack and Jill (nursery rhyme). Jill or Gill is a contraction of Julienne or Gillian, a common Norman name. Jack and Jill represent the complete amalgamation of the Saxon and Norman stocks in the nation.

(4a) Jack and the Bean-stalk (nursery tale), of German origin.

(5a) Jack and the Fiddler. Ditto.

(6a) Jack of cards. The Knave or boy of the king and queen of the same suit.

(7a) Jack the Giant Killer (q.v.).

(8a) Glym Jack. A link boy who carries a glym. (German, glimmen.) (See GLIM.)

(9a) Little Jack.

(10a) Little Jack Horner. (See JACK HORNER.)

(11a) The house that Jack built (nursery tale). (See JEAN.)

III. APPLIED TO THE MALES OF INFERIOR ANIMALS: as—

Jack-ass, Jack-baker (a kind of owl), Jack or dog fox, Jack-hare, Jack-horn, Jack-rat, Jack-shark, Jack-snipe; a young pike is called a Jack, so also were the male birds used in falconry.

IV. APPLIED TO INSTRUMENTS which supply the place of or represent inferior men or boys:—

(1b) A jack. Used instead of a turnspit boy, generally called Jack.

(2b) A jack. Used for lifting heavy weights.

(3b) Jack. The figure outside old public clocks, made to strike the bell.

Strike like Jack o' the clock-house, never but in season.—Strode, "Floating Island."

(4b) Jack-a-lent. A puppet representing Judas Iscariot, carried about in the season of Lent; a scare-crow. Shakespeare says—

Wit may be made a Jack-a-lent.—"Merry Wives of Windsor," v. 5. (See above, 4.)

(5b) Jack-roll. The cylinder round which the rope of a well coils.

(6b) Jack-in-the-basket. The cup or basket on the top of a pole, to indicate the place of a sand-bank at sea, &c.

(7b) Jack-in-the-box. A toy representing a man which pops up when the lid of the box is removed.

(8b) Boot-jack. An instrument for drawing off boots, which used to be done by inferior servants.

(9b) Bottle-jack. A machine for turning the roast instead of a turnspit.

(10b) Lifting-jack. A machine for lifting the axle-tree of a carriage when the wheels are cleaned.

(11b) Roasting-jack. (See BOTTLE-JACK, 9b.)

(12b) Smoke-jack. An apparatus in a chimney-flue for turning a spit. It is made to revolve by the upward current of smoke and air.

V. APPLIED TO INFERIOR ARTICLES which bear the same relation to the thing imitated, as Jack does to a gentleman.

(1c) Jack. A rough stool or wooden horse for sawing timber on.

(2c) Jack. A small drinking vessel made of waxed leather.

(3c) Jack. Inferior kind of armour. (See ¶ JACK.)

(4c) A Jack and a Half-jack. A counter resembling a sovereign and a half-sovereign.

(7c) Jack-pan. A vessel used by barbers for heating water for their customers.

(8c) Jack-plane. A menial plane to do the rough work for finer instruments.

(9c) Jack-rafter. A rafter in a hipped roof, shorter than a full-sized one.

(10c) Jack-rib. An inferior rib in an arch, being shorter than the rest.

(11c) Jack-screws. Large coarse screws.

(12c) Jack-timbers. Timbers in a bay shorter than the rest.

(13c) Jack-towel. A coarse, long towel for the servants' use.

(14c) Jack of Dover (q.v.).

(15c) Jackel (q.v.).

(16c) Bluck Jack. A huge drinking vessel. A Frenchman speaking of it says, "The English drink out of their boots."—Heywood.

VI. A TERM OF CONTEMPT.

(1d) Jack-a-lantern or Jack-o'-lantern, the fool fire (ignis fatuus).

(2d) Jack-ass. An unmitigated fool.

(3d) Jack-at-bowls. The butt of all the players.

(4d) Jack-daw. A prating nuisance.

(5d) Jack Drum's entertainment (q.v.).

(6d) Jackey. A monkey.

(7d) Skip-jack. A toy, an upstart.

¶ A good Jack makes a good Jill. A good husband makes a good wife, a good master makes a good servant. Jack, a generic name for man, husband, or master, and Gill or Jill his wife or female servant.

Every Jack shall have his Jill. Every man may find a wife if he likes; or rather, every country rustic shall find a lass for his mate.

Jack shall have his Jill,

Nought shall go ill;

The man shall have his mare again, and all shall be well.

Shakespeare, "Midsummer Night's Dream," iii. 2.

To Play the Jack. To play the rogue or knave; to deceive or lead astray like Jack-o'-lantern, or ignis fatuus.

—your fairy, which you say is a harmless fairy, has done little better than played the Jack with us.—Shakespeare, "Tempest," iv. 1.

To be upon their Jacks. To have the advantage over one. The reference is to the coat of mail quilted with stout leather, more recently called a jerkin.

¶ Jack. Armour consisting of a leather surcoat worn over the hauberk, from the fourteenth to the seventeenth century, both inclusive. The word is a contraction of jazerine, a corruption of the Italian ghiazeri'no (a clinker-built boat), which it resembled in construction. It was formed by over-lapping pieces of steel fastened by one edge upon canvas, coated over with cloth or velvet. In short, it was a surcoat padded with metal to make it sword-proof. These jazerines were worn by the peasantry of the English borders when they journeyed from place to place, and in their skirmishes with moss-troopers.

Jack. (See JOCKEY.)

¶ Colonel Jack. The hero of Defoe's novel so called. He is a thief who goes to Virginia, and becomes the owner of vast plantations and a family of slaves.

The Union Jack. (See UNION.)

Jack-a-dandy. A finikin coxcomb. French dandin (a ninny), similar to the Spanish tonto (a dolt).

Jack-amend-all. One of the nick-names given to Jack Cade the rebel, who promised to remedy all abuses. (See CADE.)

Jack-a-napes. An impertinent, vulgar prig. In 1379 was brought to Viterbo the game at cards called by the Saracens naib, and Mr. W. Chatto says that Jack-a-napes is Jack o' naibs. The adjective is Jack-a-nape. (See JEANNOT.)

I will teach a scurvy jackanape priest to meddle and make. — Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," i. 4.

Jack Drum's Entertainment. A beating. (See JOHN DRUM'S, &c.)

Jack Horner. Halliwell, in his "Nursery Rhymes of England," has given a full account of Master Horner's witty tricks and pleasant pranks.

A correspondent in Notes and Queries says: There is a tradition in Somersetshire that the abbot of Glastonbury, hearing that Henry VIII. had spoken with indignation of his building such a kitchen as the king could not burn down, sent up his steward, Jack Horner, to present the king with a suitable bribe—viz., a pie containing the transfer deeds of twelve manors. Jack, lifting up the crust, abstracted from the dish the deed of the manor of Wells, and told the abbot that the king had given it him. Hence the nursery rhyme:—

Little Jack Horner
Sat in a corner [of the waggon],
Eyeing his Christmas pie.
He put in his thumb
And pulled out a plum [the title-deed],
Saying "What a brave boy am I!"

Jack Ketch. Although this looks very much like a sobriquet, there seems no sufficient evidence to believe it to be otherwise than a real proper name. We are told that the name Jack was applied to hangmen from Richard Jaquett, to whom the manor of Tyburn once belonged. (See HANGMEN.)

Jack Pudding. A buffoon who performs pudding tricks, such as swallowing a certain number of yards of black-pudding. S. Bishop observes that each country names its stage buffoon from its favourite viands: The Dutchman calls him Pickel-herringe; the Germans, Hans Wurst (John Sausage); the Frenchman, Jean Potage; the Italian Macaro'ni; and the English Jack Pudding.

Jack Robinson. Before you can say Jack Robinson. Immediately. Grose says that the saying had its birth from a very volatile gentleman of that name, who used to pay flying visits to his neighbours, and was no sooner announced than he was off again; but the following couplet does not confirm this derivation.

A warke it ys as easie to be done
As tys to saye Jacke! robs on.
Arnold Play, cited by Halliwell, "Arch. Diet."

Jack Sprat. A dwarf; as if sprats were dwarf mackerels. Children, by a similar metaphor, are called small fry. (See FRY.)

Jack Tar. A common sailor, whose hands and clothes are tarred by the ship tackling.

Jack of Dover. A stock fish, "hake salted and dried." The Latin for a hake is mertucius, and lucius is a jack or pike. Mer of course means the sea, and Dover, the chief cinque port, is used as a synonym. Also, refuse wine collected into a bottle and sold for fresh wine.

Many a Jack of Dover hastow sold
That hath been twyes hot and twyes cold.
Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales."

Jack of Newbury. John Wincomb, the greatest clothier of the world, in the reign of Henry VIII. He kept 100 looms in his own house at Newbury, and equipped at his own expense 100 of his men to aid the king against the Scotch in Flodden Field.

Jack o' the Bowl. The most famous brownie or house-spirit of Switzerland; so called from the custom of placing for him every night on the roof of the cow-house a bowl of fresh sweet cream. The contents of this bowl are sure to disappear before morning.

Jack the Giant-killer owed much of his success to his four marvellous possessions—an invisible coat, a cap of wisdom, shoes of swiftness, and a resistless sword. When he put on his coat no eye could see him, when he had his shoes on no one could overtake him, his sword would cut through everything, and when his cap was on he knew everything he required to know. Yonge says the story is based on the Scandinavian tale of Thor and Loki, while Masson maintains it to be a nursery version of the feats of Corin'eus in Geoffrey of Monmouth's marvellous history. I apprehend that neither of these suggestions will find many supporters.

Jackal. A toady. One who does the dirty work of another. It was once thought that the jackals hunted in troops to provide the lion with prey, hence they were called the "lion's providers." No doubt the lion will at times avail himself of the jackal's assistance by appropriating prey started by these "hunters," but it would be folly to suppose that the jackal acted on the principle of vos non vobis. (See HONEYCOMB.)

Jacket. A little jack, or surcoat.— See JACK (armour).

Jackson. (See STONEWALL.)

Jacksonian Professor. The professor of natural and experimental philosophy in the University of Cambridge. This professorship was founded in 1783 by the Rev. Richard Jackson.

Jacob. Jacob the scourge of Grammar. Giles Jacob, master of Romsey, in Southamptonshire, brought up for an attorney. A poetaster in the time of Pope. (See "Dunciad," iii.)

Jacob's Ladder. A ladder seen by the patriarch Jacob in a vision. It was set on the earth and reached to heaven, and angels seemed to be ascending and descending on it (Gen. xxviii. 12). Jacob is, on this account, a cant name for a ladder. There is a flower so called.

Jacob's Stone. The stone inclosed in our coronation chair, brought from Scone by Edward I., and said to be the stone on which the patriarch Jacob laid his head when he dreamt about the ladder referred to above.

This stone was originally used in Ireland as a coronation stone. It was called "Innisfoil," or stone of fortune.

Jacobins. The Dominicans were so called in France from the "Rue St. Jacques," Paris, where they first established themselves in 1219.

Jacobins. A political club, originally called the Club Breton, formed at Versailles in 1789. On their removal to Paris, they met in the hall of an ex-convent of Jacobins (see above), in the "Rue St. Honoré."

Jac'obites (3 syl.). The partisans of James II., his son, and grandson.

Jacobites, nicknamed Warming-pans. It is said that Mary d'Este, the wife of James II., never had a living child, but that on one occasion a child, introduced to her in a warming-pan, was substituted for her dead infant. This "warming-pan child" was the Pretender.

Jac'obites. An Oriental sect of Monophysites, so called from Jacobus Baradaeus (Jacoub Al-Baradci), bishop of Edessa, in Syria, in the sixth century.

Jaco'bus. A gold coin of the value of 25s., struck in the reign of James I.

Jacquard Loom. So called from Jos. Marie Jacquard, of Lyons, who invented this ingenious device for weaving figures upon silks and muslins. (1752-1834.)

Jacqueline (of Paris). A bell weighing 15,000 lbs., cast in 1400.

Jacquerie (La). An insurrection of the peasantry of France in 1358, excited by the oppressions of the privileged classes and Charles the Bad of Navarre, while king Jean was a prisoner in England. When the peasants complained, and asked who was to redress their grievances, they were told in scorn Jacques Bon-homme (Johnny Goodman)—i.e., no one. At length a leader appeared, called himself Jacques Bonhomme, and declared war to the death against every gentleman in France. In six weeks some 12,000 of these insurgents were cut down, and amongst their number was the leader himself. (See JACK, JACQUES.)

Jacques. A generic name for the poor artisan class in France. Jaques is a sort of cotton waistcoat without sleeves.

Jacques, il me faut troubler ton somme;
Dans le village, un gros huissier
Rôde et court, suivi du messier:
C'est pour l'impôt, las! mon pauvre homme.
Lève-toi, Jacques, lève-toi.
Voici venir l'huissier du roi.

Béranger (1831.)

Pauvre Jacques. Said to a maiden when she is lackadaisical (French). Marie Antoinette had at the Little Trianon an artificial Swiss village, which she called her "Petite Suisse," and actually sent to Switzerland for a peasant girl to assist in milking the cows. The Swiss maiden was one day overheard sighing for "Pauvre Jacques," and the queen sent for the distant swain, and had the lovers married. To finish this absurd romance, the marchioness de Travanet wrote an ode on the event, which was for a time wonderfully popular.

Pauvre Jacques, quand j'étais près de toi,
Je ne sentais pas ma misère :
Mais à présent que tu vis loin de moi,
Je manque de tout sur la terre.
Marquise de Travanel.

Jacques Bon-homme. A sort of fairy good-luck, who is to redress all wrongs, and make all the poor wealthy. The French peasants are so called sometimes, and then the phrase is like our term of sneering pity, "my good fellow," or "my fine fellow." (See JACQUERIE.)

Jacu'si. God of medicine.—Japanese mythology.

Jade or The Divine Stone. Worn by the Indians as an amulet to preserve them from the bite of venomous animals, and to cure the gravel, epilepsy, &c.—Hill.

Jaffier (3 syl.), in "Venice Preserved," a tragedy by Otway. He joins the conspiracy of Pierre against the Venetian state, but communicates the secret to his wife Belvide'ra. Belvide'ra, being the daughter of a senator, is naturally anxious to save the life of Priuli, her father, and accordingly induces her husband to disclose the plot, under promise of pardon to all the conspirators. The plot being revealed, the senate condemned the conspirators to death, whereupon Jaffier stabbed Pierre to prevent his being broken on the wheel, and then stabbed himself.

Jaga Baba. The Belo'na or war-goddess of the Slaves.

Jai'nas. The followers of Jai'na, a heterodox sect of the Hindus. They believe that all objects are classed under nine categories.

Jamambuxes (Soldiers of the round valleys). Certain fanatics of Japan, who roam about and pretend to hold converse with the devil. They scourge themselves severely, and sometimes refrain from sleeping for several days, in order to win the odour of sanctity. They are employed by the people for the discovery of articles stolen or lost.

Jambuscha (Jam-bus-car). Adam's preceptor, according to the pre-Adamites.

Sometimes called Boan, and sometimes Zagtith.

James (St.). Patron saint of Spain. At Padron, near Compostello, they used to show a huge stone as the veritable boat in which the apostle sailed from Palestine. His body was discovered in 840 by divine revelation to bishop Theodomi'rus, and king Alphonso built a church at Compostello for its shrine. According to another legend : It was the relics of St. James that were miraculously conveyed to Spain in a ship of marble from Jerusalem, where he was bishop. A knight saw the ship sailing into port, his horse took fright, and plunged with its rider into the sea. The knight saved himself by "boarding the marble vessel," but his clothes were found to be entirely covered with scallop shells.

In Christian art this saint has sometimes the sword by which he was beheaded, and sometimes he is attired as a pilgrim, with his cloak covered with shells. (See above.)

St. James (the Less). His attribute is a fuller's club, in allusion to the instrument by which he was put to death, after having been precipitated from the summit of the temple.

St. James's College. So called from James I., who granted a charter to a college founded at Chelsea by Dr. Sutcliffe, dean of Exeter, to maintain priests to answer all adversaries of religion. Laud nicknamed it "Controversy College." The college was a failure, and Charles II. gave the site to the Royal Society, who sold it for the purpose of erecting the Royal Hospital for Old Soldiers, which now exists.

St. James's Day. July 25, the day of his martyrdom.

Jamma-Locon. The Indian hell ; after a time the spirits return to earth and enter the first body they encounter.

Jam'nes and Mam'bres. The two magicians of Pharaoh, who imitated some of the miracles of Moses. The Jaunes and Jambres who "withstood Moses," mentioned by St. Paul (2 Tim. iii. 8, 9), are supposed to be the same. The paraphrast Jonathan says they were the sons of Balaam.

Jamshid'. King of the Genii, famous for a golden cup full of the elixir of life. This cup, hidden by the genii, was discovered while digging the foundations of Persep'olis.

I know too where the gentl' hid
The jewelled cup of their king Jamshid,
With life's elixir sparkling high.
Thomas Moore, "Paradise and the Peri."

Jane. A Genoese halfpenny, a corruption of Januensis or Genoensis.

Jane. A most ill-starred name for rulers. To give a few examples: Lady Jane Grey, beheaded by Mary for treason; Jane Seymour; Jane or Joan Beaufort, wife of James I. of Scotland, who was infamously and savagely murdered; Jane of Burgundy, wife of Philippe le Long, who imprisoned her for adultery in 1314; Jane of Flanders, who was in ceaseless war with Jane of Penthièvre, after the captivity of their husbands. This contest is known in history as "The wars of the two Janes" (fourteenth century). Jane of France (de Valois), wife of Louis XII., who repudiated her for being ugly; Jane d'Albret, mother of Henri IV. of France. Being invited to Paris to attend the espousals of her son with Margaret de Valois, she was poisoned by Catharine de' Medicis (1572); Jane, countess of Hainault, daughter of Baldwin, and wife of Fernand of Portugal, who was made prisoner at the battle of Bouvines in 1214. She refused to ransom him, and is thought to have poisoned her father; Jane Henriquez, wife of John II. of Navarre, stirred up war between her husband and his son Carlos by a former marriage, and ultimately made away with the young prince, a proceeding which caused a revolt of the Catalonians (1462); Jane the imbecile of Castile, who lost her reason from grief at the neglect of her husband, Philip the handsome, archduke of Austria; Jane I. of Naples married Andrew of Hungary, whom she caused to be murdered, and then married the assassin. Her reign was most disastrous. La Harpe has a tragedy entitled "Jeanne de Naples;" Jane II. of Naples, a woman of most scandalous character, guilty of every sort of wantonness. She married James, count of March, who put to death her lovers and imprisoned Jane for two years. At her release, James fled to France, when Jane had a liaison with Caraccioli, whom she afterwards murdered; Joan, the pope, if indeed such a person ever existed; Jeanne la Pucelle [Joan of Arc] cannot be called a ruler, but her lot was not more happy; &c., &c. (See JOHN.)

Jane Eyre. The heroine in a novel of the same name, by Currer Bell (q.v.).

Jangu-Mon (Good man). Two gods of the negroes of the Gold Coast.

Janic'ulum. One of the armed positions on the farther side of the Tiber, which prohibited approach to Rome.

Janis'saries or Jan'izaries, a celebrated militia of the Ottoman empire, raised by Orchan in 1326, and called the Yengi-tscheri (new corps). It was blessed by Hadji Bektash, a saint, who cut off a sleeve of his fur mantle and gave it to the captain, who put it on his head, and from this circumstance arose the fur cap worn by these foot-guards.

Jan'itor (Latin). A door-porter.

Jan'nanins. The departed spirits of the Africans of Guinea. They resemble in a striking manner the Roman manes, in their guardian care, and in the great interest they take in the family over which they preside.

Jannat (Al) (The Garden). The name given by Mahomet to his paradise.

Jan'senists. A sect of Christians, who followed the opinions of Janse'nius, bishop of Ypres, in France. They entertained Calvinistic views, and long did battle with the Jesuits; but Louis XIV. took part against them, and they were put down by pope Clement XI., in 1705, in the famous bull called Unigen'itus (q.v.).

Januarius (St.). A martyr in 305. Two vials of his blood are preserved in the cathedral at Naples, and every year on September 19 (the day of his martyrdom) the blood liquefies.

Order of St. Januarius (patron saint of Naples), instituted in 1738 by infanté don Carlos.

Jan'uary. The month dedicated by the Romans to Janus (q.v.).

Ja'nus. The temple of peace, in Rome. The doors were thrown open in times of peace and closed in times of war. Some think the two faces of this mythical deity allegorise Noah and his sons, who look back on the world before the flood, and forward on the world after the deluge had abated. This idea will do very well in poetry.

Slavery was the hinge on which the gates of the temple of Janus turned (in the American war).—The Times.

Japanese (3 syl.). The language of Japan, a native of Japan, anything pertaining thereto.

Japheth's Stone. According to tradition, Noah gave Japheth a stone which the Turks call giudētusch and senk-jedž. Whoever possesses this stone has the power of bringing rain from heaven at will. It was for a long time preserved by the Moguls.

Jaques (1 syl.). A morose cynical moraliser in Shakespeare's "As You Like It." It is much disputed whether the word is a monosyllable or not. Charles Lamb makes it a dissyllable—"Where Jaquès fed in solitary vein;" but Sir Walter Scott uses it as a monosyllable—"Whom humorous Jaques with envy viewed."

Jarkman. An Abram-man (q.v.). Jark means a seal, whence also a safe-conduct. Abram-men were licensed beggars, who had the "seal" or licence of the Bethlehem Hospital to beg.

Jarnac. Coup de Jarnac. A peculiar stroke of the sword by which the opponent is ham-strung. The allusion is to the duel between Jarnac and La Châteigneraine, on the 10th July, 1547, in the presence of Henri II., when Jarnac dealt his adversary such a blow, from which he died.

Jarndyce v. Jarndyce. An interminable Chancery suit in Dickens's "Bleak House." The character of Jarndyce is that of a kind-hearted, easy fellow, who is half ashamed that his left hand should know what his right hand gives.

Jarvie (Baillie Nicol). A Glasgow magistrate in Scott's "Rob Roy." He is petulant, conceited, purse-proud, without tact, and intensely prejudiced, but sincere and kind-hearted.

Jatte (pron. Yetta). Giants in Swedish mythology.

Jaun'dice (2 syl.). A jaundiced eye. A prejudiced eye, which sees "faults that are not." It was a popular belief among the Romans that to the eye of a person who had the jaundice everything looked of a yellow tinge.

All seems infected that th' infected spy,
As all seems yellow to the jaundiced eye.
Pope, "Essay on Criticism."

Javan (clay). Son of Japheth. In most eastern languages it is the collective name of the Greeks, and is to be so understood in Isa. lxvi. 19, and Ezek. xxvii. 13.

In the "World before the Flood," by James Montgomery, Javan is the hero. On the day of his birth, his father died, and Javan remained in the "patriarch's glen" under his mother's care, till she also died; then he resolved to see the world, and sojourned for ten years with the race of Cain, where he became the disciple of Jubal, and noted for his musical talents. At the expiration of that time he returned, penitent, to the patriarch's glen, where Zillah, daughter of Enoch, "won the heart to Heaven denied." The giants invade the glen, and carry off the little band captives. Enoch reproved the giants, who would have slain him in their fury, but they could not find him, "for he walked with God." As he ascended through the air, his mantle fell on Javan, who, "smiting with it as he moved along," brought the captives safely back to the glen again. A tempest broke forth of so fearful a nature that the giant army fled in a panic, and their king was slain by some treacherous blow, given by some unknown hand.

Jav'inese (3 syl.). A native of Java, anything pertaining to Java.

Javert. An officer of police, the impersonation of inexorable law in "Les Misérables," by Victor Hugo.

Jawbone (2 syl.). Credit, promises. (Jaw, words or talk; bon, good.)

Ja'zey. A wig; a corruption of Jersey, and so called because they are made of Jersey flax and fine wool.

Je Maintiendrai (I will maintain). The motto of the house of Nassau. When William III. came to England, he retained the motto, but added to it, "I will maintain the liberties of England and the Protestant religion."

Jeames (1 syl.). Any flunky. Sometimes the Morning Post is so called.

Thackeray wrote in Punch "Jeames's Diary," of which Jeames de la Pluche was the hero.

Jean de Lettre (Mr. Jenkins). "Qui pour l'ordinaire, dit Tallemant, est un animal mal idoine à toute autre chose."—Mme. Deshoulières, "Historiettes," ix. 209, x. 82.

Jean de la Suié (French). A Savoyard.

Jean de la Vigne (French). So the jonglers call the poupée to which they address themselves. The French Protestants in the sixteenth century called "the host" Jean, and the word is pretty well synonymous with buffoon. Jean de la Vigne was a drunken marionette performer of considerable ability; "Jean" was his name, "de la Vigne" his sobriquet. Hence when a person does an ill action, the French say, "Il fait comme Jean des Vignes;" an illicit marriage is called "le mariage de Jean des Vignes," and a bad fellow is "un Jean des Vignes." Hence Assoucy says, "Moi, pauvre sot, plus sot que Jean des Vignes!"

Jean! que dire sur Jean? c'est un terrible nom,
Qui jamais n'accompagne une épithète bonôte.
Jean des Vignes, Jean ligne. Où vais-je? Trouvez bon
Qu'en si beau chemin je m'arrête.
"Virgile Travesti," vii. (Juno to Æneas.)

Jean de la Vigne (French). A crucifix. (See above.)

Jean Farine (Jack Flour). A sort of Scaramouch, generally very tall, and representing a loutish boy dressed all in white, the hair, face, and hands being covered with flour.

Jean Farine s'en servient (du manteau d'un gentilhomme Gasson) un bonnet; et à le voir blanchâtre, il semble qu'il soit déjà enfariné.—Les Jeux de l'Inconnu (1645).

Jeannot (French). One who is minutely great, one who exercises his talents and ingenuity on trifles, one who after great preparation at table to produce some mighty effect, brings forth only a ridiculous mouse.

Je'bis or JEBISU'. The Neptune of Japanese mythology, especially revered by fishermen.

Jeb'usites (3 syl.), in Dryden's satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," stands for the Roman Catholics; so called because England was Roman Catholic before the Reformation, and Jerusalem was called Jebus before the time of David.

Jedwood Justice. Putting an obnoxious person to death first, and trying him afterwards.

We will have Jedwood justice—hang in haste and try at leisure.—Scott, "Fair Maid of Perth," xxx.

Jehen'nam. The Gehenna of the Arabs. It consists of seven stages, one below the others. The first is allotted to atheists; the second to Manicheans (q.v.); the third to the Brahmins of India; the fourth to the Jews; the fifth to Christians; the sixth to the Magians or Ghebers of Persia; and the seventh to hypocrites.—The Koran.

Jehovis'tic. (See ELOHISTIC.)

Jehu. A coachman, especially one that drives at a rattling pace.

The watchman told him saying....the driving is like the driving of Jehu, the son of Nimshi, for he driveth furiously.—2 Kings ix. 20.

Jejune (2 syl.). A jejune narrative. A dry, tedious one. (Latin, jeju'nus, dry.)

Jelly Pardons. When Thomas Cromwell was a clerk in the English factory at Antwerp, two of his fellow-countrymen from Boston (Lincolnshire), consulted with him as to the best means of getting the pardons renewed for the repair of Boston harbour. Cromwell, knowing that pope Julius was very fond of dainties, provided for him some exquisite jelly, and told his holiness that only royalty ever ate it in England. The pope was so pleased with the delicacy that he signed the pardons, on condition of having the receipt of the jelly.

Jellyby (Mrs.). A philanthropist who would spend and be spent to help the poor fan-makers and flower girls of Berriboolah Gha, but would bundle into the street a poor beggar dying of starvation on her own doorstep.—Dickens, "Bleak House."

Jemmy, a name found in engravings of the eighteenth century, was James Worsdale, the painter and dramatic writer (died 1767).

Jemmy Dawson was one of the Manchester rebels, who was hanged, drawn, and quartered, on Kennington Common, Surrey, July 30, 1746. A lady of gentle blood was in love with the gallant young rebel, and died of a broken heart on the day of his execution.—"Percy's Reliques," series 2, bk. iii. 26.

Shenstone has a ballad on the subject, beginning "Come listen to my mournful tale."

Jenkinson (Ephraim). A swindling rascal, who makes a tool of Dr. Primrose.—Goldsmith, "Vicar of Wakefield."

Jenny. The spinning jenny means the little spinning engine. The word is a corrupt diminutive, 'ginie. It is an error to derive the word from the inventor's wife or daughter, seeing his wife's name was Elizabeth, and he had no daughter.

Jenny l'Ouvrière. A generic name for a hard-working, poor, but contented needlewoman. The name was devised by Emile Barateau, and rendered popular by his song so called.

Entendez-vous un oiseau familier?
C'est le chanteur de Jenny l'Ouvrière,
Au cœur content, content de peu
Etle pourrait être riche, et préfère
Ce qui vient de Dieu. (1847.)

Jenny Wren (Miss). A doll-dresser and a cripple. She takes charge of a drunken father, whom she calls her boy, and treats as a child.—Dickens, "Mutual Friend."

Jeopardy (3 syl.). Hazard, danger. Tyrwhitt says it is the French jeu parti, and Froissart uses the phrase, Si nous les voyons à jeu parti (vol. i. c. 234). Jeu parti is a game where the chances are exactly balanced, hence a critical state.

Jereed. A javelin with which the Easterns exercise.—Castellan, "Mœurs des Othomans."

Jeremiad (4 syl.). A pitiful tale, a tale of woe to produce compassion; so called from the "Lamentations" of the prophet Jeremiah.

Jeremiah. The British Jeremiah. Gibbon so calls Gildas, author of "Lamentations over the Destruction of Britain" (sixth century).

Jeremy Diddler. An adept at raising money on false pretences. From Kenny's farce called "Raising the Wind."

Jericho. Gone to Jericho. No one knows where. The manor of Blackmore, near Chelmsford, was called Jericho, and was one of the houses of pleasure of Henry VIII. When this lascivious prince had a mind to be lost in the embraces of his courtesans, the cant phrase among his courtiers was "He is gone to Jericho."

I wish you were at Jericho. Anywhere out of my way. (See above.)

Jerome (St.). Generally represented as an aged man in a cardinal's dress, writing or studying, with a lion seated beside him. The best painting of this saint is "The Communion of St. Jerome," by Domenichino, in the Vatican. It is placed opposite Raphael's "Transfiguration."

Jeronimo. The chief character in the "Spanish Tragedy," by Thomas Kyd. On finding his application to the king ill-timed, he says to himself, "Go by, Jeronimo," which tickled the fancy of the audience so that it became for a time the current street jest.

Jerry Sneak. A henpecked husband, from a celebrated character in Foote's farce of the "Mayor of Garratt."

Jersey is czar's-ey—i.e., Cæsar's island, so called in honour of Julius Cæsar.

Jerusalem, in Dryden's satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," means London.

A Jerusalem pony. A needy clergyman or minister, who renders temporary aid to his brother ministers for hire; so called in humorous discourtesy. The Jerusalem pony is a large species of donkey.

Jerusalem Artichoke. A corruption of Girasolë artichoke. Girasole is the sun-flower, which this vegetable resembles both in leaf and stem.

Jerusalem Chamber. The Chapter-house of Westminster Abbey. Henry IV. died there, March 20, 1413.

It hath been prophesied to me many years,
I should not die but in Jerusalem.

The Lower House of Convocation now meets in the Jerusalem Chamber. The Upper House meets at Mr. Hodgson's, in Dean's Yard, Westminster.

Jerusalem Delivered. An epic in twenty books, by Torquato Tasso (1544-1595).

The crusaders, encamped on the plains of Tortosa, chose Godfrey for their chief, and Aladine, king of Jerusalem, made preparations of defence. The overtures of Argant's to Godfrey being declined, he declared war in the name of the king of Egypt. The Christian army having reached Jerusalem, the king of Damascus sent Arni'da to beguile the Christians; she told an artful tale by which she drew off several of the most puissant. It was found that Jerusalem could never be taken without the aid of Rinaldo; but Rinaldo had withdrawn from the army, because Godfrey had cited him to answer for the death of Gernando, slain in a duel. Godfrey being informed that the hero was dallying with Arni'da in the enchanted island, sent to invite him back to the army; he returned, and Jerusalem was taken in a night attack. As for Arni'da, after setting fire to her palace, she fled into Egypt, and offered to marry any knight who slew Rinaldo; but when she found the Christian army was successful, she fled from the field. The love of Rinaldo returned; he pursued her and she relented. The poem concludes with the triumphant entry of the Christian army into the Holy City, and their devotions at the tomb of the Redeemer. The two chief episodes are the loves of Olindo and Sophronia (see OLINDO), and of Tancred and Corinda (see TANCRED).

Jess (pl. Jesses). A short strap of leather tied about the legs of a hawk to hold it on the fist. Hence a bond of affection, &c.

If I prove her haggard,
Though that her jesses were my dear hearstrings,
I'd whistle her off.

Shakespeare, "Othello," iii. 3.

Jessë-tree. In Christian art, a vine tracing the genealogy of Christ, called a "rod out of the stem of Jesse" (Isa. xi. 1). Jessü is generally represented in a recumbent position, and the vine is made to rise out of his loins.

Jes'sica. The Jew's daughter in the "Merchant of Venice," by Shakespeare.

Jesters. (See FOOLS.)

Jes'uit (3 syl.). When Ignatius de Loyola was asked what name he would give his order, he replied, "We are a little battalion of Jesus;" so it was called the "Society of Jesus," vulgarised into Jesuits. The society was noted for its learning, political influence, and "pious frauds." The order was driven from France in 1594, from England in 1604, from Venice in 1606, from Spain in 1767, from Naples in 1763; and in 1773 was suppressed by pope Clement XIV.; but it revived again, and still exists. The word is used to express one who "lies like truth," or palters with us in a double sense, that "keeps the word of promise to our ear, and breaks it to our hope."

Jet d'Eau (French). A spout or jet of water thrown up into the air, generally from an artificial fountain. The great jet at Versailles rises to a height of 100 feet; that at Chatsworth, the highest in existence, to 267 feet.

Jetsam or JETSON. Goods cast into the sea to lighten a ship. (French, jeter, to cast out.) (See FLOTSAM.)

Jeu d'Esprit (French). A witticism.

Jew. The Wandering Jew.

(1) Said to be Kartaph'ilos, Pilate's porter. When the officers were dragging Jesus out of the hall, Kartaph'ilos struck him with his fist in the back, saying, "Go quicker, man; go quicker!" Whereupon Jesus replied, "I indeed go quickly; but thou shalt tarry till I come again." This man afterwards became a Christian, and was baptised under the name of Joseph. Every 100 years he falls into an ecstasy, out of which he rises again at the age of thirty.—Matthew Paris.

(2) Ahasuerus, a cobbler, who dragged Jesus before Pilate. As the Man of Sorrows was going to Calvary, weighed down with his cross, he stayed to rest on a stone near the man's door, when Ahasuerus pushed him away, saying, "Away with you, here you shall not rest." The gentle Jesus replied, "I truly go away, and go to rest; but thou shalt walk and never rest till I come."

(3) In the fourteenth century, Isaac Lakedion or Laquedem.

(4) Croly's "Salathiel." (See ARISTEAS.)

Jews, in Dryden's satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," those English who were loyal to Charles II., called David.

Jews born with tails. (See RABOIN.)

Jew's-eye. Worth a Jew's-eye. According to fable, this expression arose from the custom of torturing Jews to extort money from them. The expedient of King John is well known: he demanded 10,000 marks of a rich Jew of Bristol; the Hebrew resisted the atrocious execution, but the tyrant ordered him to be brought before him, and that one of his teeth should be tugged out every day, till the money was forthcoming. This went on for seven days, when the sufferer gave in, and John jestingly observed, "A Jew's eye may be a quick ransom, but Jews' teeth give the richer harvest."

So much for tradition, but as a matter of serious philology the word Jew's-eye is simply a corruption of the Italian gioia (a jewel).

Launcelot, in the "Merchant of Venice," ii. 5, puns upon this phrase when he says to Jessica—

There will come a Christian by
Will be worth a Jewess' eye.

Jew's-harp, called by Bacon jeu-trompe, by Beaumont and Fletcher, jeu-trump, by Hackluyt, jeu's-harp, is evidently the French jeu-trompe (toy-trumpet) or jeu-harpe (toy-harp). "Trompe" in French has a very wide signification, and means a horn, trumpet, rattle, jew's-harp, and many other things.

The best players on this instrument have been Koch, a Prussian soldier under Frederick the Great; Kunert, Amstein, &c.

Jew's Myrtle. So called from the popular notion that it formed the crown of thorns placed by the Jews on the Saviour's head.

Jewels in heraldry represent colours. The topaz represents or (gold), or the planet Sol.

The pearl or crystal represents argent (silver), or the planet Luna.

The ruby represents gules (red), or the planet Mars.

The sapphire represents azure (blue), or the planet Jupiter.

The diamond represents sable (black), or the planet Saturn.

The emerald represents vert (green), or the planet Venus.

The amethyst represents purpure (purple), or the planet Mercury.

Jez'ebel. A painted Jezebel. A flaunting woman of bold spirit, but loose morals; so called from queen Jezebel, the wife of Ahab.

Jib. A triangular sail borne in front of the foremast. It has the bowsprit for a base in small vessels and the jib-boom in larger ones, and exerts an important effect when the wind is abeam, in throwing the ship's head to leeward.

Jib. The under-lip. A sailor's expression; the under-lip indicating the temper, as the jib indicates the character of a ship.

The cut of his jib. The expression of the face dependent on the "hang" of the under-lip. (See above.)

To hang the jib. To look cross, to drop the under-lip in ill-temper.

Jib-boom. An extension of the bowsprit by the addition of a spar projecting beyond it. Sometimes the boom is further extended by another spar called the flying jib-boom.

Jib-door. A door flush with the outside wall, and intended to be concealed; forming thus part of the jib or face of the house. (See "CUT OF HIS JIB.")

Jig, from gigue. A short piece of music much in vogue in olden times, of a very lively character, either six-eight or twelve-eight time, and used for dance-tunes. It consists of two parts, each of eight bars.

You jig, you amble, and you lisp.
Shakespeare, "Hamlet," iii. 1.

Jihon. The river Oxus.

Jim Crow. Brought out at the Adelphi, in 1836. The character of Jim Crow played by T. D. Rice, as the original of the "nigger minstrels" since so popular. A renegade or turncoat is called a Jim Crow, from the burden of the song, "Wheel about and turn about."

Jingo. By Jingo. An oath; a corruption of Ginguou—i.e., St. Ginguolph.

Jinn. A sort of fairy in Arabian mythology, the offspring of fire. They propagate their species like human beings, and are governed by a race of kings named Suleyman, one of whom "built the pyramids." Their chief abode is the mountain Kâf, and they appear to men under the forms of serpents, dogs, cats, monsters, or even human beings, and become invisible at pleasure. The evil jinn are hideously ugly, but the good are exquisitely beautiful. The singular of jinn is jinnee.

Jin'nistan. The country of the Jinn, or Fairy Land, the chief province of which is The Country of Delight, and the capital The City of Jewels.

Joachim (St.). The father of the Virgin Mary. Generally represented as an old man carrying in a basket two turtle-doves, in allusion to the offering made for the purification of his daughter. His wife was St. Anne, or St. Anna.

Joan (Pope). A supposed female "pope" between Leo IV. and Benedict III. She is said to have been born in England and educated at Cologne, passing under the name of Joannes Anglicus (John of England). Blindel, a Calvinist, has shown that no such person ever occupied the papal chair.

Joan Cromwell. Joan Cromwell's kitchen-stuff tub. A tub of kitchen perquisites. The filchings of servants sold for "market pennies." The royalists used to call the Protector's wife, whose name was Elizabeth, Joan Cromwell, and declared that she exchanged the kitchen-stuff of the palace for tallow candles.

Joan of Arc or Jeanne la Pucelle. M. Octave Delepière has published a pamphlet, called "Doute Historique," to deny the tradition that Joan of Arc was burnt at Rouen for sorcery. He cites a document discovered by Father Vignier in the seventeenth century, in the archives of Metz, to prove that she became the wife of Sieur des Armoise, with whom she resided at Metz, and became the mother of a family. Vignier subsequently found in the family muniment-chest the contract of marriage between "Robert des Armoise, knight, and Jeanne D'Arcy, surnamed the Maid of Orleans." In 1740 there were found in the archives of the Maison de Ville (Orléans) records of several payments to certain messengers from Joan to her brother John, bearing the dates 1435, 1436. There is also the entry of a presentation from the council of the city to the Maid, for her services at the siege (dated 1439). M. Delepière has brought forward a host of other documents to corroborate the same fact, and show that the tale of her martyrdom was invented to throw odium on the English. A sermon is preached annually in France towards the beatification of the Maid, who will eventually become the patron saint of that nation, and Shakespeare will prove a true prophet in the words—

No longer on St. Denis will we cry,
But Joan la Pucelle shall be France's saint.

Joannes Hagustaldensis is John, prior of Hexham, author of an old English "Chronicle," and "Lives of the Bishops of Hexham" in two books.

Job (o long). The personification of poverty and patience. "Patient as Job," in allusion to the patriarch whose history is given in the Bible.

Poor as Job. Referring to the patriarch when he was by Satan deprived of all his worldly possessions.

I am as poor as Job, my lord, but not so patient.
Shakespeare, "2 Henry IV." 1. 2.

Job's Comforter. One who pretends to sympathise in your grief, but says that you brought it on yourself; thus in reality adding weight to your sorrow. (See above.)

Job Thornberry. A rough, but generous and tender-hearted brazier, who is reduced to bankruptcy; but while the bailiffs are in the house, a youth named Peregrine, to whom he once lent ten pounds, arrives and pays the several claims. Of course the young man becomes the old brazier's son-in-law.—George Colman, "John Bull."

Job (o short). A ministerial job. Sheridan says:—"Whenever any emolument, profit, salary, or honour is conferred on any person not deserving it—that is a job; if from private friendship, personal attachment, or any view except the interest of the public, any one is appointed to any public office . . . that is a job."

Joba'tion. A scolding; so called from the patriarch Job, who was well rated by his three friends.

Jocelin de Brakelonda, de Rebus gestis Samsonis, &c., published by the Camden Society. This record of the acts of abbot Samson of Edmondsbury, contains much contemporary history, and gives a good account of English life and society between 1173 and 1202.

Jockey is a little Jack (boy). So in Scotch, "Ika Jeanie has her Jockie." (See JACK.)

All fellows, Jockey and the laird (man and master).—Scotch proverb.

Jockey of Norfolk. Sir John Howard, a firm adherent of Richard III. On the night before the battle of Bosworth, he found in his tent the warning couplet:—

Jockey of Norfolk, be not too bold,
For Dickon, thy master, is bought and sold.

Joe or a Joe Miller. A stale joke; so called from the compilation of jokes under that nom de plume. (See MILLER.)

Joey. A groat; so called from Joseph Hume, M.P., who strongly recommended the coinage for the sake of paying short cab-fares, &c.—Hawkins.

Jog. Jog away, jog off, jog on. Get away, be off, keep moving. Shakespeare uses the word shog in the same sense—as, “Will you shog off?” (“Henry V.,” ii.1.) and again in the same play, “Shall we shog?” (ii. 3). Beaumont and Fletcher use the same expression in “The Coxcomb”—“Come, prithee, let us shog off;” and again, in “Pasquill and Katharine”—“Thus it shogges” [goes]. In the “Morte d’Arthur” we have another variety—“He shokkes in sharply” [rushes in]. The words seem to be connected with the German gaggen, to go, and the Saxon seccan, to depart, to flee.

To jog his memory, or Give his memory a jog. To remind one of something apparently forgotten. Jog is to shake or stir up. (Welsh, gogi, to shake; French, choquer; our shock, shake, &c.)

Joggis or Jogges. The pillory. Jamieson says, “They punish delinquents, making them stand in jogges, as they call their pillories. (The word is Yoke; Latin, jugum; French, joug; Saxon, geoc or joc.)

Staune ane wholl Eaboths daye in ye joggis.—Glen, “History of Dumbarton.”

John. A contraction of Johannes (Joh’n). The French contract it differently, Jean—i.e., Jehan or Johann; in Italian, Giovanni.

John. A proverbially unhappy name with royalty, inasmuch that when John Stuart ascended the throne of Scotland, he changed his name to Robert; but misfortune never deserted him, and after an evil reign he died overwhelmed with calamities and infirmity. Witness John Baliol of Scotland; John of England, a most disastrous reign. John I. of France reigned only a few days; John II. was for years a captive in England, and to France his reign was a tissue of evils. John of Bohemia was slain at Cressy. John I. of Arragon was at ceaseless war with his subjects, by whom he was executed; John II. was at ceaseless war with his son, Don Carlos. John I. of Constantinople was poisoned by Basil, his eunuch; John IV. had his eyes put out; John V. was emperor in name only, and was most unhappy; John VI., harassed with troubles, abdicated, and died in a monastery. Pope John I. died wretchedly in jail; John VIII. was imprisoned by Lambert, duke of Spoleto; at a subsequent period he was dressed in female attire out of mockery, and was at last poisoned; John X. was overthrown by Gui, duke of Tuscany, and died in prison; John XI. was imprisoned with his mother by Alberic, and died there; John XII. was deposed for sacrilege, and was at last assassinated; John XXI. was crushed to death by the fall of a house at Viterbe (1277); John XXIII. fled in disguise, was arrested, and cast into prison for three years. John I. of Sweden was unhappy in his expeditions, and died childless; John II. had his wife driven out of the kingdom by his angry subjects. Jean Sans Peur of Burgundy engaged in the most horrible massacres, and was murdered. John of Suabia, called the Parricide, because he murdered his father Albert, after which he was a fugitive and a vagabond on the face of the earth, &c. &c. (See JANE.)

N.B.—John of Portugal was a signal exception.

King John and the abbot of Canterbury. John, being jealous of the state kept by the abbot, declared he should be put to death unless he answered three questions.—The first question was, how much the king was worth; the second, how long it would take to ride round the world; and the third, what the king was thinking of. The king gave the abbot three weeks’ grace for his answers. A shepherd undertook to answer the three questions, so with crozier, mitre, rochet, and cope, he presented himself before the king. “What am I worth?” asked John. “Well,” was the reply, “the Saviour was sold for thirty pence, and your majesty is a penny worse than he.” The king laughed, and demanded what he had to say to the next question, and the man replied, “If you rise with the sun and ride with the sun, you will get round the world in a day.” Again the king was satisfied, and demanded that the respondent should tell him his thoughts. “You think I am the abbot of Canterbury, but I'm only a poor shepherd who am come to ask your majesty's pardon for him and me." The king was so pleased with the jest, that he would have made the shepherd abbot of Canterbury; but the man pleaded that he could neither write nor read, whereupon the king dismissed him, and gave him a pension of four nobles a week.—Percy, "Reliques," series 2, bk. iii. 6.

Prester John. The supposed Christian king and priest of a mediæval kingdom in the interior of Asia. This Prester John was the Khan Ung who was defeated and slain by Genghis Khan in 1202, said to have been converted by the Nestorian Christians. He figures in Ariosto, and has furnished materials for a host of mediæval legends.

I will fetch you a tooth-picker now from the furthest inch of Asia; bring you the length of Prester John's foot; fetch you a hair off the great Cham's beard....—Shakespeare, "Much Ado about Nothing," ii. 1.

The three Johns—an alehouse picture in Little Park Street, Westminster, and in White Lion Street, Pentonville—is John Wilkes between the Rev. John Horne Tooke and Sir John Glynn (serjeant-at-law).—Hotten, "History of Signboards."

St. John the Evangelist is represented writing his gospel; or bearing a chalice, from which a serpent issues, in allusion to his driving the poison from a cup presented to him to drink. He is sometimes represented in a cauldron of boiling oil, in allusion to the tradition of his being plunged in such a cauldron before his banishment to the isle of Patmos.

St. John. The usual war-cry of the English of the North in their encounters with the Scotch. The person referred to is St. John of Beverley, in Yorkshire, who died 721.

John-a-Dreams. A stupid, dreamy fellow, always in a brown study and half asleep.

Yet I,
A dull and muddy-mettled rascal, peak
Like John-a-dreams unpregnant of my cause,
And can say nothing.

Shakespeare, "Hamlet," ii. 2.

John-a-Droynes. A foolish character in Whetstone's "Promos and Cassandra" (1578). Being seized by informers, he stands dazed, and suffers himself to be quietly cheated out of his money.

John Bull. The national nickname for an Englishman, represented as a bluff, kind-hearted, bull-headed farmer. The character is from a satire by Dr. Arbuthnot. In this satire the Frenchman is termed Lewis Baboon, the Dutchman Nicholas Frog, &c.

John Bull. A comedy by George Colman. Job Thornberry is the chief character.

Johnny Crapaud. A Frenchman, so called by the English sailors in the long Napoleon contest. The ancient Flemings used to call the French "Crapaud Franchois." The allusion is to the toads borne originally in the arms of France.

John Dory. Either a corruption of Jaune dorée (yellow gilt), from its golden lustre; or of the Gascon Jan dorée (the golden cock), the fish being called the sea-chicken, or St. Peter's cock, being (according to tradition) the fish caught by St. Peter with a piece of money in its mouth. The derivation from janitor's, the janitor or door-keeper [of heaven], is worthless.

John Drum's Entertainment. Hauling a man by his ears and thrusting him out by the shoulders. The allusion is to "drumming" a man out of the army. There is a comedy so called, published 1601.

When your lordship sees the bottom of his success in this....if you give him not John Drum's entertainment, your incensing cannot be removed.—Shakespeare, "All's Well that Ends Well," iii. 6.

John Long. To wait for John Long, the carrier. To wait a long time; to wait for John, who keeps us a long time.

Mess-John or Mass-John. A priest.

John Orderly. Is John Orderly there? Get done as soon as possible, for there are persons sufficient for another audience. John Orderly was a noted showman and actor; when his platform was full, he taught the ticket collector to poke his head behind the green curtain, and cry out, "Is John Orderly there?" This was a signal to the actors to draw their piece to a close, and clear the house as quickly as possible. Orderly taught this trick to Richardson.

John in the Wad. A Will-o'-Wisp. A wad is a wisp, and John or Jack is a name for any inferior person unknown. (See JACK.)

John of Bruges (1 syl.). John van Eyck, the Flemish painter. (1370-1441.)

John of Leyden (the prophet), being about to marry Bertha, met with three Anabaptists who observed a strong likeness in him to a picture of David in Munster Cathedral. They entered into conversation with him, and finding him apt for their purpose, induced him to join their rebellion. The rebels took the city of Munster, and John was crowned "Ruler of Westphalia." His mother met him in the street, and John disclaimed all knowledge of her; but subsequently visited her in prison, and obtained her forgiveness. When the emperor arrived with his army, his Anabaptist friends deserted him, and John, setting fire to the banquet-room of his palace, perished with his mother in the flames.—Meyerbeer, "Le Prophète" (an opera).

John o' Groat, with his two brothers Malcolm and Gavin, arrived at Caithness in the reign of James IV. of Scotland, and purchased the lands of Warse and Dungisbay. In the process of time their families increased, and there came to be eight families of the same name. They lived together amicably, and met once a year in the original house; but on one occasion a question of precedence arose, who was to go out first, and who was to take the head of the table. John de Groat promised them the next time they came he would contrive to satisfy them all. Accordingly he built an eight-sided room, with a door and window in each side, and placed a round oak table in the room. This building went ever after with the name of John o' Groat's House. The site of this house is the Berubium of Ptolemy, in the vicinity of Dungisbay Head.

Hear, land of cakes and brither Scots,
Frae Maidenkirks to John o' Groats,
A chief's amang ye takin' note,
And, faith, he'll print it.
Burns, "Captain Grose."

John the Almoner. Chrysostom was so called, because he bestowed so large a portion of his revenues on hospitals and other charities. (347-407.)

John the Baptist. Patron saint of missionaries. He was sent "to prepare the way of the Lord."

In Christian art he is represented in a coat of sheepskins, in allusion to his life in the desert, either holding a rude wooden cross, with a pennon bearing the words, "Ecce Agnus Dei;" or with a book on which a lamb is seated; or holding in his right hand a lamb surrounded by a halo, and bearing a cross on the right foot.

John with the Leadon Sword. So earl Douglas used to call the duke of Bedford, who acted as regent for Henry VI. in France.

Johnson (Dr. Samuel) lived in Fleet Street—first in Fetter Lane, then in Boswell Court, then in Gough Square, then in the Inner Temple Lane for seven years, then in Johnson's Court (No. 7) for ten years; and lastly in Bolt Court (No. 8), where he died eight years after. The coffee-house he most frequented was the Mitre tavern in Fleet Street, and not that which has assumed the name of "Dr. Johnson's Coffee-house." The church he frequented was St. Clement Danes in the Strand.

Johnstone. The crest of this family is a winged spur, or spur between two wings, leathered, with the motto, Nunquam non paratus. When king Edward I. was meditating treachery in favour of Balliol, John sent to Bruce (then in England) a spur with a feather tied to it. Bruce took the hint and fled, and when he became king conferred the crest on the Johnstone family.

Jolly. He is jolly green, very simple. That's jolly good, very good. John Trapp, in his "Commentary," says, "All was jolly quiet at Ephesus before St. Paul came thither" (1656). It is the French joli (pretty), but expresses rather more than our adverb pretty: thus pretty good means "rather good," but jolly good is "slap up."

Jolly. A sailor's nickname for a marine, who, in his opinion, bears the same relation to a "regular," as a jolly-boat or yawl to a ship.

Jolly-Boat, Danish, jollø; Dutch, jol; Swedish, jullø, a yawl. The French say, Se mettre en joly, meaning, "Stop," "Stand fast."

Arrestent leurs galeres; et se mirent toutes en joly (c'est un mot de galeres que l'on us: quand elles ne voguent en avant ny en arriere. et qu'elles font halles), &c.—Brantôme, "Vies des Grands Capitaines" (o. 1., Dragut).

Jo'nas, in Dryden's satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," is meant for Sir William Jones, the Indian judge and Oriental scholar. He was so called by a palpable pun. Dryden calls him, "bull-faced Jonas."

Jonathan. Brother Jonathan. In the revolutionary war, Washington, being in great want of supplies for the army, and having unbounded confidence in his friend, Jonathan Trumbull, governor of Connecticut, said, "We must consult brother Jonathan." Brother Jonathan was consulted on all occasions by the American liberator, and was accepted as the national name of the Americans as a people.

Jonc (French). A wedding-ring; so called because those who were married by compulsion at Ste. Marine wore rings of jonc or straw.

C'est dans l'église de Ste. Marine que l'on marie ceux que l'on condamne à s'épouser. Anciennement ou les mariait avec un anneau de paille; était-ce pour marquer au mari que la vertu de celle qu'il épousait était bien fragile?—Dulaure.

Jones. Être sur les joncs (to be on the straw)—i.e., in prison.

Plantez aux hurmes vos pignons
Da paour les bi-ans si tres-durs
Et aussi d'estre sur les joncz,
Emmanchez en coffre et gros murs.
Villon, "Jargon et Jubelin," ballade 1.

Jor'mundgan'dar or MIDGARDSORMER (i.e., earth's monster). The great serpent, brother of Hel and Fenrir (g.v.). It used to lie at the root of the celestial ash till All-Fader cast it into the ocean; it then grew so large that in time it encompassed the whole world, and was for ever biting its own tail.

Jos or Joss. The penatēs of the Chinese; every family has its jos. A temple is called a jos-house.

Jos'aphat. An Indian prince converted by the hermit Barlaam, in the Greek religious pastoral, entitled "Josaphat and Barlaam," generally ascribed to St. John of Damascus (eighth century).

Joseph (St.). Patron saint of carpenters, because he was of the same craft. This is Joseph, the reputed father of Jesus.

In Christian art he is represented as an aged man with a budding staff in his hand.

A Joseph. One not to be seduced from his continency by the severest temptation.

The reference is to Joseph in Potiphar's house.—Gen. xxxix. (See BELLEROPHON.)

Joseph Andrews. The hero of a novel written by Fielding to ridicule Richardson's "Pam'ela," whose brother Joseph is supposed to be.

Joseph of A'ramathe'a brought to Listenise the sanctgraal and also the spear with which Longinus wounded the crucified Saviour. When Sir Balin entered this chamber, which was in the palace of king Pellam, he found it "marvellously well dight and richly; the bed was arrayed with cloth of gold, the richest that might be thought, and thereby stood a table of clean gold, with four pillars of silver, and upon the table stood the spear strangely wrought."—"History of Prince Arthur," xl.

Josse. Vous êtes orfèvre, Monsieur Josse (You are a jeweller, Mr. Josse). Nothing like leather; great is Diana of the Ephesians; your advice is not disinterested. In Molière's comedy of "L'Amour Médecin," a silversmith, by the name of Josse, being asked the best way of winning a lady's heart, recommends a handsome present of jewellery. The lover replies, "You advise me like a jeweller, Mr. Josse."

Jotenheim, or JOTHUNHEIM (pron. Utenheim). The home or region of the Scandinavian giants or jöten.

Jo'tham, in Dryden's satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," means Savile, marquis of Halifax. Jotham was the person who uttered the parable of "The Trees choosing a King," when the men of Shechem made Abimelech king.—Judges ix.

Jour Maigre (French). A day of abstinence, when meat is forbidden to be eaten. (See BANIAN DAYS.)

Jourdain (Monsieur). In Molière's comedy of "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." He represents a bourgeois placed by wealth in the ranks of gentlemen, and making himself extremely ridiculous by his endeavours to acquire accomplishments.

Journal. Latin, diurnum (a daily thing); Welsh, diwrnod; Italian, giorno; French, journal.

Applied to newspapers; the word strictly means a daily paper, but the extension of the term to weekly papers is sanctioned by custom.

Journey-weight. The weight of certain parcels of gold in the mint. A journey of gold is fifteen pounds Troy, which is coined into 701 sovereigns or double that number of half-sovereigns. A journey of silver is sixty pounds Troy, which is coined into 3,960 shillings, or double that number of sixpences, half that number of florins, &c. So called because this weight of coin was required as a day's work. (French, ournée.)

Jouvence (2 syl.). You have been to the fountain of Jouvence—i.e., You have grown young again. This is a French phrase. Jouvence is a town of France in the department of Saône-et-Loire, and has a fountain called la fontaine de Jouvence; but Jouvence means also youth, and la fontaine de jouvence may be rendered "the fountain of youth." The play on the word gave rise to the tradition that whoever drank of this fountain would become young again.

Jove (1 syl.). (See JUPITER.) The Titans made war against Jove, and tried to dethrone him.

Not stronger were of old the giant crew,
Who sought to pull high Jove from regal state.
Thomson, "Castle of Indolence," canto 1.

Milton, in "Paradise Lost," makes Jove one of the fallen angels (i. 512).

Jo'vial. Merry and sociable, like those born under the planet Jupiter, which astrologers considered the happiest of the natal stars.

Our jovial star reigned at his birth.
Shakespeare, "Cymbeline," v. 4.

Joy. The seven joys of the Virgin: (1) The annunciation; (2) the visitation; (3) the nativity; (4) the adoration of the three kings; (5) the presentation in the temple; (6) the discovery of her youthful Son in the temple in the midst of the doctors; (7) her assumption and coronation. (See SORROW.)

Joyeuse (2 syl.). Charlemagne's sword, which bore the inscription Decem præcepto'rum custos Carolus; the sword of Guillaume au Court-Nez; any one's sword.

Joyeuse Garde or Garde-Joyeuse. The estate given by king Arthur to Sir Lancelot of the Lake for defending the queen's honour against Sir Mador.

Juan Fernandez. A rocky island in the Pacific Ocean, on the coast of Chili. Here Alexander Selkirk, a buccaner, resided in solitude for four years, and his history is commonly supposed to be the basis of Defoe's "Robinson Crusoe."

Sailors commonly believe that this island is the scene of Crusoe's adventures; but Defoe distinctly indicates an island on the east coast of South America, somewhere near Dutch Guinea.

Jubal (a trumpet). The son of Lamech and Adah. He is called the inventor of the lyre and flute (Gen. iv. 19—21).

Then when he [Javan] heard the voice of Jubal's lyre,
Instinctive genius caught the ethereal ore.
J. Montgomery, "The World before the Flood," c. 1.

Ju'bilee. The Year of Jubilee. Every fiftieth year, when the land which had passed out of the possession of those to whom it originally belonged was restored to them; all who had been reduced to poverty, and were obliged to let themselves out for hire, were released from bondage; and all debts were cancelled. The word is from jubil (a ram's horn), so called because it was proclaimed with trumpets of rams' horns.

Jubilee (in the Catholic church). Every twenty-fifth year, for the purpose of granting indulgences. Boniface VIII. instituted it in 1300, and ordered it to be observed every hundred years. Clement VI. reduced the interval to fifty years, Urban IV. to thirty, and Sixtus IV. to twenty-five.

Protestant Jubilee, celebrated in Germany in 1617, the centenary of the Reformation.

Shakespeare Jubilee, held at Stratford-on-Avon, September 6th, 1769.

Jubilee to commemorate the commencement of the fiftieth year of the reign of George III., October 25, 1809.

Jubilee to celebrate the close of Revolutionary War, August 1, 1814.

Ju'daise (3 syl.). To convert or conform to the doctrines, rites, or manners of the Jews. A Judaizing spirit is a desire to convert others to the Jewish religion.

Ju'daism (3 syl.). The religion of the Jews, or anything else which is special to that people.

Ju'das, in the satiro of "Absalom and Achitophel," by Dryden and Tate, was meant for Mr. Fergusson, a Non-conformist. He was ejected in 1662 from his living of Godmersham, in Kent, and afterwards distinguished himself by his political intrigues. He joined the duke of Monmouth, whom he afterwards betrayed.

A Judas kiss. A deceitful act of courtesy. Judas betrayed his Master with a kiss.

So Judas kissed his Master;
And cried, "All hail!" when as he meant all harm.
Shakespeare, "3 Henry VI," v. 7.

Le point de Judas (French). The number thirteen. The Messiah and his twelve disciples made thirteen. And as Judas was the first to die, he was the thirteenth. At the death of the Saviour, the number being reduced to eleven, a twelfth was elected by lot to fill the vacant place of the traitor.

Judas-coloured Hair. Fiery red.

His very hair is of the dissembling colour, something browner than Judas's.—Shakespeare, "As You Like It," iii. 4.

Judas Tree. A corruption of Kuamos tree—i.e., the leguminous or bean tree. The corrupt name has given rise to the tradition that it was upon one of these trees that Judas Iscariot hanged himself.

Judee. La petite Judée (French). The prefecture of police, so called because the bureau is in the Rue de Jérusalem, and those taken there for offences look on the police as their betrayers.

Jude (St.). in Christian art, is represented with a club or staff, and a carpenter's square, in allusion to his trade.

Judge's Black Cap. The judge puts on his black cap (now a three-cornered piece of black silk) when he condemns to death, in sign of mourning. This sign is very ancient. "Haman hastened to his house mourning, having his head covered" (Esth. vi. 12). David wept "and had his head covered" (2 Sam. xv. 30). Demosthenes went home with his head covered when insulted by the populace. Darius covered his head on learning the death of his queen. Malcolm says to Macduff in his deep sorrow, "What, man! ne'er pull your hat upon your brows" ("Macbeth," iv. 3). And the ancient English, says Fosbroke, "drew their hoods forward over their heads at funerals."

Judges' Robes. In the criminal courts, where the judges represent the sovereign, they appear in full court dress, and wear a scarlet robe; but in Nisi Prius Courts the judge sits merely to balance the law between civilians, and therefore appears in his judicial undress, or violet gown.

Ju'dica (Latin). The fifth Sunday after Lent, so called from the first word of the service for the day, Judica me, Dom'ine (Judge me, O Lord).—Ps. xliii.

Judicium Crusis was stretching out the arms before a cross, till one of the party could hold out no longer, and lost his cause. The bishop of Paris and abbot of St. Denis appealed to this judgment in a dispute they had about the patronage of a monastery; each of the disputants selected a man to represent their cause, and the man selected by the bishop gave in, so that the award was given in favour of the abbot.

Judicium Dei (Latin). The trial of guilt by direct appeal to God, under the notion that he would defend the right even by miracle. There were numerous methods of appeal, as by single combat, ordeal by water or fire, eating a crust of bread, standing with arms extended, consulting the Bible, &c. &c.

Ju'dith. The Jewish heroine of Bethulia, who perilled her life in the tent of Holofernès, the general of Nebuchadnezzar, in order to save her native town. The bold adventurer cut off the head of the Assyrian, and her townsmen rushing on the invaders, defeated them with great slaughter.—The Book of Judith.

Juge de Paix (French). A cudgel.

Albert Mangin, condamné à mort le 7 floreal an. ii. ayant dit que les jacobins étaient tous des scélérats et des coquins, et montrant un gros bâton qu'il tenait à la main: Voilà un "juge de paix" qui me servira à leur casser la barre du cou.—L. P. Prudhomme, "Dict. des Individus Condamnés," &c.

Juggernaut or Jaggernaut. A Hindu god. The word is a corruption of the Sanscrit jagannātha (lord of the world). The temple of this god is in a town of the same name in Orissa. King Ayee Akbery sent a learned Brahman to look out a site for a temple. The Brahman wandered about for many days and then saw a crow dive into the water, and having washed, made obeisance to the element. This was selected as the site of the temple. While the temple was a-building the rajah had a prophetic dream, telling him that the true form of Vishnu should be revealed to him in the morning. When the rajah went to see the temple he beheld a log of wood in the water, and this log he accepted as the realisation of his dream, enshrined it in the temple, and called it Jagannâth'.

Car of Juggernaut. An enormous wooden machine adorned with all sorts of figures, and mounted on sixteen wheels. Fifty men drag it annually to the temple, and it is said to contain a bride for the god. Devotees place themselves in the road, and allow the car to crush them to death, that they may "inherit eternal life." (See KESORA.)

Juggler means a player on a jongleur a sort of hurdy-gurdy. These jugglers accompanied the minstrels and troubadours, to assist them, and added to their musical talents sleight-of-hand, antics, and feats of prowess, to amuse the company assembled. In time the music was dropped as the least attractive, and tricks became the staple of these wandering performers.

Juggs or Jougs. The name given in Scotland to a sort of pillory, consisting of an iron ring or collar fastened by a short chain to a wall. (Latin, jugum, a yoke.) (See JOGGIS.)

Ju'lian, the Roman emperor, boasted that he would rebuild Jerusalem; but was mortally wounded by an arrow before the foundation was laid. Much has been made of this by early Christian writers, who dwell on the prohibition and curse pronounced against those who attempt to rebuild the city, and the fate of Julian is pointed out as an example of Divine wrath against the impious disregarder of the threat.

Well pleased they look for Sion's coming state,
Nor think of Julian's boast and Julian's fate.
Crabbe, "Borough."

St. Julian. Patron saint of travellers and of hospitality. Represented as accompanied by a stag in allusion to his early career as a hunter, and either receiving the poor and afflicted, or ferrying travellers across a river.

A householdere, and that a gret, was he;
Seynt Julian he was in his countrie,
His breed, his ale, was alway after oon; [one pattern]
A bettre envyn'd man was now here noon.
Chaucer, "The Frankeleyn," Introduction to "Canterbury Tales."

St. Julian was he deemed. A great epicure. St. Julian was the epicurean of saints. (See above.)

Julian Epoch or Era. That of the reformed calendar by Julius Caesar, which began forty-six years before Christ.

Julian Period is produced by multiplying together the lunar cycle, the solar cycle, and the Roman indiction. The first year of the Christian era corresponded to the year 4714 of the Julian, and therefore, to reduce our B.C. dates to the Julian, we must subtract them from 4714, but our A.D. dates we must add to that number. So named from Julius Scaliger, the deviser of it.

Julian Year. The year regulated by Julius Caesar, which continued to be observed till it was corrected by Pope Gregory XIII., in 1582.

Juliet. Daughter of Lady Capulet, and "sweet sweeting" of Romeo, in Shakespeare's tragedy of "Romeo and Juliet." She has become a household word for a lady-love.

Ju'lium Si'dus. The comet which appeared at the death of Julius Caesar, and which in court flattery was called the apotheo'sis of the murdered man.

July'. The seventh month, named by Mark Antony, in honour of Julius Caesar, who was born in it.

Ju'mala. The supreme idol of the ancient Finns and Lapps. The word is sometimes used by the Scandinavian poets for the Almighty.

On a lonely cliff
An ancient shrine he found, of Jumala the seat,
For many a year gone by closed up and desolate.
Frithiof-Saga, "The Reconciliation."

Jump, meaning "just," as jump at this same hour, is the Welsh emp (a graft or shoot); Danish, ympe; our imp (q.v.). To jump or to fit or unite-with like a graft; as, both our inventions meet and jump in one. Hence the adverb exactly, precisely.

The Scotch use jimp, as "When she had been married jimp four months."—"The Antiquary."

June (1 syl.). The sixth month, so named by the Romans from the festivals given in honour of Juno.

Ju'nior Op'timë. A Cambridge University term, meaning a third-class "honour" man—i.e., in the mathematical "honour" examination.

Ju'nior Soph. A man of the second year's standing is so called in our Universities. (See SOPH.)

Ju'nius. Letters of Junius. Of the thirty or forty claimants, the title of Sir Philip Francis may now be considered settled, for the following reasons:—In these letters the "i" is always dotted with a dash; quotations are marked with straight lines instead of commas; semicolons are used instead of hyphens at the end of a line; the spelling of many words is peculiar to Sir Philip; and lastly, Junius or Bifrons was present at the burning of certain Jesuitical books, and Lady Francis says her husband was at the court of France when Mad. de Pompadour drove out the Jesuits.

Junk. Salt meat supplied to vessels for long voyages; so called because it is hard and tough as old rope-ends so called. Ropes are called junks because they were once made of bulrushes. (Latin, juncus, a bulrush.)

Junket. A cheese-cake, a sweet-meat, properly made of curd. The word is the Italian guncate (curd or cream-cheese), so called because carried on junk or bull-rushes (giuncos).

You know there wants no junkets at the feast.
Shakespeare, "Taming of the Shrew," iii. 2.

Junner. A giant in Scandinavian mythology, said in the Edda to represent the "eternal principle." Its skull forms the heavens; its eyes the sun and moon; its shoulders the mountains; its bones the rocks; &c. Hence the poets call heaven "Junner's skull;" the sun, "Junner's right eye; the moon, "Junner's left eye;" the rivers, "The ichor of old Junner."

Ju'no. The "venerable ox-eyed" wife of Jupiter, and queen of heaven.—Roman mythology.

Juno'nian Bird. The peacock, dedicated to the goddess-queen.

Junto. A faction consisting of Russell, lord-keeper Somers, Charles Montagne, and several other men of mark, who ruled the Whigs in the reign of William III. for nearly twenty years, and exercised a very great influence over the nation. The word is a corruption of the Spanish junta (an administrative assembly), but is in English a term of censure.

Ju'piter is dies-pater, the day-god. The French jour is a remarkable illustration of the same sort of change, derived through diurn-us, Italian giorno, French journée and jour, our journal. The Roman god of the air and king of the celestials. Camoens, in his "Lusiad," calls "the lord of destiny" Jupiter, and makes him pronounce in council that the Lusians shall succeed in their undertaking.

Jupiter Scapin. A nickname of Napoleon Bonaparte, given him by the abbé de Pradt. Scapin is a valet famous for his knavish tricks, in Molière's comedy of "Les Fourberies de Scapin."

Jurassic Rocks. Limestone rocks, so called from the Jura; the Jurassic period is the geological period when these rocks were formed. Our oolitic series pretty nearly corresponds with the Jurassic.

Jurisprudence. The Father of Jurisprudence. Glanville, who wrote "Tractatus de Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliæ," in 1181. (Died 1190.)

Jury Mast. A corruption of joury mast—i. e., a mast for the day, a temporary mast, being a spar used for the nonce when the mast has been carried away. (French, jour, a day.)

Jus de Reglisse (Liquorice). French slang for a negro.

Jus Gen'tium (Latin). International law.

Jus Mari'ti (Latin). The right of the husband to the wife's property.

Just (The). Aristi'des, the Athenian. (Died B.C. 468.)

Ba'haram, styled Shah endeb (the Just King) fifth of the Sassanidæ (q.v.). (276-296.)

Casimir II., king of Poland. (1117-1194.)

Ferdinand I., king of Aragon. (1273-1416.)

Haroun al Raschid (the Just). The most renowned of the Abbasside califs, and the hero of several of the "Arabian Nights" stories. (735-809.)

James II., king of Aragon. (1261-1327.) Khosru or Chosroes, called by the Arabs Molk al Aidel (the Just King). He was the twenty-first of the Sassanidæ. (531-579.)

Pedro I. of Portugal. (1320, 1357-1367.)

Juste Milieu (French). The golden mean.

Justices in Eyre (pron. ire). A contraction and corruption of Itin'erē—i. e., in circuit.

Justing of Watson and Barbour. A description of a ludicrous tilt between Watson and Barbour, in Scotch verse, by Sir David Lindsay.

Justin'ian. The English Justinian. Edward I. (1239, 1272-1307.)

Ju'venal (Latin). A youth; common in Shakespeare, thus—

The juvenal, the prince your master, whose chin is not yet fledged.—"2 Henry IV.," i. 2.

The English Juvenal. John Oldham. (1653-1683.)

K

K. The three bad K's. The Greeks so called the Ka'rians, Kre'tans, and Kilik'ians. The Romans retained the same expression, though they spelt the three nations with C instead of K.

K.C.B. Knight Commander of the Bath.

K.G. Knight of the Garter.

K. K. is the German Kaiserliche Königlische. The emperor of Austria is styled K.K. Majestät—His imperial royal majesty.

Kaâ'ba (Arabic for square house). An oblong stone building within a mosque at Mecca, on the spot where Adam is said to have first worshipped after his expulsion from Paradise. The stone was originally white, but the sins of mankind have turned it black. (See ADAM'S PEAK.)

Kab'eyun (North-American Indian). Zephyr.

Kab'ibonok'ka (North-American Indian). Son of Mudjekeewis, and the Indian Boreas, who dwelt in Wabasso (the North). He paints the autumn leaves scarlet and yellow, sends the snow, binds the rivers in ice, and drives away the sea-gull, cormorant, and heron. (See SHING'EBIS.)

Kadris. Religious Turks, whose devotion is characterised by their lacerations with scourges.

Kaffir (Arabic, Kiafir, an 'infidel'). A name given to the Hottentots, who reject the Moslem faith. Kafiristan, in Central Asia, means "the country of the infidels."

Kai-an'ians. The sixth Persian dynasty. The semi-historic period (B.C. 660-331). So called because they took for their affix the term kai (mighty), called by the Greeks, Ku (Kuros), and by the Romans, Cy (Cyrus).

Kai-Omurs (the mighty Omurs), sur-named Ghil-shah (earth's king). Son of Du'lavêd, founder of the city Balk, and first of the Kai-Omurs or Paishdad'ian dynasty of Persia (B.C. 940-920). (See PAISDADIAN.)

Kail'yal (2 syl.). The heroine of Southey's "Curse of Kehâma."

Kaiser. The emperor of Austria. He receives the title from Dalmatia, Croatia, and the line of the Danube, which, by the arrangement of Diocletian, was governed by a prince entitled Cæsar, heir-presumptive to the imperial throne. It was Albert II., duke of Austria, who added this part to the imperial throne in 1438.

Kaled is Gulnare (2 syl.) in the disguise of a page in the service of Lara. After Lara is shot, she haunts the spot of his death as a crazy woman, and dies at length of a broken heart.—Byron, "Lara."

Kaleda (Slavonic mythology). The god of peace, somewhat similar to the Latin Janus. His feast was celebrated on the 24th of December.

Kali. A Hindu goddess after whom Calcutta receives its name, Kali-Kutta (Kali's village).

Kaliyuga. The last of the four Hindu periods contained in the great Yuga, equal to the Iron age of classic mythology. It consisted of 432,000 solar-sidereal years, and began 3102 years before the Christian era. The bull representing truth and right has but one foot in this period, because all the world delights in wickedness. (See KRITA.)

Kalmar'. The union of Kalmar. A treaty made on July 12, 1397, to settle the succession of Norway, Sweden, and Denmark on queen Margaret and her heirs for ever. This treaty lasted only till the death of Margaret.

Kalmucks — i.e., Khalimiks (apostates) from Buddhism.

Kalpa. A day and night of Brahmā, a period of 4,320,000,000 solar-sidereal years. Some say there are an infinity of Kalpas, others limit the number to thirty. A Great Kalpa is a life of Brahmā.

Kalpa-Tarou. A tree in Indian mythology from which might be gathered whatever a person desired. This tree is "the tree of the imagination."

Kalyb. The "Lady of the Woods," who stole St. George from his nurse, brought him up as her own child, and endowed him with gifts. St. George enclosed her in a rock, where she was torn to pieces by spirits. — "Seven Champions of Christendom," pt. i.

Kam. Crooked. (Erse kaam, squint-eyed.) Clean Kam, perverted into Kim Kam, means wholly awry, clean from the purpose.

This is clean kam — merely awry.
Shakespeare, "Coriolanus," iii. 1.

Kāma. The Hindu god of love. His wife is Rati (voluptuousness), and he is represented as riding on a sparrow, holding in his hand a bow of sugar-cane and five arrows (i.e., the five senses).

Ka'mi. The celestial gods of the first mythical dynasty of Japan, the demi-gods of the second dynasty, the spiritual princes, and any one sainted or deified.

Kamsin. A simoom or samiel, a hot, dry, southerly wind, which prevails in Egypt and the deserts of Africa.

Kanoon or Canun'. A sort of psaltery.

Kansa. A king of the race of Bhoja, notorious for his enmity to Krishna, who ultimately slew him. — Hindu mythology.

Kansas. Bleeding Kansas. So called because it was the place where that sanguinary strife commenced, which was the prelude of the civil war of America. According to the Missouri Compromise made in 1820, slavery was never to be introduced into any western region lying beyond 36° 30' north latitude. In 1851, the slave-holders of Missouri, by a local act, pushed their west frontier to the river-bank, and slave lords with their slaves took possession of the Kansas hunting grounds, declaring that they "would lynch, hang, tar and feather any white-livered abolitionist who presumed to pollute the soil." In 1854, thirty New England free-soilers crossed the river in open boats; they were soon joined by others, and dared the slavers to carry out their threats. Many a fierce battle was fought, but in 1861 Bleeding Kansas was admitted into the Union as a free state. — W. Hepworth Dixon, "New America," vol. i., c. 2.

Karaites (Scripturists). A Jewish sect that adhered to the letter of the Scriptures, rejecting all oral traditions. They abhorred the Talmud, and observed the Sabbath with more rigour than even the rabbinites.

Karma. The Buddhists' judgment, which determines at death the future state of the deceased. It is also their fiat on actions, pronouncing them to be meritorious or otherwise.

Karma'thians. A Mahometan sect which rose in Irak in the ninth Christian century. Its name is from Karinata, its founder, a poor labourer who assumed to be a prophet.

Karoon or Korah. The riches of Karoon (Arabic proverb). Korah, according to the commentators of the Koran, was the most wealthy and most beautiful of all the Israelites. It is said that he built a large palace, which he overlaid with gold, and that the doors of his palace were solid gold (Sale, "Koran"). He was the Croesus of the Mahometans, and guarded his wealth in a labyrinth.

Karrows. A set of gamblers in Ireland, who played away even the clothes on their backs.

The karrows plaid awaie mantle and all to the bare skin, and then trusse themselves in straw or leaves. They wait for passengers in the high-wie, invite them to game upon the green, and aske no more but companions to make them sport. For default of other stuffe they pawne their glibbs, the nailles of their fingers and toes, their diuinisars, which they ke'e or redeeme at the courtesie of the winner. — Samihurst.

Kārttikeya. The Hindu Mars or war-god, and commander-in-chief of the celestial armies. He slew Tāraka, the demon-king, whose power threatened the very existence of the gods.

Kaswa (A). Mahomet's favourite camel, which fell on its knees in adoration when "the prophet" delivered the last clause of the Koran to the assembled multitude at Mecca. This is one of the dumb creatures admitted into the Moslem paradise. (See FLY.)

Kathay'. China.

Katherine or Cathari'na, daughter of Baptista, a rich gentleman of Padua. She was very beautiful, but a shrew. Petruchio of Verona married her, and so subdued her imperious temper by his indomitable will, that she became the model of a "submissive wife," and gives Bianca, her sister, most excellent advice respecting the duty of submission.

The Katherine de' Medici of China. Voo-chee, widow of king Tae-tsông. Most imperious and cruel, but of irresistible energy. (684-705.)

Kau'seroon', in Persia, famous for its orange groves, from which bees extract a most delicious honey.—Morier, "Travels."

Kay or Sir Key, son of Sir Ector, and foster-brother of king Arthur. In Arthurian romance, this seneschal of England is represented as a rude and boastful knight, the first to attempt any achievement, but very rarely successful.

Kayre or Kaire (1 syl.). Cairo.

Straute unto Kayre his way he fongeth,
Where he the souldan thanné fonde.
Gower.

Kayward. The hare, in the tale of "Reynard the Fox." (The word means "Country-guardian.")

Ke'ber. A Persian sect (generally rich merchants), distinguished by their beards and dress. When one of them dies, a cock is driven out of the poultry yard; if a fox seizes it, it is a proof that the soul of the deceased is saved. If this experiment does not answer, they prop the dead body against a wall, and if the birds peck out the right eye first, the Keber is gone to heaven; if the left eye, the carcase is flung into a ditch, for the Keber was a reprobate.

Kebla. The point of adoration—i. e., the quarter or point of the compass towards which persons turn when they worship. The Persian fire-worshippers turn to the east, the place of the rising sun; the Jews to Jerusalem, the city of the King of kings; the Mahometans to Mecca; the early Christians turned to the "cast," and the "communion table" even of the "Reformed Church" is placed at the east end of the building, whenever this arrangement is practicable.

Kebla-Noma. The pocket compass carried by Mussulmans to direct them which way to turn when they pray. (See above.)

Ke'derli. The St. George of Mahometan mythology. He slew a monstrous dragon to save a damsel exposed to its fury, and having drunk of the water of life, rode about the world to aid those warriors who invoked him. This tradition is exactly parallel to that of St. George, and explains the reason why the one is the field-word with the Turks, and the latter with the ancient English.

Ked'jeree'. A corruption of the Indian word Khichri (a medley or hotch-potch). The word has been confounded with a place so called, forty miles southwest of Calcutta, on the Hoogly river.

Keel-Hauling or Haling. A long, troublesome, and vexatious examination or repetition of annoyances from a landlord or government official. In the Dutch and almost all other navies, delinquents were, at one time, tied to a yard-arm with weights on their feet, and dragged by a rope under the keel of their ship, in at one side and out at the other.

Keep touch. To keep faith; the exact performance of an agreement, as, "To keep touch with my promise" (More). The idea seems to be embodied in the proverb, "Seeing is believing, but feeling is naked truth."

And trust me on my truth,
If thou keep touch with me,
My dearest friend, as my own heart,
Thou shalt right welcome be.
"Songs of the London 'Prentices," p. 37.

Keha'ma. A Hindu rajah who obtains and sports with supernatural powers.—Southey, "Curse of Kehama."

Kelpy or Kelpie. A spirit of the waters in the form of a horse, in Scottish mythology. Not unlike the Irish Phooka.

Every lake has its Kelpie or Water-horse, often seen by the shepherd sitting upon the brow of a rock dashing along the surface of the deep, or browsing upon the pasture on its verge.—Graham, "Sketches of Perthshire."

Ke'ma. The book containing the secrets of the genii, who, infatuated with love, revealed the marvels of nature to men, and were banished out of heaven. According to some etymologists, the word chemistry is derived from this word.—“Zosime Panopolite.”

Kemp'fer-Hau'sen. The nom de plume of Robert Pearce Gillies, one of the speakers in the “Noctës Ambrosiæ.”—“Blackwood's Magazine.”

Kempis. The authorship of the work entitled “De Imitatio'nē Christi,” has afforded as much controversy as the “Letters of Junius.” In 1604, a Spanish Jesuit discovered a manuscript copy by the abbot John Gersen or Gesen, and since then three competitors have had angry and wordy defenders, viz., Thomas à Kempis, Chancellor Gersen, and the abbot Gersen. M. Malou gives his verdict in favour of the first.

Ken or Kium. An Egyptian goddess similar to the Roman Venus. She is represented as standing on a lion, and holding two serpents in one hand and a flower in the other. (See Amos v. 26.)

Kendal Green. Green cloth for foresters, so called from Kendal, Westmoreland, famous at one time for this manufacture. Kendal green was the livery of Robin Hood and his followers. In Rymer's Fœdera (ii. 283) is a letter of protection, dated 1331, and granted by Edward III. to John Kempe of Flanders, who established cloth-weaving in the borough.

How could'st thou know these men in Kendal-green, when it was so dark thou could'st not see thy hand?—Shakespeare, “1 Henry IV.,” ii. 4.

Kenelm (St.) was murdered at Clente-in-Cowbage, near Winchelcumb, in Gloucestershire. The murder, says Roger of Wendover, was miraculously notified at Rome by a white dove, which alighted on the altar of St. Peter's, bearing in its beak a scroll with these words—

In Clent cow pasture, under a thorn,
Of head bereft, lies Kenelm king-born.

Kenna. Daughter of king O'beron, who fell in love with Albion, son of the island-king. Oberon drove the prince from his empire, and when Albion in revenge invaded the kingdom he was slain. Kenna poured the juice of the herb moly on the dead body, and it was turned into a snow-drop. Kensington receives its name, according to fable, from the fairy Kenna.—Tickell, “Kensington Gardens.”

Kenna Quhair (I know not where). Scotch for terra incog'nita.

Kenne. A stone said to be formed in the eye of a stag, and used as an antidote to poison.

Kennedy. A poker, or to kill with a poker; so called from a man of that name who was killed by a poker.—“Dictionary of Modern Slang.”

Kennel. A dog's house; from the Latin canis (a dog), Italian canile; but kennel (a gutter) from the Latin canna (a cane), our canal, channel, &c.

Ken'sington. O'beron, king of the fairies, held his royal seat in these gardens, which were fenced round with spells “interdicted to human touch;” but not unfrequently his thievish elves would rob the human mother of her babe, and leave in its stead a sickly changeling of the elfen race. Once on a time it so fell out that one of the infants fostered in these gardens was Albion, the son of “Albion's royal blood;” it was stolen by a fairy named Milkah. When the boy was nineteen, he fell in love with Kenna, daughter of King Oberon, and Kenna vowed that none but Albion should ever be her chosen husband. Oberon heard her when she made this vow, and instantly drove the prince out of the garden, and married the fairy maid to Azur'iel, a fairy of great beauty and large possessions, to whom Holland Park belonged. In the meantime Albion prayed to Neptune for revenge, and the sea-god commanded the fairy O'riel, whose dominion lay along the banks of the Thames, to espouse the cause of his lineal offspring. Albion was slain in the battle by Azur'iel, and Neptune in revenge crushed the whole empire of Oberon. Being immortal, the fairies could not be destroyed, but they fled from the angry sea-god, some to the hills and some to the dales, some to the caves and others to river-banks. Kenna alone remained, and tried to revive her lover by means of the herb moly. No sooner did the juice of this wondrous herb touch the body than it turned into a snow-drop. When Wise laid out the grounds for the Prince of Orange, Kenna planned it “in a morning dream,” and gave her name to the town and garden.—Tickell, “Kensington Gardens.”

Kent (Latin, Can'tium, the territory of the Kantii or Cantii. Old British, Kant, a corner or headland). In the reign of queen Elizabeth, Kent was so notorious for highway robbery, that the word signified a "nest of thieves."

Some bookes are arrogant and impudent;
So are most thieves in Cristendome and Kent.
Taylor, the Water Poet (1630).

A Man of Kent. One born east of the Medway. These men went out with green boughs to meet the Conqueror, and obtained in consequence a confirmation of their ancient privileges from the new king. They call themselves the invicti.

A Kentish man. A resident of Kent, without regard to his birthplace.

Holy Maid of Kent. Elizabeth Barton, who pretended to the gift of prophecy and power of miracles. Having denounced the doom and speedy death of Henry VIII. for his marriage with Anne Boleyn, she was executed. Sir Walter Scott ("Abbot," xiii.) calls her "The Nun of Kent."—See FAIR (Maid of Kent).

Kent's Hole. A large cave in the limestone rock near Torquay, Devon.

Kent Street Ejectment. Taking away the street-door; a method devised by the landlords of Kent Street, Southwark, when their tenants were more than a fortnight in arrears.

Kentish Fire. Rapturous applause, or three times three and one more. The expression originated with Lord Winchelsea, who proposed the health of the Earl of Roden, on the 15th August, 1834, and added, "Let it be given with the 'Kentish Fire.'" In proposing another toast he asked permission to bring his "Kentish Artillery" again into action. Chambers, in his "Encyclopædia," says it arose from the protracted cheers given in Kent to the No-Popery orators in 1828-9.

Kentish Moll. Mary Carlton, nicknamed The German Princess. She was transported to Jamaica in 1671; but returning without leave, was hanged at Tyburn, January 22nd, 1673.

Kepler's Laws:

(1) That the planets describe ellipses, and that the centre of the sun is in one of the foci.

(2) That every planet so moves that the line drawn from it to the sun describes equal areas in equal times.

(3) That the squares of the times of the planetary revolutions are as the cubes of their mean distances from the sun.

Kerchief of Piesauce. An embroidered cloth presented by a lady to her knight to wear for her sake. The honoured knight was bound to place the gift in his helmet.

Kerna. A kind of trumpet used by Tamerlane, the blast of which might be heard for miles.

Kernel is the German Kern (corn, seed in general), whence acorn (the ac or oak corn).

Kersey. A coarse cloth, usually ribbed, and woven from long wool; so named from Jersey, where it was originally made.

Ker'zereh or Kerz'rah. A flower which grows in Persia. It is said, if any one in June or July inhales the hot south wind which has blown over this flower he will die.

Keso'ra. The female idol adored in the temple of Juggernaut. Its head and body are of sandal-wood; its eyes two diamonds, and a third diamond is suspended round its neck; its hands are made entirely of small pearls, called perles à l'once; its bracelets are of pearls and rubies, and its robe is cloth of gold.

Ketch. (See JACK KETCH.)

Ketchup. A corruption of the Japanese Kijap, a similar condiment sometimes sold as soy, but not equal to it.

Ketmir. The dog of the Seven Sleepers. (See FLY.)

Kettle. Thor's great kettle. The god Thor wanted to brew some beer, but not having a vessel suited for the purpose in Valhalla, stole the kettle of the giant Hymer.—Scandinavian mythology.

Kettle of Fish. A fête-champêtre in which salmon is the chief dish provided. In these pic-nics, a large caldron being provided, the party select a place near a salmon river. Having thickened some water with salt to the consistency of brine, the salmon is put therein and boiled; and when fit for eating, the company partake thereof in gipsy fashion.

Some think the discomfort of this sort of pic-nic gave rise to the phrase "A pretty kettle of fish." (See KITTLE.)

The whole company go to the waterside to-day to eat a kettle of fish.—Sir Walter Scott, "St. Ronan's Well," xii.

Kettle-drum. A large social party. Among the Tartars a "kettle" represents a family; or as many as feed from one kettle; and on Tweedside it signifies a "social party," met together to take tea from the same tea-kettle; hence any social party. Of course, the play upon this meaning of the word, and the instrument called a kettle-drum, is intentional. (See DRUM.)

Kettledrummle (Gabriel). A Covenanting preacher in Sir Walter Scott's "Old Mortality."

Kevin (St.) like St. Sena'nus (q.v.) retired to an island where he vowed no woman should ever land. Kathleen loved the saint, and tracked him to his retirement, but the saint hurled her from a rock. Kathleen died, but her ghost rose smiling from the tide, and never left it so long as the saint lived. A bed in the rock at Glendalough (Wicklow) is shown as the bed of St. Kevin. Thomas Moore has a poem on this tradition.—"Irish Melodies," iv.

Key. (See KEY.)

Keys of stables and cowhouses have not unfrequently, even at the present day, a stone with a hole through it and a piece of horn attached to the handle. This is a relic of an ancient superstition. The hag, haliq, or holy stone was looked upon as a talisman which kept off the fiendish Mara or night-mare; and the horn was supposed to ensure the protection of the god of cattle, called by the Romans Pan.

Key as an emblem.

St. Peter is always represented in Christian art with two keys in his hand; they are consequently the insignia of the Papacy, and are borne saltire-wise, one of gold and the other of silver.

They are the emblems also of St. Servatius, St. Hippolytus, St. Geneviève, St. Petronilla, St. Osyth, St. Martha, and St. Germa'nus of Paris.

One British bishop bears two keys and sword in saltire, viz., Winchester.

Four bear two keys in saltire, viz., St. Asaph, Gloucester, Exeter, and Peterborough.

The Cross Keys. A public-house sign; the arms of the archbishop of York.

The key shall be upon his shoulder. He shall have the dominion. The ancient keys were instruments about a yard long, made of wood or metal. On public occasions the steward slung his key over his shoulder as our mace-bearers carry their mace. Hence, to have the key upon one's shoulder means to be in authority, to have the keeping of something. It is said of Eliakim, that God would lay upon his shoulder the key of the house of David (Isa. xxii. 22); and of our Lord that "the government should be upon his shoulder" (Isa. ix. 6). The chamberlain of the court used to bear a key as his insignia.

The power of the keys—i. e., the supreme authority vested in the pope as successor of St. Peter. The phrase is derived from St. Matt. xvi. 19.

To throw the keys into the pit. To disclaim a debt; to refuse to pay the debts of a deceased husband. This refers to an ancient French custom. If a deceased husband did not leave his widow enough for her aliment and the payment of his debts, the widow was to throw the bunch of house-keys which she carried at her girdle into the grave, and this answered the purpose of a public renunciation of all further ties. No one after this could come on the widow for any of her late husband's debts.

Key-cold. Deadly cold, lifeless. A key, on account of its coldness, is still sometimes employed to stop bleeding at the nose.

Poor key-cold figure of a holy king!
Pale ashes of the house of Lancaster!
Thou bloodless remnant of that royal blood!
Shakespeare, "Richard III.," i. 2.

Key-stone. The Key-stone State. Pennsylvania, so called from its position and importance.

Key of the Mediterranean. The fortress of Gibraltar; so called because it commands the entrance thereof.

Key of Russia. Smolensk, on the Dnieper.

Keyne (St.). The well of St. Keyne, Cornwall, has a strange superstition attached to it, which is this: "If the bridegroom drinks therefrom before the bride, he will be master of his house; but if the bride gets the first draught, the grey mare will be the better horse."

Southey has a ballad on this tradition, and says the man left his wife at the church porch, and ran to the well to get the first draught; but when he returned his wife told him his labour had been quite vain, for she had taken with her a "bottle of the water to church."

Khedive d'Egypte. An old regal title revived by Ismael I., higher than viceroy, but not so high as sultan.

Khem or Chamno. A Semitic deity.

Khorassan (Region of the Sun). A province of Persia, anciently called Aria'na.

The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan. Mokanna, a prophet chief, who wore a veil under pretence of shading the dazzling light of his countenance.

Terror seized her lest the love-light which encircled him should fade away, and leave him like the veiled prophet of Khorassan, a sin-stained thing of clay.—Mrs. Hardy, "A Casual Acquaintance."

Khordad. The good genius of the Persians.

Khors (Slavonic mythology). The Esculapius or medicine-god of the Slavi.

Ki. A Chinese word, signifying age or period, generally applied to the ten periods preceding the first Imperial dynasty, founded B.C. 2205. It extended over some 300,000 years. The first was founded by Puon-ku (highest eternity), and the last by Fo-hi, surnamed Tien-Tse (son of heaven).

Kiak-Kiak (god of gods). An idol worshipped in Pegu. This god is to sleep 6,000 years, and when he wakes the end of the world will come.

Kick. "It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks" (Acts ix. 5). The reference is not to the ox kicking against the goad, but to a horse kicking against the spur. The proverb occurs in Pindar (2 "Pyth." v. 173), in Æschylus ("Agam." 1,620), in Euripides ("Bacch." 793), &c., in all which cases the spur, and not the ox-goad, is referred to.

To kick the bucket. A bucket is a pulley; and in Norfolk a beam, called in Lincolnshire a buckler. When pigs are killed, they are hung by their hind-legs on a bucket, with their heads downwards, and oxen are hauled up by a pulley. To kick the bucket is to be hung on the bulk or bucket by the heels.

Quite the kick. Quite a dandy. The Italians call a dandy a chic. The French chic means knack, as avoir le chic, to have the knack of doing a thing smartly.

I cocked my hat, and twirled my stick,
And the girls they called me quite the kick.
George Colman the Younger.

Kickshaws. Made dishes, odds and ends, formerly written "kickshose." (French, quelque chose.)

Kicksy-winsy. A horse that kicks and winces in impatience; figuratively a wife (grey mare). The word is used by Taylor, the water poet. Shakespeare spells it kicksy-wicksy.

He wears his honours in a box unseen
That hugs his kicksy-wicksy here at home,
Spending his manly marrow in her arms,
Which should sustain the bound and high curvet
Of Mars's fiery steed.
"All's Well that Ends Well," ii. 3.

Kidderminster Poetry. Coarse doggerel verse, like the coarse woollen manufacture of Kidderminster. The term was first used by Shenstone, who applied it to a Mr. C., of Kidderminster.

Thy verses, friend, are Kidderminster stuff;
And I must own you've measured out enough.

Kidnapper. A kid is a child, a contraction of kinder or kind; and nap means to steal. (Swedish, nappa; German, knappen; our nab.)

Kidney. Men of another kidney, or of the same kidney—i.e., sort or kind. A corruption of the Saxon cynren (kindred), as kindred spirits, &c.

Kikymo'ra (Slavonic mythology). The god of night, corresponding to Morpheus of Roman mythology.

Kilda (St.). The farthest of the western isles of Scotland.

Kilda're (2 syl.) is the Irish Kill dara, church of the oaks.

Kildare's Holy Fane. Famous for the "Fire of Bridget," which was inextinguishable, because the nuns never allowed it to go out. Every twentieth night St. Bridget returned to tend the fire. Part of the chapel of St. Bridget still remains, and is called "The Fire-house."

Apud Kildariam occurrit ignis Sanctæ Brigidæ quem inextinguibilem vocant.
Giraldus Cambrensis, "Hibernia," ii. 34.

Kilken'ny is the Gaelic Kill Kenny, church of St. Kenny or Can'icé.

Kilkenny Cats. (See CAT.)

Killed by Inches. In allusion to divers ways of prolonging capital punishments in olden times; e.g.: (1) The "iron coffin of Lissa." The prisoner was laid in the coffin, and saw the iron lid creep slowly down with almost imperceptible movement—slowly, silently, but surely; on, on it came with relentless march, till, after lingering days and nights in suspense, the prisoner was at last as slowly crushed by the iron lid pressing on him. (2) The "baïser de la Vierge" of Baden-Baden. The prisoner, blindfolded and fastened to a chain, was lowered by a windlass down a deep shaft from the top of the castle into the very heart of the rock on which it stands. Here he remained till he was conducted to the torture-chamber, and commanded "to kiss" the brazen statue of the "Virgin" which stood at the end of a passage; but immediately he raised his lips to give the kiss, down he fell through a trap-door on a wheel with spikes, which was set in motion by the fall. (3) The "iron cages of Louis XI." were so contrived that the victims might linger out for years; but whether they sat, stood, or lay down, the position was equally uncomfortable. (4) The "chambre à crucier" was a heavy chest, short, shallow, and lined with sharp stones, in which the sufferer was packed and buried alive. (5) The "hernicles" consisted of a mattress on which the victim was fastened by the neck, while his legs were crushed between two logs of wood, on the uppermost of which the torturer took his seat. This process continued for several days, till the sufferer died with the lingering torment. Many other modes of stretching out the torment of death might easily be added.

Killed by Kindness. It is said that Draco, the Athenian legislator, met with his death from his popularity, being smothered in the theatre of Ægina by the number of caps and cloaks showered on him by the spectators (B.C. 590). (See KINDNESS.)

Killing no Murder. A tract written by Sexby, who was living in Holland at the time of its publication. Probably Sexby was paid for fathering it, and that the real author was William Allan Killing-stone in Louth. A cromlech, probably used for human sacrifice.

Kilmansegg (Miss). An heiress of great expectation with an artificial leg of solid gold.—Thomas Hood, "A Golden Legend."

Kilmarnock Cowls. Nightcaps. The Kilmarnock nightcaps were once celebrated all over Scotland.

Kilmarth Rocks (Scotland). A pile of stones towering twenty-eight feet in height, and overhanging more than twelve feet, like the tower of Pisa (Italy). (See CHEESEWRING.)

Kilwinning, in the county of Ayr, Scotland, the scene of the renowned tournament held in 1339 by the Earl of Eglington. It was also the cradle of Freemasonry in Scotland.

Kin, Kind.

King. But now, my cousin Hamlet, and my son—
Ham. A little more than kin, and less than kind.

Kin or kinsman is a relative by marriage or blood more distant than father and son.

Kind means of the same sort or genus, as man-kind or man-genus.

Hamlet says he is more than kin to Claudius (as he was step-son), but still he is not of the same kind, the same class. He is not a bird of the same feather as the king.

Kinchok. One of the two chief divinities of Thibet.

Kind-hart. A jocular name for a tooth-drawer; so called from a dentist of the name in the reign of queen Elizabeth. Kindhart, the dentist, is mentioned by Rowland in his "Letting of Humours-Blood in the Head-vaine." (1600.)

Kindness. Killed with kindness. The allusion is to the ape, which not unfrequently strangles its young ones by hugging them too hard. (See KILLED.)

King means Father. The word takes us back to patriarchal times, when families were grouped into clans, clans into tribes, and tribes into nations. The elders formed the senate, and each "assembly of elders" had its father. (German, könig; Sanskrit, janaka, a father. Greek, anax, and Latin, senex, the old man of the tribe, or paterfamilias of the nation.) (See QUEEN.)

Kingly Titles:

Abim'elech (my father the king). The chief ruler of the ancient Philistines.

Agag (lord). The chief ruler of the Amalekites (4 syl.).

Akbar Khan (very-great chieftain). Hindustan.

Anax and Basileus. The chief ruler of the ancient Greek kingdoms.

Asser or Assyr (blessed one). The chief ruler of ancient Assyria.

Attabeg (father prince). Persia, 1118.

Augustus. The title of the reigning emperor of Rome, when the heir presumptive was styled "Cæsar." (See AUGUSTUS.)

Autocrat (self-potentate). One whose power is absolute—Russia.

Beglerbeg. (See Bey.)

Ben-Hadad (son of the sun) or Hadad. The chief ruler of ancient Damascus.

Bey of Tunis. In Turkey, a bey is the governor of a banner, and the chief over the seven banners is the beglar-bey.

Brenn or Brenhin (war chief) of the ancient Gauls. A dictator appointed by the Druids in times of danger.

Bretwalda (wielder of Britain). Chief king of the heptarchy.

Cæsar. Proper name adopted by the Roman emperors.

Calif (successor). Successors of Mahomet; now the Grand Signior of Turkey, and Sophi of Persia.

Canda'ce. Proper name adopted by the queens of Ethiopia.

Cacique (Ca-zeek'). American Indians; native princes of the ancient Peruvians, Cubans, Mexicans, &c.

Cham. (See Khan.)

Cyrus (mighty). Ancient Persia. (See CYRUS.)

Czar (same as Cæsar, q.v.). Russia.

Darius, Latin form of Darawesh (king). Ancient Persia.

Dey. Algiers before it was annexed to France.

Dictator. A military autocrat, appointed by the Roman senate in times of danger.

Emperor. France, &c.

Esin'gæ (q.v.). Kings of Kent.

Hos'podar. Moldavia and Wallachia.

Imperator (ruler or commander). The Latin form of emperor.

Inca. Ancient Peru.

Judge. Ancient Jews.

Kaiser (same as Cæsar, q.v.). Austria.

Khan (chieftain) or Ghengis-Khan. Tartary. In Persia, the governor of a province is called a Khan.

Khedive (q.v.). Modern Egypt.

King or Queen. Great Britain, &c.

Lama or Dalai Lama (great mother-of-souls). Thibet.

Melech (king). Ancient Jews.

Mo'gul or Great Mogul. Mougo'lia.

Nejus or Nejushee (lord protector). Abyssinia.

Nizam' (ruler) or Nizam-ul-Mulk (ruler of the state). Southern India north-west of Madras.

Pendrag'on (chief of the dragons, or "summus rex"). A dictator, created by the ancient Celts in times of danger.

Pha'raoh (light of the world). Ancient Egypt.

President. Republic of America.

Ptol'emy (proper name adopted). Egypt after the death of Alexander.

Ra'jah or Maha-rajah (great king). Hindustan.

Rex (ruler). A Latin word equivalent to our king.

Scherif (lord). Mecca and Medi'na.

Shah (protector). Persia.

Sheik (patriarch). Arabia.

So'phi (holy). Attitle of the Shah of Persia
Stadtholder (city-holder). Formerly chief magistrate of the United Provinces of Holland.

Sultan or Soldan (ruler). Turkey.

Vayvode or Wayvode of Transylvania, Moldavia, and Wallachia. In the ancient kingdom of Poland, a governor of a province.

Also, Aga, ameer or emir, archduke, count, doge, duke, effendi, elector, exarch, imaum, infanta, landamman, landgrave, mandarin, margrave or margravine, nepaub, pacha or bashaw, prince, sachem, sutrap, seigneur or gravi-seigneur, sirdar, subahdar, suzerain, tetrarch, viceroy, &c., in some cases are chief independent rulers, in some cases dependent rulers or governors subject to an over-lord, and in others simply titles of honour without separate dominion.

¶ The factory king. Richard Oastler, of Bradford, the successful advocate of the "Ten Hours' Bill." (1789 1861.)

Re' galantuomo (the gallant king). Victor Emmanuel of Italy. (1820-*)

The three kings of Cologne. The representatives of the three magi who came from the East to offer gifts to the infant Jesus. Tradition makes them three eastern kings, and at Cologne the names ascribed to them are Kaspar, Melchior, and Balthazar.

The books of the four kings. A pack of cards.

After supper were brought in the books of the four kings. — Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel," i. 22.

Like a king. When Porus, the Indian prince, was taken prisoner, Alexander asked him how he expected to be treated. "Like a king," he replied; and Alexander made him his friend.

A king should die standing. So said Louis XVIII. of France, in imitation of Vespasian, emperor of Rome.

The king can do no wrong. A sovereign is not responsible for the acts of his ministers; whatever wrong is done, the administrative government must be held responsible for it. This is contrary to the general axiom, quod facit per alios facit per se—i.e., every employer is responsible for the actions of the agents he employs.

Kings have long hands. Do not quarrel with a king, as his power and authority reach to the end of his dominions. The Latin proverb is, An nescis longas régibus esse manus; and the German, Mit gressen herren ist nicht gut kirschen essen (It is not good to eat cherries with great men), as they throw the stones in your eyes.

There's such divinity doth hedge a king,
That treason can but peep to what it would.
Shakespeare, King in "Hamlet," iv. 5.

Pray aid of the king. When some one, under the belief that he has a right to the land, claims rent of the king's tenants, they appeal to the sovereign, or "pray aid of the king."

Kings, &c., of England. Much foolish superstition has of late been circulated respecting certain days supposed to be "fatal" to the crowned heads of Great Britain. The following list may help to discriminate truth from fiction:—

[From means the regnal year commenced from; To is the day of death.]

WILLIAM I., from Monday, December 25th, 1066, to Thursday, September 9th, 1087; WILLIAM II., from Sunday, September 26th, 1087, to Thursday, August 2nd, 1100; HENRY I., from Sunday, August 5th, 1100, to Sunday, December 1st, 1135; STEPHEN, from Thursday, December 26th, 1135, to Monday, October 25th, 1154.

HENRY II., from Sunday, December 19th, 1154, to Thursday, July 6th, 1189; RICHARD I., from Sunday, September

3rd, 1189, to Tuesday, April 6th, 1199; JOHN, from Thursday, May 27th, 1199, to Wednesday, October 19th, 1216; HENRY III., from Saturday, October 28th, 1216, to Wednesday, November 16th, 1272; EDWARD I., from Sunday, November 20th, 1272, to Friday, July 7th, 1307; EDWARD II., from Saturday, July 8th, 1307, to Tuesday, January 20th, 1327; EDWARD III., from Sunday, January 25th, 1327 (N.S.), to Sunday, June 21st, 1377; RICHARD II., from Monday, June 22nd, 1377, to Monday, September 29th, 1399; HENRY IV., from Tuesday, September 30th, 1399, to Monday, March 20th, 1413; HENRY V., from Tuesday, March 21st, 1413, to Monday, August 31st, 1422; HENRY VI., from Tuesday, September 1st, 1422, to Wednesday, March 4th, 1461; EDWARD IV., from Wednesday, March 4th, 1461, to Wednesday, April 9th, 1483; EDWARD V., from Wednesday, April 9th, 1483, to Sunday, June 22nd, 1483; RICHARD III., from Thursday, June 26th, 1483, to Monday, August 22nd, 1485.

HENRY VII., from Monday, August 22nd, 1485, to Saturday, April 21st, 1509; HENRY VIII., from Sunday, April 22nd, 1509, to Friday, January 28th, 1547; EDWARD VI., from Friday, January 28th, 1547, to Thursday, July 6th, 1553; MARY, from Thursday, July 6th, 1553, to Thursday, November 17th, 1558; ELIZABETH, from Thursday, November 17th, 1558, to Monday, March 24th, 1603.

JAMES I., from Monday, March 24th, 1603, to Sunday, March 27th, 1625; CHARLES I., from Sunday, March 27th, 1625, to Tuesday, January 30th, 1649; [Commonwealth—CROMWELL died Friday, September, 13th, 1658;] CHARLES II., restored Saturday, May 29th, 1660, died Tuesday, February 6th, 1685; JAMES II., from Tuesday, February 6th, 1685, to Saturday, December 11th, 1688; WILLIAM III., from Sunday, February 13th, 1689, to Wednesday, March 8th, 1702; ANNE, from Wednesday, March 8th, 1702, to Wednesday, August 1st, 1714.

GEORGE I., from Wednesday, August 1st, 1714, to Wednesday, June 11th, 1727; GEORGE II., from Wednesday, June 11th, 1727, to Saturday, October 25th, 1760; GEORGE III., from Saturday, October 25th, 1760, to Saturday, January 29th, 1820; GEORGE IV., from Saturday, January 29th, 1820, to Saturday, June 26th, 1830; WILLIAM IV., from Saturday,

June 26th, 1830, to Tuesday, June 20th, 1837; VICTORIA, from Tuesday, June 20th, 1837 * *

Hence four have terminated their reign on a Sunday, six on a Monday, five on a Tuesday, seven on a Wednesday, five on a Thursday, two on a Friday, and five on a Saturday. Nine have begun and ended their reign on the same day: Henry I. and Edward III. on a Sunday; Richard II. on a Monday; Edward IV., Anne, and George I. on a Wednesday; Mary on a Thursday; George III. and George IV. on a Saturday.

Kings, &c., of England.

William I. styled himself King of the English, Normans, and Cinomantians; Henry I., King of the English and duke of the Normans; Stephen, King of the English; Henry II., King of England, duke of Normandy and Aquitania, and count of Anjou; John, King of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Normandy and Aquitania, and count of Anjou; Henry III., in 1259, dropped the titles of "duke of Normandy" and "count of Anjou;" Edward I., King of England, lord of Ireland, and duke of Aquitania; Edward II. made his son "duke of Aquitania" in the nineteenth year of his reign, and styled himself King of England and lord of Ireland; Edward III. from 1337 adopted the style of King of France and England, and lord of Ireland, and duke of Aquitania; Richard II., King of England and France, and lord of Ireland; Edward VI., Of England, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith—this last title was given to Henry VIII. in the thirty-fifth year of his reign; Mary, Of England, France, and Ireland, queen, defender of the faith, and supreme head of the Anglican and Hibernian Church; Charles I., Of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c.; Commonwealth, The keepers of the liberties of England, by the authority of Parliament, and Cromwell was styled his highness; Charles II. and James II. as Charles I.; William and Mary, Of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king and queen, defenders of the faith, &c.; Anne, Of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, queen, defender of the faith, &c.; George III., in 1801, abandoned the words "king of France," which had been retained for 432 years, and his style was, George III., by the grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland king, defender of the faith.

King-at-Arms. An officer whose duty it is to direct the heralds, preside at chapters, and have the jurisdiction of armoury. There are three kings-at-arms in England, viz., Garter, Clarenceux, and Norroy; one in Scotland, viz., Lyon; and one in Ireland, called Ulster.

Bath King-of-Arms is no member of the college, but takes precedence next after Garter. Office created in 1725 for the service of the Order of the Bath.

King of Bark. Christopher III. of Scandinavia, who, in a time of great scarcity, had the bark of birchwood mixed with meal for food. (15th century.)

King of Bath. Beau Nash, master of the ceremonies at that city for some fifteen years. (1674-1761.)

King of Beasts. The lion, noted for the grandness of its nature, and its royal quality of mercy.

King of Khorassan. So Anva'ri, the Persian poet of the twelfth century, is called.

King of Metals. Gold, which is not only the most valuable of metals, but also is without its peer in freedom from alloy. It is got without smelting; wherever it exists it is visible to the eye; and it consorts with little else than pure silver. Even with this precious alloy, the pure metal ranges from sixty to ninety-nine per cent.

King of Misrule. Sometimes called LORD, and sometimes ABBOT, &c. At Oxford and Cambridge one of the Masters of Arts superintended both the Christmas and Candlemas sports, for which he was allowed a fee of 40s. These diversions continued till the Reformation. Polydor Virgil says of the feast of Misrule that it was "derived from the Roman Saturnalia," held in December for five days (17th—22nd). The feast of Misrule lasted twelve days.

If we compare our Paganian Christmas and New Year Tides with these Saturnalia and Feasts of Janus, we shall find such near affinity between them both in regard of time...and in their manner of solemnizing...that we must needs conclude the one to be the very ape or issue of the other—Prynne "Histrio-Master." (737.)

King of Painters. A title assumed by Parrhasios, the painter, a contemporary of Zeuxis. Plutarch says he wore a purple robe and a golden crown. (Fl. 400 B.C.)

King of Preachers. Louis Bourdaloue, a French clergyman. (1632-1704.)

King of Rome. A title conferred by Napoleon I. on his son on the day of his birth; who was more generally called duke of Reichstadt. (1811-1832.)

King of Shreds and Patches. In the old mysteries Vice used to be dressed as a mimic king in a party-coloured suit. (Shakespeare, "Hamlet," iii. 4.) The phrase is metaphorically applied to certain literary operatives who compile books for publishers, but supply no originality of thought or matter.

King of Terrors. Death.

King of Waters. The river Amazon of North America.

King of Yvetot (pron. Ev-to). A man of mighty pretensions but small merits. Yvetot is near Rouen, and was once a seigneurie, the possessors of which were entitled kings—a title given them in 534 by Clotaire I., and continued far into the fourteenth century.

Il était un roi d'Yvetot,
Peu connu dans l'histoire ;
Se levant tard, se couchant tôt,
Dormant fort bien sans gloire ; &c.
Béranger.

King of the Bean (Roi de la Fève). The Twelfth-night king; so called because he was chosen by distributing slices of Twelfth-cake to the children present, and the child who had the slice with a bean in it was king of the company for the night. This sport was indulged in till the Reformation, even at the two universities. Without doubt, the basis of Twelfth-cake day must be traced to the old Roman feast of Janus, when people made each other presents of honey-cakes, fruits, and sweetmeats; but the exact day has been conformed to the Epiphany, according to the usual custom of the Roman Catholic Church. (See KING OF MISRULE.)

King of the Beggars or Gipsies. Bampfylde Moore Carew, a noted English vagabond. (1693-1770.)

King of the Forest. The oak, which not only braves the storm, but fosters the growth of tender parasites under its arms.

King of the Teign. Baldrick of South Devon, son of Eri, who long defended his territory against Algar, a lawless chief.

King of the World (Shah-Jehan). The title assumed by Khorrum Shah, third son of Selim Jehan-Ghir, and fifth of the Mogul emperors of Delhi. (Died 1666.)

King Ban. Father of Sir Launcelot du Lac. He died of grief when his castle was taken and burnt through the treachery of his seneschal.—"Launcelot du Lac." (1494.)

King's Cave. Opposite to Campbellton; so called because it was here that king Robert Bruce and his retinue lodged when they landed on the mainland from the isle of Arran.—"Statistical Account of Scotland," v., p. 167 (article, Arran).

King's Chair. A seat made by two bearers with their hands. On Candlemas Day, the children of Scotland used to bring their schoolmaster a present in money, and the boy who brought the largest sum was king for the nonce. When school was dismissed, the "king" was carried on a seat of hands in procession, and the seat was called the "king's chair."

King Cotton. Cotton, the staple of the Southern States of America, and the chief article of manufacture in England. The expression was first used by James H. Hammond in the senate of the United States, in 1853. The great cotton manufacturers are called "cotton lords."

King's Crag. Fife, in Scotland; so called because Alexander III. of Scotland was killed there.

As he was riding in the dusk of the evening along the sea-coast of Fife, betwixt Burnt-island and Kinghorn, he approached too near the brink of the precipice, and his horse starting or stumbling, he was thrown over the rock, and killed on the spot.... the people of the country still point out the very spot where it happened, and which is called "The King's Crag."—Sir Walter Scott, "Tales of a Grandfather," v.

King Estmere (2 syl.) of England was induced by his brother Adler to go to king Adland, and request permission to pay suit to his daughter. King Adland replied that Bremor, king of Spain, had already proposed to her and been rejected; but when the lady was introduced to the English king, she accepted him. King Estmere and his brother returned home to prepare for the wedding, but had not proceeded a mile when the king of Spain returned to press his suit, and threaten vengeance if it were not accepted. A page was instantly dispatched to inform king Estmere, and request him to return. The two brothers in the guise of harpers rode into the hall of king Adland, when Bremor rebuked them, and bade them leave their steeds in the stable. A quarrel ensued, in which Adler slew "the sowdan," and the two brothers put the Spanish retainers to flight. After which king Estmere married the lady, and took her to England to dwell with him.—T. Percy, "Reliques," &c., series I., bk. i. 6.

King's Evil. Scrofula, so called from a notion which prevailed from the reign of Edward the Confessor to that of queen Anne, that it could be cured by the royal touch. The Jacobites considered that the power did not descend to William III. and Anne, because the "divine" hereditary right was not fully possessed by them, but the office remained in our Prayer Book till 1719. Prince Charles Edward, when he claimed to be prince of Wales, touched a female child for the disease in 1745; but the last person touched in England was Dr. Johnson, in 1712, when only thirty months old, by queen Anne. The French kings laid claim to the same divine power even from the time of Anne of Clovis, A.D. 481, and on Easter Sunday, 1686, Louis XIV. touched 1,600 persons, using these words: Le roy te touche, Dieu te guerisse. The practice was introduced by Henry VII. of presenting the person "touched" with a small gold or silver coin, called a touch-piece. The one presented to Dr. Johnson has St. George and the Dragon on one side and a ship on the other; the legend of the former is Soli deo gloria. and of the latter Anna D:G:M:BR:F:ET:H: REG. (Anne, by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland Queen).

King-fisher. So called from the royal or kingly beauty of its plumage, chiefly blue and green. It frequents the banks of rivers, and dives for fish.

King Franco'ni. Joachim Murat, so called because he resembled in dress and finery Franconi the mountebank. (1767-1815.)

King Horn or Childe Horn. The hero of a metrical romance by Mestre Thomas.

Kings's Keys. The crow-bars and hammers used by sheriffs' officers to force doors and locks (law phrase).

King Log. A roi fainéant, a king that rules in peace and quietness, but never makes his power felt. The allusion is to the fable of "The Frogs Asking for a King," when Jupiter threw a log into their pond.

King-maker. Richard Neville, earl of Warwick; so called because, when he sided with Henry VI., Henry was king; but when he sided with Edward IV., Henry was deposed and Edward was king. He fell at Barnet. (1420-1471.)

King's Men. The 78th Foot; so called from their motto, Cuidich'n Rhi (Help the king).

King Pétaud. The court of king Pétaud. A kind of Alsätia, where all are talkers with no hearers, all are kings with no subjects, all are masters and none servants. There was once a society of beggars in France, the chief of whom called himself king Pétaud. (Latin, peto, to beg.)

King's-picture. Money; so called because coin is stamped with "the image" of the reigning sovereign.

King Ryence, of North Wales, sent a dwarf to king Arthur to say "he had overcome eleven kings, all of which paid him homage in this sort—viz., they gave him their bards to purfell his mantle. He now required king Arthur to do likewise." King Arthur returned answer, "My beard is full young yet for a purfell, but before it is long enough for such a purpose, King Ryence shall do me homage on both his knees." (See Percy, "Reliques," &c., series iii., bk. i.)

Spenser says that Lady Brianna loved a knight named Crudor, who refused to marry her till she sent him a mantle lined with the beards of knights and locks of ladies. To accomplish this, she appointed Mal'effort, her seneschal, to divest every lady that drew near the castle of her locks, and every knight of his beard.—"Fuëry Queen," bk. vi., cant. 1.

King Stork. A tyrant that devours his subjects, and makes them submissive with fear and trembling. The allusion is to the fable of "The Frogs Desiring a King," but not such a one as King Log.

Kingston-on-Thames. Named Kings-stone from a large, square block of stone near the town hall, on which the early Anglo-Saxon monarchs knelt when they were anointed to the kingly office: Edward the Elder, Athelstan, Edmund, Ethelred, Edred, Edwy, and Edward the Martyr received on this stone the royal unction. The stone is now enclosed with railings.

Kingstown (Ireland), formerly called Dunleary. The name was changed in 1821 out of compliment to George IV., who visited Ireland that year, and left Dunleary harbour for his return home on the 5th of September.

Kingswood Lions. Donkeys; Kingswood being at one time famous for the number of asses kept by the colliers who lived thereabout.

Kinless Loon. The judges whom Cromwell sent into Scotland were so termed, because they condemned and acquitted those brought before them wholly irrespective of party, and solely on the merits of the charge with which they were accused.

Kiosk. A Turkish summer-house or a cove supported by pillars.

Kirk of Skulls. Gamrie church in Banffshire; so called because the skulls and other bones of the Norsemen who fell in the neighbouring field, called the Bloody Pots, were built into its walls.

Kirke-grim. The nix who looks to order in churches, and punishes those who misbehave themselves there, and the persons employed to keep it tidy if they fail in their duty.—Scandinavian mythology.

Kirke's Lambs. The 2nd Foot. Their colonel was Piercy Kirke, when they were appointed as a guard of honour to the queen of Charles II. on her progress to London. For this service they were allowed to carry on their colours the "Paschal Lamb."

Kirkrapine (3 syl.). While Una was in the hut of Corewca, Kirkrapine forced his way in; but the lion springing on him tore him to pieces. The meaning is that Romanism was increased by rapine, but the English lion at the Reformation put an end to the rapacity of monks.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. i.

Kishmee. An island in the Persian Gulf, famous for its white wine.

Kiss, as a mode of salutation, comes from its use to express reverence or worship. Thus to adore idols and to kiss idols mean the same thing. Indeed, the word adore signifies simply to carry the hand to the mouth, that is, to kiss it to the idol. We still kiss the hand in salutation. Various parts of the body are kissed to distinguish the character of the adoration paid. Thus, to kiss the lips is to adore the living breath of the person saluted; to kiss the feet or ground is to humble oneself in adoration; to kiss the garments is to express veneration to whatever belongs to or touches the person who wears them. "Kiss the Son lest he be angry" (Ps. ii. 12) means Worship the Son of God. Pharaoh tells Joseph "Thou shalt be over my house, and upon thy mouth shall all my people kiss," meaning they shall reverence the commands of Joseph by kissing the roll on which his commands would be written. "Samuel poured oil on Saul and kissed him," to acknowledge subjection to God's anointed (1 Sam. x. 1). In the Hebrew state, this mode of expressing reverence arose from the peculiar form of government established, whether under the patriarchal or matrimonial figure.

A Judas kiss. An act of treachery. The allusion is to the apostle Judas, who betrayed his Master with a kiss.

Kissing the Pope's Toe. Matthew of Westminster says, it was customary formerly to kiss the hand of his holiness; but that a certain woman, in the eighth century, not only kissed the pope's hand, but "squeezed it." The church magnate, seeing the danger to which he was exposed, cut off his hand, and was compelled in future to offer his foot, a custom which has continued to the present hour.

Kissing under the Mistletoe. Balder, the Apollo of Scandinavian mythology, was killed by a mistletoe arrow given to the blind Höder, by Loki, the god of mischief and potentate of our earth. Balder was restored to life, but the mistletoe was placed in future under the care of Friga, and was never again to be an instrument of evil till it touched the earth, the empire of Loki. Hence is it always suspended from ceilings. And when persons of opposite sexes pass under it, they give each other the kiss of peace and love, in the full assurance that the epiphyte is no longer an instrument of mischief.

A correspondent in Notes and Queries suggests that the Romans dedicated the holly to Saturn, whose festival was in December, and that the early Christians decked their houses with the Saturnian emblems to deceive the Romans and escape persecution. It was this sort of compromise that Naaman the Syrian requested when his master bowed in worship to Rimmon.

Kissing-crust. The crust where the lower lump of bread kisses the upper.

Kist'nerappan. The Indian water-god. Persons at the point of death are sometimes carried into the Ganges, and sometimes to its banks, that Kistnerappan may purify them from all defilement before they die. Others have a little water poured into the palms of their hands, with the same object.

Kit. A soldier's kit. His outfit. (Anglo-Saxon, kyth.)

The whole kit of them. The whole lot. (See above.)

Kit's Coty House (Kent) is Katigern's or Kitigern's coty house—that is, the house or tomb of Kitigern, made of cots or huge flat stones. (See HACKELL'S COIT and DEVIL'S COIT.)

Katigern was the brother of Vortimer, and leader of the Britons, who was slain in the battle of Aylesford or Epsford, fighting against Hengist and Horsa. Lambarde calls it Citscotehouse (1570). The structure consists of two upright side-stones, one standing in the middle as a support or tenon, and a fourth imposed as a roof.

Kitchi-man'itou. The good deity of the savages of Canada. Once a year they celebrate his festival with dancing and singing.

Kite (Sergeant), in Farquhar's "Recruiting Officer."

Kite-flying. To fly the kite is to "raise the wind," or obtain money on bills, whether good or bad. It is a Stock Exchange phrase, and means, as a kite flutters in the air by reason of its lightness, and is a mere toy, so these bills fly about, but are light and worthless.

Kitely (2 syl.). A jealous city merchant in Ben Jonson's "Every Man in his Humour."

Kit-kat Club. A club to which Addison belonged. It received its name from Christopher Katt, a pastry-cook, who served the club with mutton pies. Sir Godfrey Kneller painted a series of portraits of the club members to be hung in the room of meeting, and in order to accommodate the paintings to the height of the walls, was obliged to make them three-quarter lengths; hence a three-quarter portrait is still called a kit-cat.

Strictly speaking, a kit-cat canvas is twenty-eight inches by thirty-six.

Kit-kat Pictures are portraits of three-quarter length, like those painted by Sir Godfrey Kneller for the Kit-kat Club-room.

Steele, Addison, Congreve, Garth, Vanbrugh, Manwaring, Steeney, Walpole, and Pulteney were of it; so was lord Dorset and the present duke. Manwaring... was the ruling man in all conversations ... lord Stanhope and the earl of Essex were also members.... Each member gave his [picture].—Lope to Spence.

Kit Kats. Mutton pies, so called from Christopher Katt, the pastrycook, who excelled in these pasties. (See above.)

Kittle of Fish. A pretty kittle of fish. A pretty muddle, a bad job. A sea term. "The kittle of fish" is the apparatus of pulleys employed in dragging the flukes of the anchor towards the bow, after it has been hoisted to the cat-head. If these pulleys get out of gear, they are "a pretty kittle of fish." (See KETTLE.)

Kiwas'a. An idol of the Virginian savages.

Klaus (Peter). The prototype of Rip Van Winkle, whose sleep lasted twenty years. (See SANTA KLAUS.)

Kloka-man (wise-folk). Doctors who undertake to cure the evils caused by wicked elves. They correspond to the Fairy-women of Ireland.—Scandinavia.

Knave. A lad, a garçon, a servant. (Saxon, cnafa, a boy; German, knabe.) The knave of clubs, &c., is the son or servant of the king and queen thereof.

In an old version of the Bible we read : "Paul, a knave of Jesus Christ, called to be an apostle," &c. (Rom. i. 1).

A knave of Sologne. More knave than fool. The French say un niais de Sologne. Sologne is a part of the departments of Loiret et Loir-et-Cher.

Knecht Clobes. (See SANTA KLAUS.)

Knee. Greek, gonu; Latin, genu; French, genou; Sanskrit, jannu; Saxon, cneow; German, knie; English, knee.

Knee Tribute. Adoration or reverence shown by prostration or bending the knee.

Kneph. The ram-headed god of ancient Egypt, called also Amen-ra, and by the Greeks, Ammon.

Knicker-bocker (Die'drich). The imaginary author of a facetious "History of New York," by Washington Irving.

Knife is the emblem borne by St. Agatha, St. Albert, and St. Christina.

The playing knife is the emblem of St. Bartholomew, because he was flayed with one.

A sacrificing knife is borne in Christian art by St. Zadkiel, the angel.

The knife of academic knots. Chrysippus, so called because he was the keenest disputant of his age. (B.C. 280-207.)

Knight means simply a boy. (Saxon, cnicht.) As boys (like the Latin puer and French garçon) were used as servants, so cnicht came to mean a servant. Those who served the feudal kings bore arms, and persons admitted to this privilege were the king's knights; as this distinction was limited to men of family, the word became a title of honour next to the nobility. In modern Latin a knight is termed auratus (golden), from the gilt spurs which they used to wear.

Last of the knights. Maximilian I. of Germany. (1459, 1493-1519.)

Knights Bachelors. Persons who are simply knights, but belong to no order. (French, bas-chevaliers.)

Knights Bannerets. Knights created on the field of battle. The king or general cut off the point of their flag, and made it square, so as to resemble a banner. Hence knights bannerets are called Knights of the Square Flag.

Knights Baronets. Inferior barons, an order of hereditary rank, created by James I in 1611. The title was sold for money, and the funds went nominally towards the plantation in Ulster. These knights bear the arms of Ulster, viz., a field argent, a sinister hand couped at the wrist gules. (See HAND.)

Knights Errant. In France, from 768 to 987, the land was incumbered with fortified castles; in England this was not the case till the reign of Stephen. The lords of these castles used to carry off females and commit rapine, so that a class of men sprang up, at least in the pages of romance, who roamed about in full armour to protect the defenceless and aid the oppressed.

"Proxima quæquæ metit glad'io" is the perfect account of a knight errant.—Dryden, Dedication of the "Æneis."

Knight's Fee. A portion of land held by custom, sufficient to maintain a knight to do service as such for the king. William the Conqueror created 60,000 such fees when he came to England. All who had £20 a year in lands or income were compelled to be knights.

Knight Rider Street (London). So named from the processions of knights from the Tower to Smithfield, where tournaments were held. Leigh Hunt says the name originated in a sign or some reference to the Heralds College in the vicinity.

Knight of Arts and Industry. The hero of Thomson's "Castle of Indolence," canto ii. 7-13.

Knights of the Bath. (See BATH.)

Knights of the Blade. Bullies who were for ever appealing to their swords to brow-beat the timid.

Knights of the Carpet or Carpet Knights, are not military but civil knights, such as mayors, lawyers, and so on; so called because they receive their knighthood kneeling on a carpet, and not on the battle-field.

Knights of the Chamber or Chamber Knights, are knights bachelors made in times of peace in the presence chamber, and not in the camp. Being military men, they differ from "carpet knights," who are always civilians.

Knights of the Garter. (See GARTER.)

Knights of the Hare. An order of twelve knights created by Edward III. in France, upon the following occasion:—A great shouting was raised by the French army, and Edward thought the shout was the onset of battle, but found afterwards it was occasioned by a hare running between the two armies.

Knight of La Mancha. Don Quixote de la Mancha, the hero of Cervantes' novel, called "Don Quixote."

Knights of Malta or Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem. Some time after the first crusade, some Neapolitan merchants built at Jerusalem an hospital for sick pilgrims and a church which they dedicated to St. John; these they committed to the charge of certain knights, called Hospitallers of St. John. In 1310 these Hospitallers took Rhode Island, and changed their title into Knights of Rhodes. In 1523 they were expelled from Rhodes by the Turks, and took up their residence in the Isle of Malta.

Knight of the Pestle or Knight of the Pestle and Mortar. An apothecary or druggist, whose chief instrument is the pestle and mortar, used in compounding medicines.

Knights o' the Post. Persons who haunted the purlieus of the courts, ready to be hired for a bribe to swear anything; so called from their being always found waiting at the posts which the sheriffs set up outside their doors for posting proclamations on.

There are knights of the post and hooby cheats enon-h to swear the truth of the broadest contradictions.—South.

Knight of the Post. A man in the pilory, or that has been tied to a whipping-post, is jestingly so called.

Knight of the Road. A highway-man.

Knights of the Round Table. King Arthur's knights, so called from the large circular table round which they sat. The table was circular to prevent any heart-sore about precedence. The number of these knights is variously given; the popular notion is that they were twelve; several authorities place the number at forty; but the "History of Prince Arthur" states that the table was made to accommodate 150. King Leodegraunce, who gave Arthur the table on his wedding-day, sent him also 100 knights, Merlin furnished twenty-eight, Arthur himself added two; and twenty "sieges" were left to reward merit.—Chaps. 45, 46. These knights went forth into all countries in quest of adventures. The most noted are—

Sir Acolon, Ballamore, Beau'maris, Beleobus, Belvoure, Bersunt, Bors, Ector, Eric, Ewain, Floll, Ga'heris, Gal'ahad, Gal'ohalt, Gareth, Gau'riel, Gawain or Ywain, Grislet, Kay, Lamerock, Lancelot du Lac, Lionell, Marhaus, Palamide, Pa'gunet, Pelleas, Per'edur or Per'ceval, Sagris, Superab'ilis, Tor, Tris'am or Tristan de Leonnais, Turquine, Wigalois, Wig'amur, &c. &c.

Knight of the Rueful Countenance. Don Quixote.

Knight of the Shears. A tailor. The word shear is a play on the word shire or county.

Knights of St. Patrick. Instituted in 1783, in honour of the patron saint of Ireland.

Knight of the Swan. An old English prose romance, compiled by Lord Berners. It was an order of the house of Cleve.

Knights of the Thistle. Said to have been established in 809 by Achaicus, king of the Scots, and revived in 1540 by James V. of Scotland. Queen Anne placed the order on a permanent footing. These knights are sometimes called Knights of St. Andrew.

Knights of the Whip. Coachmen.

Knighthen Guild, now called Portoken Ward. King Edgar gave it to thirteen knights on the following conditions:—(1) Each knight was to be victorious in three combats, one above-ground, one underground, and one in the water; (2) each knight was on a given day to run with spears against all comers in East Smithfield. William the Conqueror confirmed the same unto the heirs of these knights. Henry I. gave it to the canons of Holy Trinity, and acquitted it "of all service."

Knipperdollings. A set of German heretics about the time of the Reformation, disciples of a man named Bernard Knipperdolling.—Bloun, "Glossographia." (1681.)

Knock Under. Johnson says this expression arose from a custom once common of knocking under the table when any guest wished to acknowledge himself beaten in argument. Another derivation is knuckle under—i.e., to knuckle or bend the knuckle or knee in proof of submission. Bellenden Kerr says it is Te nō'ck ander, which he interprets "I am forced to yield."

Knockers. Goblins who dwell in mines, and point out rich veins of lead and silver. In Cardiganshire the miners attribute the strange noises so frequently heard in mines to these spirits, which are sometimes called coblyns (German, kobolds).

Knot. He has tied a knot with his tongue he cannot untie with his teeth. He has got married. He has tied the marriage knot by saying "I take thee for my wedded wife," &c., but the knot is not to be untied so easily.

True lovers' knot. "True lovers" is a corruption of the Danish trulofs, "I plight my troth," a knot being the emblem, in Scandinavia, of fidelity, love, and friendship. Sir Thomas Browne thinks the knot owes its origin to the nodus Herculeus, a snaky complication in the calu'cūs or rod of Mercury, in which form the woollen girdle of the Greek brides was fastened.

The ship went six or seven knots an hour. Miles. The log-line is divided into lengths by knots, each length is the same proportion of a nautical mile as half a minute is of an hour. The log-line being cast over, note is taken of the number of knots run out in half a minute, and this number shows the rate per hour.

Knotted. The knotted stick is planed. The house of Orleans is worsted by that of Burgundy. The house of Orleans bore for its badge a bâton noueux, the house of Burgundy a plane; hence the French saying, "Le bâton noueux est plané."

Knout (1 syl.) is a knotted bunch of thoughts made of hide. It is a Tartar invention, but was introduced into Russia. (Knout, Tartar for knot.)

Know. Know the fitting moment. The favourite maxim of Pittacos, one of the "seven wise men."

Know thyself. The wise saw of Chilon, the Spartan ephor. (B.C. 635-560.)

Know your own mind. By Murphy; borrowed from Destouches, the French dramatist.

Know-nothings. A secret political party of the United States, which arose in 1853, who replied to every question asked about their society, "I know nothing about it." Their object was to accomplish the repeal of the naturalisation laws, and of the law which excluded all but natives from holding office. The party split on the slavery question and died out.

Knox's Croft, in Gifford Gate, Haddington; so called because it was the birth-place of John Knox.

Kobold. A house-spirit in German superstition; the same as our Robin Goodfellow, and the Scotch brownie (q.v.). (See HINZELMANN.)

Kochla'ni. Arabian horses of royal stock, of which genealogies have been preserved for more than 2000 years. It is said that they are the offspring of Solomon's stud.—Niebuhr.

Koh-i-Nûr (mountain of light). A large diamond in the possession of the Queen of England. It was found in a Goleonda mine (1550), and belonged to Shah Jehan and Aurungzebe the Great, (Mogul kings). In 1739 it passed into the hands of Nadir Shah, who called it the Koh-i-nûr. It next went to the monarchs of Afghanistan, and when Shah Sujah was dispossessed he gave it to Runjeet Singh, of the Punjab, as the price of his assistance towards the recovery of the throne of Cabul'. It next went to Dhuleep Singh, but when the Punjab was annexed to the British crown in 1849, this noble diamond was surrendered to Great Britain. It is valued at £120,664.

Kohol. Russell says, "The Persian women blacken the inside of their eyelids with a powder made of black Kohol."

And others mix the Kohol's jetty dye
To give that long, dark languish to the eye.
Thomas Moore, "Lalla Rookh," pt. I.

Kola'da. The Janus of the Slaves. His fête is December 24th.

Kolah (a Persian cap). Made of the wool of the sheep of Tartary.—Waring.

Kolis. The 51st Foot, so called from the initial letters of the regimental title, King's Own Light Infantry.

Konx Ompax. The words of dismissal in the Eleusinian Mysteries. A correspondent in Notes and Queries says "konx" or "kogx" is the Sanscrit Causcha (the object of your desire); "ompax" is om (amen), pacsha (all is over). If this is correct the words would mean, God bless you, Amen, The ceremonies are concluded. When a judge gave sentence by dropping his pebble into the urn of mercy or death, he said Pacsha (I have done it). The noise made by the stone in falling was called pacsha (fate), and so was the dripping noise of the clepsydra, which limited the pleader's quota of time.

Koom or Com and Cashan. "Two Persian cities, full of mosques, mausoleums, and sepulchres of the descendants of Ali (the saints of Persia)."—Chardin.

Kör (sickness). The bed of the goddess Hel (q.v.). Its canopy is called "splendid misery."

Korân, or, with the article, Al-Korân (the Reading). The religious, social, civil, commercial, military, and legal code of Islam. It is rather remarkable that we call our Bible the writing (Scripture), but the Arabs call their Bible the reading (Korân). We are told to believe that portions of this book were communicated to the prophet at Mecca and Medi'na by the angel Gabriel, with the sound of bells.

Korrigans or Kor'igans. Nine fays of Brittany, of wonderful powers. They can predict future events, assume any shape they like, move quick as thought from place to place, and cure diseases or wounds. They are not more than two feet high, have long flowing hair, which they are fond of combing, dress only with a white veil, are excellent singers, and their favourite haunt is beside some fountain. They flee at the sound of a bell or benediction. Their breath is most deadly.—Breton mythology.

Kraal. A South African village, being a collection of huts in a circular form; so named by the early Dutch settlers, from kraal, French corail, a coral reef.

Kraken. A supposed sea-monster of vast size, said to have been seen off the coast of Norway and on the North American coasts. It was first described by Pontoppidan. Pliny speaks of a sea-monster in the Straits of Gibraltar, which barred the entrance of ships.

Kratim. The dog which accompanied the Seven Sleepers.

Krem'lin. The imperial palace at Moscow, of a triangular form, and about two miles in circumference. (Russian, krem, a fortress.)

Krems White takes its name from Krems in Austria, the city where it is manufactured.

Kreuzer (pron. krite-zer). A small copper coin in Southern Germany, once marked with a cross. (German, kreuz, a cross.)

Kriemhild (2 syl.). A beautiful Burgundian lady, daughter of Dancrat and Uta, and sister of Gunther, Gernot, and Gis'elher. She first married Siegfried, king of the Netherlands, and next Etzel, king of the Huns. Hagan, the Dane, slew her first husband, and seized all her treasures; and to revenge these wrongs, she invited her brothers and Hagan to visit her in Hungary. In the first part of the "Nibelungen-Lied," Kriemhild brings ruin on herself by a tattling tongue:—(1) She tells Brunhild, queen of Burgundy, that it is Siegfried who has taken her ring and girdle, which so incenses the queen, that she prevails on Hagan to murder the Netherlander; (2) she tells Hagan that the only vulnerable part in Siegfried is a spot between his shoulders, a hint which enables Hagan to direct his wound aright. In the second part of the great epic, she is represented as bent on vengeance, and in the accomplishment of this object, after a most terrible slaughter of friends and foes, she is slain by Hildebrand.

Krish'na (the black one). The eighth avatâra or incarnation of Vishnu. Kansa, demon-king of Mathura, having committed great ravages, Brahman complained to Vishnu, and prayed him to relieve the world of its distress; whereupon Vishnu plucked off two hairs, one white and the other black, and promised they should revenge the wrongs of the demon-king. The black hair became Krishna.—Hindu mythology.

Kriss Kringle. A sort of St. Nicholas (q.v.). On Christmas Eve, Kriss Kringle, arrayed in a fur cap and strange apparel, goes to the bedroom of all good children, where he finds a stocking or sock hung up in expectation of his visit, in which depository he leaves a present for the young wearer. The word means Christ-child, and the eve is called "Kriss-Kringle Eve."

Krī'ta. The first of the four Hindu periods contained in the great Yuga, when the genius of Truth and Right, in the form of a bull, stood firm on his four feet, and man gained nothing by iniquity. (See KALIYUGA.)

Krodo. The Saturn of the ancient Saxons.

Krupp's Steel. Steel from the works of Herr Krupp, of Essen, in Prussia.

Krusman. The Herculēs of the ancient inhabitants of the Rhine.

Ku'dos. Praise, glory. (Greek.)

Ku'fic. Ancient Arabic letters; so called from Kufa, a town in the pashalic of Bagdad, noted for its expert and numerous copyists of the ancient Arabic MSS.

Kufic Coins. Mahometan coins with Kufic or Ancient Arabic characters. The first were struck in the eighteenth year of the Heg'ra (A.D. 638).

Kumāra (youthful). The Hindu war-god, the same as Kārthkeya (q.v.). One of the most celebrated Hindu poems is the legendary history of this god. R. T. H. Griffith has translated seven cantos of it into English verse.

Kurd. A native of Kurdistan.

Kura. A noted legendary hero of India, the contests of whose descendants form the subject of the two great Indian epics.

Ku'vera. The god of riches, represented as riding in a car drawn by hobgoblins.—Hindu mythology.

Ky'anise (3 syl.). To apply corrosive sublimate to timber in order to prevent the dry-rot; so called from Mr. Kyan, who invented the process. (See PAYNISING.)

Kyle, Carrick, and Cunningham.

Avrshire is divided into three parts: Kyle, a strong corn-growing soil; Carrick, a wild hilly portion, only fit for feeding cattle; and Cunningham, a rich dairy land. Hence the saying—

Kyle for a man, Carrick for a cow,
Cunningham for butter, Galloway for woe.

The last refers to the Mull of Galloway, noted for shipwrecks.

Ky'riē Elei'son. Greek, Lord, have mercy upon us.

Kyrle. (See ROSS.)

L

L. This letter represents an ox-goad, and is called in Hebrew lamed (an ox-goad).

L for fifty is half C (centum, a hundred).

L. E. L. Letitia Elizabeth Landon (afterwards Mrs. Maclean), a poetess of the "Lara" and "Corsair" school. (1802-1839.)

LL.D. Doctor of Laws—i.e., both civil and canon. The double L is the plural; thus MSS. is the plural of MS. (manuscript); pp., pages.

L.L. Whiskey. Lord-Lieutenant whiskey. Mr. Kinahan being requested to preserve a certain cask of whiskey highly approved of by his excellency, marked it with the initials L.L., and ever after called this particular quality L.L. Whiskey.

L'Africaine. An opera by Meyerbeer.

La Garde Meurt, ne se Rend Pas. The words falsely ascribed to General Cambronne, at the battle of Waterloo, and inscribed on his monument at Nantes.

La Muette de Portici. Anber's best opera. Also known as "Masaniello."

La Roche (1 syl.). A Protestant clergyman, whose story is told in The Mirror, by Henry Mackenzie.

Lab'adists. A religious sect of the seventeenth century, so called from Jean Labadie, of Bourg in Guyenne. They were Protestant ascetics, who sought reform of morals more than reform of doctrine. They rejected the observance of all holy days, and held certain mystic notions. The sect fell to pieces early in the eighteenth century.

Labarinto or Las Trecientas. The chief work of the poet Juan de Mena, called the Spanish Ennius; suggested by Dante's "Divina Comedia."

Lab'arum. The standard borne before the Roman emperors. It consisted of a lance with an eagle on the top, while from a cross-staff hung a splendid purple streamer, with a fringe, adorned with precious stones. Constantine substituted a crown for the eagle, and inscribed in the midst the mysterious monogram (see CONSTANTINE'S CROSS). Fifty of the bravest men were deputed to bear it. (Greek, laba, a staff; ruomai, to rescue from danger.)

La'be (Queen). The Circë of the Arabians, who, by her enchantments, transformed men into horses and other brute beasts. She is introduced into the "Arabian Nights' Entertainments," where Beder, prince of Persia, marries her, defeats her plots against him, and turns her into a mare. Being restored to her proper shape by her mother, she turns Beder into an owl; but the prince ultimately regains his own proper form, and makes his escape.

Lab'yrinth. Said to be so called from Lab'yrus, an Egyptian monarch of the twelfth dynasty. The chief labyrinths are:—

(1) The Egyptian, by Petesu'ehis or Tithoës, near the lake Mœris. It had 3,000 apartments, half of which were underground. (B.C. 1800.)

(2) The Cretan, by Dædalos, for imprisoning the Mi'notaurs. The only means of finding the way out of it was by a skein of thread.

(3) The Cretan conduit, which had 1,000 branches.

(4) The Lem'nian, by the architects Zmilus, Rholus, and Theodorus. It had 150 columns, so nicely adjusted that a child could turn them.

(5) The labyrinth of Ch'sium, by Persenna, king of Etruria for his tomb.

(6) The Samian, by Theodor'us. (B.C. 540.)

(7) The labyrinth at Woodstock, by Henry II., for the fair Rosamond.

(8) Of mazes formed by hedges, the best known is that of Hampton Court.

Labyrinth'odon (Greek for Lab'yrinth-tooth). A gigantic fossil sauroid, of the frog family, so called from the internal structure of its teeth.

Lace. I'll lace your jacket for you— beat you. (French, laisse, a lash; German, laschen, to strike.)
